Plain and economical as was their way of living, the Schiller family were emphatically gentlefolks. Among the honest Captain's best traits was a chivalrous respect and courtesy in his behaviour to his wife and daughters, and a ready deference to the wishes and suggestions of the former. The boy grew up in an atmosphere of honour, simplicity, and courtesy to women. That his mind was unusually impressionable and active, no one could doubt, who listened to his eager questioning, or noted his constant thirst for information ; but there was nothing of morbid precocity about him. Full of fun and frolic, he was always getting into scrapes, requiring the intervention of his mother to save him from paternal chastisement. But there was nothing of meanness or deception about his escapades, which exhibited a singularly fearless and simple-minded nature. Once at supper-time he was missing, and his absence alarmed his parents ; for a violent thunderstorm, with vivid flashes of forked lightning, was raging around Lorch. At last little Fritz was seen perched on the highest bough of a linden tree, evidently enjoying the sight, and very thoroughly wetted by the rain, now pouring down in torrents. To the half-angry, half-terrified questioning as to what he was doing there, he replied that he wanted to see "where all that fire in the sky came from." Another time his father noticed that his shoes were fastened with strings, instead of the buckles that should have adorned them. The child replied that he had given his buckles to a poor boy who had none to wear on Sundays, as he himself had a second pair for those occasions. Of proprietorship, in the ordinary sense, he seemed to have no idea. He would give away anything, and had to be seriously warned not to include his schoolbooks among his bounties.

EDUCATION ; THE LATIN SCHOOL ; THE PRINCELY PATRON AND HIS SCHEME.

In 1768, the Schiller family removed to Ludwigsburg, and the boy was sent to the Latin school, where he made good progress. His great wish, much encouraged by his pious mother, and complacently regarded by the Captain, was to become a clergyman. The preliminary steps for the long course of study considered necessary in Germany for the clerical calling had already been taken, when the boy's career was suddenly and unexpectedly altered.

Duke Carl of Württemberg, after a wild and misspent youth, was devoting the latter years of his life to useful works. Among other schemes, he had a project for establishing an educational institute, the "Military Plant School" (Militärische Pflanzschule), at the palace of Solitude. This establishment, afterwards removed to Stuttgart, and enlarged under the name of the "Carlschule," was especially intended for the sons of officers. Duke Carl had heard good reports of little Schiller, and accordingly signified to the captain his gracious intention to receive the boy among the pupils. This was equivalent to a command, for the captain was quite dependent on the sovereign's good-will. So after a faint endeavour to decline the honour, which the Duke met by a quiet reiteration of his orders, the parents were compelled, with rueful expressions of thanks, to give up all hope of clerical honours for their son ; and young Schiller entered the school, his father signing a bond on his behalf, setting forth that in consideration of a free education he was to be considered as attached to the service and remaining at the disposal of the Duke. The study to which he was to devote himself was the law. A drearier occupation than that of delving among the dusty preserves of the German Black-stones was surely never imposed upon a quick-witted, ardent youth of highly poetic temperament. No wonder, therefore, that Schiller eagerly seized an opportunity of changing the distasteful pursuit of the law for the more congenial study of medicine.

Even after this change, his position at the Carlschule was very dreary. There was a strong flavour of mingled convent and prison about the whole place. The youths were separated from friends and relatives, only mothers and sisters being allowed to visit sons and brothers on Sundays. The general supervision was entrusted to a number of drill-sergeants, whose irksome military pedantry fretted the lads to the verge of rebellion. No allowance was made for individuality of character or capacity. What was down in the order-book was to be learnt by all alike. It was education by tap of drum. Still, it must be conceded that the Duke recognized something unusual in the listless young student, the thin, tall, melancholy youth, for whom even Roman law seemed to have so few charms. "Let that one have his way; he will turn out something good," was his sagacious remark to an examiner, who wondered whether Schiller's incorrect answers arose from idleness or stupidity.

GERMAN LITERATURE OF THE PERIOD; NEW LIGHTS.

At that time a revolution was being quietly effected in German literature. The French pseudo-classic school that had been set up for imitation, full of sham shepherds and shepherdesses, and of old-world gods and goddesses, whom nobody cared for, had at length had its day; and works like Klopstock's Messiah, Lessing's Nathan the Wise, were teaching the German people something better and more life-like than could be learnt from stiff and shallow adaptations of the ancients. A very national book indeed made its way, most probably surreptitiously, into the prosaic and military precincts of the Carlschule. It was by the young poet Goethe, and was entitled Goetz von Berlichingen, a drama, setting forth the adventures of a German free knight of the beginning of the sixteenth century, with plenty of incident, combats, and love-scenes, and told throughout with an undoubted air of reality. This work falling into Schiller's hands, impressed him greatly; but he was still more struck with a German translation of Shakespeare, which was lent to him at this period. A book so different from anything he had ever yet seen excited at once his wonder and admiration. For a long time he could not comprehend the daring which united in the same scene the sublime and the grotesque, laughter and tears. Speaking of his Shakespeare, he says: "He was the object of my reverence and zealous study for years before I could love himself. I was not yet capable of comprehending nature at first hand; I had learned to admire her image reflected in the understanding, and put in order by rules."

Schiller's debt to Shakespeare was immense. In the arrangement of these historical dramas on which his fame chiefly rests, in Wallenstein, William Tell, the Maid of Orleans, we are continually reminded of passages from the prince of English poets. Schiller even undertook to translate Macbeth, a task which he accomplished with singular success, except in one notable instance, in describing that witch to whom the sailor's wife refused the chestnuts, and who threatened such dire vengeance upon the husband who was "to Aleppo gone, Master o' the Tiger." Schiller strangely enough transforms the hag into a "Nixe," or water-spirit, who lures a fisherman to destruction by the gift of magic gold.

SCHILLER'S FIRST WORK, "THE ROBBERS."

The perusal of these works roused the poetic spirit within him, and awoke his ambition to produce a work of his own. His whole soul was in secret revolt against the hard pedantic military discipline of the place, where entire renunciation of individual action and even opinion was demanded as the price of education at the cost of the state. In secret, amid numberless difficulties and hindrances, he wrote his first tragedy, The Robbers. It was in many respects an outpouring of his own pent-up enthusiasm and love of liberty. Carl Moor, the hero, disgusted at the duplicity and treachery he meets with in the world, throws all the restraints of society and law to the winds, and becomes the captain of a band of outlaws proposing to seize from the rich that he may give to the poor, and to right wrong by violence and crime. He fails, of course; and satisfies poetical justice by surrendering to the authorities. The villain of the piece, the treacherous son and brother, Franz Moor, driven mad by the horrors of a guilty conscience, commits suicide. The work, the production of an inspired schoolboy, was naturally full of defects—of unconscious plagiarisms, as shown in the Iago-like soliloquies of the villain Franz—bristling with incongruities and absurdities even; but showing strength, originality, and promise of future excellence in every page. "His sentences, in their rude emphasis," says Carlyle, "come down like the club of Hercules; the stroke is often of a crushing force, but its sweep is irregular and awkward." That the work should have been written at all, is a marvellous triumph of persistency over difficulties; and those who complain of the want of truth to nature, in this the earliest production of Schiller's genius, should bear in mind his own temperate and sensible explanation, written at a later date. "Any disposition to poetry," he says, "did violence to the laws of the institution where I was educated, and contradicted the plan of its founder. For eight years my enthusiasm struggled with military discipline; but the passion for poetry is vehement and fiery as a first love. What discipline was meant to extinguish, it blew into a flame. To escape from arrangements that tortured me, my heart sought refuge in the world of ideas, when as yet I was unacquainted with the world of realities, from which iron bars excluded me. I was unacquainted with men; for the four hundred that lived with me were but repetitions of the same creature, accurate casts of one single mould, and of that very mould that plastic nature solemnly disclaimed."

DOUBTS AND DIFFICULTIES; FLIGHT TO MANNHEIM.

Schiller was about nineteen years old when he wrote the play, but so long as he remained a student at the Carlschule he was obliged to keep the manuscript to himself. When he had completed his medical studies, however, and had been appointed surgeon to the Würtemberg regiment Augré, he ventured to publish it, and the effect it created throughout Germany was immense. While none could doubt that a great genius had arisen, many were staggered at the extravagances mingled with true touches of sublimity and pathos. Some even saw danger to public morality in the exhibition of a gang of outlaws, for whose leader the author enlists the sympathy of his audience.

The young poet might have looked with indifference on unfounded censure and on exaggerated praise; but now a voice was heard which had a far more material bearing on his well-being, that of the Grand Duke. By the terms of the educational contract entered into for him by his father, Schiller was emphatically the servant of the Grand Duke, whose behests he was bound to obey. That great potentate could find no merit in the Kobbers, but, on the other hand, he saw much there of a dangerous "liberal" tendency. He therefore called Schiller before him, rebuked him, and dismissed him with an emphatic injunction to write nothing more, except on medical subjects; or, if he produced any poetry, to submit his work to the criticism of His Highness. Schiller was in a painful strait. On the one hand, there was the voice within him urging him to "be up and doing, with a heart for any fate;" conscious of his power and genius, to renounce poetry was to give up all that made life valuable. On the other hand, his father, the sturdy old captain, with his wife and daughters, was entirely dependent on the favour of the Grand Duke. Meanwhile his play was put on the stage at Mannheim, and was applauded to the echo. The young author came secretly to Mannheim to witness the first representation of the tragedy. A second visit was punished by military arrest, and things began to look very black for the poet. For it must be remembered that Germany had no Habeas Corpus Act. Personal liberty was not guarded as in England, by legal enactment, and the man who offended the authorities might find himself suddenly arrested, and immured in a fortress, without formal accusation, trial, or sentence. Such had been the fate of Daniel Schubart, a poor erratic poet and musician, very thoughtless and eccentric, and much given to convivial excess in the wines of the Rhineland and Franconia, but as harmless as La Fontaine or John Gay. But Schubart was a newspaper editor, a dangerous calling in a despotic country; and he had offended an Austrian general, the imperial agent at Ulm, by refusing to play on a bad harpsichord, for which that magnanimous officer vowed revenge. Accordingly, when Schubart inserted in his newspaper a report that the Empress-Queen Maria Theresa had been struck by apoplexy, Reid demanded the exemplary punishment of the unlucky poet, who was arrested by a stratagem, conveyed to Hohenasperg, a fortress near Stuttgart, and kept a close prisoner for nine years. The first was passed in confinement in a subterranean dungeon, under such conditions of cruelty that the captive nearly escaped his tormentors by death. Afterwards some slight alleviation was granted him, and he found a friend in his gaoler, who had himself experienced the tender mercies of the paternal Government of Würtemberg, having been once a prisoner himself. "For four years he had seen no human face; his scanty food had been lowered to him through a trap-door; neither chair nor table was allowed him, his cell was never swept, his beard and nails were left to grow, the humblest conveniences of civilized humanity were denied to him."

Schiller had once seen Schubart in his prison at Hohenasperg, and the probability of a similar fate so haunted him, that at last he made up his mind to seek safety in flight. In September, 1782, there were to be grand doings in the good Residenz-Stadt, Stuttgart. The Grand Duke Paul (afterwards the mad Emperor of Russia) was to be received there, with his bride, a niece of the Duke of Würtemberg. Schiller took advantage of the bustle and confusion attending a grand illumination of the Palace of "Solitude" on the evening of the 17th, and with a faithful friend, a young musician named Streicher, fled in a post-chaise from Stuttgart.

His immediate destination was Mannheim, where he hoped to establish himself as salaried poet to the theatre, which was under the direction of Baron Dalberg, a man of considerable mental cultivation and great influence. It must be remembered that theatres in the principal towns were then, as they have since continued to be, under state supervision and control, and were looked upon somewhat in the light of public educational institutions. Schiller began by offering Dalberg the manuscript of a second tragedy he had just written, Fiesco, or the Revolt of Genoa, concerning which they had already been in correspondence; but the cautious director, knowing the dangerous position of the distressed poet, who was living in doubt and poverty at Mannheim, trembling lest the Duke should demand his extradition, first declared that the piece must be remodelled to make it fit for the stage, and when this had been done, still refused to receive it.

FRIENDS IN NEED; PERSEVERANCE; DAWNING OF BETTER TIMES.

Fortunately, Schiller had made the acquaintance of a wealthy bookseller, Schwann, who purchased the manuscript of Fiesco at the rate of a louis d'or per sheet, about eight pounds sterling for the whole tragedy.

His embarrassments were for a time stopped by the cordial help and friendship of a Frau von Wolzogen, one of the kindest of ladies, the mother of Wilhelm von Wolzogen, a fellow-student of Schiller's at the Carlschule. This good Samaritan now offered the poet an asylum in her country house at Bauerbach, near Meinungen, and here for some time the fugitive remained in retirement, under the name of Dr. Ritter. His time was not wasted. During the eight months of his residence at Bauerbach, he wrote his third tragedy, Kabale und Liebe (Intrigue and Love).

"Everything comes at last to him who knows how to wait," says the French proverb. Schiller's horizon was gradually clearing, and signs of better times appeared. The Duke had given no sign of any disposition to pursue the fugitive, whose place as army-surgeon had been quietly filled up; nor had good old Captain Schiller been annoyed in any way. Then cautious Dalberg took courage and re-opened negotiations; and it was arranged that Schiller was to be engaged as theatre-poet at Mannheim for a salary of 500 gulden, or £50 a year. For some time he continued to be worried, not exactly like Hogarth's distressed poet, by demands for a milk-score, but by debts of various kinds that hung round his neck like a millstone. Sturdy Captain Schiller, whose income did not amount to £50 a year, managed, though not without some natural growling, to give him occasional assistance: a draft of £10, to pay which it was necessary to break into a fund he had saved for his daughter's outfit, seems to have especially annoyed the good old father, who could, moreover, never quite reconcile himself to the idea that his son had run away; and considered that "a theatre-poet in Germany was but a small light."

Indeed, the captain was exceedingly desirous to have the wanderer back again in Württemberg, and proposed that a petition should be addressed to the Duke on the subject. But here Schiller, in general the most acquiescent of men, gave a very decided negative. His honour would suffer frightfully, he said, if after his flight, which, with the reasons that prompted it, was known to all Germany, it should now be said of him that he had turned back after having once dared Fortune. He had chosen his own course, and would stand the hazard of the die. He would not consent to appear, like Shakespeare's Bolingbroke —

"Sick in the world's regard, wretched and low,
A poor unminded outlaw sneaking home."

He would either return, some day, to Württemberg, as a man who had made his way by his own strength, or he would never see his native state again. And the sturdy old father, while he lamented the enforced separation, in his secret soul admired his son all the more for the young man's readiness to accept the fortune he had chosen.

THE THIRD TRAGEDY, "KABALE UND LIEBE."

The third of Schiller's tragedies, Kabale und Liebe, was entirely different in style from its predecessors. "I tell nobody that I possess a copy of thy new tragedy," wrote Captain Schiller, with a kind of suppressed exultation. "I dare not, on account of certain passages, let any one know that it has pleased me." We can well understand what these "certain passages" were. Schiller, in his outspoken hatred of wrong, had denounced the wicked misgovernment and tyranny of the despotic princes of his own time, their practice of selling "teams of men" for the service of foreign states in Armenia and elsewhere. "You may extend your traffic," the great Lord Chatham had cried indignantly, a few years before, to the House of Lords, in reference to the Hessian troops employed in the American war.

"You may extend your traffic to the shambles of every German despot." The manly denunciation of these vile practices helped to procure a great success for the piece, which was even acted in Stuttgart; and if Captain Schiller did not go, incognito, to see it played, we may be sure it was not for want of inclination. Schiller had never doubted that he should leave his mark on the literature of Germany, but now his success with the public was assured; and with the steady and quiet perseverance that forms one of the truest attributes of genius, he sat down to struggle with his debts and embarrassments, to create for himself a position of modest independence, and to found a home of the plainest kind. Never was a man more moderate in his desires, or more impressed with the fact that "man wants but little here below." For a long time, his ideas of financial success were bounded by the hope of making six or seven hundred florins, sixty or seventy pounds, a year; nor did he ever in later times show any care for money beyond the natural and praiseworthy care to see his wife and children secured from the struggle he had himself gone through. He was plain, unaffected, and eminently "sensible" in manners, dress, and speech, "contemning all things mean, his truth unquestioned, and his soul serene." Never was a man more entirely free from affectation or self-consciousness. With Leigh Hunt's Abou ben Adhem also, he might have said, "Write me as one that loved his fellow-men." Depth of feeling, grandeur of expression, vast range of thought, appear in every page of the works that have made his name immortal; and while of the worldly wisdom requisite to pecuniary success, and high social advancement he was entirely destitute, he was, on the other hand, free from that looseness of principle that has wrecked many a career, by allowing to genius an immunity from the ordinary duties and responsibilities of life. To be what he called "an honest man," to pay his way, and be free from the grinding anxieties and pitfalls of debt, was the object for which he strove unweariedly for years; and the wise simplicity and frugality of his arrangements, when he had a household of his own, left his mind clear, once and for all, from such sordid cares and anxieties as have darkened the lives of many men of genius, and that hurried Goldsmith, for example, to an untimely grave.

SUMMONS TO WEIMAR—"DON CARLOS" BEGUN AND COMPLETED.

In 1784, Schiller undertook the editorship of a literary periodical, The Rhenish Thalia, devoted chiefly to dramatic criticism. At this period he removed for a time to Leipsic, where he made the acquaintance of various useful and sympathetic friends, foremost among them being Körner, the father of the poet, whose war songs were destined, in 1813, to exert so great an influence in rousing Germany to resistance against Napoleon. In a quiet little cottage, in the village of Gohlis, a mile or two from Leipsic, Schiller worked diligently at a new drama, which he had undertaken, after considering and rejecting various subjects, such as a second part to The Robbers, a tragedy on Conradin of Swabia, and a translation of Shakespeare's Timon of Athens. The subject on which he at last decided was a tragedy on the fate of Don Carlos, the unhappy son of Philip II. of Spain. In the autumn of the same year he removed to Dresden. One of the most important events of his life was his introduction to the Duke of Weimar, Carl August, whose interest in the poet was strongly aroused by hearing Schiller read the first act of Don Carlos at the Court of Darmstadt. A long conversation with Schiller, which confirmed his good opinion, led him to bestow on the poet the title of "Hofrath," or Court Counsellor. This gave him what the Germans would call "a new standpoint" with society in general, and the Duke of Würtemberg in particular. He was fulfilling the promise he had made, to carve out a fortune for himself. In 1787 another step was taken, in his removal to Weimar, at that time the Athens of Germany. By this time he had made the acquaintance of the Von Lengefeld family, old friends of his former schoolfellow, Wilhelm von Wolzogen; to one of two sisters, Charlotte von Lengefeld, he became a suitor, and married her on the 20th of February, 1790; for by this time another event had occurred, which filled the heart of old Captain—we beg his pardon, now Major Schiller—with joy and pride. His famous son had been appointed to a professorship of modern history at the University of Jena. Thus what the old man had long and ardently desired for his son, a fixed and honourable position, was definitely won; and soon afterwards came the marriage of the poet to Charlotte von Lengefeld, who proved the best of wives, and thoroughly valued and appreciated her poet husband. Not least among the evidences of Schiller's genuine nature is the affectionate attachment he continued to show towards his parents so long as they lived, and towards his sisters to the last day of his life.

MERITS AND FAULTS OF "DON CARLOS."

The publication and representation of Don Carlos was the chief literary event during this period. Here the poet handles his favourite subject, the championship of liberty against tyranny and oppression. The fault in the play is perhaps its undue elaboration; and Schiller himself acknowledged that in the course of the action the attention and sympathy of the audience is too much diverted from the hero, the unfortunate Carlos, to the champion of liberty and toleration, the heroic Marquis Posa. The character of Philip II., the gloomy suspicious tyrant, himself a slave to superstition, is powerfully drawn. We see him in his miserable lonely supremacy, far removed from human sympathy, seeking to crush all freedom of action, with the inquisition and the military cruelty of Alva for his agents. He distrusts his son, the unfortunate Carlos, whom he suspects of designs upon his crown and his life. Won for a moment to better thoughts by the pleading of the heroic Posa, who conjures him to crown the edifice of his power by granting freedom of thought throughout his dominions, and binding his subjects to him by ties of gratitude and affection, he relapses into dark suspicion, and sacrifices the son who loves him, and the wise counsellor who would have led him to better things. The piece is full of lofty thoughts and heroic sentiments, and like the majority of Schiller's works, is an eloquent vindication of right and justice against oppression and wrong. The point that strikes the reader as a fault is the fact that Marquis Posa's philosophy belongs rather to the eighteenth than to the sixteenth century. His plea for "Gedanken-freiheit," freedom of thought, especially in religious matters, would have conveyed no definite idea in Spain, except perhaps that the inquisition should lose no time in laying hands on the heretic who dared to propose such a measure.

Another drawback, which indeed attaches to several of Schiller's heroic characters, is that to some extent he, like Cumberland, "paints men as they ought to be, not as they are." His great men are in general abstractions, portraits of lofty and noble qualities; but they lack that infusion of the dross of human nature, those occasional moments of doubt and weakness which would render them real. Schiller, for instance, could have admirably painted Henry V. encouraging his men with burning words of eloquence on the morning of Agincourt: but he had not the versatility that portrayed the heroic king with a touch of the "Harry Madcap" of old days still lingering about him, good-humouredly bantering bragging Pistol, as 'Harry Le Roy,' and exchanging challenge-gloves with the bluff soldier, who promises to "take him a box o' the ear." Carlyle, after pointing out some of the imperfections of the work, of which, it may be observed, the author himself was fully conscious, says: "Yet with all this, Carlos is a noble tragedy. There is a stately massiveness about the structure of it; the incidents are grand and affecting; the characters powerful, vividly conceived, and impressively, if not completely, delineated." The success of Carlos, alike among readers and spectators, far exceeded Schiller's expectations; and with him success was never an excuse for idleness, or even rest; but ever an incentive to new exertion. "Still achieving, still pursuing," was his motto; and he had shown, in full measure, that he had learned "to labour and to wait." No man more earnestly devoted himself to his work. In Weimar he even incurred the imputation of being unsociable, from his reluctance to quit his desk for the pleasures of society. Thus, in one of his letters, he writes: "I am complained of here, because they say I shall injure my health by hard work and by sitting at home. But that's how people are! They can't forgive one for being able to do without them. And how dearly they sell the little pleasure they are able to impart! If the most complete indifference concerning clubs and circles and coffee-parties constitute a misanthrope, I have certainly become one in Rudolstadt."

SCHILLER'S ILLNESS; PRACTICAL SYMPATHY OF UNKNOWN FRIENDS.

The public remonstrance against overwork was not, in his case, without reason. His constitution had never been strong; and in 1791. Schiller was seized with an illness that threatened to put a stop at once to his literary activity and his life. It was an affection of the chest, accompanied by violent spasms; and for a time he was in great danger. His fortitude never left him. "We must submit to the all-governing Providence," he whispered to his weeping wife, and work so long as we have strength. Es näre, doch schön," he said with a beaming smile to his Charlotte, when hope of his recovery awoke. "It would be beautiful after all, if we might remain longer together." He recovered sufficiently to return to his work, and to enrich the world for some years longer with the outpourings of a genius that grew brighter as its bodily tenement became more frail; but he was never again in perfect health; and his subsequent works were written in intervals of bodily weakness and pain, that would have crushed a less determined spirit. "We must work while we have strength," he had said; and it was the strength of the mounting spirit, and of the purified will, that fought against the physical weakness to the last.

Some amount of rest, however, was imperatively necessary; and this rest would be of little avail, unless the poet's mind could be kept free from anxiety for the future; for he was now a husband and a father; and great as was his fame, he had literally still to work for his living. Just at that moment came help in the most acceptable form, and all the sweeter for the poet, inasmuch as it showed how he was appreciated beyond the bounds of Germany. The Duke of Holstein-Augustenburg (the grandfather of the Prince Christian, Queen Victoria's son-in-law), and his friend Count von Schimmelmann, wrote to Schiller, from Denmark, a letter full of warm admiration and delicate sympathy, begging him to accept a pension of a thousand dollars for three years. "We wish to preserve for the human race one of its teachers," wrote the friends; and as though conscious that such an offer from strangers might hurt the susceptibilities of the poet, they earnestly deprecate any imputation of undue interference in his affairs. "Your health," they say, "shattered by too persistent effort and overwork, requires complete rest for a time, if it is to be restored, and the danger which threatens your life averted. But your circumstances prevent you from allowing yourself this rest. Will you allow us the happiness to make this enjoyment easier to you?" . . . The poet accepted the offer with a simple and honest expression of thanks. The Duke wrote back, thanking Schiller for having understood the offer and its motives. "Your conduct in this affair is quite worthy of you," he writes, "and increases the esteem I already entertained for you." Schiller intended to accept the urgent invitation of the Duke to visit him in Copenhagen; but his health was never strong enough to allow him to undertake a northern journey.

A VISIT TO WÜRTTEMBERG.

His parents were rejoiced at this piece of good fortune; and Schiller, in the next year, was able to journey to Württemberg once more, and first at Heilbronn, and afterwards in Ludwigsburg and at Solitude, he visited the proud old father and mother, who could not rejoice sufficiently in his fame. The Grand Duke, to whom he had written, had not the grace to reply to the former pupil who had quitted his service without leave; but declared publicly that if Schiller came to Stuttgart, he would "ignoriren" or take no notice of him. Duke Carl died in the next year. He is chiefly now remembered as having probably been instrumental, by his opposition, in making Schiller earlier and more completely known in Germany, than if he had never interfered with his literary career.

"There he rests, this man who was once so active," said Schiller, soon after, to a friend, at Duke Carl's tomb. "He had great faults as a ruler, greater faults as a man; but the former were outweighed by his great qualities, and the remembrance of the latter must be buried with the dead. Therefore, I tell thee, if you hear any one talking against him, now he is lying there, trust not that man; he is not a good, certainly not a noble-minded, man." The poet also steadfastly refused to write a congratulatory ode to Duke Carl's successor, on his accession, lest it might seem to convey a reproach on the dead master who had after all, in his way, been kind to him.

Very remarkable was a prophecy he made at that time concerning the newly constructed French republic. "It will end as suddenly as it has appeared," he said. "The republican constitution will degenerate into a condition of anarchy; and sooner or later a strong man of intellect will appear, let him come whence he may, who will make himself lord, not only of France, but perhaps of a great part of Europe." At this time Bonaparte, an unknown man, was serving as a colonel of artillery.

A great solace and assistance to Schiller in his literary career was the friendship of Goethe, with whom he became acquainted about this time. At first Goethe was prepossessed rather against than in favour of the younger poet, whose first works had appeared extravagant and unreal to the man of maturer years and taste. But two such men could not fail, when once brought together, to value and love each other; and a friendship sprang up between Goethe and Schiller, that was never interrupted till death severed it.

Not much longer was the proud old father to rejoice in the fame of his glorious son. On the 6th of September, 1796, his modest, useful life came to an end. He was seventy-two years old, and had worked almost to the last.

REVOLT OF THE NETHERLANDS; THE THIRTY YEARS' WAR.

Schiller's work in Jena naturally turned his attention to history; and the first fruits of his studies in that direction are seen in his History of the Revolt of the Netherlands against Spain. The work was never completed; but even as a fragment it contains many valuable passages and very picturesque descriptions of characters and events. It was eclipsed, however, by the far more valuable and complete History of the Thirty Years' War. Here he had a splendid subject—a theme that belonged not to one people and country, but to Europe and to humanity. If we compare the animated and picturesque narrative of the poet with the dreary tirades of the Dryasdusts who preceded him, we shall appreciate the lesson he gave his countrymen and foreigners in the manner of writing history. The characters of the chief actors in the great drama are portrayed with much felicity, especially those of the great rivals Wallenstein and Gustavus Adolphus, the latter of whom he represents as the bright heroic central figure of the picture, the knight without fear and without reproach,—carrying on the combat for the freedom of religious faith,—never swerving from his high purpose, from the time when his stern, determined, disciplined pikemen were disembarked on the island in the Baltic, till that fatal day of dear-bought victory when his corpse was discovered, amid heaps of the common dead, on the plain of Lützen, close by the rocky fragment that has ever since been known as the "Stone of the Swede." The philosophy may here and there be too speculative and cloudy; and it has been objected that the poet-historian makes too complete a contrast between Wallenstein and the Swedish king, painting the characters rather with dramatic force than with historic accuracy. But in spite of sundry drawbacks the History of the Thirty Years' War is a noble work; and would be valued at a higher rate, had its glories not been eclipsed by those of a far loftier production—"the greatest dramatic work," Carlyle rightly says, "of the seventeenth century," the noble trilogy Wallenstein.

WALLENSTEIN; THE CAMP; THE PICCOLO-MINI; WALLENSTEIN'S DEATH.

This may be considered as the greatest work of the poet's life. It occupied him at intervals during seven years, and was first produced at Weimar, in 1799. The subject is well worthy of Schiller's genius. During the thirty years' war, Albert Wallenstein, a Bohemian noble, was employed by the Emperor Ferdinand II. against the Protestant armies. Wallenstein, a man of great wealth and of considerable reputation as a soldier, brought together for Ferdinand an army of more than forty thousand men, and was brilliantly successful against the Emperor's enemies. But on the complaint of the German princes, whose territories were plundered ruthlessly by his men, he was dismissed, reluctantly enough, by the Emperor; and lived for some time in ostentatious retirement in his palace at Prague. But a new danger arose. Gustavus Adolphus landed in Germany; and after Tilly, the imperial general, had been twice worsted, and at length mortally wounded, it became necessary to recall Wallenstein at all hazards. That ambitious man would return to the Emperor's service only on condition that the whole management of the war was put into his hands as generalissimo, and he excited the suspicion of the court by negotiations, and secret accommodations with the Saxons and Swedes. His design, probably, was to force the Emperor to a peace, and to claim the sovereignty of Bohemia for himself. After the death of Gustavus, at Lützen, Wallenstein's conduct became still more equivocal. He was evidently allowing loopholes of escape to an enemy he might now have vanquished with ease; and at last found himself in a position of complete antagonism to the Emperor. Trusting in his boundless influence over his own troops, he conceived the treacherous design of leading over the army to the enemy. But his plots were countermined. He was outlawed; and an order went forth that he should be seized and delivered up to the Emperor, dead or alive. At the frontier town of Egra, in Bohemia, while he was waiting the arrival of the Swedish forces whom he was to join, Wallenstein was assassinated by certain of his own officers, in February, 1634. The greater number of his men had already deserted him. Of the rest, some regiments were disbanded, and some were allowed to swear fealty afresh to the Emperor.

This is the foundation of the dramatic work of Schiller. In the first part, entitled Wallenstein's Camp, we are introduced to the soldiers of the great adventurer. We learn what kind of men these are whom Wallenstein heads, and how comparatively easy it is to lead astray from their fealty men who care so much for their chief and so little for their nominal master, the Emperor, who is to them a mere abstraction. For this is not a national army, but a mob of men of all nations—Italians, Germans, Walloons from Flanders, Bohemians, Scots, Irishmen,—all who are ready to fight for fray and plunder. There are differences in the various corps. Some, like the arquebusiers of Tiefenbach, are inclined to be loyal to the Emperor; but the majority are ready to do anything for Wallenstein, whose name, to them, represents fortune and plunder and victory. In the prologue Schiller explains the necessity of regarding this first part as a kind of key to the comprehension of the rest. We see here unlimited power in the hands of a bold, unscrupulous man, smarting under the sense of injury:—

"It was his might that led his heart astray,
His camp alone explains to us his crime."

In the second part, The Piccolomini, the plot develops itself naturally and skilfully. The generals and Wallenstein are here introduced; Illo and Terzky, the evil counsellors, who play upon their lord's ambition, and incite him to treason, for their own purposes; Octavio Piccolomini, the old cold-hearted courtier, who keeps up the outward appearance of friendship to his master, while he is planning his destruction, and is the holder of the decree of outlawry that is to ruin Wallenstein; and Max Piccolomini, his son, the impersonation of honesty and heroism—the man who admires and respects Wallenstein from the bottom of his heart, and who, when informed by his father of the general's intended treachery, first refuses to believe it possible, and then declares that he will seek an explanation with the Duke himself, and will never consent to wear a mask, and show a face of friendship while conniving at the secret plots of court intrigue and treachery.

"Thy way is crooked; it is not my way," he says to his father, when that wily politician reckons on his help against Wallenstein, who has been his patron and his friend. He exclaims indignantly,—

"My way must be straight on. True with the tongue, False with the heart, I may not, cannot be;
Nor can I suffer that a man should trust me—
As his friend trust me—and then hush my conscience
With such low pleas as these, 'I asked him not;
He did it all at his own hazard, and My mouth has never lied to him.'"

Octavio piteously pleads the hardships of seeing his "toilsome labours and state policy" rendered useless by his son; but to Max truth and honour stand higher than all else, and must first be satisfied.

Here also the character of the chief who wields so mighty a power is drawn with consummate skill. He is not essentially a man of action, though his ambition is great, and he feels that he should eat his heart in the bitterness of enforced retirement, if for the second time he were dismissed from the kingly position to which the fortunes of war and the necessities of the state had raised him. Like Macbeth, he "would not play false, and yet would wrongly win." He has not the strength to say to the temptation that besets him, "Avaunt! What have I to do with thee?" He is at last compelled to go forward in the bad path, because he lets the time go by in which he might choose the good. At one time he is almost determined to give up the treasonous enterprise. When he thinks of that kingly Bourbon, "the great constable, the subject of Francis the First, who sold himself to the enemies of his country, and fought against the fatherland he should have protected, bearing the banner of Charles of Germany, he thinks how even a warrior's death became dishonour to the man who made himself his country's foe, and left but the name of a giant traitor behind him. But then the magnitude of the stake for which he fights comes before his mind. In what respect is the action he meditates worse than the deed committed by that mighty Caesar, whose fame has gone forth over all the earth? Did not the great Julius lead against Rome those legions that Rome had entrusted to him for her protection? "Give me his fortune; I will bear the rest," says the proud leader, conscious of the power he wields in the unquestioning attachment of the wild hordes who follow him as Highland clansmen follow their chief. A mystic, dreamy superstition, too, strengthens the hold established on him by his own ambition and the insidious promptings of evil-minded followers. He is a believer in astrology, and believes that "Friedland's star" will shine brightest in the blackest night. This is especially seen when Terzky and Illo, the low-minded, unscrupulous traitors, who tempt him to wrong for their own purposes, are urging him to an overt act of treason against the emperor, and bitterly deprecating the hesitation that is causing him, they think, to miss the opportunity of striking a decisive blow. The passage forms part of the eleventh scene of the first act in the Piccolomini.

"Wal. The time is not yet come.

Ter. So you say always,

But when will it be time?

Wal. When I shall say it.

Illo. You'll wait upon the stars, and on their hours,
Till the earthly hour escapes you. O, believe me,
In your own bosom are your destiny's stars.
Confidence in yourself, prompt resolution,
This is your Venus! and the sole malignant,
The only one that harmeth you is doubt.

Wal. Thou speakest as thou understand'st. How oft
And many a time I've told thee, Jupiter,
That lustrous god, was setting at thy birth.
Thy visual power subdues no mysteries;

Mole-eyed, thou may'st but burrow in the earth
Blind as that subterrestrial, who with wam,
Lead-coloured shine lighted thee into life.
The common, the terrestrial, thou may'st see,
With serviceable cunning knit together
The nearest and the nearest; and therein
I trust thee and believe thee! but what'er
Full of mysterious import Nature weaves,
And fashions in the depths—the spirit's ladder,
That from this gross and visible world of dust
Even to the starry world, with thousand rounds, Builds itself up; on which the unseen powers
Move up and down on heavenly ministries—
The circles in the circles, that approach
The central sun with ever-narrowing orbit—
These see the glance alone, the unsealed eye,
Of Jupiter's glad children born in lustre.

(He walks across the chamber, then returns, and, standing still, proceeds.)

The heavenly constellations make not merely
The day and night, summer and spring, not merely Signify to the husbandman the seasons
Of sowing and harvest.

Human action,
That is the seed too of contingencies,
Strewed on the dark land of futurity,
In hopes to reconcile the powers of fate,
Whence it behoves us to seek out the seed-time,
To watch the stars, select their proper hours,
And trace with searching eye the heavenly houses,
Whether the enemy of growth and thriving
Hide himself not, malignant, in his corner.
'Therefore permit me my own time. Meanwhile
Do you your part. As yet I cannot say
What I shall do—only, give way I will not.
Depose me too they shall not. On these points
You may rely."

His resolution is at length taken: he will do this dark deed of treachery, that, like Macbeth's crime,—

"Shall, to all his days and nights to come, Give solely sovereign sway and masterdom."
He can say with Cæsar, "Jacta est alea," the die is cast.

In the third part of the trilogy, The Death of Wallenstein, the end of the tragic history is reached. Around the guilty man, who in his falling seems "a pillar of state, majestic still in ruin," the net of retribution is closing. His steps are dogged by the avenging Nemesis, while he deems that all is going well; the steel is being sharpened that is to put an end at once to his enterprise and his life. The friends whom he has trusted forsake him treacherously, and swell the ranks of his foes; but Max Piccolomini has still maintained his honour. He has boldly and plainly told the great leader that this is an evil thing that Wallenstein purposes doing. If his chief will openly and honestly renounce the Emperor's service, Max will go with him, and still follow him through evil and through good report. But he can take no part in an enterprise of treason; and though his heart is torn by the consciousness that in renouncing Wallenstein he is destroying his own hopes of happiness, by parting from Thekla, the daughter of his chief, whom he loves with all the chivalrous devotion of his noble soul, he goes forth at the head of his regiment of cuirassiers to find a worthy death in the battle-field, while the guilty leader perishes ignobly by the hand of the assassin. Few passages, even in Schiller's dramatic writings, are more beautifully pathetic than the lines in which the great, noble, guilty Wallenstein, at the moment when he awaits the triumph of his enterprise, thinks mournfully of the gallant young Piccolomini, the tidings of whose heroic death has just reached him:—

"He the more fortunate! yea, he hath finished!
For him there is no longer any future;
His life is bright—bright without spot it was,
And cannot cease to be. No ominous hour
Knocks at his door with tidings of mishap.
Far off is he, above desire and fear;
No more submitted to the change and chance
Of the un-tearable planets. O 'tis well
With him! But who knows what the coming hour, Veil'd in thick darkness, brings for us!"

The whole is a splendid dramatic epic of human greatness, and weakness of love and heroism, of crime and retribution.

DOMESTIC LIFE; SCHILLER AND HIS MOTHER AND SISTERS.

It is pleasant to notice how the poet, occupied with work into which he threw his whole soul, yet had time for affectionate correspondence with his old mother and his three sisters; and how he maintained an active and tender solicitude for all that concerned their happiness. The eldest of the sisters, Christophine, two years older than the poet, and the constant friend and companion of his younger days, was married to Reinwald, the court librarian at Meiningen. She lived to the age of ninety, the last thirty years of her long life being spent in widowhood; and indeed, during her husband's life, her career was one of endurance and hardship in many respects. For Reinwald was a gloomy, bitter-spirited, disappointed man. Hardly treated by fortune, and without the elasticity of mind that enables many to meet the fickle goddess's frowns with a cheerful laugh; a scholar, and a ripe and good one, he had toiled on for years and years at clerkship drudgery, waiting for promotion, which coming at length, was after a short time arbitrarily withdrawn. His health gave way under the strain; and for years the devoted wife was the best of nurses and companions to the poor scholar, who, with the position of sub-librarian and a munificent salary of £15 a year, had to do the work for a senior librarian, whose office was a sinecure. Ill luck attended him in worldly matters to the last. A most learned translation of the Anglo-Saxon poem "Heliand" (Heiland, Saviour), with glossary, "from a transcript of the Cotton library copy in England," occupied him for years; but no publisher would undertake the printing at his own risk. Poor Reinwald sent his MS. to the Munich library; and his labours were in after years much appreciated by a bookworm, who, finding poor Reinwald's learned work, used the deceased librarian's brains in an edition published for his own glorification. Christophine's letters show her to have been a thoroughly good, gentle, helpful woman; and poor morose Reinwald, captious to others, had a deep affection for his untiring and contented wife. Luise, the second sister, had a far more cheerful fate. She married, at the age of thirty-three, an excellent clergyman named Frankh, and had the happiness of receiving her old mother in the quiet parsonage of Clever-Sulzbach, and of ministering to the last declining days of that good, affectionate soul. Promotion, too, in a modest way, came to Parson Frankh, in the shape of a better living, at Möckmühl; where he died, in 1834, his wife surviving him for about two years. When she died, in September, 1836, she had completed her seventieth year. Nannette, the youngest of the family, was only five years old at the time of her brother's memorable flight from Stuttgart. She seems to have been the darling of the family, and to have had some share of her brother's genius. She was cut off suddenly in her nineteenth year, by a malignant fever, to the great grief of her family, and especially of her old father, who survived her only a few months. In sending little presents to his sisters, in cordial sympathy with their joys and sorrows, and true brotherly affection towards them, Schiller never failed. "Thy dear husband's promotion to Möckmühl," he writes to Luise, "of which I heard a week ago through our sister" (meaning Christophine), "has rejoiced us greatly, not only for the improvement it makes in your position, but because it is such an honourable testimony to my dear brother-in-law's merits. May you be very happy in these new relations, and may you long enjoy them. We, too, shall by this be a few miles nearer to you; and in a future journey to Franconia, which we are meditating every year, we may get over to you more easily." Never was a more simple, single-hearted man than Friedrich Schiller. Not a grief nor a care of his good hard-working sisters in which he did not sympathize; and very pleasant it was to see how with ready affection he rejoices in everything that can affect them favourably, trying, amid his own hard work and failing health, to throw a ray of cheerfulness over the dark places of their lives.

INCREASED FAME AND PROSPERITY; "MARY STUART."

Schiller's outward circumstances were such as completely to satisfy him. For wealth he cared nothing, for never was there a man of simpler habits; but he desired to see the future subsistence of his children secured; and in this he succeeded, and was content. His salary at Jena was several times increased, and with reason, as advantageous offers were made to him from the Universities of Tübingen and Berlin; and the Duke of Weimar, who behaved like a prince to him, and, unsolicited, bestowed upon him a title of nobility in 1802, though, in truth, the name of Schiller required no prefix to render it illustrious.

The one drawback to this modest prosperity was the unsatisfactory state of his health, which no care perhaps could have permanently re-established, but which certainly suffered from the poet's unremitting industry. Dramatic composition now occupied him more than ever. In conjunction with his friend Goethe, he entertained a scheme for remodelling many of the German plays, and thus establishing a "German theatre." He was obliged to quit Jena, first in the winter, and then permanently, for the air was too keen for his weak lungs. He established himself finally at Weimar; but wherever he might be, or whatever might be his state of health, he seemed always conscious, by a kind of pre-science, that for him the night was coming quickly, in which no man can work; and though his friends begged him to spare himself, he would not rest from his labours, measuring life, indeed, not by length of years, but by achievement of results. He generally worked at night, walking up and down in his room during the winter-time, and in his little garden during the summer, and writing down his thoughts at his desk, when he had formed them into verse. Frequently he continued his labour until four or five in the morning. That these midnight vigils further shattered his already weakened health, there is no doubt.

The next tragedy he produced after Wallenstein was Mary Stuart. It is better known in England than any of his works, on account, probably, of the nature of the subject; but it does not offer a fair standard by which to judge of the author's powers. The object of Schiller was to show, in the person of the unhappy Queen of Scots, a spirit chastened and subdued by affliction. A prisoner, surrounded by bitter enemies, she has learned to repent of her crimes; and resentment seems dead in her, and, indeed, all passion, but a weary longing for freedom, for deliverance from her captivity. That deliverance comes at last, but it is through the portals of the grave; by the time the unfortunate Mary Stuart prepares herself, with heroic dignity, for that last dark journey, we have learned to pardon, to pity, to admire her. Elizabeth is represented as the exact contrast of her Scottish rival. She is cold, selfish, and utterly heartless; not at all the hot-headed, lion-hearted, clever shrew who, on the news of the approach of the Spanish Armada, posted down to Tilbury, and roused her troops to fierce enthusiasm by declaring that she had come to live and die among her faithful people, and that she "thought foul scorn" that Spain, or Parma, or any prince in Europe should dare to invade the borders of her realm. Schiller's Elizabeth is certainly not our "Good Queen Bess;" nor is the court he depicts anything at all resembling that concourse of "gorgeous dames, and statesmen old, in bearded majesty," that surrounded the throne of the greatest of the Tudors. Schiller has "evolved" the sixteenth century English court life, as his compatriot did the camel, "out of his inner consciousness."

"THE MAID OF ORLEANS;" BALLADS AND OTHER POEMS.

Of far higher merit and greater interest is the tragedy with which the next year, 1801, is associated in Schiller's career. In the story of the Maid of Orleans the poet found a subject especially suited to his genius, romantic and poetical in its nature, and belonging to a period of history sufficiently remote to be treated in the chivalric style, with a large intermingling of fiction. Schiller has softened the harsher features of that miserable period of pillage, robbery, and murder. He has thrown a new halo round the head of the enthusiastic girl of Domremy, who believed so firmly in her mission, and perished so mournfully after saving a nation that was not worthy of her. The surrounding characters, Dunois the gallant soldier, the stern veteran Talbot, the profligate Isabella of Bavaria, and the gentle Agnes Sorel, are far more vividly delineated than the characters in Mary Stuart. The feelings intended to be awakened for the heroine; admiration and pity, are realized in the highest degree; and though opinions may vary as to the judiciousness of altering the catastrophe—for Schiller represents the heroine as dying on the field of battle, instead of on the scaffold at Rouen—the work, taken as a whole, is a triumph of art. In Germany it was received with a shout of welcome; and it is told how, when the play was first represented at Leipsic, the spectators formed two long lines outside the theatre, after the performance, between which lines the poet walked like a king passing through a crowd of his subjects, every head being uncovered as he went along—while mothers held their little children aloft, and pointed out to them, in the pale, mild-faced stranger, the man whose genius conferred lustre on his country for all time.

Among the poetical works produced by Schiller up to this time, mention must not be omitted of the splendid series of ballads, which, appealing directly to the people, sank deep into the heart of Germany. Some of these are popular versions of classical subjects, like "Die Bürgschaft" (the suretyship), in which the story of Damon and Pythias is told with much graphic power. The idea of haste, as exemplified on the continual reference to the course of the sun, on the homeward journey of the respited criminal, hastening back to save the friend who has suretied him, is finely indicated; and the manner in which the interest is worked up to a climax is beyond all praise. Hardly less popular is Der Taucher (the Diver), founded on the story of an Italian of Sicily, who lost his life by overdaring in exhibiting his skill to a noble. A few verses of this poem, in the metre of the original, will give an idea of Schiller's treatment of the subject:—

THE DIVER.

"Be he knight, be he squire, who is here will dare
To dive in the depths below?
A golden goblet I hurl through the air,—
See o'er it already the black waters flow;
And he who will giv' me once more to behold,
Shall have for his guerdon the goblet of gold."

Thus spake the monarch; and forth flung he,
From the cliff whose beetling height
Looks down on the restless heaving sea,
The goblet into the whirlpool's night:
'Now who is the bold one, I ask again,
Who dares to dive in the stormy main?'

The knights and the pages by his side Hear the words, but silence keep,
And gaze on the boundless rolling tide,
And no one will dare for the goblet the leap;
Till the king for the third time asks again,
'Will none of ye venture to dive in the main?'

But still the warriors silent stand,
Till a page of noble birth
Steps proudly forth from the wavering band,
And flings his girdle and cloak to earth;
And the gallant knights and the ladies fair
At the venturesome youth in wonder stare.

FRIEDRICH VON SCHILLER.

And as he steps to the mountain's brow,
And gazes the pool upon,
Backward the foaming waters now,
From the dark Charybdis come rushing on;
And with sound like the distant thunder's roar,
Upward they leap to the air once more.

And it boils and it bubbles, and hisses and scethes,
As when water with fire doth vie;
Towards heaven a vapoury column breathes,
And wave on wave rolls eternally;
Exhausted never, and ceasing not,
As though a new sea by the old was begot."

The youth returns in safety from his first attempt; but the king tempts him down once more by offer of greater reward, even the hand of his fair daughter.

"It shoots through his soul like the flashing of light,
And valour beams from his eye;
When blushing he sees that maiden bright
Then pale to the earth sinking helplessly;
That beauteous prize must his efforts crown,—
'For life or for death, then,' he plunges down.

Still heard are the breakers; still come they again
At the voice of the thundering fall;
And fond eyes are gazing, and gazing in vain,— They're coming, they're coming, the waters all;—
Upward they foam, and downward they roar,
But that gallant youth shall return no more."

In Die Kränche des Ibycus, the old Greek idea of the secret vengeance that tracks the footsteps of the murderer is picturesquely illustrated:—

"Stones have been known to move, and trees to speak;
Augurs, and understood relations, have
By magot-pies, and choughs, and rooks, brought forth
The secret'st man of blood."

In the ballad a flight of cranes, passing over the theatre just when the people's hearts have been stirred by the woe-denouncing song of the Furies, cause the two "secret men of blood," who have murdered Ibycus the minstrel, to betray their own guilt. Der Kampf mit dem Drachen (the Fight with the Dragon), is a chivalrous story of a knight of Rhodes, one of the famous "Order of St. John." Above all the lyric poems towers the glorious Lied von der Glocke (Song of the Bell), in which the various events of human life—baptism, marriage, burial, war and peace, conflagration and festivity—are all associated with the sound of the iron monitor, that from its coign of vantage in the belfry tower seems to survey the motley throng of life below.

"THE BRIDE OF MESSINA;" "WILLIAM TELL."

In his next tragedy, The Ride of Messina, the poet made an experiment, by introducing the chorus in the old Greek fashion, but with a difference; for in Schiller's drama there are two choruses, a first and a second, who discuss and illustrate the action of the play. But though the sound of a number of male voices speaking in unison has a fine effect, the device is scarcely suitable to modern drama, and interrupts the story, whose interest flags before the end is reached. Even Spenser could not, in England, revive the age of romantic and allegorical poetry; and Schiller failed when he endeavoured to re-animate the dead dramatic form of ancient days.

The year 1803 brought a new task to Schiller, and one which he fulfilled with complete success. Goethe had made a tour in Switzerland; and while wandering on the beautiful shores of the Lake of Lucerne, or climbing the mountains by which it is surrounded, had often regretted that Schiller was not with him,—for such a landscape would have rejoiced the poet's heart. Then, amid the scenes rendered famous by the struggle of the Swiss for freedom, the idea struck him that the story of that struggle would be an excellent subject for dramatic treatment. He felt also that Schiller was the man to do justice to the theme; but Schiller was at Weimar, a consumptive, weak-chested man, entirely unable to climb Swiss mountains, or even to breathe the keen air of those snow-clad heights. Therefore did Goethe carefully store up in his capacious memory every scene of interest, and every incident and natural feature that could be turned to account in the alchemy of his friend's imagination. And when he returned, he painted to Schiller, in words such as he only had at command, the beauties of that wonderful mountain land. And the imagination of the poet took fire; and he sat down, animated by the exhortation and encouragement of Goethe, to give the world the history of the revolt of the Swiss; to show how the little community of herdsmen and hunters did battle against the chivalry of Austria for freedom; and how, at that famous meeting on the Rütli, they determined that if the Empire denied them justice, they would, among their mountains, fight for their freedom to the last.

William Tell is the last great dramatic work Schiller lived to complete; and it is worthy to close the great series of his historic tragedies. An air of sturdy truth pervades the work throughout. There is nothing bombastic from beginning to end; no frothy sentiment, no vapouring of stage heroes. The persons represented are plain, downright countrymen—shepherds and farm-labourers and smiths. But they are "Cives Romani" in the best sense of the term—men who know their privileges, and are determined to uphold them manfully. One of the finest touches of nature is the threatened quarrel among the confederates themselves on the "Rütli," and the interposition of the "Landamman," or president, to quiet the excited wealmen. The character of William Tell himself is admirably conceived and carried out. He is a plain, strong, courageous man, full of energy and helpfulness, but the last person in the world to be a professional agitator. He even keeps aloof, at first, from the resistance meditated by his friends. "They will tire of themselves," he says of the oppressors, "if they see that the country remains quiet." But when Gessler puts the life of the brave huntsman's child in jeopardy, it is wounding Achilles in the heel. Tell then has but one idea of the duty incumbent on him. If he does not kill Gessler, that ruthless man will kill his wife and children. It is the true portraiture of a strong, simple nature. It requires much to rouse him to resistance; but once roused, nothing will turn him aside. In this, the last dramatic work Schiller lived to complete, the idea is, like that in The Robbers, the vindication of liberty and human rights against tyranny; but between the two pieces there lies the whole of a singularly rich literary life, and all that continual study and striving had given to enrich the mind of a great man. The idea of liberty in The Robbers is the expression of a blind outcry against existing institutions, because of their imperfection and inconsistency; in William Tell, the liberty advocated is that which keeps strictly within the bounds of order—reforming, not overturning; "broadening down, from precedent to precedent," and uniting individual freedom of action with the subordination necessary for the happiness of all.

LAST WORKS; ILLNESS AND DEATH.

It was in February, 1804, that William Tell was played for the first time at Weimar. Madame de Staël, full of enthusiasm, and glowing with ideas of practicable and impracticable freedom, was present, and joined in the general chorus of gratulation at its success. "She had a real idea-hunger," said Schiller quaintly, when the lively Frenchwoman questioned and cross-questioned the good-natured poet respecting his works, with her continual "Quel en est le but?" ("What's the intention of it?") as each in turn became the subject of discussion.

But meanwhile his state of health grew more and more alarming. An ashen hue had gradually fallen over the thoughtful face; constant weakness, only to be overcome by the greatest resolution, tormented him from day to day; and he was himself deeply impressed with the idea that for him the night was quickly coming, in which no man can work. "True human wisdom," he once said, "consists simply in seizing every moment with a man's whole strength, and using it as if it were the only one, the last one, to be granted to him. It is better to do a thing with good-will too quickly, than to remain unemployed." Thus, with failing hand and aching head, immediately after Tell had added another to the list of his triumphs, he began a new dramatic task, the tragedy of Demetrius, destined to show, in a few unfinished scenes, what power yet remained in that glorious mind when the body was worn out. Demetrius, the hero of the tragedy, was an impostor, who gave himself out as the son of a Russian czar, Ivan Wasilovitch. Those hours in which the dying poet felt too much depressed to attempt original writing he devoted to translating the Phædra. The king of Prussia wished to attract him to the University of Berlin, and advantageous offers were made to him. But these he declined; strong local attachment held him fast to Weimar, and presentiments also that the end was near.

It came somewhat suddenly at last. A feverish cold, that would have been of little consequence in a man of ordinary health, was sufficient to exhaust his remnant strength. To the last he was the mild, gentle, self-forgotten, affectionate man he had always been; entirely resigned to the Higher Will, yet acknowledging the sweetness of life; gazing with eyes brightened with hope upon the setting sun, when at his request the curtain had been drawn aside, that the last evening rays might fall upon his brow. The most perfect peace shone in the dead face when all was over and he had sunk to rest, gently as a wearied child. "I think I shall sleep well to-night, if it be God's will," he had said, shortly before he died, to the watchers round his bed.

Only forty-five years, passed in a struggle first against adverse circumstances, and afterwards against ill-health,—and in that space a work achieved of which a veteran might be proud for its beautiful completeness. Wealth and worldly honours far greater than any he gained might have been his; but he had chosen the better part, and had given to humanity a treasure that time cannot take away.

BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

THE Scottish capital has the honour of claiming Sir Walter Scott as one of the most illustrious of the many illustrious sons she has reared. He was born in the old town of Edinburgh, on the 15th of August, 1771, in an old street called the College Wynd, and in a house which soon after his birth was pulled down to make way for the College.

His descent, according to his own showing "was neither distinguished nor sordid, but such as the prejudices of his time justified him in accounting gentle." He traced his line back on the one side, through a succession of Jacobite gentlemen and moss-troopers, to Auld Scott of Harden and his spouse, renowned in Border song as "The Flower of Yarrow." His pedigree on the other side connected him with the "Bauld Rutherfords that were sac stout; the Mac-Dougalls of Lorn, and the Swintons of Swinton."

His father was a man of fine presence, who conducted all conventional arrangements with a certain grandeur and dignity of air, and "absolutely loved a funeral." "He used," says Scott, "to preserve the list of a whole bead roll of cousins, merely for the pleasure of being at their funerals, which he was often asked to superintend, and I suspect had sometimes to pay for. He carried me with him as often as he could to these mortuary ceremonies; but feeling I was not, like him, either useful or ornamental, I escaped as often as I could." Mr. Scott was a strict disciplinarian, a precisian in religion, and a legal formalist. He exacted from his children a strict observance of the outward forms of religion, and spared no trouble to imbue their minds with a knowledge of the doctrines of the National Church. He strove to make the actions of his domestic circle as strictly conformable to rules as his causes in the Court of Session.

Scott's mother, who was a Miss Rutherford, the daughter of a physician, had been better educated than most Scotchwomen of her day. She was a motherly, comfortable woman, with much tenderness of heart, and a well-stored, vivid memory. Sir Walter, writing of her after her death, says: "She had a mind peculiarly well stored with much acquired information and natural talent, and as she was very old, and had an excellent memory, she could draw, without the least exaggeration or affectation, the most striking pictures of the past age. If I have been able to do anything in the way of painting the past times, it is very much from the studies with which she presented me. She connected a long period of time with the present generation, for she remembered, and had often spoken with, a person who perfectly recollected the battle of Dunbar and Oliver Cromwell's subsequent entry into Edinburgh."

Scott was the ninth of twelve children, of whom the first six died in early childhood. Of the six later-born children all were boys but one, and the solitary sister was a somewhat querulous invalid, whom Scott seems to have pitied quite as much as he loved.

EARLY BOYHOOD.

The history of his early boyhood is the tale of a naturally strong constitution struggling with disease. He had attained the twenty-second month of his infancy when one morning his right leg was found to be powerless and perfectly cold: hence ensued a lameness "which proved incapable of cure, and which remained with him all his life. Everything that skill and tenderness could devise was tried to remove it, and at last his parents were recommended to see what country air would do; so he was entrusted to the care of his paternal grandfather at Sandy-Knowe, on the Tweed.

Here Scott had the first consciousness of existence, as he tells us; and how deep and indelible the impression was which the scenery of that romantic spot made upon his imagination the readers of "Marmion" and the "Eve of St. John" do not need to be reminded. Nor was it exclusively from the features of the landscape, including as these did some of the most striking objects on the Scottish border, that early inspiration came. After spending hours in some sheltered nook, where he looked down upon the ewe-milking and listened to the ewe-milker's songs, he would be borne back again and laid upon a couch, beside which his grandmother and aunt took it in turns to sit, and to keep him in the highest state of happy excitement with their border legends.

There were some fine crags in the neighbourhood of Sandy-Knowe, and to these crags the maid sent from Edinburgh to look after him used to carry him, with a design—due of course to incipient insanity—of murdering the child there and burying him in the moss. She confessed her purpose one day to the housekeeper, and was of course at once dismissed.

His health was greatly improved by this stay at Sandy-Knowe, and it was thought that the Bath waters might complete the cure thus apparently begun. But though he spent a whole year at Bath, his aunt making the journey with him, nothing came of it, so far as the lameness was concerned.

At six years of age, Mrs. Cockburn, the accomplished authoress of the "Flowers of the Forest," described him as the most astounding genius of a boy she had ever seen. She went to supper one night, she tells us, at Mr. Walter Scott's. The boy "was reading a poem to his mother when I went in. I made him read on: it was the description of a shipwreck. His passion rose with the storm. 'There's the mast gone,' says he;

'crash it goes; they will all perish.' After his agitation he turns to me, 'That is too melancholy,' says he; 'I had better read you something more amusing.' And after the call, he told his aunt he liked Mrs. Cockburn, for "she was a virtuoso like himself." "Dear Walter," says Aunt Jenny, "what is a virtuoso?" "Don't you know? Why, it's one who wishes and will know everything."

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE DAYS.

In 1778, after attending first a little private school, and then a private tutor, Scott was sent with his brothers to the High School of Edinburgh. His school reputation was one of irregular ability: he glanced like a meteor from one end of the class to the other; and received more praise for his interpretation of the spirit of his authors than for his knowledge of their language. Out of school his fame stood higher. He extemporized innumerable stories, to which his schoolfellows delighted to listen; and was, spite of his lameness, to be found in the thick of every street-fight with the boys of the town. He was also renowned for his boldness in climbing the "kettle nine stanes," which are "projected high in air from the precipitous black granite of the Castle Rock." An interesting glimpse of him at this time is given by Mr. Mitchell, one of his tutors. "I seldom," he says, "had occasion all the time I was in the family to find fault with him, even for trifles, and only once to threaten serious castigation, of which he was no sooner aware, than he suddenly sprang up, threw his arms about my neck, and kissed me." And the quaint old gentleman adds this commentary:—"By such generous and noble conduct my displeasure was in a moment converted into esteem and admiration; my soul melted into tenderness, and I was ready to mingle my tears with his."

The chief enjoyment of Scott's holidays was to go out with a friend who had a taste for tales similar to his own, and the boys would then recite their wild inventions alternately. Arthur's Seat was a favourite spot for those performances, which were kept secret from the profane. The same tale of knight-errantry, or what not, would be continued from day to day.

Five years constituted the regular course of training at the High School, and Scott went through them—not, however, without some interruptions. He outgrew his strength, and in consequence of illness was more than once removed. It was on one of these occasions, while residing with his aunt at Kelso, that he made the acquaintance of the brothers Ballantyne, with whom in after life his connection became so intimate. It was also here, at the age of thirteen, that he became acquainted with a book destined to lead to much in his own future career—the Percy Ballads. Fascinated by them, he next read the similar collection by Evans, and that of Scottish Ballads by Herd.

From the High School Scott passed to the College. His career in the classes which he attended there resembled in all essential points his career at school. He made no figure either as a classic or as a metaphysician. But he persevered in a practice long ere this begun, and became an eager collector, in a small way, of old ballads and stories.

Towards the close of the year 1784, he had a violent attack of illness, for the only distinct accounts of which we are indebted to himself: "My indisposition arose, in part at least, from my having broken a blood-vessel; and motion and speech were for a long time pronounced positively dangerous. For several weeks I was confined strictly to my bed, during which time I was not allowed to speak above a whisper, to eat more than a spoonful or two of boiled rice, or to have more covering than a counterpane." In May, 1786, he was sufficiently recovered to commence his apprenticeship to his father as writer to the Signet, at that time the usual commencement of the education of Scotch barristers; and his subsequent life was little troubled with indisposition.

These juvenile sicknesses had a powerful influence on the development of Scott's mental powers. During the enforced inactivity of his illness of 1784, his habit of omnivorous reading—especially of anything having a romantic or traditional character—became powerfully confirmed. He read almost all the romances, old plays, and epics, pertaining to a circulating library which formed his solace; tales of chivalry, Cyrus and Cassandra, the novels of modern days—all furnished alike his pabulum; his strong sympathetic nature, quick fancy, and enormously retentive memory assimilated and digested it all. He thus attained an early command of language, and acquired facility in the construction of tales on his own account, for the amusement of his companions.

Scott was surrounded, too, by characters calculated to leave a deep impression on the mind of a bookish boy. The Lowlands of Scotland had by that time settled down into regulated habits of steady industry, but many old-world characters, belonging to a less tranquil period, still survived.

He had opportunities also of observing closely the manners and failings of the lower classes of society in the agricultural districts of the south of Scotland. His grandfather, being a farmer, lived on a footing of more familiar intercourse with his domestics than was even then customary in towns, and in his house Scott learned the password to the confidence of that class.

As time went on he began—perhaps primarily with a view to health—to take long rambles, on foot or on horseback, through the Border and Highland counties where his father had relations or clients. He discovered many an out-of-the-way character interesting to the feelings or the imagination, remaining from the political troubles of 1745 and the succeeding years—more especially interesting to Scott, who himself came of a Jacobite stock.

PREPARATIONS FOR AUTHORSHIP.

An inquirer into the early traces of Scott's writing faculty, may note some class exercises which he composed under Donald Stewart in 1790, and three essays which he read in the Edinburgh Speculative Society in 1792-93. His subjects were the Manners and Customs of the Northern Nations of Europe; the Origin of the Feudal System; the Origin of the Scandinavian Mythology; and the authenticity of Ossian's Poems—all of them themes entirely germane to the future bent of his genius. At an earlier date he had written an essay maintaining Ariosto to be a better poet than Homer; hence Dr. Dalziel had pronounced the rather precarious prophecy that "dunce he was, and dunce he would remain."

Scott had made some attempts in verse even before reading Percy's "Reliques" at Kelso. Some lines on the "Setting Sun" are dated in July 1783; some on Mount Ætna still earlier, 1782; and towards the completion of his fifteenth year he is said to have executed a poem in four books on the Conquest of Granada, which, however, he burned almost immediately. At the house of Professor Ferguson, about 1786, he had seen and been taken notice of by Burns; and had been impressed, as was befitting, by this view of the great poet of Scottish life, of whose successors he was destined to be the chief. For a period of about ten years, however, his rhyming propensities remained in abeyance. They were at length re-awakened by reading the ballads of Matthew Gregory Lewis, to whose "Tales of Wonder" he afterwards contributed.

About the same time, in 1788, a lecture delivered by Henry Mackenzie directed his attention to the German language. This he studied, but only in a desultory way, up to 1793 or 1794, when Miss Aiken (afterwards Mrs. Barbauld) brought to his notice some of the poems of Bürger. Hence resulted his earliest published poem—the "Helen and William," paraphrased from that author's "Leonore," and issued in 1796, along with the "Wild Huntsman," also from Bürger.

In addition to acquiring a knowledge of German, young Scott paid some attention to Italian and Spanish. He never, however, took the trouble to make himself an accurate scholar. Enough for him if he could extract the meaning or enjoy the beauties of his author. For whether it was an ancient or a modern book which came in his way—whether an English, an Italian, a Spanish, a German, or a Latin classic—his sole object in perusing it was to pick out from it the ideas which recommended themselves to his taste or judgment. In no single instance did he dream of making it a means of ascertaining, far less of settling, the niceties of idiom or of grammar. We have specified these five tongues, omitting Greek altogether, for this obvious reason—that Scott never mastered the grammar of that noble language, and had latterly forgotten the very letters.

At this time the Scottish capital was—or, at any rate, was believed by her citizens to be—at the head of the literature and science of the world. Reid had just vacated the chair of metaphysics, that he might be succeeded by Dugald Stewart, Professor Robison stood deservedly high as a mathematician and natural philosopher. Adam Smith, though he taught in Glasgow, passed as much of his time as possible in Edinburgh. Hume had recently died, but Robertson survived. Monboddo and Ferguson were both there; and Home, the author of "Douglas," and Mackenzie, the "Man of Feeling," contributed, each after his fashion, to make up that galaxy of light by which the rest of the world was supposed to be dazzled. The young men composing the set of which Scott was a member, though they could not pretend to vie with these stars of the first magnitude, were ambitious of moving in the same orbit.

CALLED TO THE BAR.

Scott never acted with any regularity as clerk in his father's legal business; he was constantly absent on the jaunts in which he so greatly delighted; and when in the office, chess-playing divided his attention with law. In 1791 he finally resolved to adopt the profession of an advocate, and recommenced his attendance at the College classes. In the same year he was admitted by the Faculty of Advocates to his first trials; in July 1792 he passed the residuc, and was called to the bar. He showed himself active in the private business of the Faculty, and in the work of the Speculative Society.

Scott continued to practise at the bar—nominally, at least—for fourteen years; but the most which he ever seems to have made in any one year was rather under £230; and latterly his practice was much diminishing, instead of increasing. As a speaker he had no great reputation; though confessedly one of the most agreeable talkers that ever lived, he had very little of the orator about him. Even when his fame pervaded Europe, and the consciousness of his proper place in the world might have given him confidence, the distrust of his own powers as a speaker continued to hang about him, and it was only on rare occasions, when his feelings happened to be strongly worked upon, that he expressed himself eloquently.

In the civil court he made only one professional appearance, but several in the Court of Justiciary, for which he was diligent in preparation; nor was there any lack of energy or of pushing talent in his general business habits. In several prosecutions for riot he appeared as counsel for the defendant.

Scott also came prominently forward in organizing, more especially in the character of quarter-master, a volunteer corps of horse, the Royal Edinburgh Light Dragoons, to act in case of French invasion or other sudden demand.

SCOTT'S MARRIAGE.

We have now brought the subject of our narrative to the commencement of that literary career which he prosecuted with unabated perseverance till his death. This career may naturally be divided into three epochs: that during which he was achieving his poetic fame, extending from the publication of his translation of Bürger in 1796 to the publication of "Waverley" in 1814: the period of the celebrity of his novels, which extended till the bankruptcy of Constable in 1826: the period of his Herculean struggle to readjust his affairs, which ended with his sinking, overtaken, into a premature grave in 1832. Let us speak of these in order. But first to tell of his marriage.

About two years previous to his being called to the bar, Scott one Sunday offered his umbrella to a young lady of much beauty, whom he saw in the porch of the Greyfriars Church during a shower. The umbrella was graciously accepted, and Scott then and there fell in love with the lady, who proved to be Margaret, the daughter of Sir John and Lady Jane Stuart Belches, of Invermay. The hope of marrying this lady animated the mind of Scott for nearly six years, and it seems as if she must have given him some encouragement. Scott's attentions continued till close on the eve of the marriage of Miss Margaret, in 1796, to William Forbes (afterwards Sir William Forbes) of Pitsligo, a banker, who proved to be one of Scott's most generous and most delicate-minded friends, when his time of trouble came, towards the close of both of their lives.

However curious we may be on the subject, we are never likely now to know what it was that kept the young people apart. It is certain that Scott's passion for this lady was the first and only deep passion he ever entertained, and that it had a powerful influence on his life, in keeping him free from some of the most dangerous temptations of the young, and in creating within him a world of dreams and recollections throughout his whole life on which his imaginative nature was continually fed.

Like a great many other people who experience disappointment of their hopes, Scott speedily formed new ties, and became engaged within a year to Miss Charlotte Margaret Carpenter, a lady of French birth and connections, and with a moderate fortune, whom he had met at the Cumbrian watering-place of Gilsland. Miss Carpenter was a lively beauty, but evidently possessed of no force or depth of character. The impression produced on the mind by the few letters of hers which have been preserved, is that of an amiable petted girl of a somewhat thin character, who was rather charmed at the depth and intensity of Scott's nature, and with his poetic notions of what love should mean, than capable of understanding them. "Evidently she had no inconsiderable pleasure in display; but she made on the whole a very good wife, only one to be protected by him from every care, and not one to share Scott's deeper anxieties or to participate in his dreams." She had a thoroughly kindly nature and a true heart. She was not the ideal wife for Scott; but she loved him, and sunned herself in his prosperity, and tried to bear his adversity cheerfully. With many agreeable and amiable qualities, she never was to him, nor could she be, a companion. She was proud of his genius, and jealous of any attacks that might be made upon his renown. Indeed, she never forgave Jeffrey his attack on "Marmion" in the Edinburgh Review, and could not help showing what she felt when, immediately after the critique, the author of it dined at Scott's table. Still Scott was sincerely attached to her, and his diary shows that her death, though long expected, affected him deeply.

In December, 1799, Scott obtained, through the interest of the Melville and Buccleuch families, the appointment of Sheriff Depute of Selkirkshire, which brought him in £300 per annum; in 1806 the more lucrative post of one of the principal clerks of the Court of Session, an office which still left him a good deal of leisure, and from which he did not retire till almost the close of his life, November 1830. The full emoluments of the clerkship (about £1300 per annum) did not accrue to him till the year 1812.

In addition to these sources of income, he succeeded to a small landed property on the death of an uncle in 1797, and received a moderate fortune with Miss Carpenter. He was thus placed above absolute dependence upon the literary exertions to which his leisure and inclinations invited him. At the same time, additions to his fortune were not indifferent to him, for he had a relish for the elegant luxuries of life, and the ambition to mingle on terms of equality with the families of the aristocracy, upon some of whom, as well as the honest farmers we have already spoken about, he had a claim of relationship.

"THE MINSTRELSY OF THE SCOTTISH BORDER."

Even before he formed his final resolution to use literature "as a staff—not as a crutch," Scott followed up the appeal made to the public by the printing of "William and Helen," to which we have already referred. In 1799 he published a translation of Goethe's "Götz von Berlichingen." He also composed and circulated among his friends the ballads of "Glenfinlas" and "The Eve of St. John." The bustling patronage of Lewis made his name familiar to many persons of literary taste in England, and Scott's acquaintance with the literati of Edinburgh became more extensive and intimate. At last he took the final plunge into literary occupation, and avowedly became author by profession.

His first publication in this capacity was his "Border Minstrelsy," a work which he had long had in preparation. During seven successive years he made a raid, as he called it, into Liddesdale, exploring every rivulet to its source and every ruined pile from foundation to battlement. Whenever he heard of a ballad, he hunted it up either himself or through the instrumentality of assistants, almost all of whom were destined themselves to take a place of more or less distinction in the world. Leyden was one of these, a man born in a shepherd's cottage, who, when the Edinburgh philosophers found him out, astonished them all by the depth and variety of his knowledge.

Another of Scott's assistants was James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, a genius without conduct, whom everybody admired in his writings, but whom nobody could serve. "Hogg knew, or affected to know, every ballad that was ever sung, and every story that was ever told on the Scottish border. He was exceedingly adroit likewise in filling up blanks, and supplying sometimes a head and sometimes a tailpiece, just as it was wanted. Scott did his best to serve him, but failed. Hogg could not manage his own affairs, yet was for ever urgent to be allowed to manage the affairs of others. He was to Scott alternately obsequious, ridiculous, and insolent."

A third of these assistants cannot be passed without special notice, for he grew, as he deserved to grow, into the condition of one of Scott's dearest friends. William Laidlaw, the son of a tenant-farmer on the Yarrow, was gifted, like all the other members of his family, with an amiable disposition, excellent memory, and a clear understanding. He had in his boyhood gathered up a store of old songs and tales, all of which he gave to Scott, and if a blank appeared in any which Scott received from other quarters, he was generally able to fill it up either from his own recollection or from knowing the place and the people among whom it had its origin. William Laidlaw never ceased to enjoy a large share of Scott's friendship, and was among the few who were present and contributed to Scott's ease at his death.

When on his ballad-hunting expeditions, Scott made himself at home with everybody, and many pleasant stories are told of the reception accorded to him by the friendly farmers and peasantry. Take the following for example:—"On reaching one evening," says Mr. Lockhart, "some Charlieshope or other (I forget the name) among those wildernesses, they found a kindly reception as usual; but to their agreeable surprise, after some days of hard living, a measured and orderly hospitality as respected liquor. Soon after supper, at which a bottle of elderberry wine alone had been produced, a young student of divinity who happened to be in the house was called upon to take the 'big ha' Bible,' in the good old fashion of Burns's 'Saturday Night'; and some progress had been already made in the service when the good man of the farm, whose 'tendency,' as Mr. Mitchell says, 'was soporific,' scandalized his wife and the dominie by starting suddenly from his knees, and rubbing his eyes, with a stentorian exclamation of 'By — I here's the keg at last!' and in tumbled, as he spake the word, a couple of sturdy herdsmen, whom, on hearing, a day before, of the advocate's approaching visit, he had despatched to a certain smuggler's haunt at some considerable distance in quest of a supply of run brandy from the Solway Frith. The pious 'exercise' of the household was hopelessly interrupted. With a thousand apologies for his hitherto shabby entertainment, this jolly Elliot or Armstrong had the welcome keg mounted on the table without a moment's delay, and gentle and simple, not forgetting the dominie, continued carousing about it until daylight streamed in upon the party. Sir Walter Scott seldom failed, when I saw him in company with his Liddesdale companions, to mimic with infinite humour the sudden outburst of his old host on hearing the clatter of horses' feet, which he knew to indicate the arrival of the keg, the consternation of the dame, and the rueful despair with which the young clergyman closed the book."

"The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border" was published in two volumes at first, in 1802, and constituted Scott's first great literary success.

The whole edition of eight hundred copies was sold within the year, and greatly added to Scott's reputation as a man of letters. His "Border Minstrelsy" gives more than a glimpse of his extraordinary and varied powers, his historical industry and learning, his masculine humour, his delight in restoring the "old simple violent world" of activity and excitement, as well as that power to kindle men's hearts, which was the chief secret of the charm of his own greatest poems.

The "Border Minstrelsy" is scarcely less interesting when viewed as the commencement of Scott's connection with those commercial speculations in literature which ultimately crushed him, than as his first serious effort in the character of an author. James Ballantyne was, at the time of the publication of the Minstrelsy, the editor of a provincial newspaper in Kelso.

To him Scott offered the printing of his book. The offer, after some hesitation, was accepted; a new fount of type, superior to anything previously seen in Scotland, was procured, and a specimen of typography was produced which at once established the reputation of what for a time got the name of the "Border press." Not long after Ballantyne removed to Edinburgh, and started as printer on a large scale, in partnership, as was proved by subsequent disclosures, with Scott.

IN THE FIELD OF POETRY.

Encouraged by the success of the "Border Minstrelsy," Scott commenced the composition of an original poem, which secured for him the place of the most popular poet of his day.

The "Lay of the Last Minstrel" appeared in 1805, when Scott was thirty-four years old. The magnificent quarto of 750 copies was soon exhausted, and an octavo edition of 1,500 copies was sold out within the year. In the following year two editions, containing together 4,250 copies, were disposed of; and before twenty-five years had elapsed, that is, before 1830, 44,000 copies of the poem had been bought in this country, taking account of the legitimate trade alone. Scott gained by the "Lay" £769 in all, an unprecedented sum for an author in those times to receive from any poem.

"Marmion," issued in 1808, confirmed Scott's renown as a poet, and deserved to do so; at portions of it, Scott, though mostly not a careful writer, worked with earnest application. He received £1000 for the poem from its publishers. His fame rose still higher, and attained its culmination in May 1810, with the publication of the "Lady of the Lake," which the readers of the present day, however, will be apt to pronounce the least valuable of the three. Twenty thousand copies sold in a few months. Its pictures of Highland scenery, valour, and manners, naturally made it immensely attractive at the time, and produced a huge effect in popularising the Highlands among tourists of an adventurous or sentimental turn.

"The Vision of Don Roderick" followed in 1811. It was obviously little adapted to enhance the purely poetic reputation of its author; but the public circumstances of the time favoured its success. "Rokeby," written in three months and a half, at the close of 1812, and published in 1813, was again received with great applause, yet so far sobered down as to show that the furor for Scott was already on the wane, not to speak of its own general tameness and marked inferiority.

The "Lord of the Isles" was written in 1814; it was better than "Rokeby," but its reception again told the same tale of receding popularity, although a sale of 15,000 copies could not at the lowest be called less than very tolerable. His two other leading poems were published anonymously, with a view to testing the general state of public feeling—the "Bridal of Triermain," in the same year that the "Lord of the Isles" was composed, 1814, and "Harold the Dauntless," in 1817. There was, moreover, the "Field of Waterloo," in 1815; the authorship of which was avowed.

As to the "Bridal of Triermain," a somewhat peculiar arrangement was adopted. The subject had been suggested to Scott by William Erskine, Lord Kinneder; and an agreement was made with this legal dignitary that the poem on appearing in print should not be disowned by him. Two large editions sold off and a third was called for; both parties to the quasi-deception then thought it had lasted long enough, and Scott proclaimed himself the author.

A more potent despot was now ruling the world of poetry: Byron finally eclipsed Scott by the publication of "Childe Harold" in 1812; and Scott's own numerous imitators had cheapened his wares and made them almost as commonplace as they had a few years before been new in style. About this period he composed also some dramatic pieces, without either achieving or deserving success. They were published in 1822 and 1830. With prudent caution, said to be characteristic of his nation, he prepared to abandon a field of literary exertion in which he felt himself in danger of losing his popularity.

AT ASHESTIEL.

But before discussing Scott in the character of novelist, in which he now appeared, there are a few particulars of his personal history to which we may as well allude. Immediately after his marriage he resided in Edinburgh during the winter months, but the summer he spent in a retired cottage on the banks of the Esk, at Lasswade. In 1804 he removed himself and his belongings from the banks of the Esk to the banks of the Tweed. The house of Ashestiel, belonging to a cousin of his own, was vacant, and he took a lease of it.

The description of Ashestiel, and the brook which runs through it, in the introduction to the first canto of Marmion, is one of the finest specimens of Scott's descriptive poetry:—

"November's sky is chill and drear,
November's leaf is red and sear;
Late, gazing down the steepy linn,
That hems our little garden in,
Low in its dark and narrow glen,
You scarce the rivulet might ken,
So thick the tangled greenwood grew,
So feeble trill'd the streamlet through;
Now, murmuring hoarse, and frequent seen,
Through bush and briar no longer green,
An angry brook, it sweeps the glade,
Brawls over rock, and wild cascade,
And, foaming brown with double speed,
Hurries its waters to the Tweed."

In every point of view the change of residence proved advantageous. It brought him into a country endeared to his earliest recollections, and pregnant for him with home associations.

His habits of work here underwent a change. At Lasswade he had worked principally by night, but serious headaches made him now change his plans, and rise steadily at five, lighting his own fire in winter. "Arrayed in his shooting-jacket, or whatever dress he meant to use till dinner time, he was seated at his desk by six o'clock, all his papers arranged before him in the most accurate order, and his books of reference marshalled around him on the floor, while at least one favourite dog lay watching his eye, just beyond the line of circumvallation. Thus, by the time the family assembled for breakfast, between nine and ten, he had done enough, in his own language, 'to break the neck of the day's work.' After breakfast a couple of hours more were given to his solitary tasks, and by noon he was, as he used to say, his 'own man.' When the weather was bad, he would labour incessantly all the morning; but the general rule was to be out and on horseback by one o'clock at the latest; while, if any more distant excursion had been proposed overnight, he was ready to start on it by ten; his occasional rainy days of unintermitted study, forming, as he said, a fund in his favour, out of which he was entitled to draw for accommodation whenever the sun shone with special brightness."

The amusements of Scott at Ashestiel were riding and coursing, the chief form of sporting in the neighbourhood, together with burning the water, as salmon fishing by torchlight was called, in following which he got many a ducking. An amusing picture is given by Mr. Skene of their excursions in company from Ashestiel among the hills, he himself followed by a lanky Savoyard, and Scott by a portly Scotch butler, both servants being highly sensitive to their personal dignity, and mounted on horses which neither of them could ride well. "Scott's heavy lumbering buf-fetier had provided himself against the mountain storms with a huge cloak, which, when the cavalcade was at gallop, streamed at full stretch from his shoulders, and kept flapping in the other's face, who, having more than enough to do in preserving his own equilibrium, could not think of attempting at any time to control the pace of his steed, and had no relief but fuming and pesting at the sacré mantau, in language happily unintelligible to its wearer. Now and then some ditch or turf-fence rendered it indispensable to adventure on a leap, and no farce could have been more amusing than the display of politeness which then occurred between these worthy equestrians, each courteously declining in favour of his friend the honour of the first experiment, the horses fretting impatient beneath them, and the dogs clamouring encouragement."

AT ABBOTSFORD.

In 1811 Scott thought so well of his means and prosperity as to resolve on buying a hundred acres of land on Tweed side in order to build a residence for himself. Such was the origin of the estate of Abbotsford, where ultimately he reared a castle. His removal to his new dwelling took place in May 1812, and Scott describes the migration as a scene in which the neighbourhood found no small share of amusement: "Our fitting and removal from Ashestiel baffled all description; we had twenty-five cartloads of the veriest trash in nature, besides dogs, pigs, ponies, poultry, cows, calves, barcheaded wenches, and bare-breeched boys."

To another friend Scott wrote that the neighbours had "been much delighted with the procession of my furniture, in which old swords, bows, targets, and lances made a very conspicuous show. A family of turkeys was accommodated within the helmet of some preux chevalier of ancient Border fame; and the very cows, for aught I know, were bearing banners and muskets. I assure your ladyship that this caravan, attended by a dozen of ragged rosy peasant children, carrying fishing-rods and spears, and leading ponies, greyhounds, and spaniels, would, as it crossed the Tweed, have furnished no bad subject for the pencil, and really reminded me of one of the gipsy groups of Callot upon their march."

AS A NOVELIST.

Some time previous to his abdication of the laurel, the success of Miss Edgeworth's "Pictures of Irish Life," and his consciousness of an extensive acquaintance with the manners and customs of Scotland, more especially of the olden time, had stimulated him to attempt a portraiture of them in a prose imaginative narrative. The task was prosecuted for some time, but, in consequence of the unfavourable opinion of a friend, laid aside. In 1814, however, he resolved to make the attempt, and "Waverley" was published anonymously. This book, published without any parade of announcement, and without the attraction of an author's name, made its way noiselessly and rapidly to a high place in public estimation. In the course of four years it was followed in rapid succession by "Guy Mannering,"

"The Antiquary," "The Black Dwarf," "Old Mortality," "Rob Roy," and "The Heart of Mid-Lothian," all bearing the indisputable impress of the same parent mind. The circumstance of Scott's having published a poem in the same year in which "Waverley" appeared, and his engagement in other literary undertakings being known, combined, with the common prejudice that a poet cannot excel as a prose writer, to avert from him for a time the suspicion of the authorship of the "Waverley" novels. The taciturnity of the few entrusted with the secret defeated all attempts to obtain direct evidence as to who was the author. From the first, however, suspicion pointed strongly towards Scott.

The light, half-playfully worn veil of mystery served, however, no doubt, to excite the public curiosity, and to add a fictitious interest to the Waverley novels at the time of their publication. But their own merits were undoubtedly the main cause of their success.

This new vein of popularity was worked as sedulously as the former, and, like it, worked out. The novels which from 1818 to 1826 followed each other in rapid succession are not, like them, the outpouring of long-treasured thoughts; they bear marks of reading for the purpose of finding materials to fill up a previously-sketched outline. They are of different degrees of merit, but all are inferior in depth of tone and weight of metal to the works of the first four years. Individual characters and incidents in some of them may be equal, but not one of them can bear comparison when considered as a whole.

MISCELLANEOUS LITERATURE.

Scott's novels and poems, however, were by no means the only literature that occupied him during his busy life. He contributed to the Edinburgh Review at its commencement; and when differences of opinion induced him to break off from that publication, he took a warm interest in the establishment of the Quarterly. His trade connection with the Ballantynes, and through them with Constable and other publishers, led him to project many publications, and to take an active part in them as editor and contributor. To these we owe the Life of Dryden, published in 1808; of Swift (1814); the biographical and critical prefaces to Ballantyne's collection of the English novelists; and his annotations to such books as "Sadler's Correspondence." His biographical and critical writings are characterised by masculine good sense, vigour, and a happy play of humour, rather than by subtle analysis or a just and delicate taste.

TRAVELS AND INTERRUPTIONS.

Between 1814 and 1825 the interruption to Scott's literary labours comprised one serious illness and a few journeys, several of these being to London, and one being to Paris immediately after the battle of Waterloo. Of his journeys he has left some records; but we agree with Mr. Hutton, who thinks that "Scott would never have reached, as a mere observer and recorder, at all the high points which he reached directly his imagination went to work to create a story." That imagination was indeed far less subservient to his mere perceptions than to his constructive powers. "Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk"—the records of his Paris journey after Waterloo—for instance, are not at all above the mark of a good special correspondent. His imagination was less the imagination of insight than the imagination of one whose mind was a great kaleidoscope of human life and fortunes.

One of the greatest obstacles to the progress of Scott's work, besides those we have named, was the lion-hunting of which he became the object. Arising to a great extent from the mystery surrounding his authorship, his fame grew to be rather oppressive. At one time no fewer than sixteen parties of visitors applied to see Abbotsford in a single day. Strangers would drop in upon him without introductions, facetiously cry out "Prodigious!" in imitation of Dominic Sampson, when they were shown anything, ask whether the new house was called Tullyveolan or Tillytuddlem; cross-examine, with their note-books open, as to Scott's age and the age of his wife; and seem quite surprised if they were bowed out without an invitation to dinner.

These were days of high postage, and Scott's bill for letters seldom came under £150 a year; and as to coach parcels, "they were a perfect ruination." On one occasion a mighty package arrived by post from America, for which Scott had to pay £5 sterling. When opened, it was found to contain a manuscript play, entitled "The Cherokee Lovers," by a young lady of New York, who begged Scott to read and correct it, write a prologue and epilogue, get it put on the stage at Drury Lane, and negotiate with Murray or Constable for the copyright. About a fortnight after, another package, not less formidable, arrived, charged with a similar postage, which Scott—not grown cautious, as one might have supposed, through experience—recklessly opened: out jumped a duplicate copy of "The Cherokee Lovers," with a second letter from the authoress, stating that, as the weather had been stormy, and she feared that something might have happened to her precious manuscript, she had thought it prudent to forward a duplicate.

DAILY LIFE.

Till 1826, Scott's life was busy and happy, and seemingly prosperous. His notoriety as an author gave him an extensive circle of acquaintance. His manly and sensible character commanded respect; his bonhomie and talent for increasing the hilarity of the social hour conciliated the love of all who knew him. The continuance of apparent success increased his confidence in his own resources to a degree bordering on presumption. The ambition of his life was to enact the part of one of those feudal lords who were the favourite objects on which his imagination dwelt. To this was owing the purchase of Abbotsford, the strewing it with "auld nick-nackets," and the extensive scale on which he exercised his hospitality.

The real amusements of Scott were his trees and his friends. "Planting and pruning trees," he said, "I could work at from morning to night. There is a sort of self-congratulation, a little tickling self-flattery, in the idea that while you are pleasing and amusing yourself, you are seriously contributing to the future welfare of the country, and that your very acorn may send its future ribs of oak to future victories like Trafalgar,"—for the day of iron ships was not yet. And again, at a later stage of his planting:—"You can have no idea of the exquisite delight of a planter. He is like a painter laying on his colours—at every moment he sees his effects coming out. There is no art or occupation comparable to this; it is full of past, present, and future enjoyment. I look back to the time when there was not a tree here, only bare heath; I look round and see thousands of trees growing up, all of which—I may say almost each of which—have received my personal attention. I remember, five years ago, looking forward with the most delighted expectation to this very hour; and as each year has passed the expectation has gone on increasing. I do the same now. I anticipate what this plantation and that one will presently be, if only taken care of; and there is not a spot of which I do not watch the progress. Unlike building, or even painting, or indeed any other kind of pursuit, this has no end, and is never interrupted; but goes on from day to day, and from year to year, with a perpetually augmenting interest. Farming I hate. What have

I to do with fattening and killing beasts, or raising corn, only to cut it down, and to wrangle with farmers about prices, and to be constantly at the mercy of the seasons? There can be no such disappointments or annoyances in planting trees."

THE FRIENDSHIP OF ROYALTY.

In 1816, when Scott was in London, the Prince Regent asked him to dine with him, addressed him uniformly as Walter, and struck up a friendship with him which appears to have lasted their lives, and "which certainly," says Mr. Hutton, "did much more honour to George than to Sir Walter Scott. It is impossible not to think rather better of George IV. for thus valuing and doing his best in every way to show his value for Scott. It is equally impossible not to think rather worse of Scott for thus valuing and in every way doing his best to express his value for this very worthless though by no means incapable King."

The first baronet created by George IV., after he succeeded to the throne, was Sir Walter Scott, who not only accepted the honour gratefully, but dwelt with great pride on the fact that it was offered to him by the King himself, and was in no way due to the prompting of any Minister.

When George IV. visited Edinburgh, in 1822, it was Sir Walter Scott who acted virtually as master of the ceremonies, and to whose exertions it was chiefly due that the visit was so successful.

DISASTER ; A STRUGGLE AGAINST ADVERSITY.

The worm, however, was at this time gnawing at the root of Scott's magnificence. Constable, Ballantyne, and Scott were all men of sense and talent, but the spirit of enterprise was stronger in them than that of accurate mercantile calculation. From the beginning their undertakings had been on a larger scale than their capital warranted ; and as difficulties thickened around them, their confident spirits looked for relief to bolder and more extensive speculations. This could not go on for ever ; the commercial crisis of 1825-26 precipitated but did not cause the catastrophe.

When what is called in Scotland "a state of the affairs" of Constable and Co. and Ballantyne and Co. was made up subsequently to the bankruptcy of the two companies, it appeared that Sir Walter Scott was indebted to Constable's creditors, as a partner of Ballantyne and Co., for nearly £72,000 ; and that the total amount of the debts of Ballantyne and Co. was about £110,000, for the whole of which Sir Walter was liable as a partner. About half of the £72,000 due to Constable and Co. being included in the debts of Ballantyne and Co., Scott's actual liabilities were somewhere about £147,000. The presumptuous rashness with which, in order to indulge himself in the theatrical pleasure of enacting the part of one of the favourite heroes of his imagination, he incurred this immense load of debt, cannot be palliated. From 1823, if not from an earlier period, novels were contracted for and paid in bills, before even the subjects or names of the future publications were fixed. This was not a mere speculation upon popularity : it was a wanton setting of health, mental and corporeal, and of life itself, upon the hazard. But to the honour of Scott, he did not flinch from the terrible responsibility he had so presumptuously incurred. "Gentlemen," he said to the creditors, "Time and I against any two. Let me take this good ally into my company, and I believe I shall be able to pay you every farthing." He surrendered the whole of his property ; executed a trust-deed in favour of certain gentlemen, who were to receive the funds realized by his exertions, and pay off his debts with interest by instalments ; and resumed his literary work with dogged resolution. "It is very hard," he said in his deep thoughtful voice, to "a friend who expressed his sympathy, "thus to lose all the labours of a lifetime, and be made a poor man at last, when I ought to have been otherwise. But if God grant me life and strength for a few years longer, I have no doubt that I shall redeem it all."

It is pleasant to mention that towards his old associates in business matters, even towards Mr. Constable, who had been the cause of so much loss, Scott maintained a friendly bearing. He did not indeed shut his eyes to the new view he had obtained of Constable's character as a man of business, but though he could trust no longer he was far from hardening his heart. With regard to James Ballantyne, Scott told him, on the very day when ruin was declared, that he would never forsake him. Ballantyne now conducted business on his own account, and was honoured with the steady friendship and patronage of his old schoolfellow as of yore.

The conduct of Scott's immediate dependents at this time was highly creditable. "I must note," says Lockhart, "how greatly I admired the manner in which all his dependents appeared to have met the reverse of his fortunes—a reverse which inferred very considerable alteration in the circumstances of every one of them. The butler, instead of being the easy chief of a large establishment, was now doing half the work of the house at probably half his former wages. Old Peter, who had been for five-and-twenty years a dignified coachman, was now ploughman in ordinary, only putting his horses to the carriage upon high and rare occasions; and so on with all the rest that remained of the ancient train. And all, to my view, seemed happier than they had ever done before."

Scott, like other men of energy as well as genius, found his escape from care in constant employment. He worked now double tides, rising early, sitting late, and not unfrequently depriving himself of exercise altogether. He had undertaken to write for Constable a "Life of Napoleon," which was to appear in two volumes. The subject grew upon him, and covered in the end nine volumes. It constituted for two years the main object of his literary care, yet by no means exhausted it. "Woodstock" and the "Chronicles of the Canongate," series after series, as well as articles for the Quarterly Review, went forward with it, pari passu.

Besides the entire loss of fortune, he was by this time a widower, for in April of 1826 Lady Scott had died while he was from home. The house in Edinburgh, where he was wont to dispense a generous hospitality, was sold; and as often as business carried him to the Scotch metropolis he inhabited a lodging. But his courage never failed. On returning for the first time from Edinburgh to Abbotsford after Lady Scott's funeral:—"I again took possession," he says, "of the family bedroom and my widowed couch. This was a sore trial, but it was necessary not to blink such a resolution. Indeed I do not like to have it thought that there is any way in which I can be beaten." And again:—"I have a secret pride—I fancy it will be so most truly termed—which impels me to mix with my distresses strange snatches of mirth, which have no mirth in them."

It was at this time that he judged it expedient to remove the veil which had long ceased in reality to cover his connection with the Waverley Novels. It had become in fact a necessary proceeding, because to a republication of these tales, with prefaces and notes, both he and his friends looked for the surest means of discharging the obligations under which he lay. Yet the avowal of the authorship at a theatrical fund dinner over which he presided took the general public a good deal by surprise. It was done, however, with excellent grace, and operated, as it seemed, as a sort of relief to his own feelings.

Scott visited London in 1828, where the first decided manifestations of the complaint under which he by-and-by succumbed showed themselves. He, however, pressed on with his work, and covered day by day innumerable pages of manuscript, producing almost simultaneously his "Letters on Demonology" for Murray's Family Library and a further series of "Tales of a Grandfather." But even in the former of these, the Letters on Demonology, evidence of failing power is perceptible, and in the stories from French history which make up the latter, both words and arrangements are cloudy. He persevered, however, and wrote at the same time his Scottish History for Lardner's Cyclopædia, a work certainly not worthy of its high parentage.

In 1830 he was smitten down with paralysis, from which he never thoroughly rallied. It was hoped that the climate of Italy might benefit him, and by the Government of the day a frigate was placed at his disposal in which to proceed thither. But in Italy he pined for the home to which he returned only to die.

SCOTT'S DEATH.

The end was singularly pathetic. His return to Abbotsford acted upon him as a breath of air acts upon a fire which is dying out for lack of fuel. He recognised and hailed William Laidlaw, who stood at the hall-door to receive him. He alternately sobbed and smiled over his dogs as they fawned on him and licked his hands. He slept soundly that night, and awoke on the morrow perfectly conscious and collected. They procured a Bath-chair, and he was wheeled up and down for some time on the turf and among the rose-beds of his garden, then in full bloom. At his own desire they next wheeled him through his rooms, and he kept saying as he moved, "I have seen much, but nothing like my ain house; give me one turn more."

The delusion had come upon Scott when in Malta that all his debts were paid off, and that the future would be to him a season of more perfect enjoyment than the past. A different persuasion took hold of him soon after he found himself again at home, and casting aside the plaids with which they had covered him in his chair, he said, a day or two after his arrival, "This is sad idleness, I shall forget what I have been thinking of if I don't set it down now. Take me into my room and fetch the keys of my desk."

"He solicited this so earnestly," says Lockhart, "that we could not refuse: his daughter went into his study, opened his writing-desk, and laid paper and pens in the usual order, and I then moved him through the hall and into the spot where he had always been accustomed to work. When the chair was placed at the desk, and he found himself in the old position, he smiled and thanked us, and said, "Now give me my pen and leave me a little to myself:" Sophia put the pen into his hand, and he endeavoured to close his fingers upon it, but they refused their office, and it dropped on the paper. He sank back among the pillows, silent, tears rolling down his cheeks; but composing himself by-and-by he motioned to me to wheel him out of doors again.

"Laidlaw met us at the porch and took his turn of the chair. Sir Walter, after a little while, again dropped into slumber. When he was awaking, Laidlaw said to me, 'Sir Walter has had a little repose.' 'No, Willie,' said he, 'no repose for Sir Walter but in the grave.' The tears again rushed from his eyes. 'Friends,' said he, 'don't let me expose myself: get me to bed.'"

They got him to bed, and he never again rose from it.

He lingered till the 21st of September, more than two months from the day of his reaching home, with only one clear interval of consciousness, on Monday, the 17th of September. On that day Lockhart was called to Sir Walter's bedside with the news that he wished to see him. "Lockhart," he said, "I have but a minute to speak to you. My dear, be a good man, be virtuous, be religious, be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here." Here Scott paused, and Lockhart said, "Shall I send for Sophia and Anne?" "No," said he, "don't disturb them. Poor souls! I know they were up all night. God bless you all." With this he sank into a very quiet slumber, and indeed he scarcely afterwards gave any sign of consciousness except for an instant on the arrival of his sons.

Four days afterwards, on a glorious autumn day, at half-past one in the afternoon, with every window wide open, and the ripple of the Tweed over its pebbles distinctly audible in his room, he passed away, and his eldest son kissed him and closed his eyes. He died a month after completing his sixtieth year.

The funeral of Sir Walter Scott was conducted in a very quiet manner, invitations to be present being issued only to the oldest of his friends. The coffin was borne to the hearse and from the hearse to the grave by his old domestics and foresters, who petitioned that no mercenary hand should be allowed to touch it. Yet of voluntary followers, as soon as the procession started, the number was so great that the carriages alone extended over a mile. The inhabitants of all the villages through which the cortège passed, turned out in black and with uncovered heads. The wide enclosure of the Abbey grounds was filled in like manner; and amid profound and reverential silence Archdeacon Williams read the service.

HIS FAMILY.

Scott had four children, two sons and two daughters. In their infancy he seems to have taken comparatively little notice of them, but as soon as they were old enough to understand what he said, he delighted in having them with him, and devoted to them much time and tender care. Like their mute companions, the dogs, they had free admission to his study at all hours, when he would lay down his pen, take them on his knee, repeat to them a ballad or tell a story, kiss them, and send them away again. From a very early age they were accustomed to dine with their father and mother.

Their education he conducted in a rather desultory fashion. The girls when old enough were placed under a governess, chosen far more because of her good sense and moral worth than on account of showy accomplishments; and the boys went to school, as he himself had done, the eldest passing thence into a cavalry regiment, the youngest entering Oxford and taking a degree preparatory to his admission into the Foreign Office. But till they were ready for systematic teaching he was himself their instructor; the instruction being communicated more frequently by oral tradition than through books.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE, CHARACTER, AND PECULIARITIES.

The personal appearance of Scott was striking and peculiar. In height he was above the middle size. His shoulders were broad, his chest wide, his arms long, and his hands large. But for his shrunken limb he would have been the very beau ideal of a stalwart Liddesdale yeoman. His features were not regular; his eyes were gray, and deeply set in their sockets; his forehead was broad and high, but not particularly so. When in repose his countenance was heavy, but no sooner was an appeal made to his fancy than it was lighted up, and mouth and eye became alike expressive of emotion, either pathetic or ludicrous. His voice was pleasing, though he knew nothing of music; he read well, but with a strong Scottish accent. His conversation overflowed with humour, and in discussing the merits of other men, he seemed always on the look-out for something to praise. No man ever lived who won so many friends and made so few enemies. Absence of all literary envy or jealousy was one of the most remarkable features of his character.

Sir Walter Scott had his failings, but "few that ever lived," remarks a Quarterly Reviewer, "could better endure to have their failings exposed. But his merits, as well moral as intellectual, were of so transcendent a nature that they cast quite into the shade errors which had their root neither in vice nor in meanness, but in an imagination preternaturally gigantic. Sir Walter Scott was as much in earnest when he set all Scotland agog to greet the arrival of George IV., as if he had taken a leading part to bring back the Stuarts to the capital of their forefathers. The glass from which the King drained his whisky to the poet's health, on the quarter-deck of the Royal yacht, would have been laid up among the most sacred relics at Abbotsford, had it not been crushed to pieces by an accident."

In like manner his own style of life on Tweed-side, his Abbotsford hunts, his joyous carouses, transported him back to times when moss-trooping was a manly occupation. There is not one of his tales, whether in prose or verse, which fails to show upon the face of it that the scenes which are therein described were as much realities to him as if he had lived through them. It was this chronic state of hallucination indeed, this inability to free himself from the spells of enchantment, which not only gave all the colouring to his best romances, but made the man himself what he was. He could no more help buying up land, building a castle, dressing its walls with trophies of war and of the chase, and emblazoning its roof with the quarterings of noble families, than he could help breathing.

Yet how generous he was! how gentle! how considerate in all his dealings with all who approached him; how unselfish, how true to his friendships, how willing to forget and to forgive wrongs by whomsoever committed! Only once in his life is he known to have acted with rudeness to any one, and that was when he turned his back upon Lord Holland, because Lord Holland had spoken ungenerously, as he conceived, of a favourite brother in the House of Lords. Of Scott's great personal courage there can be no doubt. He had some opportunities of proving this in his scuffles with democrats and rioters in early life; and later, when General Gourmand blustered about what had been written of that gentleman's proceedings at St. Helena, he anticipated a challenge and was ready to accept it. His sense of knightly honour was indeed keen to a degree.

All that he read and admired he remembered. Scott used to illustrate the capacious affinity of his own memory for what pleased him, and its complete rejection of what did not, by old Beattie of Meikledale's answer to a Scotch divine, who complimented him on the strength of his memory. "No, sir," said the old Borderer, "I have no command of my memory, it only retains what hits my fancy, and probably, sir, if you were to preach to me for two hours, I would not be able when you finished to remember a word you had been saying."

Scott's demeanour towards his servants and labourers was very striking. "Sir Walter speaks to every man as if they were blood-relations," was a common saying amongst those who came in contact with him. Take the following by way of example:—There was a little hunch-backed tailor, named Goodfellow, living on his property at Abbotsford. This tailor was employed to make the curtains for the new library, and had been very proud of his work; but he fell ill soon afterwards, and Sir Walter was unremitting in his attention to him. On the evening of the poor tailor's death, when Scott entered the hovel he found everything silent, and inferred from the looks of the good woman in attendance that the patient had fallen asleep, and that they feared his sleep was a final one. He murmured some syllables of kind regret: at the sound of his voice the dying tailor unclosed his eyes, and eagerly and wistfully sat up, clasping his hands with an expression of rapturous gratefulness and devotion, that in the midst of deformity, disease, pain, and wretchedness was at once beautiful and sublime. He cried with a loud voice, "The Lord bless and reward you!" and expired with the effort.

Lockhart tells us that some of Scott's senses were decidedly "blunt," and one seems to recognise this in the simplicity of his romantic effects. "It is a fact," he says, "which some philosophers may think worth setting down, that Scott's organization, as to more than one of the senses, was the reverse of exquisite. He had very little of what musicians call an ear; his smell was hardly more delicate. I have seen him stare about, quite unconscious of the cause, when his whole company betrayed their uneasiness at the approach of an overkept haunch of venison; and neither by the nose nor the palate could he distinguish corked wine from sound. He could never tell Madeira from sherry,—nay, an Oriental friend having sent him a butt of sheeraz, when he remembered the circumstance some time afterwards, and called for a bottle to have Sir John Malcolm's opinion of its quality, it turned out that his butler, mistaking the label, had already served up half the bin as sherry. Port he considered as physic . . . in truth he liked no wines except sparkling champagne and claret; but even as to the last he was no connoisseur, and sincerely preferred a tumbler of whisky-toddy to the most precious 'liquid-ruby' that ever flowed in the cup of a prince."

Spite of his imaginative turn of mind, there never was an organization less susceptible of influence by superstitious fears than his own. When a friend jokingly urged him, within a few months of his death, not to leave Rome on a Friday, as it was a day of bad omen for a journey, he replied, laughing, "Superstition is very picturesque, and I make it, at times, stand me in great stead, but I never allow it to interfere with interest or convenience." Basil Hall reports Scott's having told him on the last evening of the year 1824, when they were talking over this subject, that "having once arrived at a country inn, he was told there was no bed for him. 'No place to lie down at all?' said he. 'No,' said the people of the house; 'none, except a room in which there is a corpse lying.' 'Well,' said he, 'did the person die of any contagious disorder?' 'Oh, no; not at all,' said they. 'Well, then,' continued he, 'let me have the other bed. So,' said Sir Walter, 'I laid me down, and never had a better night's sleep in my life.'" He was, indeed, a man of iron nerve, whose truest artistic enjoyment was in noting the forms of character seen in full daylight by the light of the most ordinary experience.

AS POET AND NOVELIST.

As regards the merits of Scott as a poet, it is difficult for some critics to be sufficiently affluent of praise, and for others to be sufficiently chary. When one has said that he is exceedingly spirited, one has expressed the most salient and the finest of his excellences; only we must remember that a narrative and romantic poet cannot be thus spirited without having other admirable gifts, whence the spirit ensues, and whereby it is sustained—virility, knowledge of life and character and circumstance, quick sympathy with man and nature, flow of invention, variety of presentment, a heart that vibrates to the noble and the right—much picturesqueness, some beauty. On the other hand, it is not untrue to say that Scott, though continually spirited, is also very frequently tame—and not free from tameness even in his distinctively spirited passages. His phrases, when you pause upon them, are full of commonplace. The reason of this is that Scott was very little of a literary-poetic artist; greatness of expression—the heights and depths of language and of sound—were not much in his way. He respected his subject much more than he respected his art; after consulting and satisfying his own taste and that of his public, the thing had to do well enough.

Scott has always been the poet of youthful and high-minded readers; there seems to be no reason why he should not contribute indefinitely to meet their requirements; and certainly they will be considerable losers if ever, in the lapse of time and shifting of poetic models, his composition should pass out of ready currency. He is not and never can be the poet of literary readers; the student and the artist remember him as a cherished enchantment of their youth, and do not recur to him. Neither the inner recesses of thought nor the high places of art thrill to his appeal. But it is highly possible for the critical tendency and estimate to be too exclusively literary; the poetry of Scott is mainly amenable to a different sort of test, and to that it responds not only adequately but triumphantly.

The rank of Scott as a prose writer it is difficult to fix with anything like precision. "So imposing to the mind," remarks a writer in a popular Encyclopædia, "is his immense prestige as a novelist, that even at this date it is difficult to criticise him coolly; but it is not without risk of awakening some under-murmur of dissent that the absolute supremacy can now be assigned him which at one time, almost without question, used to be conceded as his due. Nor is the dissent without some just ground of reason. Scott, with the artistic instinct granted him in largest measure, had little of the artistic conscience. Writing with the haste of the improvisatore, he could exercise over his work, as it proceeded, no jealous vigour of supervision, and on its appearance he was amply pleased with it if the public paid him handsomely. Hence he was an exceedingly irregular writer; many of his works are in structure most lax and careless, and some of the very greatest of them are disgraced by occasional infusions of obviously inferior matter. Yet, all reasonable deductions made, it may be doubtful whether in mass and stature he is quite reached by any other novelist who could be mentioned. To class him, or even speak of him, along with Shakspeare is absurd, but it is scarcely absurd perhaps to say that, since Shakspeare, to no native of our country has such wealth in its kind been entrusted."

That Scott, it has been truly remarked, was the mechanic of his genius or that genius was the slave of his pride, takes nothing from the inherent value of his work; his life was apart altogether from his creations; and we should say no one was more puzzled to explain their immediate and immense popularity than he was himself, though we now know that it was in the glamour of romance and the haze of antiquity hanging round every sentence—in the witchery of which ether, by a strange unforced subtilty he enwrapped his reader—that his most potent charms lay. Besides, the time wanted the man, and the man came—came to a clear field. Had he come now, with all the gauze of his hoary trappings, he would have had to encounter vastly greater coldness and unconcern. His plots are not of the modern kind; the reader is never made to caracole past hobgoblins and murders to the abyss of the catastrophe; the most of his characters are grand public men and women—the incident history manipulated; and every creature of his creation appears before us in drapery that hangs gracefully together. Goethe repeatedly commends this feature in Scott, and admired as unique the subtle charm—it cannot be called skill—which made characters merge imperceptibly from high tragedy into side-scene and side-play.

Describing the manners of past ages, Scott himself can never be identified or confounded with any of his princely personalities. He takes us back to the time and the spot, and puts the pigment on before our eyes. His drawing is none the worse because of its elaborateness, or because precision is not greatly studied. Every face has its clear outline and fitting complexion; and his respect for the reader makes him put his own spectacles out of the way when his work is done, and say—"There it is, sir; take your own view."

You can't mistake the colour of the pantouffles, the shape of the ruffles, or the turn of the shoe. The only things he borrowed from the present were his faces. He went about picking up nineteenth century men, and sent them adrift in the middle ages. His lover's face appears in three places; Erskine was Dairsie Latime; Miss Cranstoun, Dic Vernon; Laidlaw, Dandie Dinmont; and M'Guffog, a witness in the tipsy minister's case, figures along with Dirk Hatteraick in "Guy Mannering." Rarely, however, does he draw on his own experience, except, perhaps, in the matters of beauty, horsemanship, and honour. Mr. Hutton truly says, he did himself what he would have made his heroes do. He is like none of his successors, who all deal with the intense present, and intense reality. Said Carlyle—"Your Shakspeare fashions his characters from the heart outwards; your Scott fashions them from the skin inwards, never getting near the heart of them." The justice of this judgment has been only feebly impugned. It is because he seldom gets near the heart, and seldom felt the dreadful poignancy of intense emotions, bitter experiences, and the tearing conflicts of the inner world, that his endless romance is endlessly entertaining. His men and women, like himself, lived in grand baronial residences, and, like him, they have much heart, a good deal of brain, but very little soul, and none of the over-soul. He had little dissective or analytic power, and never concealed his inaptitude for the domestic picture: "The big bow-wow strain I can do myself like any now going, but the exquisite touch which renders ordinary commonplace things and characters interesting, from the truth of the description and the sentiment, is denied me." * INTRODUCTION.

THE fame of John Bunyan, the author of the "Pilgrim's Progress," has gradually risen. Beginning among the people, it has made its way up to those who may be held to represent the culture and education of our country.

In most cases the many gradually and slowly receive the opinions of the few respecting literary merit, and sometimes, in assenting to such authority, profess with their lips an admiration of they know not what, for a reason equally unknown. In this instance, however, the process has been reversed. The opinion of the multitude has been ratified by the judicious. The people knew what they admired.

The "Pilgrim's Progress" is a book which makes its way through the fancy to the understanding and the heart. The child peruses it with wonder and delight; in youth we discover the genius which it displays; its worth is apprehended as we advance in years; and we perceive its merits most in declining age.

The life of the author of this wonderful production is what is here to be told, and to the life we have added a few notes as to his immortal work—a work which has obtained a larger and more constant sale than any other book in the world, the Bible alone excepted.

BIRTH AND EARLY YEARS.

The village of Elstow, which is within a mile of Bedford, was the birthplace of John Bunyan, 1628 the year of his birth.

"I was of a low and inconsiderable generation, my father's house being of that rank that is meanest and most despised of all families in the land." "I never went to school to Aristotle or Plato, but was brought up in my father's house in a very mean condition, among a company of poor countrymen. Nevertheless, I bless God that by this door He brought me into the world to partake of the grace and life that is by Christ in His gospel."

Such is Bunyan's own account of his origin. His father was a tinker, but why his calling should have been so mean and despised is not very apparent, when it was not followed as a vagabond employment, but, as in this case, exercised by one who had a settled habitation. "The Bunyans," says a friend, "were of the national religion, as men of that calling commonly were." Bunyan himself, in a passage, which has been always understood to refer to his father, describes him as "an honest poor labouring man, who, like Adam unparadised, had all the world to get his bread in, and was very careful to maintain his family."

The years of Bunyan's youth were those in which the Puritan spirit was in its highest vigour all over England; and in no quarter had that spirit more vigour than in Bedfordshire. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that a lad, as was the case with Bunyan, to whom nature had given a vivid imagination and extraordinary sensibility, should have been early haunted by religious terrors.

"My sins," he says, "did so offend the Lord, that even in my childhood He did scare and affright me with fearful dreams, and did terrify me with dreadful visions. I have been in my bed greatly afflicted while asleep with apprehensions of devils and wicked spirits, who still, as I then thought, laboured to draw me away with them, of which I could never be rid. I was afflicted with thoughts of the day of judgment night and day, trembling at the thoughts of the fearful torments of hell fire." When, at ten years old, he was running about with his companions in "his sports and childish vanities," these terrors continually recurred to him, yet "he would not let go his sins."

MENTAL CONFLICTS; STRONG LANGUAGE MISUNDERSTOOD.

As he grew older, his mental conflicts grew still more violent. "Once," says a biographer who knew him well, and had heard the story of his visions from Bunyan's own lips, "he dreamed that he saw the face of heaven as it were on fire, the firmament cracking and shivering with the noise of mighty thunder, and an archangel flew in the midst of heaven sounding a trumpet, and a glorious throne was seated in the east, whereon sat One in brightness like the morning star. Upon which he, thinking it was the end of the world, fell upon his knees, and said, 'O Lord, have mercy on me! What shall I do? The day of judgment is come, and I am not prepared.'"

At another time "he dreamed that he was in pleasant place, jovial and rioting, when an earthquake rent the earth, out of which came bloody flames, and the figures of men tossed up in globes of fire, and falling down again with horrible cries and shrieks and execrations, while devils mingled among them, and laughed aloud at their torments. As he stood trembling, the earth sank under him, and a circle of flames embraced him. But when he fancied he was at the point to perish, One in shining white raiment descended and plucked him out of that dreadful place, while the devils cried after him to take him to the punishment which his sins had deserved. Yet he escaped the danger, and leapt for joy when he awoke and found it was a dream."

The strong language in which Bunyan describes his youthful experience has been strangely misunderstood by many of his biographers. In later times, however, Southey, Lord Macaulay, and Mr. Froude have done him justice. To quote one of these: "It has long been an ordinary practice," says Lord Macaulay, "to cite Bunyan as an instance of the supernatural power of Divine grace to rescue the human soul from the lowest depths of wickedness. He is called in one book the most notorious of profligates; in another, the brand plucked from the burning. He is designated in a 'History of the Baptists' as the depraved Bunyan, the wicked tinker of Elstow. Mr. Ryland, a man once of great note among the dissenters, breaks out into the following rhapsody: 'No man of common sense and common integrity can deny that Bunyan was a practical atheist, a worthless, contemptible infidel, a vile rebel to God's goodness, a common profligate, a soul-despising, a soul-murdering, a soul-damning, thoughtless wretch as could exist on the face of the earth. Now be astonished, O heavens, to eternity! and wonder, O earth and hell, while time endures! Behold this very man become a miracle of mercy, a mirror of wisdom, goodness, holiness, truth, and love!'

"But whoever takes the trouble to examine the evidence will find that the good men who wrote this had been deceived by a phraseology which, as they had been hearing it and using it all their lives, they ought to have understood better. There cannot be a greater mistake than to infer from the strong expressions in which a devout man bemoans his exceeding sinfulness, that he has led a worse life than his neighbours. Many excellent persons, whose moral character from boyhood to old age has been free from any stain discernible to their fellow-creatures, have, in their autobiographies and diaries, applied to themselves, and doubtless with sincerity, epithets as severe as could be applied to Titus Oates or Mrs. Brownrigg.

"It is quite certain that Bunyan was, at eighteen, what in any but the most austere puritanical circles would have been considered as a young man of singular gravity and innocence. Indeed, it may be remarked that he, like many other penitents who, in general terms, acknowledge themselves to have been the worst of mankind, fired up and stood vigorously on his defence whenever any particular charge was made against him by others. . . .

"The worst that can be laid to the charge of this poor youth, whom it has been the fashion to represent as the most desperate of reprobates, as a village Rochester, is that he had a great liking for some diversions quite harmless in themselves, but condemned by the rigid precisians among whom he lived, and for whose opinions he had a great respect. The four chief sins of which he was guilty were dancing, ringing the bells of the parish church, playing at tipcat, and reading the history of Sir Bevis of Southampton." A rector of the school of Laund would have held such a young man up to the whole parish as a model. But Bunyan's notions of good and evil had been learned in a very different school; he was made miserable by the conflict between his tastes and his scruples."

A TINKER; A SOLDIER; A HUSBAND

Bunyan was brought up to follow the same humble calling as his father, but when he was about seventeen years of age the ordinary course of his life was interrupted by his becoming a soldier in the Parliamentary army. He served during the decisive campaign of 1645, but only one incident of his military career has come down to us. "When I was a soldier," he says, "I was with others drawn out to go to such a place to besiege it. But when I was just ready to go, one of the company desired to go in my room. Coming to the siege, as he stood sentinel, he was shot in the heart with a musket bullet, and died." Tradition agrees that the place to which these words refer was Leicester.

The glimpses obtained during his military service of the pomps of war powerfully impressed the imagination of Bunyan. In his after life he delighted to draw his illustrations of sacred things from camps and fortresses, from guns, drums, trumpets, flags of truce, and regiments arrayed each under its own banner. It has been pointed out that his Greatheart, his Captain Boanerges, and his Captain Credence are evidently portraits, of which the originals were among those martial saints who fought and expounded in Fairfax's army.

On his return home from the wars, Bunyan married. "I lighted on a wife," he says, "whose father was counted godly. We came together as poor as poor might be, not having so much household stuff as a dish or a spoon between us. But she had for her portion two books, 'The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven' and 'The Practice of Piety,' which her father had left her when he died. In these two books I sometimes read with her. I found some things pleasing to me, but all this while I met with no conviction. She often told me what a godly man her father was, how he would reprove and correct vice, both in his house and among his neighbours; what a strict and holy life he lived in his day, both in word and deed. These books, though they did not reach my heart, did light in me some desire to religion."

THE SPIRIT OF SUPERSTITION; SUNDAY SPORTS; SWEARING REPROVED.

"About this time," he says, "I fell in with the religion of the times to go to church twice a day, very devoutly to say and sing as the others did, yet retaining my wicked life. Withal I was so overrun with the spirit of superstition, that I adored with great devotion even all things—both the high place, priest, clerk, vestment, service, and what else belonging to the Church; counting all things holy therein contained, and especially the priest and clerk most happy and without doubt greatly blessed. This conceit grew so strong in my spirit, that had I but seen a priest, though never so sordid and debauched in his life, I should find my spirit fall under him, reverence, and be knit to him. Their name, their garb, and work did so intoxicate and bewitch me."

One day the parson took for his subject the observance of the Sabbath and the sinfulness of breaking it, either with labour, sports, or otherwise. "I fell," says Bunyan, "in my conscience, under his sermon, to thinking and believing that he made that sermon on purpose to show me my evil-doing." But by the time dinner was over he shook the sermon out of mind and betook himself to his old sports.

"But the same day," to quote his own words, "as I was in the midst of a game of cat, and having struck it one blow from the hole, just as I was about to strike it the second time, a voice did suddenly dart from heaven into my soul, which said, 'Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell?' At this I was put to an exceeding maze; wherefore, leaving my cat upon the ground, I looked up to heaven, and was as if I had, with the eyes of my understanding, seen the Lord Jesus look down upon me, as being very hotly displeased with me, and as if He did severely threaten me with some grievous punishment for those and other ungodly practices."

He concluded, however, that it was too late for him to repent. He was past pardon. He was sure to be damned, and he might as well be damned for many sins as few. Sin at all events was pleasant,—the only pleasant thing he knew,—therefore he would take his fill of it. The sin was the game, and nothing but the game. He continued to play, and the Puritan sensitiveness had taken hold of him. An artificial offence had become a real offence when his conscience was wounded by it. He was reckless and desperate.

"This temptation of the devil," he says, "is more usual among poor creatures than many are aware of. It continued with me about a month or more; but one day, as I was standing at my neighbour's shop-window, and there cursing and swearing after my wonted manner, there sate within the woman of the house and heard me, who, though she was a loose and ungodly wretch, protested that I swore and cursed at such a rate that she trembled to hear me. I was able to spoil all the youths in a whole town. At this reproof I was silenced and put to secret shame, and that too, as I thought, before the God of heaven. I stood hanging down my head, and wishing that I might be a little child, that my father might learn me to speak without this wicked sin of swearing; for, thought I, I am so accustomed to it, that it is vain to think of a reformation. But how it came to pass I know not. I did from this time forward so leave my swearing, that it was a great wonder to myself to observe it; and whereas before I knew not how to speak, unless I put an oath before and another behind, to make my words have authority, now I could without it speak better and with more pleasantness than ever I could before. All this while I knew not Jesus Christ, neither did leave my sports and plays.

REFORMATION; ENQUIRY.

"But quickly after this I fell into company with one poor man that made profession of religion, who, as I then thought, did talk pleasantly of the Scriptures and of religion; wherefore, liking what he said, I betook me to my Bible, and began to take great pleasure in reading, especially with the historical part thereof; for, as for St. Paul's epistles and such-like scriptures, I could not away with them, being as yet ignorant either of my nature or of the want and worth of Jesus Christ to save us. Wherefore I fell to some outward reformation, both in my words and life, and did set the commandments before me for my way to heaven, which commandments I also did strive to keep, and, as I thought, did keep them pretty well sometimes, and then I should have comfort; yet now and then should break one, and so afflict my conscience; but then I should repent, and say I was sorry for it, and promise God to do better next time, and there got help again; for then I thought I pleased God as well as any man in England.

"Thus I continued about a year, all which time our neighbours did take me to be a very godly and religious man, and did marvel much to see such great alteration in my life and manners; and indeed so it was, though I knew not Christ, nor grace, nor faith, nor hope; for, as I have since seen, had I then died, my state had been most fearful. But, I say, my neighbours were amazed at this my great conversion—from prodigious profaneness to something like a moral life and sober man. Now, therefore, they began to praise, to commend, and to speak well of me, both to my face and behind my back. Now I was, as they said, become godly; now I was become a right honest man. But oh! when I understood those were their words and opinions of me, it pleased me mighty well; for though as yet I was nothing but a poor painted hypocrite, yet I loved to be talked of as one that was truly godly. I was proud of my godliness, and indeed I did all I did either to be seen or well spoken of by men; and thus I continued for about a twelvemonth or more.

"Now you must know that before this I had taken much delight in ringing; but my conscience beginning to be tender, I thought such practice was but vain, and therefore forced myself to leave it; yet my mind hankered after the ways of the world; wherefore I would go to the steeplehouse, and look on, though I durst not ring. But I thought this did not become religion neither; yet I forced myself, and would look on still. But quickly after I began to think, 'How if one of the bells should fall?' Then I chose to stand under a main beam that lay overthwart the steeple, from side to side, thinking here I might stand sure; but then I thought again, 'Should the bell fall with a swing, it might first hit the wall, and then rebounding upon me, might kill me for all this beam.' This made me stand in the steeple-door; 'and now,' thought I, 'I am safe enough; for if a bell should then fall, I can slip out behind these thick walls, and so be preserved notwithstanding.' So after this I would yet go to see them ring, but would not go any farther than the steeple-door; but then it came into my head, 'How if the steeple itself should fall?' And this thought—it may, for aught I know, when I stood and looked on—did continually so shake my mind, that I durst not stand at the steeple-door any longer, but was forced to flee, for fear the steeple should fall upon my head.

"Another thing was my dancing; I was full a year before I could quite leave that. But all this while, when I thought I kept that or this commandment, or did by word or deed anything I thought was good, I had great peace in my conscience, and would think with myself, God cannot choose but be now pleased with me; yea, to relate it in my own way, I thought no man in England could please God better than I. But, poor wretch as I was, I was all this while ignorant of Jesus Christ, and going about to establish my own righteousness; and had perished therein, had not God in His mercy showed me more of my state by nature."

One day, in a street in Bedford, as he was at work in his calling, he fell in with three or four old women sitting at a door in the sun, talking about the things of God. By this time he himself was "a brisk talker" about religious subjects, and he joined in the conversation. Their expressions proved quite beyond his comprehension. "They were speaking of the wretchedness of their own hearts, of their unbelief, of their miserable state. They did contemn, slight, and abhor their own righteousness as filthy and insufficient to do them any good. They spoke of a new birth, and of the work of God in their hearts, which comforted and strengthened them against the temptations of the devil."

Bunyan left the women, and resumed his work, but what they said haunted him. He was greatly affected. He saw that he "wanted the true tokens of a godly man." He sought them out, and had frequent conversations with them. He could not stay away, and the more he saw of them the more he questioned his condition.

"I found two things," he says, "at which I did sometimes marvel, considering what a blind ungodly wretch but just before I was; one, a great softness and tenderness of heart, which caused me to fall under the conviction of what, by Scripture, they asserted; the other, a great bending of my mind to a continual meditating on it. My mind was now like a horse-leech at the vein, still crying, 'Give! give!' so fixed on eternity and on the kingdom of heaven (though I knew but little), that neither pleasure, nor profit, nor persuasion, nor threats, could loosen it or make it let go its hold. It is in very deed a certain truth, it would have been then as difficult for me to have taken my mind from heaven to earth as I have found it often since to get it from earth to heaven."

These poor women whose company Bunyan sought after he had listened to their talk were members of a small Baptist congregation, which a Kentish man, John Gifford by name, had formed at Bedford. The effect of their conversation with him was that he began to look into the Bible with new eyes, and "indeed was never out of it, either by reading or meditation." He now took great delight in St. Paul's Epistles, which before he "could not away with;" and the first strong impression which they made upon him was that he wanted the gifts of wisdom and knowledge of which the Apostle speaks, and was doubtful whether he had faith or not; yet this was a doubt which he could not bear, being certain that if he were without faith he must perish.

FEARS AND DELUSIONS.

Being "put to his plunge" about this, and not as yet consulting with any one, he conceived that the only means by which he could be certified was by trying to work a miracle, a delusion which, he says, the tempter enforced and strengthened by urging upon him those texts of Scripture that seemed to look that way.

"One day," he writes, "as I was between Elstow and Bedford, the temptation was hot upon me to try if I had faith by doing some miracle. I must say to the puddles that were on the roadside, 'Be dry!' And truly at one time I was going to say so indeed; but just as I was about to speak, the thought came into my mind, 'Go under yonder hedge first, and pray that God would make you able.' But when I had concluded to pray, this came hot upon me, that if I prayed and came again and tried to do it, and yet did nothing notwithstanding, then be sure I had no faith, but was a castaway and lost. 'Nay,' thought I, 'if it be so I will never try it yet, but will stay a little longer.' Thus was I tossed between the devil and my own ignorance, and so perplexed at some times that I could not tell what to do."

He now began to be tormented by a succession of fantasies, which seemed likely to drive him to suicide or Bedlam. "I began," he says, "to see something of the vanity and inward wretchedness of my wicked heart, for as yet I knew no great matter therein. But now it began to be discovered unto me, and to work for wickedness as it never did before. Lusts and corruptions would strongly put themselves forth within me in wicked thoughts and desires which I did not regard before. Whereas before my soul was full of longing after God, now my heart began to hanker after every foolish vanity.

"As to the act of sinning, I was never more tender than now. I durst not take up a pin or a stick, though but so big as a straw, for my conscience now was sore, and would smart at every touch. I could not tell how to speak my words, for fear I should misplace them.

"My original and inward pollution was my plague and my affliction. I was more loathsome in my own eyes than was a toad, and I thought I was in God's eyes too. I thought every one had a better heart than I had. I could have changed heart with anybody. I thought none but the devil himself could equal me for inward wickedness and pollution. 'Sure', thought I, 'I am given up to the devil and to a reprobate mind;' and thus I continued for a long while, even for some years together."

One of Bunyan's notions at this time was that all who could boast of Israelitish blood would be saved, and he tried to make out that he had some chance under this head; but his hopes were speedily destroyed by his father, who seems to have had no ambition to be regarded as a Jew.

Then he took up a notion that the day of grace for Bedford and the villages in the vicinity was past; that all who were to be saved in that part of England were already converted, and that his endeavours after salvation had been begun some months too late.

Next he was harassed by doubts whether the Turks were not in the right, and the Christians in the wrong. "How can you tell," the tempter whispered, "but that the Turks have as good a scripture to prove their Mahomet the Saviour as we have to prove our Jesus is? Could I think that so many tens of thousands in so many countries and kingdoms should be without the knowledge of the right way to heaven, if there were indeed a heaven, and that we who lie in a corner of the earth should alone be blessed therewith. Every one doth think his own religion the rightest, both Jews, Moors, and Pagans; and how if all our faith, and Christ, and Scripture should be but 'a think so' too." St. Paul spoke positively. Bunyan saw shrewdly that on St. Paul the weight of the whole Christian theory really rested. But how could he tell but that St. Paul, being a subtle and cunning man, might give himself up to deceive with strong delusions? "He was carried away by such thoughts as by a whirlwind."

Then he was troubled by a maniacal impulse to pray to the trees, to a broomstick, to the parish bull. As yet, however, he was only entering the valley of the shadow of death. Soon the darkness grew thicker. Hideous forms floated before him. Sounds of cursing and wailing were in his ears. His way ran through stench and fire, close to the mouth of the bottomless pit.

He began to be haunted by a strange curiosity about the unpardonable sin. But the most frightful of all the forms which his disease took was a propensity to utter blasphemy, and especially to renounce his share in the benefits of the redemption. Night and day, in bed, at table, at work, evil spirits, as he imagined, were repeating, close to his ear, the words, "Sell him! sell him!" He struck at the hobgoblins; he pushed them from him; but still they were ever at his side. He cried out in answer to them, hour after hour, "Never, never! not for thousands of worlds; not for thousands." At length, worn out by this long agony, he suffered the fatal words to escape him, "Let him go if he will."

Then his misery became more terrible than ever. He felt as if he had done what could not be forgiven, and had forfeited his part of the great sacrifice. "None," he afterwards wrote, "knows the terrors of those days but myself." He has described his sufferings with singular energy, simplicity, and pathos. He envied the very stones on the street and the tiles on the houses. The sun seemed to grudge him both light and warmth. His body, though cast in a sturdy mould, and still in the vigour of youth, trembled whole days together with the fear of death and judgment. He fancied that this trembling was the sign set on the worst reprobates, the sign which God had put on Cain. The unhappy man's emotion destroyed his powers of digestion. He had such pains that he expected to burst asunder like Judas, whom he regarded as his prototype.

Neither the books which Bunyan read, nor the religious advisers whom he consulted, were likely to prove serviceable in a case like his. One old man, of high repute for piety, whom he took into his counsel, gave an opinion which might well have produced fatal consequences. "I am afraid," said Bunyan, "that I have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost." "Indeed," replied the old fanatic, "I am afraid you have."

FIRST COMFORT; CONVERSION.

The first comfort which he received, and which had there not been a mist before his understanding, he might have found in every page of the gospel, came to him in a sermon upon a strange text, strangely handled: "Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair." Gradually the clouds cleared away, and the enthusiast who had imagined that he was branded with the mark of the first murderer, and destined to the end of the arch-traitor, enjoyed peace and a confident assurance in the mercy of God.

"One day," he says, "as I was travelling into the country, musing on the wickedness of my heart, and considering the enmity that was in me to God, the Scripture came into my mind, 'He hath made peace through the blood of His cross.' I saw that the justice of God and my sinful soul could embrace and kiss each other. I was ready to swoon, not with grief and trouble, but with solid joy and peace." Everything became clear: the Gospel history, the birth, the life, the death of the Saviour; how He gave Himself to be nailed on the cross for his (Bunyan's) sins. "I saw Him in the spirit," he goes on, "a Man on the right hand of the Father, pleading for me, and have seen the manner of His coming from heaven to judge the world with glory.

"Love and affection for Christ," he says, "did work at this time such a strong and hot desire of revenge upon myself for the abuse I had done to Him, that, to speak as then I thought, had I had a thousand gallons of blood in my veins, I could freely have spilt it all at the command of my Lord and Saviour. The tempter told me it was vain to pray. 'Yet,' thought I, 'I will pray.' 'But,' said the tempter, 'your sin is unpardonable.' 'Well,' said I, 'I will pray.' 'It is no boot,' said he. 'Yet,' said I, 'I will pray:' so I went to prayer, and uttered words to this effect: Lord, Satan tells me that neither Thy mercy nor Christ's blood is sufficient to save my soul. Lord, shall I honour Thee most by believing that Thou wilt and canst, or him, by believing that Thou neither wilt nor canst? Lord, I would fain honour Thee by believing that Thou wilt and canst.' As I was there before the Lord, the scripture came, 'O man, great is thy faith,' even as if one had clapped me on the back."

"Now," says Bunyan, "there remained only the hinder part of the tempest." Heavenly voices continued to encourage him. "As I was passing in the field," he goes on, "I heard the sentence, Thy righteousness is in heaven;" and methought I saw, with the eyes of my soul, Jesus Christ at God's right hand; there, I say, as my righteousness; so that wherever I was, or whatever I was doing, God could not say of me He wants my righteousness, for that was just before Him. Now did my chains fall off my legs indeed. I was loosed from my affliction and irons; my temptations also fled away, so that from that time those dreadful Scriptures of God left off to trouble me. Now went I home rejoicing for the grace and love of God. 'Christ of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.' I now lived very sweetly at peace with God through Christ. 'Oh! methought, 'Christ, Christ!' There was nothing but Christ before my eyes. I was not now only looking upon this and the other benefits of Christ apart, as of His blood, burial, and resurrection, but considered Him as a whole Christ. All those graces that were now green in me were yet but like those cracked groats and fourpence-half-pennies which rich men carry in their purses, while their gold is in their trunks at home. Oh! I saw my gold was in my trunk at home, in Christ my Lord and Saviour. The Lord led me into the mystery of union with the Son of God, that I was joined to Him, that I was flesh of His flesh. If He and I were one, His righteousness was mine, His merits mine, His victory mine. Now I could see myself in heaven and earth at once; in heaven by my Christ, though on earth by my body and person. Christ was that common and public Person in whom the whole body of His elect are always to be considered and reckoned. We fulfilled the law by Him, died by Him, rose from the dead by Him, got the victory over sin and death, the devil and hell by Him. I had cause to say, 'Praise ye the Lord. Praise God in His sanctuary.'"

Years, however, elapsed before the nerves of John Bunyan, which had been, as we have seen, so terribly overstrained, recovered their tone. On his joining the Baptist Society at Bedford, and being admitted for the first time to partake of the sacrament, it was with difficulty that he could refrain from imprecating destruction on his brethren whilst the cup was passing from hand to hand.

ENGAGED IN PREACHING.

Gifford, the minister of the Baptist Society, died in 1655, and in the following year a resolution was passed at the meeting, that "some of the brethren (one at a time), to whom the Lord may have given a gift, be called forth and encouraged to speak a word in the church for mutual edification." Bunyan was one of the persons so called upon.

"The which," says Bunyan, "though at the first it did much dash and abash my spirit, yet, being still by them desired and entreated, I consented to their request; and did twice, at two several assemblies (but in private), though with much weakness and infirmity, discover my gift amongst them; at which they not only seemed to be, but did solemnly protest as in the sight of the great God they were, both affected and comforted, and gave thanks to the Father of mercies for the grace bestowed on me."

In those days the supply of public news came so slowly, and it was so scanty when it came, that even the proceedings of so humble an individual as Bunyan became matter of considerable attention in the town of Bedford. His example drew many to the Baptist meeting, from curiosity to discover what had affected him there and produced such a change in his conversation.

The Bedford meeting had at this time its regular minister, whose name was John Burton, so that when Bunyan was shortly afterwards "more particularly called forth and appointed to a more ordinary and public preaching," what he received was a roving commission to itinerate in the villages in the neighbourhood. In this he was so much occupied, that when, in the ensuing year, he was nominated for a deacon of the congregation, they declined electing him to that office, on the ground that he was too much engaged to attend to it.

When he first began to preach, Bunyan endeavoured to work upon his hearers by alarming them: he dealt chiefly in commination, and dwelt upon the dreadful doctrine that the curse of God "lays hold on all men as they come into the world because of sin."

The Lord led him to begin where His Word began, with sinners. "This part of my work," he says, "I fulfilled with a great sense, for the terrors of the law and guilt for my transgressions lay heavy on my conscience. I preached what I felt. I had been sent to my hearers as from the dead. I went myself in chains to preach to them in chains, and carried that fire in my own conscience that I persuaded them to beware of. I have gone full of guilt and terror to the pulpit door; God carried me on with a strong hand, for neither guilt nor hell could take me off."

Most of Bunyan's addresses remain in the form of theological treatises, and Mr. Froude, in giving an account of them, makes some remarks much to the point. "Bunyan's doctrine," he says, "was the doctrine of the best and strongest minds in Europe. It had been believed by Luther, it had been believed by Knox. It was believed at that moment by Oliver Cromwell as completely as by Bunyan himself. It was believed, so far as such a person could be said to believe anything, by the all-accomplished Leibnitz himself. Few educated people use the language of it now. In them it was a fire from heaven, shining like a sun in a dark world. With us the fire has gone out; in the place of it we have but smoke and ashes; and the evangelical mind, in search of something deeper and truer than satisfied the last century,' is turning back to catholic verities. What Bunyan had to say may be less than the whole truth: we shall scarcely find the still missing part of it in lines of thought which we have outgrown."

Preaching was not Bunyan's sole employment; and though still working at his business for a maintenance, he found time to compose a treatise against some of those heresies which the first Quakers poured forth so profusely in their overflowing enthusiasm.

Bunyan's rapidly growing reputation produced effects which might have been anticipated. He tells us that the ignorant and malicious were stirred up to load him with slanders; and that whatever the devil could devise, and his instruments invent, was "whirled up and down the country" against him, thinking that by that means they should make his ministry to be abandoned. He was called a witch, a Jesuit, a highwayman. It was reported that he had "his misses," that he had two wives, etc. "My foes have missed their mark in this," he said with honest warmth: "I am not the man."

SHUT UP IN PRISON.

By this time Bunyan's first wife had died, and he had married a second. That he "carried it pleasant" towards her, appears by the behaviour of this second wife in his troubles. These troubles came on a few months only after the Restoration, Bunyan being one of the first persons after that event who were punished for nonconformity.

The nation was in a most unquiet state. There was a restless, rancorous, implacable party, who would have renewed the civil war for the sake of again trying the experiment of a commonwealth. They looked to Ludlow as their general, and Algernon Sidney took the first opportunity of soliciting for them men from Holland and money from France. The political enthusiasts who were engaged in such schemes counted upon the sectaries for support. Even among the sober sects there were men who at the cost of a rebellion would gladly have again thrown down the Church Establishment for the hope of setting up their own system during the anarchy that must come. In such times the Government was rendered suspicious by the constant sense of danger, and was led as much by fear as by resentment to severities which are explained by the necessity of self-defence, not justified by it, when they fell upon the innocent, or even upon the less guilty.

A warrant was issued against Bunyan, as if he had been a dangerous person, because he went about preaching. This office was deemed incompatible with his calling; he was known to be hostile to the restored Church.

In November, 1660, he was flung into Bedford gaol; and there he remained, with some intervals of partial and precarious liberty, during twelve years. His persecutors tried to extort from him a promise that he would abstain from preaching; but he was convinced that he was divinely set apart and commissioned to be a teacher of righteousness, and he was fully determined to obey God rather than man. He was brought before several tribunals, laughed at, caressed, reviled, menaced; but in vain. He was facetiously told that he was quite right in thinking that his gift ought not to remain hidden, but that his real gift was ability to mend old kettles. He was compared to Alexander the coppersmith, who troubled the apostles. He was told that if he would give up preaching he would at once be set free.

His imprisonment might have ended at any time, if he would have promised to confine his addresses to a private circle; it did end after six years. He was released under the first declaration of indulgence; but as he instantly recommenced his preaching, he was arrested again. Another six years went by; he was again let go, and was taken once more, immediately after, preaching in a wood. This time he was detained but for a few months, and in form more than in reality. The policy of the Government was then changed, and he was free for the rest of his life.

NOT FOUNDED ON FACT.

Bunyan's condition during his long confinement has furnished a subject for pictures, which, if correct, would be extremely affecting. Mr. Froude, however, points out, and we quite agree with him, what slender foundation they apparently have in fact. "It is true," says Mr. Froude, "that, being unable to attend to his usual business, he spent his unoccupied hours in making tags for bootlaces." With this one fact to build on, and with the assumption that the scene of his sufferings was the Bridge Lockhouse, Nonconformist imagination has drawn a 'den' for us, 'where there was not a yard or a court to walk in for daily exercise; a damp and dreary cell; a narrow chink, which admits a few scanty rays of light to render visible the abode of woe;' the prisoner, pale and emaciated, seated on the humid earth, pursuing his daily task, to earn the morsel which prolongs his existence and his confinement together. Near him, reclining in pensive sadness, his blind daughter, five other distressed children, and an affectionate wife, whom pinching want and grief have worn down to the gate of death. Ten summer suns have rolled over the mansion of his misery, whose reviving rays have never once penetrated his sad abode, and so on.

"If this description resembles or approaches the truth, I can but say that to have thus abandoned to want their most distinguished pastor and his family was intensely discreditable to the Baptist community. English prisons in the seventeenth century were not models of good management. But prisoners, whose friends could pay for them, were not consigned to damp and dreary cells; and in default of evidence, of which not a particle exists, I cannot charge so reputable a community with a neglect so scandalous. The entire story is in itself incredible. Bunyan was prosperous in his business. He was respected and looked up to by a large and growing body of citizens, including persons of wealth and position in London. He was a representative sufferer, fighting the battle of all the Nonconformists in England. He had active supporters in the town of Bedford and among the gentlemen of the county. The authorities, so far as can be inferred from their actions, tried from the first to deal as gently with him as he would allow them to do. Is it conceivable that the Baptists would have left his family to starve; or that his own confinement would have been made so absurdly and needlessly cruel? Is it not far more likely that he found all the indulgences which money could buy and the rules of the prison would allow? Bunyan is not himself responsible for these wild legends. Their real character appears more clearly when we observe how he was occupied during these years.

"Friends, in the first place, had free access to him, and strangers who were drawn to him by reputation; while the gaol was considered a private place, and he was allowed to preach there, at least occasionally, to his fellow-prisoners. Charles Doe, a distinguished Nonconformist, visited him in his confinement, and has left an account of what he saw. 'When I was there,' he writes, 'there were about sixty dissenters besides himself, taken but a little before at a religious meeting at Kaistor, in the county of Bedford, besides two eminent dissenting ministers, Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Dunn, by which means the prison was much crowded. Yet, in the midst of all that hurry, I heard Mr. Bunyan both preach and pray with that mighty spirit of faith in Divine assistance, that he made me stand and wonder. Here they could sing without fear of being overheard, no informers prowling round, and the world shut out.'"

A WIFE'S PETITION; THOUGHTS IN CAPTIVITY.

One of the most interesting events of his imprisonment is the application made on behalf of Bunyan by his wife, a woman who evidently had imbibed something of her husband's spirit. Sir Matthew Hale happened to be one of the judges of assize to whom she presented a petition begging that they would impartially take his case into consideration. She complained to Hale that her husband was kept unlawfully in prison, for the indictment was false, and he was clapped up before there were any proclamations against the meetings. One of the judges then said he had been legally convicted. "It is false," replied the woman; "for when they said to him, 'Do you confess the indictment?' he only said this, that he had been at several meetings both when there was preaching the word and prayer, and that they had God's presence among them." "Will your husband leave preaching?" said Judge Twisden; "if he will do so, then send for him." "My lord," said she, "he dare not leave preaching as long as he can speak." Sir Matthew himself was not likely to be favourably impressed by this sort of pleading, and the application of course came to nothing.

It would be wronging Bunyan, were the touching expression of his feelings in his captivity to be withheld. "I found myself," he says, "a man encompassed with infirmities. The parting with my wife and poor children hath often been to me, in this place, as the pulling the flesh from the bones; and that, not only because I am somewhat too fond of these great mercies, but also because I should have often brought to my mind the many hardships, miseries, and wants that my poor family was like to meet with, should I be taken from them, especially my poor, blind child [one of his children by his first wife], who lay nearer my heart than all besides. Oh, the thought of the hardships I thought my poor blind one might go under would break my heart to pieces! 'Poor child!' thought I, 'what sorrow art thou like to have for thy portion in this world! Thou must be beaten; must beg; suffer hunger, cold, nakedness, and a thousand calamities, though I cannot now endure the wind should blow upon thee.' But yet, recalling myself, thought I, 'I must venture you all with God, though it goeth to the quick to leave you.' "

STUDYING AND WRITING.

In prison Bunyan studied indefatigably the few books he possessed. His two chief companions were the Bible and Fox's Book of Martyrs. His knowledge of the Scriptures was such that he might have been called a living concordance, and on the margin of his copy of the Book of Martyrs are still legible some ill-spelt lines of doggerel "in which he expressed his reverence for the brave sufferers, and his implacable enmity to the mystical Babylon."

"At length," says Lord Macaulay, "he began to write, and though it was some time before he discovered where his strength lay, his writings were not unsuccessful. They were coarse, indeed, but they showed a keen mother-wit, a great command of the homely mother-tongue, an intimate knowledge of the English Bible, and a vast and dearly bought spiritual experience. They therefore, when the corrector of the press had improved the syntax and the spelling, were well received by the humbler class of dissenters."

Before he left his prison he had begun the "Pilgrim's Progress," the book which has rendered his name immortal. The history of this book is remarkable. The author tells us that he was engaged in writing a treatise in which he had occasion to speak of the Christian's progress. He compared that progress, as many others have done, to a pilgrimage. Soon his quick fancy discovered innumerable points of similarity which had escaped his predecessors, and images came crowding on his mind faster than he could put them into words. He had no assistance. Nobody saw a line till he had finished the whole. He then consulted his pious acquaintances. Some were pleased, but others were much scandalized at what they thought the frivolity of the performance. What was it but a vain story—a mere romance? In defiance of their opinion, however, Bunyan determined to print.

The second part of the "Pilgrim's Progress" appeared in 1684. It was not long afterwards followed by the "Holy War," which, after the "Pilgrim's Progress," is, in the opinion of Macaulay, perhaps the best allegory that ever was penned.

A POPULAR PREACHER.

Bunyan now enjoyed a greatly improved position. There was a time when many dissenting ministers, proud of possessing a smattering of Latin and Greek, had affected to look down on him, but his reputation and influence now far exceeded theirs. He became so influential among the Baptists, that he went popularly by the name of Bishop Bunyan.

His episcopal visitations were annual. Every year he rode from Bedford to the metropolis, where he preached to large and attentive congregations. From London he went his circuit through the country, rousing the zeal of his fellow-Baptists, collecting and distributing alms, and making up quarrels.

As a preacher, Bunyan may be supposed to have been always vehement and vigorous in delivery, as he frequently is in his language. One day, when he had preached "with peculiar warmth and enlargement," some of his friends came to shake hands with him after the service, and observed to him what "a sweet sermon" he had delivered. "Aye," he replied, "you need not remind me of that, for the devil told me of it before I was out of the pulpit." This anecdote authenticates itself.

From the magistrates he seems to have received few troublesome attentions. There is reason, however, for believing that in 1685 there was some danger of his being lodged in his old quarters in Bedford gaol. "In that year the rash and wicked enterprise of Monmouth gave the Government a pretext for prosecuting the Nonconformists, and scarcely one eminent divine of the Presbyterian, Independent, or Baptist persuasion remained unmolested. Baxter was in prison. Howe was driven into exile, Henry was arrested. Two eminent Baptists, with whom Bunyan had been engaged in controversy, were in great peril and distress. Danvers was in danger of being hanged, and Kippin's grandsons were actually hanged."

There is a tradition that during these evil days Bunyan was forced to disguise himself as a waggoner, and that he preached to his congregation at Bedford in a smockfrock, and with a cart whip in his hand.

Soon a great change took place, and all danger was at an end. James II. was at open war with the Church, and found it expedient to pay court to the dissenters. An attempt was made to secure the support of Bunyan. The creatures of the Government who did so remembered that he had written in praise of the indulgence of 1672, and they hoped that he would be equally delighted with the indulgence of 1687. But they were mistaken: fifteen years of thought, observation, and contact with the world had made Bunyan a wiser man. Besides, the cases were hardly parallel. Charles was a professed Protestant; James, on the other hand, was a professed Papist. The object of Charles's indulgence was disguised; that of the indulgence of James was patent. "Bishop" Bunyan was not deceived, and instead of doing what was desired of him, exhorted his hearers to prepare themselves by fasting and prayer for the danger which menaced their civil and religious liberties.

Bunyan was not spared to see the Revolution. His end was characteristic, being brought on by exposure when he was engaged in an act of charity. A quarrel had broken out in a family at Reading, with which he had some acquaintance. A father had taken great offence at his son, and threatened to disinherit him. Bunyan rode from Bedford to Reading in hope to bring about a reconciliation. He succeeded, but at the loss of his life. Returning by London, he was overtaken by a storm of rain, and was drenched before he could find shelter. On reaching his lodgings on Snow Hill, he was seized with a violent fever, and died in a few days.

JOHN BUNYAN'S DEATH.

The exact date of Bunyan's death is uncertain. It was towards the close of August, 1688, between two and three months before the landing of King William. His last words were, "Take me, for I come to Thee."

He was buried in the dissenters' burying-ground of Bunhill Fields. "So ended, at the age of sixty," says Mr. Froude, "a man who, if his importance may be measured by the influence which he has exerted over succeeding generations, must be counted among the most extraordinary persons whom England has produced. It has been the fashion to dwell on the disadvantages of his education, and to regret the carelessness of nature which brought into existence a man of genius in a tinker's hut at Elstow. Nature is less partial than she appears, and all situations in life have their compensations along with them.

"Circumstances, I should say, qualified Bunyan perfectly well for the work which he had to do. If he had gone to school, as he said, with Aristotle and Plato; if he had been broken in at a university, and been turned into a bishop; if he had been in any one of the learned professions, he might easily have lost or might have never known the secret of his powers. He was born to be the poet-apostle of the English middle classes, imperfectly educated like himself; and, being one of themselves, he had the key of their thoughts and feelings in his own heart. Like nine out of ten of his countrymen, he came into the world with no fortune but his industry. He had to work with his hands for his bread, and to advance by the side of his neighbours along the road of common business. His knowledge was scanty, though of rare quality. He knew his Bible probably by heart. He had studied history in Foxe's 'Martyrs,' but nowhere else that we can trace. The rest of his mental furniture was gathered at first hand from his conscience, his life, and his occupations. Thus every idea which he received, falling into a soil naturally fertile, sprouted up fresh, vigorous, and original."

The deep affliction that his church was plunged into by John Bunyan's death, led to several special meetings. Wednesday, the 4th of September, "was kept in prayer and humiliation for this heavy stroke upon us,—the death of dear brother Bunyan; it was appointed also, that Wednesday next be kept in prayer and humiliation on the same account. At the meeting held on the 11th, it was appointed that all the brethren meet together on the 18th of this month September, to humble themselves for this heavy hand of God upon us, and also to pray unto the Lord for counsel and direction what to do in order to seek out a fit person to make choice of for an elder. On the 18th, when the whole congregation met to humble themselves before God, by fasting and prayer, for His heavy and severe stroke upon us in taking away our honoured brother, Bunyan, by death, it was agreed by the whole congregation that care be taken to seek out for one suitably qualified to be chosen an elder among us, and that care was committed by the whole to the brethren at Bedford." Thus did the congregation manifest that they had improved in wisdom under his ministry, by flying, in their extreme distress, to the only source of consolation.

The saddest feelings of sorrow extended to every place where he had been known. His friend, the Rev. G. Cockayne, of London, says: "It pleased the Lord to remove him, to the great loss and inexpressible grief of many precious souls." Numerous elegies, acrostics, and poems were published on the occasion of his decease, lamenting the loss thus sustained by his country, by the Church at large, and particularly by the church and congregation at Bedford. One of these, "written by a dear friend of his," is a fair sample of the whole:—

JOHN BUNYAN.

"A SHORT ELEGY OF MR. JOHN BUNYAN, WRITTEN BY A DEAR FRIEND OF HIS.

"THE pilgrim travelling the world's vast stage,
At last does end his weary pilgrimage:
He now in pleasant valleys does sit down,
And for his toil receives a glorious crown.
The storms are past, the terrors vanish all,
Which in his way did so affrighting fall:
He grieves nor sighs no more, his race is run Successfully, that was so well begun.
You'll say he's dead: Oh no, he cannot die,
He's only changed to immortality.
Weep not for him, who has no cause of tears;
Hush, then, your sighs, and calm your needless fears.
If anything in love to him is meant,
Tread his last steps, and of your sins repent:
If knowledge of things here at all remains Beyond the grave, to please him for his pains
And suffering in this world; live, then, upright,
And that will be to him a grateful sight;
Run such a race as you again may meet,
And find your conversation far more sweet.
When, purged from dross, you shall unmixed possess
The purest essence of eternal bliss.
'He in his pulpit preached truth first, and then He in his practice practised it o'er again.'"

His remains were interred in Bunhill Fields, in the vault of the friend, Mr. Strudwick, at whose house he died. His tomb has been visited by thousands of pilgrims, blessing God for His goodness in raising up such a man so signally fitted to be a blessing to the times in which he lived. All the accounts of his decease published at the time agree as to the place of his burial. The words of Mr. Doe, who probably attended the funeral, are, "He was buried in the new burying-place, near the artillery-ground, where he sleeps to the morning of the resurrection." His "Life and Actions," 1692, records that "his funeral was performed with much decency, and he was buried in the new burying-ground, by Moorfields." The Struggler calls it "Finchbury burying-ground, where many London Dissenting ministers are laid." Bunhill Fields burying-ground for Dissenters was first opened in 1666. The inscription upon the tomb to his memory was engraven many years after his funeral. It is not contained in the list of inscriptions published in 1717. His widow survived him four years. He had six children by his first wife, three of whom survived him—Thomas, Joseph, and Sarah. His son Thomas joined his congregation in 1673, and was a preacher in 1692. He appears to have been usefully employed in visiting absent members, until December, 1718.

"My kind friend, the Rev. J. P. Lockwood, rector of South Hackney," says Mr. George Offor, writing in 1859, "recently discovered entries in the register of Kimbolton, in Huntingdonshire, probably of the descendants of this son Thomas:—November 26th, 1698, John Bonion and Mary Rogers, married; she was buried September 7th, 1706: and he again married Anne, and buried her in 1712, leaving a son and two daughters. His death is not recorded. One of the descendants, Hannah Bunyan, died in 1770, aged seventy-six years, and lies in the burial-ground by the meeting-house at Bedford. John Bunyan's son Joseph settled at Nottingham, married a wealthy woman, and conformed to the Church.

"A lincal descendant of his was living, in 1847, at Islington, near London, aged eighty-four, Mrs. Senegar, a fine, hearty old lady, but a strict Baptist. She said to me, 'Sir, excuse the vanity of an old woman, but I will show you how I sometimes spend a very pleasant half-hour.' She took down a portrait in canvas of her great forefather, and propped it upon the table with a writing-desk, with a looking-glass by its side. 'There, sir, I look at the portrait and then at myself, and can trace every feature; we resemble each other like two pins.' 'Excepting the imperial and moustachios,' I replied; to which she readily assented. It was the fact that there was a striking likeness between the picture and her reflection in the looking-glass.

"Another descendant from the same branch of the family is now living at Lincoln. He was born in 1775, and possessed a quarto Bible published by Barker and Bill in 1641, given by John Bunyan to his son Joseph. This was preserved in his family till the present year, when it came into my possession, together with the following relics, which were, and I trust will yet be, preserved with the greatest care:—An iron pen-case, made by Bunyan the brazier, with some stumps of old pens, with which it is said he wrote some of his sermons and books; the buckles worn by him, and his two pocket-knives,—one of them made before springs were invented, and which is kept open by turning a ferrule; his apple-scoop, curiously carved, and a seal; his pocket box of scales and weights for money being stamped with the figures on each side of the coins of James and Charles I. These were given by Robert Bunyan in 1839, then sixty-four years of age, to a younger branch of the family, Mr. Charles Robinson, of Wilford, near Nottingham (his sister's son), for safe custody. He died in 1852; while his aged uncle remains in good health, subject to the infirmities of his seventy-eighth year. On many of the blank spaces in the Bible, are the registers of births and deaths in the family, evidently written at the time. These relics are deposited in a carved oak box. They were sold with the late Mr. Robinson's effects, January 1853, and secured for me by my excellent friend, James Dix, Esq., of Bristol, who met with them immediately after the sale, in one of his journeys at Nottingham. They are not worshipped as relics, nor have they performed miracles, but as curiosities of a past age they are worthy of high consideration."

PERSONAL APPEARANCE, MANNERS, AND REPUTATION.

"In countenance," wrote a friend, "John Bunyan appeared to be of a stern and rough temper, but in his conversation mild and affable; not given to loquacity or to much discourse in company, unless some urgent occasion required it; observing never to boast of himself or his parts, but rather to seem low in his own eyes, and submit himself to the judgment of others; abhorring lying and swearing, being just, in all that lay in his power, to his word; not seeming to revenge injuries, loving to reconcile differences and make friendships with all. He had a sharp quick eye, with an excellent discerning of persons, being of good judgment and quick wit. He was tall of stature, strong boned, though not corpulent, somewhat of a ruddy face, with sparkling eyes, wearing his hair on his upper lip; his hair reddish, but in his later days time had sprinkled it with grey; his nose well set, but not decaying or bending; his mouth moderately large, his forehead something high, and his habit always plain and modest."

His manner and presence were as impressive as his writings. "He was mild and affable in conversation," says one who visited him in gaol, "not given to loquacity or to much discourse, unless some urgent occasion required. It was observed he never spoke of himself or of his talents, but seemed low in his own eyes. He was never heard to reproach or revile any, whatever injury he received, but rather rebuked those who did so. He managed all things with such exactness as if he had made it his study not to give offence."

Many anecdotes of him have been preserved, and of these we shall repeat two.

He was once going somewhere disguised as a waggoner, and was overtaken by a constable who had a warrant to arrest him. The constable asked him if he knew that devil of a fellow Bunyan. "Know him!" Bunyan said: "you might call him a devil if you knew him as well as I once did."

On another occasion a Cambridge student was trying to show him what a divine thing reason was—"reason, the chief glory of man, which distinguished him from a beast," etc. Bunyan growled out, "Sin distinguishes man from beast. Is sin divine?"

Bunyan was extremely tolerant in his terms of church membership. He offended the stricter part of his congregation by refusing even to make infant baptism a condition of exclusion. The only persons with whom he declined to communicate were those whose lives were openly immoral. His chief objection to the Church of England was the admission of the ungodly to the sacraments. He hated party titles and quarrels upon trifles. He desired himself to be called a Christian or a believer, or "any name which was approved by the Holy Ghost." Divisions, he said, were to Churches like wars to countries. Those who talked most about religion cared least for it; and controversies about doubtful things and things of little moment, ate up all zeal for things which were practicable and indisputable.

During Bunyan's lifetime, and for at least a century after his death, his fame, however great it might be, was almost entirely confined to religious families of the middle and lower classes. Writers of great literary eminence seldom mentioned him with respect. "Young," says one writer, "coupled his prose with the poetry of the wretched D'Urfey." In the "Spiritual Quixote," the adventures of Christian are ranked with those of Jack the Giant Killer and John Hickethrift. Cowper ventured to praise the great allegorist, but did not venture to name him. It is a significant circumstance that, till a recent period, all the numerous editions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" were evidently meant for the cottage and the servants' hall. The paper, the printing, the plates, were all of the meanest description. In general, when the educated minority differ about the merit of a book, the opinion of the educated minority finally prevails. The "Pilgrim's Progress" is perhaps the only book about which, after the lapse of a hundred years, the educated minority has come over to the opinion of the common people.

The finest trait in Bunyan's Christian character was his deep, heartfelt humility. This is the more extraordinary from his want of secular education and his unrivalled talent. The more we learn, the greater is the field for research that is opened to us, inasmuch that the wisest philosophers have most seriously felt the little progress they made. He acknowledged to Mr. 4

Cockayn that spiritual pride was his easily besetting sin, and that he needed the thorn in the flesh, lest he should be exalted above measure. A sense of his weakness probably led him to peculiar watchfulness against it. His self-abasement was neither tinctured with affectation nor with the pride of humility. His humble-mindedness appeared to arise from his intimate communion with Heaven. In daily communion with God he received a daily lesson of deeper and deeper humility. "I am the high and lofty One; I inhabit eternity: verily this consideration is enough to make a broken-hearted man creep into a mouse-hole, to hide himself from such majesty; there is room in this man's heart for God to dwell!" "I find it one of the hardest things that I can put my soul upon, even to come to God, when warmly sensible that I am a sinner, for a share in grace and mercy. I cannot but with a thousand tears say, 'God be merciful to me a sinner.'"

LORD MACAULAY ON "THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS."

No one has written on the subject of the "Pilgrim's Progress" with greater discrimination and more pronounced enthusiasm than Lord Macaulay. With his remarks we shall draw this sketch of Bunyan's life to a conclusion, feeling that it is worth something to back up one's own opinion of a great masterpiece by a sympathetic quotation from one of the greatest critics our country has yet produced.

"That wonderful book," says Lord Macaulay, "while it obtains admiration from the most fastidious critics, is loved by those who are too simple to admire it. Dr. Johnson, all whose studies were desultory, and who hated, as he said, to read books through, made an exception in favour of the 'Pilgrim's Progress.' That work, he said, was one of the two or three works which he wished longer. It was by no common merit that the illiterate secretary extracted praise like this from the most pedantic of critics and the most bigoted of Tories.

"In the wildest parts of Scotland the 'Pilgrim's Progress' is the delight of the peasantry. In every nursery the 'Pilgrim's Progress' is a greater favourite than 'Jack the Giant Killer.' Every reader knows the straight and narrow path as well as he knows a road in which he has gone backwards and forwards a hundred times. This is the highest miracle of genius, that things which are not should be as though they were, that the imagination of one mind should become the personal recollections of another; and this miracle the tinker has wrought. There is no ascent, no declivity, no resting-place, no turn-stile, with which we are not perfectly acquainted. The wicket-gate and the desolate swamp which separates it from the City of Destruction; the long line of road, as straight as a rule can make it; the Interpreter's house, and all its fair shows; the prisoner in the iron cage; the palace, at the doors of which armed men kept guard, and on the battlements of which walked persons clothed all in gold; the cross and the sepulchre, the steep hill and the pleasant harbour, the stately front of the House Beautiful by the wayside, the low green Valley of Humiliation, rich with grass and covered with flocks—all are as well known to us as the sight of our own streets. Then we come to the narrow place where Apollyon strode right across the whole breadth of the way to stop the journey of Christian, and where afterwards the pillar was set up to testify how bravely the pilgrim had fought the good fight. As we advance, the valley becomes deeper and deeper. The shade of the precipices on both sides falls blacker and blacker. The clouds gather overhead. Doleful voices, the clanking of chains, and the rushing of many feet to and fro, are heard through the darkness. The way, hardly discernible in gloom, runs close by the mouth of the burning pit, which sends forth its flames, its noisome smoke, and its hideous shapes, to terrify the adventurer. Thence he goes on amidst the snares and pitfalls, with the mangled bodies of those who have perished lying in the ditch by his side. At the end of the long dark valley he passes the dens in which the old giants dwelt, amidst the bones of those whom they had slain.

"Then the road passes straight on through a waste moor, till at length the towers of a distant city appear before the traveller; and soon he is in the midst of the innumerable multitudes of Vanity Fair. There are the jugglers and the apes, the shops and the puppet-shows. There are Italian Row, and French Row, and Spanish Row, and British Row, with their crowds of buyers, sellers, and loungers, jabbering all the languages of the earth.

"Thence we go on by the little hill of the silver mine, and through the meadow of lilies, along the bank of that pleasant river which is bordered on both sides by fruit trees. On the left branches off the path leading to the horrible castle, the courtyard of which is paved with the skulls of pilgrims; and right onward are the sheepfolds and orchards of the Delectable Mountains.

"From the Delectable Mountains the way lies through the fogs and briers of the Enchanted Ground, with here and there a bed of soft cushions spread under a green arbour. And beyond is the land of Beulah, where the flowers, the grapes, and the songs of birds never cease, and where the sun shines night and day. Thence are plainly seen the golden pavements and streets of pearl on the other side of that black and cold river over which there is no bridge.

"All the stages of the journey, all the forms which cross or overtake the pilgrims—giants and hobgoblins, ill-favoured ones and shining ones, the tall, comely, swarthy Madame Bubble, with her great purse by her side, and her fingers playing with the money, the black man in the bright vesture, Mr. Worldly Wiseman and my Lord Hategood, Mr. Talkative, and Mrs. Timorous—are all actually existing beings to us. We follow the travellers through their allegorical progress with interest not inferior to that with which we follow Elizabeth from Siberia to Moscow, or Jeanie Deans from Edinburgh to London. Bunyan is almost the only writer who ever gave to the abstract the interest of the concrete. In the works of many celebrated authors, men are mere personifications. We have not an Othello, but jealousy, not an Iago, but perfidy, not a Brutus, but patriotism. The mind of Bunyan, on the contrary, was so imaginative, that personifications, when he dealt with them, became men. A dialogue between two qualities, in his dream, has more dramatic effect than a dialogue between two human beings in most plays. In this respect the genius of Bunyan bore a great resemblance to that of a man who had very little else in common with him—Percy Bysshe Shelley. The strong imagination of Shelley made him an idolater in his own despite. Out of the most indefinite terms of a hard, cold, dark, metaphysical system, he made a gorgeous Pantheon, full of beautiful, majestic, and life-like forms. He turned atheism into a mythology, rich with visions as glorious as the gods that live in the marble of Phidias, or the virgin saints that smile on us from the canvas of Murillo. The Spirit of Beauty, the Principle of Good, the Principle of Evil, when he treated of them, ceased to be abstractions. They took shape and colour. They were no longer mere words, but, 'intelligible forms,' 'fair humanities,' objects of love, of adoration, or of fear. As there can be no stronger sign of a mind destitute of the poetical faculty than that tendency which was so common among the writers of the French school to turn images into abstractions—Venus, for example, into love, Minerva into wisdom, Mars into war, and Bacchus into festivity—so there can be no stronger sign of a mind truly poetical than a disposition to reverse this abstracting process, and to make individuals out of generalities. Some of the metaphysical and ethical theories of Shelley were certainly most absurd and pernicious. But we doubt whether any modern poet has possessed in an equal degree some of the highest qualities of the great ancient masters. The words bard and inspiration, which seem so cold and affected when applied to other modern writers, have a perfect propriety when applied to him. He was not an author, but a bard. His poetry seems not to have been art, but an inspiration. Had he lived to the full age of man, he might not improbably have given to the world some great work of the highest rank in design and execution.

"The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. The vocabulary is the vocabulary of the common people. There is not an expression, if we except a few technical terms of theology, which would puzzle the rudest peasant. We have observed several pages which do not contain a single word of more than two syllables. Yet no writer has said more exactly what he meant to say. For magnificence, for pathos, for vehement exhortation, for subtle disquisition, for every purpose of the poet, the orator, and the divine, this homely dialect, the dialect of plain working men, was perfectly sufficient. There is no book in our literature on which we would so readily stake the fame of the old unpolluted English language, no book which shows so well how rich that language is in its own proper wealth, and how little it has been improved by all that it has borrowed."

AN ORIGINAL WRITER.

MAN of letters, poet, and politician, the most outspoken and uncompromising of foes—eloquent of tongue and marvellous in picturesque warmth of friends and partisans, the ability with the pen, unquestionably sincere in his vehement attachment to national liberty and the cause of the people—startling occasionally in his violent denunciation of tyranny, but never for a moment wavering in his allegiance to what he conceived to be truth and right—prejudiced, and occasionally extravagant, but always honest and thorough, the author of Notre Dame de Paris and Les Misérables, of Le Roi s'amuse and Napoléon le Petit, stands prominently forth among the most distinguished Frenchmen of the present century, as one who has had a large share in forming the public opinion of his time alike in politics and literature; and looking to what he has achieved during a life prolonged beyond fourscore years, even those who differ most from him in opinion, and are least inclined to agree with his frequently startling theories, will hardly be disposed to deny him the credit due to remarkable genius seconded by strenuous and persistent work. He is a very Boanerges, one of the Sons of Thunder, in his political and literary utterances. Whatever he asserts, comes with all the force of thorough conviction on the part of the writer. No uncertain sound is given forth by the trumpet he blows, and he is one ever prepared for the battle; and the admixture of the dramatic element in his character has powerfully contributed to recommend him to his countrymen, on whom theatrical effect is never thrown away. One great source of his popularity undoubtedly lies in the fact that he is never half-hearted and dull. He is original in mind, and has a richness of imagination that sometimes confounds shadowy theories with realities, and gives to the airiest of nothings "a local habitation and a name." He never fails to interest his hearers and readers, and to put the subject he discusses in a new and attractive point of view. "Ich hör ihm gerne zu, Denn manchencue denkt sich bei den Worten" (I like to listen to him, for many ideas are suggested by his words), may be spoken of him as it is said in Schiller's Wallenstein of the astrological philosopher Seni. You, the reader, may not agree with his opinion, but he always helps you in forming yours; while his hearty desire for the advancement and happiness of the human race, his healthy, robust hatred of injustice and tyranny, his strong, enthusiastic advocacy of the rights and claims of the humble toilers of the world to the sympathy and consideration of their more fortunate compeers, emphatically stamp him as a kindly and generous-hearted man, inclined even to optimism in his belief in his fellow-men.

The very vehemence with which he pronounced injustice and wrong, and the strange, abrupt style, easily parodied, in which his ideas were often expressed, at one time exposed him to much ridicule; but now the world has come to appreciate him more justly.

VICTOR HUGO'S FOREFATHERS.

The family of Victor Marie Hugo was one of undoubted antiquity and consideration, resident at Nancy, the capital of Lorraine. A certain Pierre Antoine Hugo was privy councillor to the Grand Duke of Lorraine about three hundred years ago; and throughout the 17th and 18th centuries, several members of the Hugo race are found occupying prominent positions, chiefly of a military kind, in home and foreign service. One, a certain Joseph Antoine Hugo, an officer on the staff of the Marshal de Montesquieu, was killed at the battle of Denain; another, Michel Pierre, was a lieutenant-colonel in the service of Tuscany.

In the great war period that commenced with the French Revolution of 1789, the Hugo family especially distinguished themselves by the number of men they contributed to the national armament. Joseph Leopold Sigisbert, the father of the poet, had just entered the army as a cadet in 1788. He had seven brothers, every one of whom marched towards the frontier to repel the invaders of France; and no less than five out of the seven were killed at the very commencement of the strife. Of the two survivors, one ultimately rose to the rank of major, the other to that of general of brigade. Joseph Leopold himself passed through one of the most active careers that even those stirring, feverish times could furnish. He was in the very thick of the combat between 1792 and 1795; on one occasion he received no less than seventeen wounds from canister shot, besides having his foot shattered by a bullet; at the rout of Montaigu he had two horses killed under him; everywhere he gained the reputation of a gallant, and what was at that time a far rarer distinction, that of a thoroughly humane officer, frequently interfering to save the lives of prisoners, and to protect women and children; for in those days, when the Republic had to carry on a civil war at home and a contest against foreign invaders at the same time, the amenities of civilized warfare were woefully neglected; quarter was as often refused as granted, and women perished in the field as on the guillotine.

INCIDENTS OF THE REVOLUTIONARY EPOCH.

Two incidents, not exceptional in that frantic contest, will illustrate the scenes that were taking place daily. The detachments of the republican army moving towards Nantes, were frequently attacked and harassed on their way by the inhabitants of towns and villages of a royalist tendency. Among the offenders in this respect was the village of Bouquénay; and at last a squadron, irritated by a fire opened upon it by the population, attacked the place, and carried off two hundred and ninety-two prisoners, twenty-two of the captives being women. Capture under such circumstances meant death; but in view of the unusual number of the prisoners, a special commission was sent to pronounce judgment. Then Hugo, who was acting as adjutant-major, tried to obtain a respite for the prisoners, by proposing that they should be sent to work in the mines in the interior of France until the conclusion of the war; but his humane proposition was rejected, and the two hundred and seventy men were promptly condemned and shot. But the special commission, being required at Nantes, was recalled, leaving orders that the women should be delivered over for trial to a military council. Again Hugo intervened, and this time successfully, to save life. An old sub-lieutenant, a silent and morose man, would have to give his opinion first, as the oldest in the military court; Hugo, who feared the veteran would not be on the side of mercy, took occasion before the votes were given to impress upon the members of the court that each one was to give his own opinion according to his conscience, uninfluenced by the rest; taking care, however, to remind them that these unhappy women had taken no direct part in the hostilities, and had been sufficiently punished for what they had done in the death of their fathers, brothers, husbands, and sons. Then he called upon the old sub-lieutenant to speak, and was considerably relieved when the grizzled warrior declared in his rough, harsh voice: "I became a soldier to fight with men, and not to assassinate women. I vote that the women be immediately set at liberty, and sent to their homes;" which vote was passed, nemine contradicente. The other incident occurred at Chateaubriant where Hugo was chief of the staff. A soldier, a convalescent from the army of the Rhine, was returning to his father's house; and though he had been cautioned not to go in advance of the escort that guarded the diligence, at the sight of his native village he had been unable to restrain himself, and hastened on alone. But a peasant, who had a gun concealed in the furrow where he was at work, fired full at the advancing republican soldier, killed him on the spot, and fled with the dead man's knapsack and pocket-book from the escort, who hurried up on hearing the report. The peasant got safely home; and, unable to read, asked a neighbour to decipher the name written in a "route" he found in the pocket-book. It turned out that the murdered man was his son. The horrified mother killed herself with a knife, and the man went and delivered himself up to the authorities.

MARRIAGE OF JOSEPH HUGO; MOREAU AND BONAPARTE.

During this period, Captain-adjutant Hugo made the acquaintance and won the esteem of some of the most distinguished generals of the great war: Desaix, the brilliant cavalry leader, who perished after saving the day for the First Consul Bonaparte, at Marengo; Kleber, the gallant Alsatian, who perished by the hand of an assassin in Egypt, after bluntly declaring while all the country was shouting out praises of the victor of Italy: "That little wretch Bonaparte, who's about as tall as my boot," (qui est haut comme ma botte); "will ruin France;" and Hoche the gallant and humane, whose firmness and clemency put an end to the horrible war in La Vendée. During his campaigns, he made the acquaintance at Nantes of a family named Tribuchet. They were strongly royalist in sentiment; but political feeling did not prevent the youngest of the three daughters, Mademoiselle Sophie, from looking very kindly on the gallant young soldier, who after a time made a proposal for her hand, and was accepted, notwithstanding his republicanism and his hazardous profession. The marriage took place in Paris; and not long afterwards, Leopold Hugo, now a major, left his wife and an infant son to join the army of Moreau, against the Austrians, on the staff of Lahorie, who was then known as a distinguished officer, risen from the ranks, and who was destined long afterwards to lose his life in a conspiracy against Napoleon in the year of the Russian campaign. This was the famous campaign against the Austrians, which terminated triumphantly in the battle of Hohenlinden and the treaty of Luneville. Moreau, who got to know Hugo by a chance meeting, and conceived a high opinion of him, wished to attach him to his personal staff, after Luneville; but Hugo had obtained a still more prominent patron in the person of Joseph Bonaparte, the brother of the First Consul, who, having met him at Luneville, wanted him for his own service. Accordingly, anxious to promote the interests of his protégé, he wrote a civil letter to the minister of the department, setting forth the services of the "Chef de bataillon" Hugo, and soliciting for that meritorious officer the rank of brigadier. Moreau, faithful to a promise he had made, backed the request with his warm recommendation; and this was, as it happened, the worst thing he could have done. The quarrel between Moreau and Bonaparte, which afterwards rendered them enemies for life, had already begun, and the good word of the conqueror of Hohenlinden was a bad credential to the favour of the victor of Marengo. The application was refused, and Hugo—to whom a second son, Eugene, had by this time been born, the eldest was named Abel—was obliged to content himself with the command of the 20th demi-brigade, stationed at Besançon.

BIRTH AND INFANCY OF VICTOR HUGO; JOSEPH HUGO AND JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

It was at Besançon that Victor Marie Hugo, the third son of the valiant republican officer, was born, the event being entered in the registry of the town as occurring at half-past ten at night on "Septidi Ventose, An X. de la République (A seventh day of the wind-month of the year X.); corresponding in the ordinary calendar to the 26th of February, 1802.

It was the fortune of the children to see more changes of locality, and to undergo a greater amount of travel during their earliest years, than in those days fell to the lot of many persons during a lifetime. France, Italy, Spain, each became their abode in turn for a short period; and from each Victor, a singularly impressionable child with an astonishing memory, brought home reminiscences, which he turned to good account during his future literary activity. The reason of their frequent journeyings was connected with the vicissitudes of their father's career as a soldier.

In the fortunes of Leopold Hugo we have an illustration of the difference of character between Napoleon and his undistinguished but amiable brother Joseph; and in the comparison the great conqueror does not appear altogether to advantage. For Joseph was the steady and honest friend of the good officer who had once earned his esteem and favour, and whom he continued to treat with increasing confidence and kindness to the end. With Napoleon, on the other hand, the fact that Hugo had been put forward by Moreau, and had shown himself grateful to his early patron, was reason enough for treating him with exceptional roughness and coldness; and it required the personal intercession and remonstrance of Joseph Bonaparte himself to prevent Hugo from being entirely "shelved" for the high crime and misdemeanour of having been appreciated by General Moreau, and for having refused to join in the chorus of vilification against that officer by which the partisans of Napoleon strove to render themselves acceptable to their imperious no less than imperial master. It is recorded of Louis XII., that on succeeding to the throne, he declared that the King of France ought not to remember the enemies of the Duke of Orleans. Napoleon had none of this magnanimity; the Emperor never forgot the opponents of the First Consul. Thus during his whole career, Leopold Hugo was more or less under a cloud of imperial disfavour.

But when good-natured Joseph Bonaparte was made King of Naples, a dignity he was soon afterwards to exchange for the still more precarious one of King of Spain, he insisted that Hugo should accompany him, and, indeed, made him intendant of his palace and governor of a province, afterwards bestowing similar offices upon him in Spain. One of the first military duties the Colonel was called upon to perform was the arduous one of hunting down the celebrated brigand Michel Pezza, better known as Fra Diavolo, who, robber as he was, had yet been employed by the Bourbon King of Naples in a military capacity, and even honoured with a title. But Napoleon made short work with the bandit when once he had him in his power, for Diavolo was promptly tried by a court-martial, found guilty, and executed.

A JOURNEY TO ITALY ACROSS MONT CENIS.

At first, Madame Hugo and her three little sons had been left behind in Paris; but when the affairs of the new government of Naples were somewhat settled, the Colonel sent for his wife and children to join him in Italy. This journey, undertaken when he was five years old, in 1807, was among the earliest recollections of Victor Hugo. He used to relate in after years how he remembered crossing the Mont Cenis, himself with his mother in a sledge, his elder brothers mounted on mules; how, on one occasion, in traversing the Apennines, the mountain air had so sharpened the appetites, of the little boys, that they could not wait for the usual midday halt for dinner, but persuaded a good-natured shepherd, who had just shot an eagle, to cook the two legs of the bird for them; and how he used to be surprised at seeing the travelling peasants walking barefoot, with their shoes economically suspended round their necks. He recollected, also, a somewhat ghastly token of the unquietness of the times, in the shape of the corpses of brigands suspended at frequent intervals from trees at the roadside, as a terror to evil-doers.

Avellino, where their father was stationed, was a kind of paradise to the three little boys, who were charmed to find there a large thicket attached to the garden, giving unlimited facilities for play, and no school to which they could be sent. The father, however, looked upon the place and its opportunities from a different point of view. Writing to his mother in Burgundy concerning his sons, he says of the future author, "Victor, the youngest, shows a great aptitude for study. He is as self-possessed as his elder brothers, and very thoughtful. He speaks little, and always to the purpose. His reflections have several times struck me. He has a very sweet face. All three are good children, and the two elder ones are extremely fond of their little brother. I am sorry that I no longer have them with me. But the means of education are wanting here, and they must go to Paris."

EARLY DAYS IN PARIS; A MILITARY TUTOR EXTRAORDINARY.

To Paris they went accordingly; and Madame Hugo was fortunate enough to establish herself in a domicile to which was attached a famous garden, all the more admirable to the boys for being in a very uncultivated state, and containing a sort of wilderness and a dry reservoir, highly available in games of the military kind. Here the boys romped and tumbled and played at soldiers to their hearts' content; while at the same time their education was not neglected. Abel was of an age to attend the Lycée. The two younger boys were sent to a preparatory school. When Victor was to be taught to read, it was found that he knew that art already. He had taught himself by looking at the letters; and within six months he could write from dictation almost without a fault, as the old schoolmaster's wife, with pardonable pride, was accustomed to boast.

In these days of his early education, Victor had a home tutor, a somewhat strange one, in addition to the old schoolmaster, who opened his eyes at his pupil's precocious ability. This tutor was no other than General Lahorie, his godfather, who, having avoided capture for Moreau's conspiracy, had been condemned to death for contempt of court, and now sought an asylum with the Hugo family. For some months he occupied a kind of pavilion at the end of the great garden, never going into the streets, and living under the character of an eccentric and misanthropic student. He took great notice of the boys, joined in their sports, told them marvellous stories, and was the first to initiate Victor into the mysteries of Latin, to which the boy took with marvellous aptitude. Induced at last by an ignoble artifice of the Head of the Police to come forth from his concealment, Lahorie was arrested and cast into prison. Victor was only eight years old when Lahorie explained Tacitus to him. The education was exceptional, but so was the pupil's ability.

Meanwhile, in the course of events which proceeded with great rapidity under the Empire, Joseph Bonaparte had been transferred to Spain. Thither, at his invitation, Colonel Hugo followed him; and was made Governor of the province of Avila, to which soon afterwards two other provinces were added. His conspicuous gallantry and good service in the field soon caused him to be advanced to the rank of general, then of field-marshal, and commander of the royal order of Spain.

Joseph could give away titles and offices, but he was little better than a phantom king. The fact that he was a foreigner operated fatally against him in the minds of the natives, though he was in every way superior to the taiscable Ferdinand for whom the English were fighting in the Peninsula; but every effort was made to give the French occupation the appearance of permanency; and the immediate followers and friends of the King were expected to purchase estates in the country and to establish themselves there.

A JOURNEY TO SPAIN; TRAVELLING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

Thus it happened that at the beginning of 1811, Victor and his brothers were delighted at the news that another foreign journey lay before them, for General Hugo had determined that his wife and children should join him in Spain. It has been said by a clever French writer that Europe ended at the Pyrenees; so far as the usages of civilized life were concerned, the assertion was perfectly true in 1811, the year of Madame Hugo's journey. It was necessary to travel with a large escort, for the whole country was scourged by the guerilla bands of the Empecinado and other chiefs, and the peasants were generally hostile. The Hugos travelled in a huge, lumbering conveyance of antiquated form, packed like a caravan with provisions and stores of all kinds, the baggage including an iron bedstead for Madame Hugo, who had heard the sleeping accommodations of Spain described as anything but conducive to repose; and at Bayonne a whole month's delay occurred before the military escort was ready to start : it consisted of no less a force than 1500 infantry, 500 cavalry, and four pieces of artillery. This escort was primarily to guard a treasure that was to be conveyed to Madrid, and would be a rich booty to the guerillas if they could capture it ; and that they would attempt something of the kind was more than probable. As carrying the wife of a governor of three provinces, Madame Hugo's lumbering vehicle, drawn by six mules, had the precedence among the long caravan that accompanied the escort. The journey itself, full of incident and novelty, was an increasing delight to the little Victor, who laid up in his mind scenes and incidents reproduced with brilliant effect in his works many years afterwards. At one point of the route, the dangerous defile of Salinas, the guerillas attempted an attack, but were quickly beaten off ; at another the heavy carriage broke down, and there was a danger that the Hugos would be left to their fate on the road. The inhabitants of the towns along the route were " requisitioned " to furnish provisions to the French. They obeyed the mandate, being unable to resist ; but it was with " curses not loud but deep ; " and the civilities shown to the strangers were such as " the faint heart would fain deny, but dared not." The cookery at the Spanish inns also was of a kind hardly congenial to the tastes of the travellers. Once, indeed, they were delighted by finding a colonist, a French restaurateur, who provided them with a true Parisian dinner ; but the bill amounted to sixteen pounds, which Madame Hugo considered dear. Occasionally they encountered processions, whose curious appearance made the children laugh, but awakened very different feelings in the minds of their elders. Whole convoys of wounded, mutilated, and diseased soldiers were met returning to France in rags and in various stages of decrepitude and misery,—cavalry soldiers without horses, infantry soldiers stumping along on wooden legs or riding on mules ; blind men with lame men to lead them. " That's how you will return to France," cried these unfortunates, when rallied by the new-comers, " if you return at all."

RESIDENCE AT MADRID ; THE CONVENTUAL " COLLEGE OF THE NOBLES."

At Madrid the new-comers were installed in an enormous palace, but their father was absent on duty. Victor afterwards related how a few days after their installation, there arrived a detachment of sixty Westphalian soldiers, whose duty was to bring a despatch from General Hugo stating that he should come in a few days. In those times, such was the state of the country, that sixty men were required to convey a letter in safety. It was in the palace of Masserano, in the great portrait gallery furnished with long lines of the effigies of departed grandees of Spain, that Victor Hugo conceived the idea which afterwards developed into the gorgeous drama of Hernani.

The arrival of their father was not an unmingled subject of delight for the boys ; for the General, who was now " Count Hugo," conceived the idea, very much to the chagrin of the youngsters, that three months spent on the journey, and six weeks liberty in Madrid, constituted a tolerably long holiday, and that it was high time they were brought under discipline. Abel, the eldest brother, had been appointed one of King Joseph's pages ; the two younger ones, Eugene and Victor, were sent to the " Nobles' College," a conventual establishment, very large, very gloomy, and at that time, on account of the general opposition to King Joseph, which had caused the withdrawal of the chief families from Madrid, very empty. Twenty-four pupils ranged through the halls and buildings constructed to accommodate five hundred. The boys found the deserted rooms and the monkish professors little to their taste, and Victor hardly knew whom he disliked most, the gloomy, frigid Don Basilio, or the insinuating, false Don Manuel.

Profoundly astonished were the two monks when they began to examine their new pupils in Latin. They could hardly believe their eyes and ears, especially when they found the little eight-year-old Victor fluently construing the easier Latin authors without a dictionary, and even with some difficulty getting through Virgil and Lucretius, until at last Plautus proved too hard for him. Sour-faced Don Basilio finally asked him what author he was " in " at eight years old ; and his visage became more acid than before when the boy answered, " Tacitus." At first he insisted, against Don Manuel's advice, in putting the two brothers with the little boys of the school, but soon had to remove them to the first class ; and even there they were far in advance of their companions, young Spaniards of fifteen.

Madrid was then in so unsafe a state from the guerillas and peasants, that no Frenchman could visit the environs with impunity ; but the two brothers, walking out with the school, had opportunities of seeing many things that remained hidden from the nominal masters and rulers; and the fidelity of Victor Hugo's pictures of Spanish life and character long afterwards bore testimony to the accuracy of his powers of observation and the strength of his memory. Not an incident of these early days was lost upon him.

RETURN TO PARIS; DESULTORY READING.

At best, young Victor found the Nobles' College of Madrid a dreary place, and was full of joyous expectation when his eldest brother Abel, the royal page, came to see him one day in all the bravery of his blue uniform, trimmed with gold lace, and brought the promise that in a year's time Victor, too, should be a page and wear a blue coat and a little cocked hat and sword. But when the next year came, Joseph Bonaparte had no further occasion for the service of pages. His phantom empire was drawing rapidly towards its close, and he was thinking of quitting the country that persistently refused to accept him as its ruler. At the beginning of 1812, already the state of things in the Peninsula was so threatening that General Hugo judged it prudent to send his wife and his two younger sons back to France. Accordingly advantage was taken of an escort about to set out from Spain, and the family recrossed the Pyrenees; to the great joy of the boys, who were wild with delight at the prospect of exchanging the gloom of the Spanish seminary for the liberty of their beloved garden in Paris. The General, of course, remained behind, loyally attached to the fortunes of his royal master and patron; and Madame Hugo had, as before, to supply the place of both father and mother to her boys.

In various respects she was well qualified for the task. She had the good sense to encourage the intellectual and moral development of the children, while she kept the exuberance of their spirits within bounds; insisted upon prompt and punctual obedience to all her commands; and kept them continually employed, discouraging anything like a tendency to dreaminess and sloth. Among other things she insisted upon their working hard in the garden with spade, rake, and watering-pot. Their natural love for reading was stimulated by the responsible office she gave them of selecting and perusing works for her; and thus young Victor, in the next few years, being made free of the warehouse of an old-fashioned bookseller, whose stores of various literature had overflowed from his shop and covered every available inch of space in a large upper-room, got through an enormous quantity of miscellaneous literature; like Johnson, in his earlier days, reading his way through his father's shelves at Lichfield.

THE RESTORATION; INCONVENIENT FIDELITY OF GENERAL JOSEPH HUGO.

And now came a time of deep anxiety for the Hugo family. The mother had been from the first a royalist in sentiment, and, politically speaking, was disposed to welcome the return of the Bourbons and the fall of the Empire; but General Hugo, though little disposed to like the Emperor personally, had his fortunes bound up with those of Joseph Bonaparte; and 1813 saw the battle of Vittoria and the ruin of Joseph in Spain. In 1814, when the Cossacks were encamped in the streets of Paris,—the capital having already surrendered,—General Hugo was in command at Thionville, which town he held bravely and loyally against the allies till the last moment, though General Haynau, who commanded the attacking force, tried every means of cajolery and remonstrance to induce him to surrender. It was not until the 14th of April, when a staff officer brought him a despatch, announcing the cessation of hostilities and the abdication of Napoleon, that he opened the gates to the allies. It was very doubtful whether this fidelity to his flag would not cost him his command; and while, on the one hand, he had been badly treated by the Emperor for his partiality to Moreau, it seemed now likely that the Restoration would ruin him professionally for his adhesion to the Empire. He was, in fact, removed from the command, which was given to a junior, General Curto. During the Hundred Days he was once more sent to take command of the fortress, which he held to the last moment against the allies in 1815 as he had done in 1814. A general who so persistently kept foreigners out of a French fortress was not likely to be in favour with a government that foreigners had set up; and thus General Hugo, though not absolutely cashiered, was kept in obscurity, and had a black mark against his name in the books of the Ministry of War under Louis XVIII. He was kept in the provinces, and could only come once or twice a year to Paris on a flying visit. Thus a kind of estrangement, though without any hostile feeling, arose in the family of the Hugos. The sons remained with their mother, whose royalist opinions they cordially shared; while the father devoted himself entirely to his professional duties, and was content that the lads should form their own opinions.

"Let time work," he once said philosophically to a friend, when young Victor had expressed some very pronounced opinions on the legitimate side. "The child is of the mother's opinion; the man will be of the opinion of the father."

THE PENSION CORDIER; VICTOR HUGO'S FIRST ACADEMIC HONOURS.

At the school to which he was now sent, the "Pension Cordier," Victor soon gained a great reputation; and he and his brother Eugene became the leaders of the place, the pupils being divided into two friendly factions under their command. He had already composed many verses, which he seems himself to have criticised with unsparing severity. Some that have been preserved are marvellous in merit, considering the age of the writer. His first literary triumph was in 1817, when he was fifteen years old. The Academy of France had given as the subject of a prize poem for that year "The happiness procured by study in every situation in life." A sudden impulse impelled the school-boy to compete for the prize. He wrote his poem in solitude and secrecy, and managed to get it delivered in the proper quarter by the aid of a friendly usher, who was, however, caught in the act by Victor's eldest brother, Abel, to whom the secret was thus perforce confided. Some days afterwards, Victor saw Abel enter the playground in a state of excitement, accompanied by two friends. "Come hither, you blockhead!" cried the elder brother; and when Victor approached, somewhat bewildered, he continued: "A pretty noodle you are! What made you put such a bit of nonsense into your verses? Who asked how old you were? The Academy thought you were hoaxing them; but for that you would have had the prize. What a donkey you are! You've got a mention!" And that is how Victor Hugo's first success was announced to him. He had put into his poem two lines describing himself as living apart from cities and courts, and having seen scarcely three lustres pass over his head. The Academy would not believe the poem could possibly be the work of a lad of fifteen.

This early effort of Victor Hugo's pen has been preserved, and certainly seems marvellous, considered as the effort of a school-boy, and the doubt and hesitation of the Academicians are not to be wondered at. The easy flow of the lines is remarkable.

LITERATURE AS A PROFESSION; AN EARLY ENGAGEMENT.

It was the beginning of a literary career of triumph. Chateaubriand, then an old man, and the acknowledged arbiter of poetic taste, lauded the young poet, and condescended to make his acquaintance. Raynouard, the secretary of the Academy, awarded him a somewhat stinted praise. The salons of Paris began to talk about him. He determined to devote himself to literature, and published a volume of poems, which, like many a young author's first venture, brought him more fame than emolument. At this period he had the misfortune to lose his mother, and was thus thrown on his own resources. For General Hugo indeed offered to give his sons an allowance, but made it conditional on their adopting a more regular and less precarious profession than literature. Victor declined the condition, and thus began life for himself at the age of nineteen, with a capital of eight hundred francs, the produce of his pen. But he had four great things in his favour—genius, youth, health, and determination; and he possessed a further incentive to strenuous work in the affection of Mademoiselle Foucher, whose parents had been intimate friends of his family for many years, and whose consent to become his wife he secured at this momentous period of his career. Of his determination and of the difficulties that arose in his path, we have sufficient evidence in letters written by him to various friends during the first two years of his literary career. "Things are not desperate," he writes; "and a slight check does not beat down a great courage. I do not hide from myself the uncertain or even the threatening aspect of the future; but I have learned from a strong-hearted mother that one can dominate events. Many people march with a trembling step on firm ground; when one has a tranquil conscience and a legitimate aim in one's favour, one should march with a firm step even on quaking ground."

RESOLUTIONS AND DIFFICULTIES.

He maintained his resolution, and "walked with a firm step" even where the way seemed most treacherous. But, like most other aspirants to literary fame, he did not find his path strewn with roses. When success began to come he had to go through a new kind of discipline, and learn the hard lesson of possessing his soul in patience amid the attacks of malignant envy; his assailants possessing the art of wounding him, with perverse ingenuity, in his most sensitive feelings. At a later period he was accustomed to look with magnanimous indifference upon the worst efforts of enviers and detractors. But at first they hurt him sorely. "You cannot imagine," he writes to a friend, "the multitude of annoyances that besiege and distract me. Independently of my troubles and domestic disquietudes, I have to resign myself to all the disgust of literary hatreds. I know not what demon has plunged me into a career where every step is disputed by some secret enmity or some base rivalry. It's pitiable, and I am ashamed for the literary craft. It is discouraging to wake up every morning a prey to the petty attacks of a crowd of enemies, to whom one has never done anything, and the majority of whom one has never seen. I should wish to inspire you with esteem for this great and noble profession of letters, but I am compelled to allow that in it one makes a strange experience of all human meannesses. It is a kind of marsh into which one is compelled to plunge, if one has not the wings of talent to keep oneself above the mud. I who have not the wings of talent" (he was wrong here; he had wings, and strong ones, but had not yet fully learned to use them), "but who have isolated myself by an inflexible character,—I am sometimes tempted to laugh at all the little injuries people seek to do me; but oftener, I confess it to the shame of my philosophy, I am tempted to grow angry. You will think, perhaps, with an appearance of reason, than in the important interests which occupy me I ought to be insensible to such trifles; but it is just the state of irritability in which I am that renders them unbearable to me. What would only bore me if I were happy is now odious to me; and I suffer when the miserable gnats come and alight on my sores. But let us speak no more of it; it is doing them too much honour; they are not worth the pen I spoil or the paper I blot for them."

FIRST COLLECTION OF POEMS; PATRONAGE OF LOUIS XVIII.

He persevered accordingly, and after a time was content to take the rough with the smooth, and to endure the annoyances inseparable from his calling in the hope of the reward the future would bring. He made up his mind to any kind of literary work by which he could advance his fortunes without lowering his self-respect. "All ways are good to me," he writes, "provided one can walk upright in them, and straightforward, without crawling on one's stomach or bending one's head. That was my meaning when I wrote to you that I would far rather create the means of livelihood for myself than wait till I obtained them from the lofty patronage of powerful men. There are many ways of making one's fortune; and I should certainly have made mine if I had been willing to purchase favours by flattery. That is not my way. . . . What then remains for a man who disdains to advance by these easy methods? Nothing but the consciousness of his strength and his self-respect. He must push his way onward nobly and frankly, and march on as fast as he can, without overturning or jostling anyone, and trust for the rest to the justice of God." To another he writes words worth remembering as putting forward a great truth honestly and simply. "I confess I do not make much account," he writes, "of the conventional spirit of popular beliefs and conventional traditions; I think that a prudent man should try everything with his reason before accepting anything; then, if he is mistaken, it will not be his fault."

He was quite content to begin at the beginning; and managed his affairs with such economy that he contrived to live for a year on seven hundred francs, "without borrowing a sou;" and even then he found the means to lend a friend a five-franc piece at need. Afterwards, when fortune came to him, no man was less solicitous about accumulating money. During this time he published various odes in different magazines; and, on the advice of his elder brother, Abel, brought out a volume of "Odes and Poems," on his own account, involuntarily to a certain extent, for he had not the means of paying the expense of publication; but good-natured Abel carried off the manuscript secretly to a printer, and Victor was one day considerably surprised on receiving a proof of the first sheet. A bookseller, the uncle of a friend of Abel's, was good-natured enough to show the little volume in his window; and one of the first copies was purchased by M. Mennechet, reader to Louis XVIII., who put the unpretending little book in the King's hands. The monarch, who was not without taste, criticised and admired the work, especially one ode, of which he himself was the subject, for Victor Hugo was at that time, from his mother's teaching, a devoted royalist. The King condescended to annotate the volume, and wrote in the margin of the ode on himself, "superbe;" and at once Victor Hugo's poetry became the fashion.

MARRIAGE; HUGO AND TALMA.

The "Odes" brought their author an emolument of 700 francs. He was now about to marry, and for once thought himself entitled to commit an extravagance. A cache-mire magnifique, his contribution to his wife's trousseau, absorbed the whole sum.

A very welcome and practical mark of the King's approbation of the poet's efforts came quite unsolicited, but very opportunely, to recruit the finances of the young married couple. Victor Hugo's name was enrolled among the recipients of small literary pensions; and the two thousand francs for which he figured on the civil list, helped him to set up a separate establishment, the newly-married couple having been in the first instance installed in the house of the Fouchers, the parents of the bride.

But not long after circumstances occurred which gradually changed his attachment to the Bourbons into something like contempt for their proceedings; and the prophecy of the General concerning the sentiments of the child and the man were gradually fulfilled. In an interview with the director of the postal service, Victor Hugo found that he owed his pension, not to his poetry, but to the appreciation of the King for his loyalist sentiments, discovered through an intercepted letter of his own, that had been broken open by the government, laid before the King, and then resealed and sent to its destination. The King had been touched by the expressions of attachment to his house contained in the letter; but a king who broke open letters was not the ideal monarch of Victor Hugo; and his faith in the Bourbons received its first shock. The reign of Charles X., with its petty tyranny and lamentable misunderstanding of the spirit of the time, completed his conversion from the doctrines of legitimacy to those of popular government. By this time the young author, carrying out his own maxim of taking nothing for granted, receiving nothing as necessarily good and correct because it was conventionally so regarded, had come to the conviction that the so-called classic style in French literature was based on a fallacy; that neither in fiction nor in dramatic writing did his countrymen present to their readers a true picture of life as it really existed; that in narrative as in the theatre, men and things should be represented as they really were, with varying moods and passions, moved alternately to laughter and tears; the hero sometimes unbending, the brave man with his moments of doubt and terror, the villain with his occasional impulses to better things. In dramatic writing it was his purpose to substitute romantic drama for tragedy, to represent men instead of abstractions of virtues and vices, to make realisation and actual life take the place of the conventional, to descend from the heroic to the positive; the style was to be varied with the subject, passing "from grave to gay, from lively to severe," according to the exigencies of the scene. In this idea he was much strengthened and encouraged by the opinion of the veteran actor, Talma, who declared that he had been hampered all his life long by the artificial conventionalities of the pieces to which he had been restricted. "The actor is nothing without the character," said the great tragedian to Hugo, "and I have never had a real character to play. I have never had pieces such as I required. Tragedy is fine, noble, and grand; but I should have liked the same amount of grandeur with more reality. I wanted a hero who showed movement and variety, who was not the same all through, who could be at once tragic and familiar, a king who was a man. Have you seen me in Charles VI.? I made an effect when I said 'Bread! I want bread.' It was because the king did not feel a royal suffering, but a human suffering; it was tragic, and it was true; it was sovereignty and misery combined: here was a king who was a beggar. Truth! that's what I have been looking for all my life. But what would you have? I ask for Shakespeare, and they give me Ducis."

DRAMATIC WRITING; REALISM AND CLASSICISM; "MARION DE LORME;" "HERNANI."

In the drama, Hugo took Shakespeare for his model; in narrative, fiction, Sir Walter Scott; continually throughout his works the influence of both his models is to be found.

It is not to be supposed that there were not many who cried out against this daring innovation—this attempt of a young and comparatively unpractised writer to overthrow the accepted order of things, and set up new rules and customs. For a couple of centuries there had been a thoroughly defined separation between tragedy and comedy; the one was always considered as entirely heroic, the other as essentially humorous; and here was a heretic actually mingling the two in the same work, in defiance of all dramatic usage! A strong faction was formed to oppose such a sacrilege, and for years the war between the partisans of the Classic and of the Romantic School raged fiercely in the French literary circles, and in the Parisian and provincial journals. The first dramatic work in which Victor Hugo attempted to show life as it really is, and to exhibit historical characters speaking in the language of familiar converse instead of in heroics, was a tragedy on the subject of Cromwell. The piece was too long for representation, and, indeed, was not intended for the theatre; but his second piece, Marion de Lorme, at first known by the title "Un duel sous Richelieu," was kept within the bounds of theatrical exigency; and after the author had read it with great applause to a literary circle, Baron Taylor, the director of the Theatre Français, asked the author to let him have it for his house. Victor Hugo promised it him; but the next day brought two other managers, "fiery-red with speed," each hoping to be the first to make an offer for the play, which was to show the Parisians the drama in a form to which they were quite unaccustomed. Great was the disappointment of the managers to find they were too late. One of them, the representative of the "Odéon," actually tried to carry off the manuscript by main force. But even the preliminary troubles of the author were not yet over. The censorship of the press under Charles X. was oppressively strict. Objection was taken to the fourth act, and the censors affected to perceive in the character of the weak Louis XIII., governed by a powerful minister, a satire upon the reigning monarch. In vain the author declared that it was Louis XIII. only whom he intended to represent. The Minister De Martignac declared the piece to be dangerous; and the King himself, to whom Victor Hugo appealed, overwhelmed the author with civility, professed a high admiration of his genius, and prohibited the piece. A pension of 4,000 francs offered to the author as an amends was at once declined by him. The prohibition of Marion de Lorme only made the public more eager for a piece by Victor Hugo; and in less than four weeks the author was ready with a new drama, Hernani. The unconventionality of the work startled some of the critics; and the Government press was angry with the author for his refusal of the pension. Before Hernani was even acted, a parody appeared, wherein all the points in which accredited usage had been set aside were turned into ridicule. Victor Hugo likewise, to the alarm and dismay of the management, refused the assistance of the "claque," or organised band of applauders, who had often saved a piece from condemnation on the first night. He was determined his piece should stand or fall by its own merits alone.

ROMANTICISM VERSUS CLASSICISM: "NOTRE DAME DE PARIS."

The excitement on the occasion reminds us of the first representation of She stoops to Conquer, when Goldsmith stood up for the claims of realism against "genteel comedy." The author's friends mustered in large numbers in the theatre. Every box was taken days beforehand. Thiers, Benjamin Constant, Mérimée, had to apply personally to Hugo to procure them admission, for it seemed that not a seat was to be had. From the first act, though an attempt was made to turn certain passages into ridicule, the success of the play seemed so probable that an enterprising publisher determined to buy the copyright there and then. When the fourth act was over he sought out M. Hugo, and prevailed on him to sign a contract on the spot, disposing of the right of printing the play for 6,000 francs, honestly avowing that if he waited till the conclusion of the fifth he would probably have to offer 10,000. The curtain fell amid enthusiastic plaudits from all parts of the house, and the romantic drama had achieved its first great triumph; the classicists present were mute before the general demonstration of approval.

By the next day, however, they had taken heart of grace in view of the articles published by various journals, who abused the play and the author very heartily. For forty-four nights Hernani was played, amid opposing demonstrations—the classicists hissing some passages as vehemently as the romanticists applauded them. Eight years afterwards, when the piece was revived, the public taste had undergone an entire change; and Hernani was acknowledged as a work that had taken its place in the national literature of France.

Successful in the drama, Victor Hugo now turned his attention to historical romance, and sat down to write the work which more than any other effort of his pen established his reputation and the permanence of the romantic school in France, the wonderful novel, Notre Dame de Paris. In graphic portraiture of the period and characters represented, the book reminds us of Scott's inimitable "Quentin Durward;" and several of the personages represented are the same. The cynical king, for instance, distrustful, cold-hearted and pitiless, taking pleasure in the terror, the degradation, and the sufferings of those around him; the worthless Cardinal la Balue, whining in his horrible cage in the Bastille for the mercy he had never shown. The author's intention in the work is shown in his explanation to the publisher, Gosselin, who had asked for some hints for the preliminary announcement. He describes the book as "a picture of Paris in the fifteenth century, and of the fifteenth century as illustrated by Paris. Louis XI. appears in one chapter. He it is who determines the issue of the story. The book has no historic intention, except, perhaps, to paint with some science and conscientiously, but only in sketches and scattered traits, the state of manners, belief, arts, laws, in fact, of civilization in the fifteenth century. It is not that, however, that is important in the book. If it has a merit, it is as a work of imagination, caprice, and fancy." The verdict of Europe soon pronounced how far the author had underestimated the influence and importance of this wonderful romance. Like all the works of Hugo, especially his earlier productions, it was criticised with virulent animosity by a portion of the press; but by this time the author had learnt to look with equanimity upon the attacks of his literary enemies, and to accept them as a necessary concomitant to fame. Claude Frollo and Quasimodo Esmeralda and Captain Phœbus, and the rest of the characters in the lifelike romance, will live in fiction with Scott's Balafres, Tristan, and the rest of the personages of "Quentin Durward." One of the most prominent French writers wrote to the author on the occasion:—"I have 'Notre Dame;' I assure you I was one of the first to have it. If the impotent admiration of a barbarian like myself could express and translate itself in a manner worthy of the book that has inspired it, I should tell you that you are a great spendthrift, and that your critics are like those poor dwellers in garrets who, seeing the prodigality of a great lord, say to each other in a rage, 'On the money he spends in a day, I could live all my life!' and, indeed, the only fault they have been able to find with your book is that there is too much in it. A pleasant piece of criticism in our century, is it not?"

The success of the work was enormous; and at the importunity of Gosselin the author projected two other novels to illustrate feudal life, as "Notre Dame" had depicted the sacerdotal life of the Middle Ages; but other works and duties intervened, and the idea was never carried out. The Revolution of July 1830 put an end to the censorship, and Marion de Lorme, the forbidden drama, was put forward.—the fact that it had been proscribed by Charles X. being an additional motive for public curiosity. It was successful in spite of opposition; but neither the success nor the resistance equalled the excitement caused by Hernani. Perhaps so much was being enacted on the stage of history at the time, that the mimic scene of the Porte St. Martin was somewhat disregarded.

His next plays were Le Roi s'amuse, from the plot of which the Italian opera of Rigoletto has since been constructed, and Lucrèce Borgia, or as it was at first entitled, Le Souper à Ferrare. By this time there had been a considerable reaction against the government of the "citizen king," Louis Philippe, who, indeed, had been fired at on the boulevards just before the piece was brought out. Consequently, to the surprise of the author, Le Roi s'amuse was prohibited after the first representation, on the ground that it advocated the assassination of kings, and was thus an immoral work. The action of the July monarchy, in the face of its various promises and the guaranteeing of the Charter, naturally tended to give the finishing stroke to the author's expiring royalism.

Lucrèce Borgia, in spite of various deprecatory articles in the newspapers, written in advance to prejudice public feeling, took the Parisians by storm. It is not to be denied that its subject, like that of Le Roi s'amuse, is eminently disagreeable; but the historical interest in both pieces, the strong portraiture of character, the startling contrasts, life and death brought close together, the buffoon towering in majesty over the dissolute king, the festive song interrupted by the dread funeral chaunt, all in direct opposition to the unities of the classic school, gave a complete triumph to the romanticists. But from first to last Hugo's connection with the theatre was destined to be a stormy one. His next play, Marie Tudor, was crushed by an organized plot with a theatrical manager at its head. A final triumph as a dramatist was reserved for him when he brought out his universally popular Ruy Blas.

This last-mentioned work, though not by any means the best constructed or the best written among Victor Hugo's dramas, is the one which has frequently been acted on various occasions in England, and has always been well and cordially received.

VICTOR HUGO AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

In the midst of his struggles with censor managers, critics, and actors, various of his friends, and especially the Abbé Lamennais, had suggested to him that he might command attention in the senate as an orator, if the theatre were closed against him; and his active mind had occupied itself at different times with political and judicial questions. One to which he gave special attention, and which occupied him for a series of years, was that of capital punishment. He vehemently and persistently maintained that the punishment of death was opposed alike to humanity and to sound policy, declaring that no man and no body of men had a right to inflict an irrevocable penalty; denying the deterrent effect of the punishment, and alleging that its horrors are only realised by the prisoner after the crime for which it is to be inflicted has been committed, while for the bystanders it affords unwholesome excitement, not warning example. His powerful work, Le dernier jour d'un condamné, was the first public expression of his opinion on this important subject. Since then he has frequently interfered to prevent the carrying out of death sentences on condemned prisoners, sometimes, indeed, where such humane interference was evidently hopeless, as in the case of the American, John Brown, executed for attempting to excite a rebellion among the slaves in the United States. In 1851, when his eldest son was arraigned for an article in the Revenant, commenting freely on the horrible details of a recent execution, Victor Hugo undertook the defence of the accused, and made one of the most powerful appeals ever made by an orator for the abolition of capital punishment. That the rarity of the appearance of the guillotine on the Place de la Roquette is in part due to his exertions is certain.

In 1815, Hugo was raised to the dignity of a peer of France by Louis Philippe; and in that capacity he had to vote in 1846 and 1847 on the question of the punishment of two men, Henry and Lecomte, each of whom had attempted the life of Louis Philippe. In the first case he gave his voice for a term of imprisonment; in the second for imprisonment for life. In no instance could he be induced to countenance the death penalty.

POLITICAL CAREER; 1848; THE REPUBLIC; 1851; THE COUP D'ÉTAT; PROSCRIPTION.

With the Revolution of 1848, a new phase in his career was commenced. The National Assembly included among its members a number of literary men, Lamartine, Louis Blanc, Faucher, and a host of others. Victor Hugo, who by this time thoroughly believed in the republican as the best form of government, was elected a deputy for Paris, and became prominent as one of the democratic section, though he never advocated the impracticable theories of the extreme men of his party. When that great political crime known as the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was perpetrated on the 2nd of December, 1851, and the President destroyed by means of an armed force the republic he had sworn to uphold, Victor Hugo was among the bravest and most energetic of those deputies who tried to do their duty to their country. But resistance was vain. The cannon and the musket, the bayonet and the cavalry sabre, were weapons against which the best and most solid arguments on right and justice could effect nothing; and when the great successful conspirator had secured himself in his ill-gotten power, he showed his appreciation of the importance of Victor Hugo by including his name in the list of those who were banished from France for life.

But in the end the pen was stronger than the sword. The proscribed writer took up his abode in the island of Jersey; and thence, in 1852, he indited the scathing satire which will ever cling to the memory of the nephew of his uncle, who, impassable and sluggish of temperament as he was, is said to have mentally writhed under the blow inflicted on him by the author of Napoléon le Petit. The meannesses, the impostures, the false pretences of the spurious imitator of a great man are there mercilessly exposed. The tinsel was unsparingly stripped from the gaudy garb of the "nephew of his uncle," whom a satirist pungently described as having that uncle's name "a little the worse for wear." With all the bitterness of personal indignation natural to a generous man labouring under the sense of a great national wrong, the betrayer of the Republic was denounced; and never was a revenge more complete than that involved in the exposure of Napoleon the Little in contrast to Napoleon the Great. It was certainly of evil augury for the second Empire in France that such men as Victor Hugo were banished from the country to render its establishment possible. The ostracism of distinguished citizens was sometimes considered a salutary and even a necessary step in ancient days; but in modern times the judgments of men are formed on other rules, and a government is judged to a great extent by the men with whom it surrounds itself. It was a lamentable state of things for France, in which the De Mornys and the Persignys took the place of such men as Victor Hugo, Lamartine, and Cavaignac.

VICTOR HUGO IN EXILE; "LES CHÂTIMENTS; THE AMNESTY.

From the first the exile felt persuaded that the empire set up by Napoleon III. would not last, but that the government, founded in injustice, falsehood, and bloodshed, would some day suddenly come down, and that great would be the fall thereof. In Jersey, where he took up his residence for some years, and afterwards in Guernsey, where he occupied Hauteville House, a picturesque dwelling on almost the highest point of the town of St. Peter Port, he resumed his literary labours, and lived a quiet and retired life; but never ceased to look forward to the time when the reign of absolutism would come to an end in France. His work, Les Châtiments, published in 1857, sufficiently shows that while many were acting up to the saying of the witty French writer, who declared that unless men made up their minds to forget many things, life would be impossible, and were gradually becoming reconciled to the French Empire, especially after the Crimean successes had raised the military reputation of the Government, Victor Hugo was still among the irreconcilables, and sturdily held out in enmity. He had declared that he would never return to France while Napoleon III. sat on the throne, and held down with the iron hand of absolutism the liberties of the country, however well that iron hand might be concealed in a glove of velvet. In 1859, after the successful war against Austria in Italy had given a new lease of power and popularity to "the man of the 2nd December," and by the Treaty of Villa Franca the French Emperor was enabled to present himself in the novel character of a liberator, Napoleon III. made a bid for further popularity by the proclamation of an amnesty, permitting the return of many whom the events of 1851 and the subsequent years had made exiles. Of this amnesty, in which Victor Hugo was included, the exile refused to avail himself. Between him and the French Emperor there could be no peace; and he kept stubbornly to the resolution he had once taken,—while the Empire lasted, France was no home for him.

HUGO'S LIFE IN THE CHANNEL ISLANDS; PHILANTHROPY AND HOPE.

The best part of his character was developed during those quiet years of retirement in the Channel Islands. The more combative part of Victor Hugo's nature, formerly kept in continual irritation, first by his stormy contentions with the classicists on behalf of romanticism, and afterwards in the political arena, here remained in abeyance; and the goodness of his heart showed itself in unwearying efforts to better the condition of the toiling masses, condemned, as kind Tom Hood wrote, by lot of birth to eat the lean and not the fat of earth. Himself a worker, his sympathies were with those whose work furnished the means of enjoyment for the favoured ones of fortune; and no scheme of benevolence, down to the providing of dinners for the hungry little island children, went without his active co-operation and support. And wherever there was a chance that his voice would be heard, he raised it unhesitatingly for justice and right. Thus in 1862, when the laws of the Republic of Geneva were under revision, he wrote a long and eloquent memorial to the authorities, pleading for the abolition of the penalty of death. His pleading, indeed, is more eloquent sometimes than logical. He makes a strong point of the fact that the wife and children of an executed criminal, being left without a protector, are likely to become good-for-nothings and criminals; forgetting that, where for the death penalty a very long period of penal servitude is substituted, the prisoner is as completely dead to his relatives as if he had been executed. "The punishment of death," he says, "has partisans of two kinds: those who explain it, and those who apply it; those who undertake to defend the theory, and those who undertake to defend the practice. But the theory and the practice do not agree; they contradict one another strangely. To demolish the punishing, theath, you have only to open the debate to funeral theory and practice. Just listen. Those who wish to retain the punishment of death, why do they wish to retain it? Because capital punishment is an example. Yes, says theory. No, says practice. It hides the scaffold as much as it can; it destroys Montfaucon (where criminals were gibbeted in former days); it has suppressed the public crier; it avoids market-days; it builds up its scaffold at midnight; it strikes its blow very early in the morning. In certain countries, in America and in Prussia" (it might happily now be added, "and in England") "the hanging and heading are done with closed doors. Is it because the death penalty is justice? Yes, says theory; the man was guilty, he is punished. No, says practice, for the man is punished. Very good; he is dead—that is well. But what about this woman? She is a widow. What about these children? They are orphans. Death has left then behind it a widow and orphans—that is to say, they are punished, and yet they are innocent. Where is your justice? But if the penalty of death is not just, is it useful? Yes, says theory, the corpse can do us no more harm. No, says practice, for this corpse leaves you a legacy of a family—a family fatherless—a family without bread; and the widow falls, that she may earn a livelihood, and the orphans steal because they must eat." It is not difficult to see the fallacy of this argument. On the other hand, the following words are in Hugo's best style:—

"There is no such thing as a little nation. I said so a few months ago to Belgium on the occasion of the convicts of Charleroi; let me be permitted to repeat it to Switzerland to-day. The grandeur of a people can no more be measured by their number than the greatness of a man can be measured by his stature. The only measure is the amount of intelligence and the amount of virtue. He who sets a great example is great. The little nations will be the great nations from the day when, standing beside nations large in number and vast in territory, who obstinately adhere to fanaticism and prejudice, to hatred, war, slavery, and death, they shall gently and proudly practise fraternity, abhorring the sword, demolishing the scaffold, glorifying progress,—when they shall smile serene as the heavens. Words are vain if there are not ideas under them. It is not enough that there should be the republic, there must be liberty; it is not enough that there should be democracy, there must be humanity. <sup>in this</sup> must be a man, and a man must be a <sup>wish</sup>

FALL OF THE EMPIRE; RETURN TO FRANCE;
"L'ANNÉE TERRIBLE;" "LES MISÉRABLES."

At length the day whose advent he had long foreseen came; and with a more tremendous retribution than the author of Les Châtiments himself could have imagined. September 1870 saw the Empire suddenly overthrown after the terrible defeat at Sedan. Victor Hugo at length returned to France, and was immediately chosen as a representative in the Assembly that met at Bordeaux while Paris was besieged. Bewildered, however, and not a little disgusted at the confusion and strife of factions at a time when the only chance of safety lay in unanimity, he retired for a time to Belgium, and from thence to the territory of Luxembourg, where he wrote his Année terrible. Returning to Paris after the horrible crimes of the Commune had filled the prisons with condemned captives, he pleaded earnestly for the commutation of the death penalty in all cases; but with little success. His representations had little chance of favourable hearing while the Tuileries still smouldered and the petroleum fires had scarcely been extinguished.

He once more devoted himself to his pen, and in his old age produced several of the most remarkable of his works. In Les Misérables he paints with touching eloquence, and with a persistent belief in the existence of redeeming points even in the most depraved characters, worthy of all honour in one who had seen so much of the worst side of human nature, the struggles, temptations, and trials of those poor fellow-creatures to whom society has been in the habit of dealing out hard measure, partly computing what is done, but knowing not what is resisted. Jean Valjean and Cosette and the good Archbishop are all studies from life, and are true to human nature; and the lesson of the book is such that he who runs may read it. In "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," the toilers of the sea are described with a generous appreciation of the everyday heroism that so frequently passes unnoticed, because it does not advertise itself.

POLITICAL OPINIONS VERIFIED; NAPOLEON
III. AND THE EMPIRE.

As Victor Hugo had refused the proffered pardon of Napoleon III., and had proved himself during the existence of the second Empire its irreconcilable enemy, so when that government had been obliterated and utterly swept away in the ruin of Sedan, he still preserved his hatred towards "the man of the 2nd of December;" and his great anxiety during his latter days seemed to be lest in the rapid march of events on the establishment of the third Republic, the means by which the imperial authority of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte had been evolved from the ruin of the second Republic should be forgotten.

Immediately after he had quitted France, at the commencement of his exile in 1852, he had written the terrible denunciation of the coup d'état contained in Napoleon le Petit, the avowed object of the work being to place before the eyes of the French people, in his true colours, the man who had strangled the Republic he had solemnly sworn to uphold. It is remarkable, at this distance of time, to notice how strong was the poet's belief in the downfall of the military absolutism set up by the President at a time when the general opinion, while deploring the means by which Louis Napoleon had gained his imperial power, still represented that power as firmly established, and the restoration of republican government in France as a thing utterly impossible, and as simply the dream of a certain number of political fanatics. Victor Hugo never doubted that the day would come when France would awaken from her lethargy and shake off the yoke imposed on her by the founder of the second Empire and his associates. At the very beginning of his book he paints with all the bitterness of indignation the lethargy that had come upon France after the great agony of the 2nd of December and the following days; and prophecies that from this lethargy the country will one day awake to a new and stronger political life. He writes :—

“There will be an awakening. This book has no other object but to drive away this slumber. France ought not even to adhere to this government by the consent of lethargy ; at certain hours, in certain places, under certain shadows, to slumber is to die. Let us add, that at the moment that is passing over us, France—a strange thing to say, and yet a true one—knows nothing of what happened on the 2nd of December and afterwards, or knows it incorrectly, and there is her excuse. Nevertheless, thanks to several generous and courageous publications, the facts are beginning to leak out. This book is intended to bring some of them to light, and, if it please God, to present them all in their true aspect. It is important that people should know a little what M. Bonaparte is. At the present hour, thanks to the suppression of the tribune, thanks to the suppression of free speech of truth and liberty,—a suppression whose consequence has been to make everything permissible to M. Bonaparte, but which has at the same time had the effect of rendering null and void all his acts without exception, including the unqualifiable ‘scrutiny’ of the 20th of December.—thanks, we say, to this stifling of every complaint, this obscuration of all light, not one thing, not one man, not one fact, has its true appearance or is called by its right name. The crime of M. Bonaparte is not a crime, it is called ‘necessity :’ the ambush of M. Bonaparte was not an ambush, it is called the defence of order ; the robberies of

M. Bonaparte are not robberies, they are called measures of state ; the murders of M. Bonaparte are not murders, they are called public safety ; the accomplices of M. Bonaparte are not malefactors, they are called magistrates, senators, and Councillors of State ; the adversaries of M. Bonaparte are not the soldiers of the law and of right, they are called levellers, demagogues, and fanatics. This book is nothing more than a hand thrust forth from the shadow to tear the mask off that man.

“But we will expose this triumph of order ; to paint as it is this vigorous, strong, established government, having for its supporters a number of youngsters who have more ambition than boots, pretty fellows and great rascals ; supported at the Exchange by Fould the Jew, and in the Church by Montalembert the Catholic ; resting on the coalition of all that is shameful ; giving fêtes ; making cardinals ; wearing white hats and with opera hats under their arm, with primrose kid gloves like Morny, or new-lacquered like Maupas, brushed up like Persigny, rich, elegant, neat, gilded, coming forth from a lake of blood. Yes, there will be a waking up ! ”

He goes on to liken the Empire to the faïence held on the frozen Neva in the Russian winter, every booth, built on a foundation apparently as solid as marble, vanishing when the first breath of returning spring blows over the land. In L'Histoire d'un Crime, the veteran writer has further fulfilled his promise of giving to the world the details of the events that preceded the formation of the second French Empire.

BIRTH OF THE QUEEN.

ON the 24th of May, 1819, a little blue-eyed girl-baby was born into the world at Kensington Palace. Her father, the Duke of Kent, fourth son of George III., had married, in the previous July, Victoire Maria Louise, Princess Leiningen, youngest sister of the reigning Duke of Coburg. The Duke of Kent was then in his fifty-first year, and the beautiful widow whom he married was a year or two over thirty. By her first marriage with Prince Leiningen, she had a son and a daughter.

The son died in 1859, and his son is now (1881) in the British Navy, and commands the royal yacht. The daughter, our Queen's step-sister and only playmate in the quiet years of her childhood, for whom Her Majesty entertained the warmest sisterly affection, afterwards married the Prince of Hohenlohe Langenburg, and died in 1872.

Prince (afterwards King) Leopold, who married the Princess Charlotte of England, was brother to the Duchess of Kent, so that it was not the first time that the English Royal Family had been united by marriage with the House of Coburg.

When the "little English May-flower," as her German grandmother loved to call the Princess Victoria, first saw the light, it was by no means certain that she was heir to the throne of England. Of all the sons of George III., not one had a legitimate heir, it is true. The hatred felt by the Prince Regent, afterwards George IV., to his wife, Queen Caroline, prevented any hope of a reconciliation between them. The Duke of Clarence, elder brother of the Duke of Kent, and afterwards William IV., was married on the same day as our Queen's father, and two daughters were born of this marriage. Both, however, died in infancy, to the deep sorrow of their mother, good Queen Adelaide. Their birth had the effect of making the prospect of the little Princess Victoria succeeding to the throne a very uncertain one. She was christened by the names Alexandrina Victoria, the second name being that of her mother.

The Duke of Kent died just eight months after the birth of his daughter. He was one of the most popular of the royal princes, and his death was much regretted. He never seemed to entertain any doubt as to his infant daughter's succession to the throne, and used constantly to hold her up in his arms and say to his friends: "Look at her well! She will one day be Queen of England." Upon his death the Duchess of Kent sent for her brother, Prince Leopold, and from that moment he devoted a fatherly care and love to the Princess Victoria.

THE QUEEN'S CHILDHOOD.

The Duchess of Kent and Prince Leopold, in view of the uncertainty which surrounded the prospects of the little Princess, wisely resolved that she should be kept in ignorance of the great destiny which in all probability lay before her. The Duke of Kent, at his death, had left his widow and daughter, "without means of existence." The Regent's tastes were too extravagant for him to consider the necessities of any one else, and when he became king, shortly after his brother's death, he showed an active dislike to his sister-in-law, the Duchess of Kent. All these circumstances combined, caused the Duchess to live quietly enough during the Queen's childhood. She was anxious to guard her daughter from the merest chance of hearing that she was regarded as the future Queen of England. Born of a thrifty German race herself, she looked with horror upon the extravagance of the members of the House of Hanover, and took care to inculcate lessons of a far different nature in the mind of the Princess,—lessons which afterwards bore rich fruit and beneficially affected in no small degree the prosperity of England. As an instance of this careful training, an anecdote related by Harriet Martineau may be told here.

"It became known at Tunbridge Wells that the Princess had been unable to buy a box at the Bazaar because she had spent her money. At this Bazaar she had bought presents for almost all her relations, and had laid out her last shilling, when she remembered one cousin more, and saw a box priced half-a-crown which would suit him. The shop people, of course, placed the box with the other purchases, but the little lady's governess admonished them by saying, 'No; you see the Princess has not got the money, therefore, of course, she cannot buy the box.' This being perceived, the next offer was to lay by the box till it could be purchased; and the answer was, 'Oh, well, if you will be so good as to do that.' On quarter day, before seven in the morning, the Princess appeared on her donkey to claim her purchase."

It would be well for all children, of whatever rank in life, were their ideas of expenditure so carefully checked in early years as were those of the future Queen of England.

When Princess Victoria was ten years old, there was a child's ball given at court, at which she was present. Mr. Greville thus describes her: "Our little Princess is a short, plain-looking child. However, if nature has not done much, fortune is likely to do a great deal more for her." On the King (George IV.) talking of giving this ball, Lady Maria Conyngham was guilty of great want of tact. She said to the King, "Oh, do; it will be so nice to see the two little queens dancing together," meaning the little Queen of Portugal, a few weeks older than Princess Victoria, and the little Princess herself. It is on record that the King was greatly annoyed at this, as, of course, the Princess could not become queen until after not only his death but that of his brother, the Duke of Clarence.

George IV. died when the Princess Victoria was twelve years old, and as there was only the life of an old man of sixty-five between her and the throne, it was thought judicious to tell her now for the first time of the great prospect that lay before her. So imminent was this prospect deemed by the nation, that a Bill was brought into Parliament, making the Duchess of Kent Regent, should her daughter be called to the throne before completing her eighteenth year.

The little Princess received the news with a calmness and a deep sense of the responsibility involved in so important a position, which would be surprising in a child of twelve, were it not for the remembrance of the care and thought that had surrounded her with all good influences and kept her from all evil ones, throughout her childhood.

The next six years were spent quietly enough. The Duchess of Kent took endless pains to ensure her daughter the best education that could be given and the finest moral training. The Princess was carefully kept away from court, the atmosphere of which in those days was scarcely suited to youth and purity. She was not even allowed to appear at the coronation of her uncle, William IV. This, and her absence from the drawing-rooms, gave great offence to the Royal Family, and the occasional storms that arose from these causes were the only events that rippled the calm of our Queen's girlhood.

THE QUEEN'S ACCESSION.

WHEN William IV. died (June 20th, 1837) speculation was rife as to the character of the young Queen. Her mother had kept her in such jealous seclusion that no one knew anything about her. She had never been allowed to be alone with anybody, not even her governess, the Duchess of Northumberland. Amid this uncertainty, the conduct of the girl-queen at her first Council was such as to reassure all who had feared her youth and inexperience. We give the account in the words of a chronicler of the time, who was not wont to overpraise. He says: "The King died at twenty minutes after two, and the young Queen met the Council at Kensington Palace at eleven. Never was anything like the first impression she produced, or the chorus of praise and admiration which is raised about her manner and behaviour, and certainly not without justice. It was very extraordinary, and something far beyond what was looked for. Her extreme youth and inexperience, and the ignorance of the world concerning her, naturally excited intense curiosity to see how she would act on this trying occasion, and there was a considerable assemblage at the Palace. Lord Melbourne asked her if she would enter the room accompanied by the great officers of State, but she said she would come in alone. The doors were thrown open, and the Queen entered, quite plainly dressed in mourning. Her two uncles, the Dukes of Cumberland and Sussex (the Duke of Cambridge was in Hanover), advanced to meet her. She bowed to the Lords, and took her seat, and then read her speech in a clear, distinct, and audible voice, without any appearance of fear or embarrassment. After she had taken the oath for the security of the Church of Scotland, the Privy Councillors were sworn, the two royal Dukes first by themselves; and as these two old men, her uncles, knelt before her, swearing allegiance and kissing her hand, I saw her blush up to the eyes, as if she felt the contrast between their civil and natural relations, and this was the only sign of emotion she evinced. Her manner to them was very graceful and engaging; she kissed them both, and rose from her chair and moved towards the Duke of Sussex, who was farthest from her, and too infirm to reach her. . . . At twelve the next day she held a Council at which she presided with as much ease as if she had been doing nothing else all her life. She looked very well, and though so small in stature and without much pretension to beauty, the gracefulness of her manner and the good expression of her countenance give her on the whole a very agreeable appearance, and with her youth inspire an excessive interest in all who approach her."

The same chronicler relates how the young Queen, on receiving a request from the Queen-Dowager that she might remain at Windsor till after the funeral, replied in the kindest terms, begging that the widow of the King would consult nothing but her own health and convenience, and that she would remain at Windsor as long as she pleased. "In short," says Mr. Greville, "she appears to act with every sort of good taste and good feeling, as well as good sense, and as far as it has gone, nothing can be more favourable than the impression she has made, and nothing can promise better than her manner and conduct."

Miss Martineau describes the Queen as being "really pretty in the upper part of the face, and with an ingenuous and sincere air which seemed full of promise."

The Coronation took place on the 30th of June, 1838. Miss Martineau gives a picturesque word-picture of the ceremony, which was a magnificent one. During the year which had elapsed between the accession of the Queen and her coronation, she had found out how difficult was her position. Party spirit ran high. Each side hoped to gain to its side the young and inexperienced girl who sat upon the throne.

Everywhere were networks of cabal and intrigue, and parties arrayed against each other. The Queen's uncle, Prince Leopold, had frequently and carefully inculcated the doctrine that a constitutional monarch must never side with any party; but it is scarcely to be wondered at that his niece, in the first months of her reign, forgot to put in practice so admirable an axiom.

When Lord Melbourne's Ministry went out, it became necessary for the Ladies of the Bedchamber to give up their office and to be replaced by others appointed by the Tory Government. The Queen, however, refused to part with her Ladies, and consequently the Whigs remained in office. This is the simple story of what is known as the Bedchamber Plot. The Queen probably scarcely realized what she was doing. At the same time there is no doubt that, had she been advised by Lord Melbourne as he ought to have advised her, she would never have permitted her personal feelings to interfere with the affairs of the State. The occurrence gave colour to the idea that the Queen favoured the Liberals, an idea that was not removed until many years had passed, and shown that Her Majesty became as friendly with Sir Robert Peel when he was in office as she had been with Lord Melbourne, and that her friendship was by no means confined to those Ladies of the Bedchamber who held their office under the Liberal Government.

THE QUEEN'S HUSBAND.

The history of the Queen would be incomplete indeed without a sketch of the character and appearance of her husband, the Prince Consort, born three months after the Queen. He was the second son of Ernest, Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld. It is a curious coincidence that the same clergyman who officiated at the marriage of the Duke and Duchess of Kent, baptized the infant Prince, who was, years afterwards, to marry the only issue of their union. The Duchess of Kent was sister to Prince Albert's father, so that Queen Victoria and her husband were first cousins.

At two years old the little Prince is described by his grandmother, the Dowager Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, as "very handsome, but too slight for a boy; lively, very funny, all good nature and full of mischief." His uncle, Prince (afterwards King) Leopold, who had remained in England after the sad and early death of his young wife, the Princess Charlotte, became acquainted with his nephew in 1820, and even at this time, when there was little probability of Princess Victoria ever becoming Queen of England, Prince Leopold and his mother seem to have had the idea of an union between the cousins. In writing of the little Princess to the Duchess of Kent, the grandmother always called her the "dear little Mayflower," because she had been born in May; and before the children were three years old, the Prince's nurse used to talk to him of his "little English sweetheart." When he was five years old, his mother, whom he adored, was separated (and eventually divorced) from the Duke, and her two sons never saw her again. "The Prince," says the Queen, "never forgot her, and spoke with much tenderness and sorrow of his poor mother." The Prince was full of life and fun as a boy, but possessed many other qualities by no means common to boyhood. He was gentle and kind-hearted, hated to give pain, and was always anxious to do good and give pleasure to others. He never forgot an act of kindness however trifling. He showed the greatest patience under the attacks of illness to which he was subject up to the age of ten. With these pleasant qualities he was possessor of a refinement of nature, one effect of which was a perfect moral purity both in word and deed. He had a keen sense of the ridiculous, which made him a charming companion, and a wonderful power of mimicry, which might have been a dangerous gift had it not been controlled by his sweetness of disposition. The two young princes were brothers not in name only, but in heart and mind. There was a close affection. When Ernest was seventeen, he was to be confirmed, and as the boys had gone hand in hand from childhood, their friends thought it well that the younger brother should join the elder in this rite. Accordingly they were confirmed in the Chapel of the Palace at Coburg, on Palm-Sunday, in 1835, Prince Albert being then only sixteen, but of a nature, as his tutor expressed it, "singularly earnest and thoughtful, and indeed distinctly devout."

In 1836, when there appeared every probability of the Princess Victoria becoming Queen of England, and at no distant date, and when King Leopold began seriously to consider the union of the cousins, Baron Stockmar writes as follows:—"Albert is a fine young fellow, well grown for his age, with agreeable and valuable qualities; and who, if things go well, may in a few years turn out a strong, handsome man, of a kindly, simple, yet dignified demeanour. Externally, therefore, he possesses all that pleases the sex, and at all times and in all countries must please. It may prove, too, a lucky circumstance that even now he has something of an English look." As to his character, Stockmar declined to give an opinion until he had seen more of the Prince. The Duchess of Kent in this year invited her brother, the Duke of Coburg, and his two sons, to visit her at Kensington Palace; but all parties agreed that any idea of a future union between the consins, now to meet for the first time, must be kept a profound secret from the Princess Victoria. The Prince was well aware of the object of this visit, as his grandmother had often talked to him of a scheme she had so much at heart. The situation was a romantic one. It can be imagined with what eyes of interest the young prince regarded the fair-haired, blue-eyed girl whom his relatives destined for his future wife, and by whose side he would probably sit on the throne of England. The Princess, too, had often heard of her two cousins, and having been watched so strictly, and kept so secluded by her mother, her girlish heart must at least have felt some interest and curiosity about the two youths, with whom she was allowed to converse and associate freely during their four weeks' stay. During the visit she wrote to her uncle Leopold, then King of the Belgians, and in her letters her favourable opinion of her cousin unconsciously revealed itself. Reassured by this, King Leopold wrote, on the termination of the princes' visit, expressing to the Princess his wishes on the subject of the proposed union. He had always stood in the place of a father to her, and he was perhaps the one person in the world who had most influence over her mother, the Duchess of Kent. Consequently the Princess looked naturally to him for guidance in the affairs of her early life. Her answer to the King's letter, dated June 7th, 1836, proves how willing she was to fall in with the project of a union between herself and Prince Albert. She concludes with the words: "I have only now to beg you, my dearest uncle, to take care of the health of one now so dear to me, and to take him under your special protection. I hope and trust that all will go on prosperously and well on this subject now of so much importance to me." The Prince however, was not made aware of the preference shown for him by his cousin. His education was now carried on on such a scale as might best fit him for the duties of Prince Consort in the opinion of his relatives. That their ideas were correct on this subject was proved by the result. When the death of William IV., on June 20th, 1837, placed the Queen upon the throne, the Prince wrote to congratulate his "dearest cousin," adding: "You are now Queen of the mightiest land of Europe. In your hand lies the happiness of millions. May Heaven assist you and strengthen you with its strength in that high but difficult task."

In 1838, King Leopold wrote to the Queen, suggesting that some decisive arrangement regarding the marriage should be made for the year 1839, when she and the Prince would be twenty years old; but the Queen decided against this. Her reasons were excellent. She thought herself and the Prince too young, and also suggested that he should make himself complete master of the English language before the question of marriage should recur. A year later she again writes to her uncle, deprecating any haste as regards the marriage. In October of the same year, however, Prince Albert and Prince Ernest came on a visit to Windsor Castle for the first time for three years. We have a description of the future Prince Consort as he then appeared, in the words of General Grey: "Prince Albert was eminently handsome, but there was also in his countenance a gentleness of expression and a peculiar sweetness in his smile, with a look of deep thought and high intelligence in his clear blue eyes and expansive forehead, that added a charm to the impression he produced on those who saw him, far beyond that derived from mere beauty and regularity of feature." On the second day after their arrival, the Queen wrote to her uncle: "The young men are very amiable, delightful companions. Albert's beauty is most striking, and he is most amiable and unaffected—in short, very fascinating." Her uncle was delighted at all these superlatives, which clearly showed that the Queen would no longer insist upon the "delay of a few years" which she had suggested a few months previously. All her true friends were anxious that she should marry. Notwithstanding her possession of unusual commonsense, prudence, and discrimination for one so young, her inexperience had led her in some measure to neglect that paramount duty of a constitutional sovereign,—viz., to maintain a position of neutrality towards the leaders of party on both sides. The youthful Queen had drifted unconsciously into political partisanship. Besides this, there were numerous intrigues going on upon the subject of the future consort of the Queen of England. It could scarcely be otherwise, considering the enormous issues involved. To sit beside the Queen on the throne of England was a position coveted by many. On the whole, the decision of the Queen in favour of her cousin, announced by her to Lord Melbourne on the 14th of October, 1839, four days after the arrival of the Prince at Windsor, was the source of unalloyed satisfaction not only to that nobleman but to the country at large. As to King Leopold, he writes to the Queen: "When I learned your decision, I had almost the feeling of old Simeon, 'Now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace.'" The true womanliness of the Queen's heart is shown in her letter to Baron Stockmar, announcing her engagement: "Albert has completely won my heart, and all was settled between us this morning . . . I feel certain he will make me very happy; I wish I could say I felt as certain of my making him happy, but I shall do my best." This is not the language of a queen, but of a loving woman.

Baron Stockmar, having taken some years to arrive at a sound conclusion as to the character of the Prince, now at last delivers himself of a decided utterance. He writes on the return of the young princes to their native land: "The more I see of the Prince, the better I esteem and love him. His intellect is so sound and clear, his nature so unspoiled, so childlike, so predisposed to goodness as well as truth, that only two external elements will be required to make of him a truly distinguished prince." He explains these to be, knowledge of the world and an intimate acquaintance with the English nation and their constitution.

That the Queen agreed in the latter sentiment is proved by one of her first gifts to the Prince being a Blackstone, which she sent to him at Coburg, and which he tells her in one of his letters he spent hours in studying.

THE ROYAL ENGAGEMENT.

On the 15th of October, 1839, the Queen sent for Prince Albert and made known to him her wishes on the subject, which had been familiar to him from early childhood—viz., marriage between the cousins. The Queen herself says that he received her offer without hesitation; but this is a calm and cold expression of the state of his mind, as revealed in a letter written by him on the next day, in which he describes his emotion in two lines from Schiller's "Song of the Bell:—"

"Das Auge sieht den Himmel an, Es schwimmt das Herz in Seligkeit."
(My eyes see heaven opening;
My heart swims in happiness.)

After the engagement, the Prince and his brother remained a month at Windsor Castle. A rumour of the proposed marriage had gone abroad throughout the country, though no official announcement had been made of it. Parliament was not sitting; and until the Queen could officially communicate the intelligence to the Privy Council, it was kept secret by the principal parties concerned. After the departure of the two princes from Windsor, which took place on the 15th of November, the Queen wrote to the Queen-Dowager (good Queen Adelaide) and to the other members of the English Royal Family, announcing her intended marriage. The declaration was made to the Privy Council on the 23rd. It is thus recorded in the Gazette of the same date.

"I have caused you to be summoned at the present time in order that I may acquaint you with my resolution in a matter which deeply concerns the welfare of my people and the happiness of my future life.

"It is my intention to ally myself in marriage with the Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. Deeply impressed with the solemnity of the engagement which I am about to contract, I have not come to this decision without mature consideration, nor without feeling a strong assurance that, with the blessing of Almighty God, it will at once secure my domestic felicity, and serve the interests of my country."

The Queen says that her hands shook while she read this declaration, and that she was happy and thankful when it was over. Doubtless it was nervous work for a girl of twenty thus publicly to announce her choice. The news was well received throughout the country, and had it not been for the bitterness of party spirit raging in England at that time, all would have gone smoothly and well. As it was, either party was constantly on the look-out for means to irritate and confound the other, and to this may be attributed the fact that the proposed allowance of £50,000 a year was eventually reduced to £30,000.

The Queen announced her intended marriage on the opening of Parliament on the 16th of January, 1840. During that session, not only were there stormy discussions as to the above-named question of Prince Albert's income, but there were also difficulties raised as to his precedence, and the appointments to be made in forming his household. This rendered the few weeks before the marriage different indeed from the happy time which such an interval ordinarily becomes in a case where the union is the result of love on both sides. As Lord Melbourne said, it was because it was "a love-match" that the English nation accepted the idea of the marriage with such heartiness.

MARRIED LIFE.

The marriage took place on the 10th of February, 1843, in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. Since the rejoicings at the visit of the Allied Sovereigns in 1814, never had such multitudes assembled in Hyde Park. After the ceremony the Queen and Prince drove to Windsor Castle. Of this journey the Queen writes: "Our reception was most enthusiastic, hearty, and gratifying in every way, the people quite deafening us with their cheers, horsemen, etc., going along with us."

Lady Lyttelton records that on the Queen's wedding day, her "look and manner were very pleasing, her eyes much swollen with tears, but great happiness in her countenance; and her look of confidence and comfort at the Prince when they walked away as man and wife was very pleasing to see. I understand she is in extremely high spirits since. Such a new thing for her to dare to be unguarded in conversing with anybody, and, with her frank and fearless nature, the restraints she has hitherto been under from one reason or another with everybody must have been most painful."

The Queen found in Prince Albert, young as he was, an inestimable guide and counsellor in the trying position in which she was placed. One single entry in the Queen's journal shows that this was supplemented by the purest affection, without which marriage becomes a bond instead of a blessing. "I told Albert that formerly I was too happy to go to London, and wretched to leave it, and how since the blessed hour of my marriage, and still more since the summer, I dislike it, and am unhappy to leave the country, and would be content and happy never to go to town. The solid pleasures of a peaceful, quiet, yet merry life in the country, with my inestimable husband and friend, my all-in-all, are far more durable than the amusements of London, though we don't despise or dislike them sometimes."

The Queen and Prince played, sang, and etched together. The following is the Queen's own sketch of the daily routine: "They breakfasted at nine, and took a walk every morning soon afterwards: then came the usual amount of business (far less heavy, however, than now), besides which they drew and etched a great deal together, which was a source of great amusement having the plates bit in the house. Luncheon followed at the usual hour of two o'clock. Lord Melbourne (the Prime Minister at the time) came to the Queen in the afternoon, and between five and six the Prince generally drove her out in a pony phaeton. If the Prince did not drive the Queen, he rode, in which case she took a drive with the Duchess of Kent or the ladies. The Prince also read aloud most days to the Queen. The dinner was at eight o'clock, and always with the company. . . . The hours were never late, and it was very seldom that the party had not broken up at eleven o'clock."

In November 1840, the Princess Royal was born, and in November of the following year the hearts of father, mother, and nation were gladdened by the birth of an heir to the throne. In 1843 another girl, the Princess Alice, was added to the group of royal children. On the 28th of August in this year, the Queen and Prince Albert embarked at Southampton, and after cruising about for a couple of days, they crossed to Tréport on a visit to Louis Philippe, King of the French, who, when Duke of Orleans, had been a most intimate friend of Her Majesty's father, as well as of the Princess Charlotte and King Leopold.

DEATH OF PRINCE ALBERT'S FATHER.

On the 29th of January, 1844, Prince Albert's father, Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld, died. The Prince was very much affected by the news, and the Queen, knowing the great affection he had felt for his father, was filled with sympathetic sorrow. She writes to Baron Stockmar: "My darling stands so alone, and his grief is so great and touching." Lady Lyttelton, in a letter written at this time, says: "I have been with the Queen a good deal altogether. She is very affecting in her grief, which is in truth all on the Prince's account; and every time she looks at him her eyes fill afresh. He has suffered dreadfully, being very fond of his father; and his separation from him and the suddenness of the event and his having expected to see him soon, all contribute to make it worse." It was at this period that the Prince, in a letter to Baron Stockmar, wrote the following tribute to the womanly love and tenderness of Queen Victoria:—"The good Alexandrine (his brother's wife) seems to me in the whole picture like the consoling angel. Just such is Victoria to me, who feels and shares my grief, and is the treasure on which my whole existence rests. The relation in which we stand to each other leaves nothing to desire. It is a union of heart and soul, and is therefore noble, and in it the poor children shall find their cradle, so as to be able one day to ensure a like happiness for themselves."

During the Easter recess of that year (1844), Prince Albert visited Coburg in order to be of some use to his brother, now reigning Duke. The Queen and he had never been parted for a single day since their marriage, and the separation involved great pain to both. The Queen of the Belgians came on a visit to Buckingham Palace two days before the Prince left for Coburg, the King arriving later on,—"an arrangement suggested by the thoughtfulness of Prince Albert, as providing companionship for Queen Victoria. He left England on the 28th of March, and Lady Lyttelton, writing from the Palace on the 29th, says: "The Queen has been behaving like a pattern wife as she is, about the Prince's tour, so feeling, and so wretched, and yet so unselfish, urging him to go and putting the best face upon it to the last moment."

The letters written by the Prince to the Queen during his absence are more like love letters than those usually written after four years of marriage. On the 11th of April he returned to England, arriving at Windsor in the evening.

In 1844, the Queen received several royal guests. First on the list was the King of Saxony, the amiable and accomplished sovereign who was killed in 1854 by being thrown from his carriage. The Emperor of Russia visited England in this year, though not for the first time. In 1816, when he was Grand Duke, only twenty years old, he had been in this country. Later in the same year (1844), the Prince of Prussia, now Emperor of Germany, spent a few days at Windsor, and King Louis Philippe arrived in England on a visit to the Queen, the pleasure of which was increased by the gloom that had hung over the relations between the two countries owing to the serious aspect of affairs caused by the indiscretion of the French officials in Tahiti, who grossly insulted the English Consul. After months of negotiation, the affair was at last peacefully settled. King Louis Philippe landed at Portsmouth on the 8th of October, where Prince Albert went to receive him, accompanied by the Duke of Wellington. On the same day the King of the French arrived at Windsor, the first French monarch who had ever come on a friendly visit to an English sovereign. Lady Lyttelton says: "When we saw the first of the escort enter the quadrangle, down flew the Queen and we after her, to the outside of the door on the pavement of the quadrangle, just in time to see the escort clattering up and the carriage close behind. The old man was much moved, I think, and his hand rather shook as he alighted, his hat quite off, and grey hair seen. His countenance is striking, much better than the portraits, and his embrace of the Queen was very parental and nice . . . . It was a striking piece of real history—made one feel and think much." The King was delighted to revisit England, and talked to the Queen of the time when he was "in a school in the Grisons, acting as a teacher," receiving twenty pence a day, having to brush his own boots, etc., under the name of Chabot. He was invested by the Queen with the Order of the Garter during this visit.

In the year 1816, the political sky in England was dark and stormy, resulting in a change of ministry in July. When the time came for the Queen to receive the Ministers on their taking formal leave, the trial on both sides was severe. "Yesterday was a very hard day for me," the Queen wrote to King Leopold on the 7th of July, "I had to part with Sir Robert Peel and Lord Aberdeen, who are irreparable losses to us and the country. They were both so overcome that it quite upset me, and we have in them two devoted friends. We felt so sad about them.

Never, during the five years that they were with me, did they ever recommend a person or a thing that was not for my or the country's best, and never for the party's advantage only." We can see from this how completely the Queen had overcome the girlish feeling of one-sided petulance that had actuated her conduct immediately after her accession in the incident of the Bed-chamber Plot.

Princess Helena (now Princess Christian) was born in May 25th of this year, in the midst of the anxieties of the political crisis. In July the Queen and Prince were separated for the second time since their marriage, and though only for a few days, both appear to have felt it greatly. The occasion was the opening of the Albert Dock at Liverpool by the Prince. A letter written by the Queen to Baron Stockmar, during his absence at this time, shows how entirely her existence was blended with that of her husband, and gives some idea of how terrible her sufferings must have been when the final separation came. She says: "I feel very lonely without my dear master; and though I know other people are often separated for a few days, I feel habit could not make me get accustomed to it. This I am sure you cannot blame. Without him everything loses its interest. . . . It will always be a terrible pang for me to separate from him even for two days; and I pray God never to let me survive him."

The Chancellorship of the University of Cambridge having become vacant through the death of the Duke of Northumberland in February 1847, Prince Albert was asked by Dr. Whewell, the Master of Trinity, and also by Lord Lansdowne, to allow himself to be put in nomination for the office. The election, after a violent party struggle, resulted in the Prince becoming Chancellor, and the imposing ceremony of installation took place in July of the same year. The Queen and Prince left town for Cambridge on the 5th, and in the great hall of Trinity, the Queen received the Chancellor's address. As Her Majesty observes in her Diary, it was almost absurd for them, but Madame Bunsen has placed it on record that the command of countenance of both was admirable, and that the Queen "only smiled upon the Prince at the close, when all was over."

On the 18th of March, 1848, in the midst of stormy times, the Princess Louise was born. At the end of the previous month the Orleans dynasty had been overthrown in France, and at the time of the young Princess's birth, though some of the members of Louis Philippe's family had reached England, nothing had been heard of the King himself, or of the Queen. Notwithstanding that Louis Philippe had broken his solemn pledge, made to the Queen on the occasion of her visit to the Château d'Eu, that his son, the Duke of Montpensier, should not marry the Spanish Infanta until the young Queen of Spain should not only be married but have an heir to the crown, the Queen had been too long bound to him by family ties not to feel deeply for the now homeless old man. Queen Victoria's uncle, the King of the Belgians, had married Louise, daughter of Louis Philippe, and the Duke of Kent had for many years been most intimate with the King of the French.

At home, affairs were cheerless enough. There was a Ministerial crisis, and a money and tax crisis. Add to this that news had just been received of the death of Prince Albert's maternal grandmother, to whom he was deeply attached, and it will be seen that the Prince's fears for the Queen, who always suffered in his sorrows, were not unfounded. But we find Her Majesty writing to King Leopold on the 4th April: "From the first I heard all that passed; and my only thoughts and talk were politics. But I never was calmer and quieter or less nervous. Great events make me calm; it is only trifles that irritate my nerves."

REVOLUTIONARY '48.

The insurrectionary spirit that prevailed over Europe in 1848, kindled but a small fire in England. A national convention of Chartists arranged for a monster demonstration on April 10th, and nervous people, knowing how the whole of the Continent was given up to insurrection and massacre, began to tremble. The Chartist leaders demanded the dismissal of the Ministry, the dissolution of Parliament, and "the Charter." Failing the Charter, they wanted a republic. The 10th of April, 1848, was a date looked forward to with terror and dismay by the peaceful citizens. The result was almost ludicrous. The proposed demonstration was a miserable failure. So was the petition they presented to Parliament. The spirit of anarchy was not strong enough in England, and our Queen sat firmly on her throne while the Pope was flying from Rome, the Emperor of Austria from Vienna, and Louis Philippe from France; Spain was in convulsions, Hungary in arms, and even quiet Switzerland was stirred, all in the terrible year of '48.

VISIT TO IRELAND.

The Queen's first visit to Ireland was made in August 1849. The most enthusiastic loyalty hailed the Royal visitors at every step of their progress. Following closely upon the terrible year '48, when the country had been in open revolt and under martial law, the universal warmth of this reception was all the more significant.

In 1849, the Queen and Prince suffered a severe loss in the death of Mr. Anson, the Prince's first secretary and afterwards Privy Purse. His death was terribly sudden, and the sorrow felt by those who valued him was aggravated by this fact. Lady Lyttelton gives a graphic account of the grief felt by the Queen and her husband, and of the sympathy of the former for the poor widow.

The same year witnessed the death of the Queen Dowager, Adelaide, widow of William IV. The Queen "loved her dearly," and was much saddened by the event.

Since the Queen's marriage, Prince Albert had been indefatigably employing himself in various ways, the usefulness of which was barely recognized during his life by the country at large, but could not fail to be appreciated by those who were in close association with him. He was always ready to inaugurate any movement which tended towards progress in art or science. For public functions, such as opening a new dock or other public building, the Prince was constantly in request. The Queen knew how hard he worked for his adopted country, and had seen how that meed of success which is almost inseparable from honest, painstaking, persevering endeavour, almost invariably followed his schemes. She knew how much he was to England, and how little England knew it. Sweet to her, indeed, then, was the proof of confidence and esteem given to her husband by the Duke of Wellington in 1850, when he proposed that Prince Albert should succeed himself as Commander-in-chief of the army. The Duke gave as reason for this request, his opinion that the command of the army should be in the hands of the sovereign, and, recognizing the deficiency in the constitutional working of the theory arising from the fact of the present sovereign being a woman, had always endeavoured practically to maintain the theory by scrupulously consulting the Queen's pleasure on every point before acting. The Duke expressed himself as most anxious that the command of the army should not fall into the hands of the House of Commons. After much earnest deliberation the Prince refused "the tempting offer," as he himself characterized it, on the ground that to accept it would involve the leaving unperformed many important duties connected with the welfare of the sovereign which no one but her husband could perform.

On 1st of May, 1850, Prince Arthur was born, that name being in compliment to the Duke of Wellington, on whose eighty-first birthday the Prince came into the world. His other names are William (after the Emperor of Germany, then Prince of Prussia), Patrick, given in remembrance of the recent royal visit to Ireland, "and," writes the Prince to Baron Stockmar, "my name the Queen insists on retaining by way of coda."

In July 1850, Sir Robert Peel was thrown from his horse, and, worn out with pain, fever, and a gouty constitution, soon succumbed to the consequences of the fall. The Queen and Prince felt his loss very deeply. They had, at the moment, many vexations, among them the absurd and unpatriotic opposition offered to the Prince Consort's grand and most successful scheme, the Great Exhibition of 1851. Close upon the death of Sir Robert Peel followed that of the Duke of Cambridge. It was in this year that Prince Albert began first to feel that the strain of constant work was telling upon him. He lost energy, and felt "an unaccountable disinclination for work. The Queen was full of anxiety, especially as to the sleeplessness which is so distressing a result of an overworked brain. Welcome indeed was the visit to Osborne after the close of the London season in this most trying year, though a portion of the time spent there had been employed by the Queen in making the celebrated memorandum of her views as to the transaction of business between the Crown and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. This office was then held by Lord Palmerston, who had persistently acted in defiance of the recognized rule that no steps should be taken, no despatches sent, until the sovereign had been consulted. Hasty, impulsive, and even abrupt as he was, in addition to those other well-known qualities of sagacity, courage, patriotism, and brilliant ability, Lord Palmerston frequently took important steps, and sent important instructions abroad, without previously having communicated with the Queen. As the whole incident throws a clear light upon the working of our constitutional monarchy, and proves that the Queen of England is by no means the merely mechanical agent that many persons suppose her to be, we give a sketch of it here. The following is the text of the memorandum :

"Osborne, Aug. 12, 1850.

"With reference to the conversation about Lord Palmerston which the Queen had with Lord John Russell the other day, and Lord Palmerston's disavowal that he ever intended any disrespect to her by the various neglects of which she has had so long and so often to complain, she thinks it right, in order to prevent any mistake in the future, to explain what it is she expects from the Foreign Secretary.

"She requires :

"1. That he will distinctly state what he proposes in a given case in order that the Queen may know as distinctly to what she has given her Royal sanction.

"2. Having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered or modified by the Minister. Such an act she must consider to be a failure in sincerity towards the Crown. . . . She expects to be kept informed of what passes between him and the Foreign Ministers before important decisions are taken based upon that intercourse, to receive the foreign despatches in good time, and to have the drafts for her approval sent to her in sufficient time to make herself acquainted with their contents before they are sent off."

Lord Palmerston received the rebuke as proceeding from "a lady as well as a sovereign," and wrote to Lord John Russell, saying "I have taken a copy of the memorandum of the Queen, and will not fail to attend to the directions which it contains." Those who knew about the memorandum fully expected the Foreign Secretary to resign his office. For not doing so, Lord Palmerston gave an excellent reason.

"By suddenly resigning," he says, "I should have been bringing for decision at the bar of public opinion a personal quarrel between myself and my sovereign—a step which no subject ought to take if he can possibly avoid it; for the result of such a course must be either fatal to him or injurious to the country. If he should prove to be in the wrong, he would be irretrievably condemned; if the sovereign should be proved to be in the wrong, the monarchy would suffer."

To follow this affair to its close. When Louis Napoleon accomplished his historical coup d'état, and the story of the massacre along the Boulevards filled England with horror, the Queen wrote from Osborne expressly desiring that the British ambassador at Paris, Lord Normanby, should in no way commit himself to an expression of approval of what had taken place; and that he should be instructed to remain passive. The Cabinet decided that Lord Normanby was not to make any change in his diplomatic relations with the French Government; but when our Ambassador called on the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to inform him of this decision, that gentleman informed him that Lord Palmerston had expressed to the French ambassador in London his entire approval of the conduct of the Prince President. This created a very great sensation in England. This piece of indiscretion following upon what we have already described, led to the removal of Lord Palmerston from his post as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in which he was succeeded by Lord Granville.

The list of deaths for this fateful year (1850) was not yet complete. Poor old Louis Philippe, the "clever, unwise, grand, mean old man," died on the 26th of August, and in October, his daughter, the Queen of the Belgians, the Queen's "only confidant and friend" except her husband, followed him to the grave. The Queen's sister, Princess Hohenlohe, writing from Meran on the 31st of October, says: "Dearest Victoria, my heart aches so for you. The loss of such a friend in your position is very hard to overcome, to submit to; the love and confidence in that angelic character had grown up with you and was a real blessing to you. This separation from her for life is the first great affliction you have known; may it be the last for many years to come."

In addition to the Queen's deep sense of her own loss was her sympathy in that of her beloved uncle, King Leopold, now widowed for the second time.

Trying indeed had been the last two years, with personal sorrows and national anxieties.

The Queen bore all with calm fortitude, as was her wont. Then no sorrow had to be borne alone, and the trials of these days seemed afterwards but as preparation for the terrible loss which darkened Her Majesty's whole life.

THE EXHIBITION OF 1851.

"But yesterday a naked sod,
The dandies sneered from Rotten Row,
And cantered o'er it to and fro;
And see, 'tis done!
As though 'twere by a wizard's rod,
A blazing arch of lucid glass
To meet the sun!"

Thus wrote Thackeray, in his "May-day Ode," of the first great World-Fair, the idea of which had been conceived by the Prince, and in the working out of which he had had such immensity of trouble and annoyance. The Queen was so thoroughly one with him in all his plans, hopes, fears, discouragements, and joys, that she writes with delight, after her private visit on the 29th of April, of "the myriads of beautiful and wonderful things which now quite dazzle one's eyes! Such efforts have been made, and our people have shown such taste in their manufactures, all owing to this Great Exhibition and to Albert—all to him!"

The next day the Queen went again to see the result of her husband's splendid idea and long labours in spite of immense difficulty and opposition. She and her husband were on this occasion accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Prussia (now Emperor and Empress of Germany), who with their son and daughter had arrived at Buckingham Palace on a visit the previous day. "They were thunderstruck," the Queen writes.

On the 1st of May it was opened to the public by the Queen. A more brilliant ceremony has seldom been witnessed in England. The Queen herself says it far surpassed her coronation in solemnity and beauty. The crowds were enormous. Twenty-five thousand people were assembled in the building, and it is calculated that about 700,000 were massed together on the route between it and Buckingham Palace. The Queen writes of the day from a full heart. "The sight," she says, "was magical—so vast, so glorious, so touching. One felt—as so many did whom I have since spoken to—filled with devotion, more so than by any service I have ever heard. The tremendous cheers, the joy expressed in every face, the immensity of the building, the mixtures of palms, flowers, trees (two huge elms had been enclosed in the Exhibition), statues, fountains, the organ (with 200 instruments and 600 voices, which sounded like nothing), and my beloved husband the author of this 'Peace Festival,' which united the industry of all nations of the earth,—all this was moving indeed, and it was and is a day to live for. God bless my dearest Albert, God bless my dearest country, which has shown itself so great to-day! One felt so grateful to the great God, who seemed to pervade all and to bless all!"

Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston wrote to congratulate the Queen upon the brilliant success of the opening ceremony—a triumph all the more splendid and deeply felt for the opposition which had been made to the scheme, and the evil auguries that had been made as to the bringing together such enormous crowds of people of all nations. The Exhibition was such an enormous financial success that the surplus receipts reached in August no less a sum than £170,000.

At the close of 1850, and throughout the year 1851, the English nation was excited by what was termed at the time the "Papal Aggression." The Pope simply gave to the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops in England the territorial titles their predecessors had held. There was little involved in this; and it was more the injudicious manner in which Cardinal Wiseman acted upon the Pope's Brief than the Brief itself, which caused that commotion in England which resulted in the framing and passing of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. Fiercely and passionately debated at the time, discussed all over England as it was, causing many a riot and influencing many an election as it did, this once famous Act sank into obscurity soon after having been passed, and in 1871 was almost unopposedly repealed. It gave rise, however, to the following important expression of opinion on the Queen's part, conveyed in a letter to the Duchess of Gloucester: "I would never have consented to anything that breathed a spirit of intolerance. Sincerely Protestant as I always have been, and always shall be, and indignant as I am at those who call themselves Protestants while they are in fact quite the contrary, I much regret the unchristian and intolerant spirit exhibited by many people at the public meetings."

THE CRIMEAN WAR.

In the year 1852, Louis Napoleon, Prince President, was proclaimed Emperor of the French. In his famous speech before the Chamber of Commerce at Bordeaux in October, he had declared emphatically that "the Empire was peace." "L'empire: c'est la paix" is an utterance that has now become historical. The French believed him. The English wondered with which country he would go to war first—Russia, Austria, Prussia, Belgium, or England. That was the English translation of the new Emperor's avowed determination to be at peace with all men. Results proved its general correctness. It seems a curious coincidence that in this year, when Napoleon III. was looking round Europe with a view to war, the conqueror of his grandfather, the Duke of Wellington, should die. His death occurred in September. From the date of Waterloo, England had been at peace. During the latter part of this period of peace the growth of Russia had been remarkable. Under the plea of protecting the suffering Christians in Turkey, Russia proposed that England and herself should make arrangements for the disposal of the Ottoman empire. England could see neither her own right nor that of Russia to disposing of Turkey; and the result of all this was, that when Russia made a move towards securing Turkey for herself, England and France combined together to check the progress of a Power which had become already threateningly great. After forty years' peace, in 1851, the English engaged in the Crimean war. The troops covered themselves with glory, and not merely the simpler glory of deeds, but the far more difficult and nobler glory of patient suffering, during months of inaction, of battling with disease, famine, and the bitterness of cold. The mismanagement of the Government, which resulted in terrible privations to our soldiers throughout the winter of 1855-56, is historical. The cold was so intense, that if the human hand touched metal in the open air the skin adhered to the metal. All kinds of comfortable clothing and warm garments were sent out, and never reached their destination. Food and medicine shared the same fate. Boots were sent out, and when they arrived were found to be all for the left foot. Contractors took the opportunity of supplying preserved meats totally unfit for food to our sick and hungry poor fellows suffering all kinds of miseries in a far-off land. While they pocketed their ill-gotten gains, English hearts ached over the soldiers. Miss Florence Nightingale went out to Scutari, accompanied by a band of ladies, and not only nursed the sick in hospital at Scutari, but actually managed, by determined perseverance, to secure for the benefit of their patients some of the food and medicine that had been for months somewhere on the way from England. Great indeed was the relief when at last, early in 1856, the war ended. The Queen, whose letters throughout its duration had breathed the most intense anxiety, sorrow, and sympathy both with the soldiers and their friends at home, was happy indeed when all was over, though she did not readily emerge from the sadness in which the death of 24,000 brave fellows had plunged her.

This war secured us a little glory, and an addition of forty-one millions of money to the National Debt. So much for this great landmark in the reign of Queen Victoria.

THE INDIAN MUTINY.

The year 1857 saw the passing of the Divorce Act (which secured to the poor what had formerly been the luxury of the rich) and the abolition of the system of transportation. But this year was memorable for events so tragic as to throw all matters of mere legislation into the shade. The frightful Indian Mutiny broke out in May, and in June the news reached horror-stricken England. The national mind was roused to frenzy. The letters of the Queen express the indignant horror with which she heard of the massacres and atrocities perpetrated by the Sepoys. It is needless to dwell upon them. The mutiny was quelled, and resulted finally in the abolition of that till then had been the ruling power in India, the East India Company, and the placing of responsible government in the hands of that at home. In September 1858, the "John Company" formally ceased. The Queen was proclaimed throughout India in November, and Lord Canning began his rule as her first viceroy.

DEATH OF THE DUCHESS OF KENT AND THE PRINCE CONSORT.

In February 1858, Parliament moved a vote of congratulation to Her Majesty on the marriage of her eldest daughter, the Princess Royal, to Prince Frederick William, eldest son of the present Emperor of Germany, who was then heir-apparent to the throne. The marriage was solemnized at Windsor. This first break in the family circle seemed but the prelude to others. The Prince of Wales visited Canada in the following year, and Prince Alfred joined his ship and set out for the Cape. Not long after, the Princess Alice became engaged to Prince Louis of Hesse. But here a great and terrible parting was at hand, and intervened between the betrothal of the young princess and her marriage. Writing in 1861 to the Duchess of Kent, the Prince Consort says: "To-day our marriage comes of age according to law. We have faithfully kept our pledge for better and for worse, and have only to thank God that He has vouchsafed so much happiness to us. May He have us in His keeping for the days to come! You have, I trust, found good and loving children in us, and we have experienced nothing but love and kindness from you."

The Queen wrote about the same anniversary, the 10th of February, their wedding day: "Very few can say with me that their husband at the end of twenty-one years is not only full of the friendship, kindness, and affection which a truly happy marriage brings with it, but of the same tender love as in the very first days of our marriage."

A month later the Duchess of Kent died, and the Queen's sorrow for her mother was deep and sincere.

In October of the same year the Prince Consort suddenly lost energy and spirits. For some time he had been suffering from the strain of long-continued and incessant work. The death of the young King of Portugal from typhoid fever made a curiously deep impression upon Prince Albert.

Not long before his fatal illness, in speaking to the Queen, he said, "I do not cling to life; you do, but I set no store by it. If I knew that those I love were well cared for, I should be quite ready to die to-morrow." In the same conversation he added, "I am sure if I had a severe illness, I should give up at once; I should not struggle for life." Nor did he when the time for struggle came.

The Princess Alice was his devoted nurse. The Queen was seldom absent from the sick room. Of her loneliness and overwhelming grief when the end came it is needless to speak. Half her life was gone. Rarely has such an intensely mutual existence been lived by two persons. In their public capacity, as in their private, they were as one. The Queen lost not only husband and closest friend, but a guide and counsellor in the thorny way of politics, and a private secretary in whom she could confide as in her own thoughts.

In the "Life of the Prince Consort," the Queen gives the sad details of his last illness, and unconsciously reveals the depth and breadth of her own terrible grief. Since then she has lived, as women do, in the lives of others, her children and her people, but her own life has been to her but as a slight thread running through the larger interests about her. Our Queen, since the loss of her husband, has been, in Bible language, a "widow indeed."

Fifty years hence, the character of the Prince Consort will be appreciated as it deserves, and his influence estimated at its true worth. Only those who can appreciate the contrast between England under the rule of the Georges and England as it now is, can fairly judge of the mind that caused so much of the beneficial change. A depraved and immoral court, where extravagance was regarded as a virtue and purity as a failing, has been replaced by one in which, fortunately for our country, an exactly opposite state of things exists. Much of this is due to the example of wedded happiness to be seen in the royal home, and the Queen herself acknowledges, with love and pride, how great was the influence exercised upon her own nature by the husband whom she regarded with such fond affection and has mourned with such constancy.

MARRIAGES.

Princess Alice was married quietly to Prince Louis of Hesse in the early part of 1862. In the following year, on the 10th of March, the Prince of Wales was married to the Princess Alexandra, daughter of the King of Denmark. Her youth and loveliness, goodness and sweetness, made her at once more popular in England than any foreign princess had ever been before, and her popularity has continued to increase to this day.

At subsequent dates, the Princesses Helena and Louise married respectively Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein and the Marquis of Lorne, eldest son of the Duke of Argyll, leaving to the Queen but one unmarried daughter, Princess Beatrice.

The Duke of Edinburgh married the daughter of the late Emperor of Russia; and the latest of the royal marriages has been that of the Duke of Connaught with the Princess Margaret, daughter of a German potentate.

The Queen's sons by no means eat the bread of idleness. The Prince of Wales works hard at the profession of royalty, and his brothers perform their no less onerous duties with assiduity.

The Queen's daughters are all more or less gifted with artistic tastes. The Crown Princess of Germany is a clever artist, and has also cultivated to proficiency a taste for sculpture. The artistic proclivities of the Princess Louise are well-known both in this country and in Canada, where her husband has for some years held the post of Governor-General. Princess Beatrice has illustrated a book with dainty water colour sketches.

Of the Queen's numerous grandchildren, the eldest grandson was married in 1881. The eldest son of the Crown Prince of Prussia and of his wife, our Princess Royal, this young Prince, Frederick William Victor Albert, aged twenty-two, married Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, aged twenty-one. The Queen thus sees the branches of the family tree stretching far and wide.

Our Royal Family is connected by marriage with the most powerful of the European nations. With Russia there is a double bond. The sister of our Princess of Wales is wife of the present Emperor. The only daughter of the late Emperor is married to the Duke of Edinburgh.

With Germany the ties are numerous, the strongest being the union of our Princess Royal with the heir-apparent of the Empire.

Another sister of the Princess of Wales is married to the Duke of Cumberland, whose right to the title of King of Hanover is undoubted by himself but disputed by others. The Duke is the lineal representative of King George III. in the male line, and had the Salic law, which excludes women from reigning, prevailed in these realms, he would now occupy the throne of England.

The King of Greece is the Princess of Wales's brother, adding another loop to the network of connections and relationships that stretches from the royal homes of England over the continent of Europe.

THE REFORM BILL.

In 1866 the Queen opened Parliament in person for the first time, since the Prince Consort's death. The mind of England was agitated on the subject of the franchise, and remained thus agitated throughout that year and part of the next, until, on the 15th of August, 1867, the Reform Bill passed through its final stage. We borrow the following concise summary of its results from the historian of "Our Own Times":—"It enfranchised in boroughs all male householders rated for the relief of the poor, and all lodgers resident for one year, and paying not less than £10 a year rent; and in counties, persons of property of the clear annual value of £5, and occupiers of land or tenements paying £12 a year. It disfranchised certain small boroughs, and reduced the representation of other constituencies; it created several new constituencies, among others the boroughs of Chelsea and of Hackney. It gave a third member to Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Leeds, and a representative to the University of London. It enacted that where there were to be three representatives, each elector should vote for only two candidates, and that in the City of London, which has four members, each elector should only vote for three."

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.

The year 1868 saw the Abyssinian Expedition brought to a successful close. In 1867, Theodore, king of that country, had thrown a number of English into prison; and in November, England sent an expeditionary force against him. After the battle of Magdala, in which five hundred Abyssinians were killed and not one English life lost, the King released the captives and himself committed suicide. Sir Robert Napier, who commanded the expedition, was made Baron Napier of Magdala, and received a pension. The Queen took charge of King Theodore's son, aged seven, and had him educated in India. He was afterwards brought to England, where he died before reaching maturity.

When the franchise was extended, Mr. Robert Lowe quaintly remarked, "We must now at least educate our new masters." Mr. Forster's Education Bill, introduced in February 1870, had for its object the provision of public elementary education in England and Wales. This Bill resulted in the establishment of School Boards and of the new school system which now reigns in England. This is not the place to discuss its merits and demerits. After ten years' trial, men have not yet made up their minds as to whether it has been a success or a failure.

But one opinion can be formed as to another measure passed shortly after. The abolition of the purchase system in the army was an undeniable reform. It met with no small amount of opposition, but was carried in the end, as was only right and just. The Queen, acting on Mr. Gladstone's advice,—and it was one of his boldest strokes of policy,—took the decisive step of cancelling the Royal Warrant which made purchase of promotion in the army legal. Her Majesty issued a new Royal Warrant, and the anomalous system was at an end.

Another important measure passed in the later years of the Queen's reign was the Ballot Bill, which secured secrecy for voters, and prevented personation.

THE ASHANTEE WAR.

The King of Ashantee having refused to evacuate certain territory on the Gold Coast ceded by the Dutch to England in 1872, Sir Garnet Wolseley was sent out in September of the following year in command of an attacking force. They fought their way to Coomassie, conquering the Ashantees wherever they came in collision with them, and compelled the King to come to terms. The successful campaign was ended and the troops back at Portsmouth in the following March.

THE INVASION OF AFGHANISTAN.

Since then, the most important events of Her Majesty's reign have been the war in Afghanistan and that in Zululand. England, fearing a union between Russia and the ruler of Cabul, Shere Ali, sent a "mission" in 1878 to Afghanistan, which certain misunderstandings eventually converted into an invasion. The English troops occupied Cabul, from which the ruler, Shere Ali, fled. He died shortly after, and his son, Yakooob Khan, succeeded, and signed a treaty with the British troops in May 1879. This treaty arranged that the Indian Government should pay the Ameer £60,000 a year, on consideration of his ceding the frontier in question. All was considered to be happily settled. Then came the news of the rising in Cabul, and the massacre of Sir Louis Cavagnari, the English envoy, and nearly all the members of his staff. The British troops again took Cabul, and Yakooob Khan was imprisoned.

THE ZULU WAR.

In 1852, Cape Colony and Natal were the only English dominions in South Africa. The English Government distinctly acknowledged the independence of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republic, both belonging to the Dutch. In 1878, the Transvaal went to war with one of the contiguous African States, and was by no means successful in the undertaking. A certain portion of the settlers, peacefully inclined, and alarmed for their property and their lives, appealed to England to annex the Transvaal to English territory. The British envoy, without taking the trouble to discover whether the appellants formed a majority or a minority, annexed the Transvaal. The Zulu king took fright at the increasing power of the English, and assembled his army,—a measure which he declared to be merely defensive, but which Sir Bartle Frere, the Lord High Commissioner, set down as aggressive. He demanded that the Zulu army should be disbanded; and on Cetewayo's refusal, he at once, on his own responsibility, began a war with the Zulus. In January 1879, the English force sustained a terrible defeat, but eventually Cetewayo was made captive, and the war ended.

The young French Prince, Louis Napoleon, died fighting for England, and the circumstances of his death were peculiarly painful. The Queen felt deep and sincere grief and the most tender sympathy for the lonely and bereaved mother.

The young Prince, manly and unaffected, gentle in disposition and of a cultured, deep-thinking nature, had found the way to the motherly heart of our Queen, and the cry of the Empress on hearing the news, "Oh, mon pauvre fils !" found a thrilling echo in the horror and grief of the Queen.

LOYALTY OF NATIONAL FEELING.

It may be questioned if, in any other countries than England and America, such anguish of sympathy is shown by the people in the sorrows of those rulers who have endeared themselves to the nation, as have been exhibited during the trials of the Queen in the death of her husband, the almost mortal illness of the Prince of Wales in 1871, and the death of the Princess Alice in 1878 ; and by the Americans during the protracted illness of President Garfield after having been shot by Guiteau in 1881. When the Prince Consort died, the universal cry was, " Oh, the poor Queen," and loyal tears testified to the sincerity of the sympathy felt for the lonely widow, more lonely by reason of her high position. During the illness of the Prince of Wales of the same disease, typhoid fever, which carried off his father, universal gloom hung over England.

The reaction when hope revived and grew stronger every day, after the Prince had asked for and received the famous glass of ale, became something to wonder at—something out of the experience of nations. Men had said, " He will die on the same day as his father ;" but when the fateful 14th of December found the Prince growing rapidly strong, the nation exulted. A more universally happy Christmas was never spent in England. When the Queen first appeared in public, she was received with such shouts of congratulatory delight as seemed to astonish her. As for the Princess of Wales, whom the English nation had for eight years been loving more and more, she was now lifted to the highest place in the national affection. Her simple, wifely devotion had touched a chord to which every English heart responded. This beautiful, good, and gentle lady revives in the breasts of men the old sentiment of chivalric devotion, and women look up to her as a bright example of the purity and sweetness that shine out all the more softly and brightly for that " fierce light which beats around a throne."

On that momentous Sunday, December 10th, the Princess of Wales wrote a few lines to the vicar of Sandringham church. In the words of the Times, " so simple and so touching are the words that their heartfelt earnestness, trust, and humility will strengthen the affectionate respect in which the Princess is held by the nation. The Princess wrote: " My husband being, thank God, somewhat better, I am coming to church. I must leave, I fear, before the service is concluded that I may watch by his bedside. Can you not say a few words in prayer in the early part of the service that I may join with you in prayer for my husband before I return to him ? "

The day of Public Thanksgiving for the restoration of the Prince of Wales to health will long be remembered in England. The Royal Family went in procession to St. Paul's, where a solemn special service was solemnized. Crowds lined the whole route from Buckingham Palace on the 27th February, 1872, the day on which the Thanksgiving Service was held. The London Gazette of the 1st of March contained the following letter received from the Queen by Mr. Gladstone:—

" Buckingham Palace,

" Feb. 29th, 1872 "

" The Queen is anxious, as on a previous occasion, to express publicly her own personal, very deep sense of the reception she and her dear children met with on Tuesday the 27th of February, from millions of her subjects on her way to and from St. Paul's.

" Words are too weak for the Queen to say how very deeply touched and gratified she has been by the immense enthusiasm and affection exhibited towards her dear son and herself, from the highest down to the lowest, on the long progress through the capital, and she would earnestly wish to convey her warmest and most heartfelt thanks to the whole nation for this demonstration of loyalty.

" The Queen, as well as her son and dear daughter-in-law, felt that the whole nation joined with them in thanking God for sparing the beloved Prince of Wales's life.

" The remembrance of this day, and of the remarkable order maintained throughout, will for ever be affectionately remembered by the Queen and her family."

Again at the death of the Princess Alice of Hesse of diphtheria caught from her own child, whom she nursed with devoted care, the heart of the nation turned to the Queen in her sorrow. Her Majesty can scarcely realize how in every home her grief became a household sorrow in these great troubled moments of her life, and how men and women went about with an ache at heart for the sorrow of the Queen. At such times the nation feels as one family with a strength of sentiment that often by its intensity excites a sensation of wonder even in those who experience it.

BIRTH AND BAPTISM.

AT the palace of Greenwich, on the 7th of September, 1533, the young and giddy queen of "the haughty lord that broke the bones of Rome," gave birth to a daughter. The child received the auspicious name of her grandmother, Elizabeth, whose marriage to the first of the Tudor kings had united the two Roscs, and for ever ended the bloodshed of the civil wars; and the infant now born, though destined to be the last of her proud line, was to accomplish infinitely more for the peace and unity of the great awakened Commonwealth of England.

She was not Henry's first child, nor Anne Boleyn his first wife. A daughter named Mary, a courageous girl, born to him by his divorced wife Catharine of Arragon, was now seventeen years of age. That only "a fair young maid" should have been presented him by his beautiful and brilliant queen, for whom he had cut himself and his kingdom adrift from pope and cardinal, sorely vexed the heart of the imperious sovereign. In the play of Shakspeare, the King turns to the lady who announced it, "I guess thy message . . . Say ay, and of a boy!" and she walks away grumbling because she had received no more than a groom's fee. Nevertheless the ceremony of christening was brilliantly pompous. The church was hung with tapestry, and the way to it from the palace was strewn with rushes, the ancient and filthy substitute for the carpets that were to come into familiar use during the reign of the child who was the subject of all this show. The ceremony was witnessed by many lords and ladies of high degree,—a strange gathering when we regard it in the light of the fates of its components. In the middle of the church stood a silver font, adorned with a crimson canopy; the innocent babe, in a mantle of purple velvet with a long train furred with ermine, was borne by the Duchess-Dowager of Norfolk, mother of a lady who was destined by-and-by to be Henry's queen, and to perish on the scaffold for her own dishonour; and a splendid canopy was held above the infant by her uncle, who afterwards died upon the block, by two Howards and Lord Hussey, the great Lincolnshire chief, who was also to suffer execution in a few years. The Bishop of London performed the ceremony of baptism; and Thomas Cranmer, the moulder of the English Reformation, administered the sacrament of confirmation,—the very man who, in three short years, was to pronounce the sentence which branded the infant as a bastard. On the same day, and at the same hour, said an untrue rumour of the age, as those which gave birth to Elizabeth, a son was born to Sir John Dudley (afterwards Duke of Northumberland), who now assisted in carrying from the church the gorgeous presents of the sponsors. That boy became in after years the favourite of this young princess, and the superstition of the sixteenth century in this way explained the mysterious fondness of the Maiden Queen for the lord of Kenilworth. To make the ceremony doubly historic, the bard of Avon, full seventy years later, when the princess had finished her majestic and lonely life, put into the lips of Cranmer a prophecy, which was fulfilled because it was then no prophecy:—

"This royal infant (heaven still move about her!)
Though in her cradle, yet now promises
Upon this land a thousand thousand blessings,
Which time shall bring to ripeness.

She shall be loved and feared: her own shall bless her;
Her foes shake like a field of beaten corn,
And hang their heads with sorrow: good grows with her.

In her days every man shall eat in safety
Under his own vine what he plants, and sing
The merry songs of peace to all his neighbours.

She shall be, to the happiness of England,
An aged princess; many days shall see her,
And yet no day without a deed to crown it.
Would I had known no more! but she must die,—
She must, the saints must have her,—yet a virgin;
A most unspotted lily shall she pass
To the ground, and all the world shall mourn her."

CHILDHOOD'S PROMISE.

But the child was born to trouble, born to be steeled in the school of political scandal, court intrigue, and wearisome persecution, that she might make England strong and prosperous by her cold, keen genius. Her sorrows began ere she was three years old. The love of Henry for the other sex—like his daughter's—had little chance against his self-will and state-craft; and when Anne Boleyn approached him one summer day in 1536, as he stood by a window of that palace where Elizabeth had first seen the light, and in supplicating attitude held out to him the bright little thing who must even then have possessed some of that magical fascination which struck all men in her elder girlhood, the relentless husband dismissed her from his presence with stern mien. In a few hours the accused queen was landed from the Thames, and passed beneath the gloomy and ominous portals of the Traitor's Gate into the Tower of London, her last earthly abode. She was condemned by the peers; and on the nineteenth day of that same month of May, her "small" neck was severed on Tower Green. At that moment, however, there was at least one good and true heart which pitied the "motherless and worse than fatherless child;" for only six days before her arrest,

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

Queen Anne had enjoined her chaplain, Matthew Parker, to instruct her little daughter in the principles of true religion. This learned priest had to pass through persecution and poverty during the reactionary reign of Mary, but when Elizabeth ascended the throne she summoned him to the primacy of the English Church.

The care of the infant princess and her elder sister devolved on Lady Margaret Bryan at Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire, who seems to have done her best for the neglected child of her deceased friend and queen. "My Lord," wrote she to Thomas Cromwell, the right-hand man of Henry, "when my Lady Mary's Grace was born, it pleased the King's Grace to appoint me Lady Mistress, and made me a Baroness, and so I have been governess to the children His Grace have had since. Now it is so, my Lady Elizabeth is put from that degree she was afore, and what she is at now I know not but by hearsay. Therefore I know not how to order her nor myself, nor none of hers that I have the rule of, that is, her women and grooms, beseeching you to be good Lord to my Lady and to all hers, and that she may have some raiment. She hath neither gown, nor kirtle, nor petticoat, nor no manner of linen, nor fursuicks, nor kerchiefs, nor rails, nor body stichets, nor handkerchiefs, nor mufflers, nor biggens. All these Her Grace must take. I have driven off as long as I can, that by my troth I can drive it off no longer . . . God knoweth my Lady (Elizabeth) hath great pain with her great teeth, and they come very slowly forth, which causeth me to suffer Her Grace to have her will more than I would. I trust to God, an her teeth were well graft, to have Her Grace after another fashion than she is yet, so as I trust the King's Grace shall have great comfort in Her Grace. For she is as toward a child, and as gentle of conditions, as I ever knew any in my life. Jesu preserve Her Grace!"

Mary had not been treated well by Anne Boleyn. Brought up in the same house with Elizabeth, she had been compelled to behold the pomp that surrounded the infant's cradle, while she herself did not even enjoy the privilege of writing. But no Tudor bore a long-lived rancour. Now that her baby-sister was degraded in her turn, she continued to address her as "Her Grace;" nay, she even ventured to beseech their father's kindness just two months after the execution of the Queen. "My sister Elizabeth," she wrote from Hunsdon, "is in good health (thanks to Our Lord), and such a child toward, as I doubt not but Your Highness shall have cause to rejoice of in time coming, as knoweth Almighty God." Elizabeth was a proper and charming child,—proper, when her sister Mary led her in the summer of 1537 to the baptismal font of their baby brother Edward; charming, when she, a mere child of six years, addressing the Chancellor whom Henry had sent down to Hunsdon with his "blessing" for the girls, gave her humble thanks, and asked after His Majesty's welfare "with as great a gravity as she had been forty years old." From the hour she learned to lisp, she conquered all by her brightness and fascination. Each of the royal Bluebeard's successive wives was charmed by her winning ways: poor dull Anne of Cleves, content to receive a pension and be called the King's "sister," was pleased with her; Catharine Howard honoured the child of seven with a conspicuous place at her own wedding feast; Catharine Parr, the last and luckiest of Henry's brides, desired the company of Elizabeth, for whom already there was predicted on every hand a brilliant future; and for a time the Princess lived and learned at Court with her little brother. For some unknown reason she was sent away for an entire year (1543-4); but a letter in Italian to her step-mother, full of love and obedience, cleared the air, and she was released from her banishment. Further on, we shall have occasion to speak of the intellectual drill she went through; but here it may be mentioned that by the time she was eleven years of age, she had prepared a translation of Marguerite de Valois's "Le Miroir de l'Âme Pécheresse," which she dedicated to the Queen. Elizabeth and Edward were sweetly intimate; they cried bitterly together at Enfield when told of their father's death, but her sorrow vanished quickly under the current of her cold prudence; and the young King complimented her by letter on the equanimity with which she had borne the trial.

Here for the first time we touch the core of England's great Queen. We have seen her charms of manner and intellect; now we see the cold glitter of her prudence, which permitted her to fold her arms and serenely survey the future over her father's grave. There was no girlish abandon. Probably she thought more of the annuity of £3,000 bequeathed by the selfish despot she so strangely resembled, and of the will which left her the crown of England in succession to Edward and her elder sister. She was now almost within measurable distance of a throne. This wise little woman was only thirteen years of age. To complete her picture, one feature has still to be added to the canvas,

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

—her unrivalled capacity for dissimulation and what is vulgarly called (it is a vulgar thing) “bamboozling.” It accosts us in the story of—

HER FIRST FLIRTATION.

The reins of government had been taken by the Earl of Hertford (Duke of Somerset), maternal uncle of the young King “Josiah,” while his brother, Sir Thomas Seymour, was appointed Lord High Admiral,—unscrupulous naevi homines, Protestants by profession and plunderers by trade. Only a few weeks at the most had elapsed from the death of Henry, when the younger of these, a handsome and daring man of thirty, asked her hand in marriage. Repulsed at once, he simply wheeled round his attentions to her step-mother, and married the royal widow straight off. Elizabeth had a separate establishment of one hundred and twenty persons, but she lived in the same house as the learned Queen-Dowager, and under her guardianship. Seymour, by his stroke of politic marriage, was placed in excellent circumstances for prosecuting the courtship at his ease. At Chelsea, and other mansions of his own or Catharine’s, he was guilty of indecent and vulgar antics—such as marching bare-legged into her room of a morning, patting her in a manner that was more familiar than seemly, and otherwise foudling and teasing her—even in his wife’s presence; but Catharine could wink no longer at his gallantry when she caught him with his arm round the maiden’s waist. Elizabeth, scarcely fifteen, was packed off to Cheshunt, still, however, in the loving thoughts of her step-mother, who could forgive a little thoughtless frivolity in a brilliant girl, to whom she could say, without fear of turning her head, “I believe you are destined by Heaven to be the Queen of England.”

In a few months after this separation the giddy princess lost her best female friend. The path was again cleared to the gallant wooer, whose art of fascination raised against him a suspicion of magic. He played with high and dangerous stakes. He sought, by presents of money for ignoble purposes, to win over the boy-king to press under the notice of Parliament the treatment Edward experienced from Somerset; he aimed at bringing about the marriage of Edward and Lady Jane Grey, so as to attach a strong party among the nobles, and then, as the crowning achievement, marrying Elizabeth and perhaps reaching the throne. He did not suffer the grass to grow beneath his feet. He secured fit agents in Thomas Parry, Elizabeth’s offerer, and Catharine Ashley, her governess, one of the most accomplished women in England. They plied her fancy by frequently dwelling on his love and worth, so effectively that with her own permission the inexorable Seymour one day appeared at the stately mansion of Ashridge, in Herts, where she had taken up her residence. Although Elizabeth was able to dissemble before him, doubtless Kate Ashley would let him know that behind the curtain the mention of his name brought the blushes to mantle her cheeks. Blushing maiden as she was, the daughter of Henry VIII. had not lived in the atmosphere of those times of base intrigue and light regard for human heads, without learning what was more essential than the Latin and Greek taught her by Grindal and Ascham,—the value of caution and craft. Even with the crimson on her clear-complexioned face she said,—from no virgin modesty, we fear, “Castles in the air!” “I will do as God shall put into my mind;” and when she consented to Seymour’s visit, she was wise enough to look ahead for probable rocks and insert a proviso, “not without the permission of the Council.”

Her levity leaked out, and the Duchess of Somerset personally reprimanded the governess for permitting “my Lady Elizabeth’s going in the night in a barge upon the Thames and for other light parts.” Seymour’s bubble was ready to burst. He was a traitor to himself. He had gained a strong party for the Protector’s overthrow; but a greedy man, who wantonly bubbled about the Princess’s fortune, boasted of “speedily climbing” above the Lord Privy Seal, and brandished a paper which he declared to be a charge against the Protector, was doomed to failure. His brother seized him and sent him to the Tower, in January 1549. Thither, too, were sent Parry and Ashley. Seymour had not the privilege of a fair trial. On the 4th of March a Bill of Attainder was passed, and sixteen days later he perished on the scaffold.

On the arrest of her two domestics, Elizabeth was placed under restraint by Sir Robert Tyrwhit, at Hatfield, in Herts. After an outburst of tears on learning the fate of her two servants, she assumed the calmness which was her strength and power through life. No bold question or cunning insinuation took her off her guard, and Sir Robert was forced to confess that “she hath a good wit, and nothing is to be gotten from her but by great policy.” She allowed to no amorous intimacy, but merely that her relations had been those of business. “My Lord,” wrote this girl who had “a soul to be saved,” “there goeth rumours abroad which be grently against both my honour and honesty, which above all things

I esteem, which be these, that I am in the Tower and with child by my Lord-Admiral. . . . I shall most heartily desire your Lordship that I may come to Court after your first determination, that I may show myself there as I am." Foiled by a girl of fifteen, who could talk with such placid hardihood on the most delicate of matters, the Protector turned his attention to her domesticities, and wrung from them the confessions on which our narrative is based. When these were presented to her, so keenly suspicious had her mind become at this early stage of life, she took care to examine the signatures, so as to be assured of their genuineness. In fact, she went no further than her servants' statements, and the wiliest and most experienced statesmen in all England were thoroughly outwitted. Kate was removed from her position as governess, and the troublesome task devolved on Lady Tyrwhit. Elizabeth had now driven home to her once for all, that in the days and people amid which and whom she lived only a hair-breadth divided a scaffold from a throne. A story is told, and it is not improbable, that she showed no sign of sorrow when informed of Seymour's fate, but remarked with the calmness of a critical biographer. "This day died a man with much wit and very little judgment." It is now manifest that Elizabeth might play with hearts and heads, but that her heart would never break nor her head go to the block.

LOVE'S AFTERMATH.

The shock—how much from love, how much from shame?—that followed her first introduction to the arena of responsible life in those ruthless and cunning times was deep and protracted. She became depressed and sank into a dangerous illness. The strain continued for a year, but at last the poison of the wound had passed through her nature. Meanwhile her suffering brought forth some tenderness from the Court: her two beloved domestics returned to her household; and the wisest head in England, the incorruptible secretary of Edward VI., William Cecil,—afterwards her own leading counsellor when she reached the throne,—seems to have been received into her confidence. She was no foolish Rosalind. It would be hard to find in Elizabeth from this time forward any trace of gentle feeling, except perhaps some thirteen years later, when she, believing herself to be dying of small-pox, confessed her love for Robert Dudley to the sage statesmen who stood in terror by her bed. The iron scourge of the "stern, rugged nurse," Adversity, did not teach her to melt at the woe of others. From her first trampled passion she emerged a cold and wary woman. She turned away from the scandal of the Court to serious study, burying in her heart the secret of "her freaks and follies with the late Lord Admiral;"* and possibly its shadow never crossed her path visibly from the outside world, save once when she was Queen, and dealt in deeper and wider plots. Sir John Harrington presented her with a portrait of the handsome innamorato of her blushing girlhood, along with a sonnet in which that Orlando was thus referred to:—

"Of person rare, strong limbs, and manly shape,
By nature formed to serve in sea or land;
Yet against nature, reason, and just laws,
His blood was spilt, guiltless, and without cause."

All who have paid attention to the growth of education in England are sufficiently well acquainted with the learning and works of that stout Yorkshireman, Roger Ascham. If he had any sin worth speaking of, it may have been that of fondness for cock-fighting; but against this possible item of extravagance in his nature—a humble reflex of the ferocious life of his exalted neighbours—must be set his ardent pursuit of learning amid the narrow straits of poverty. He was a Protestant not only in religion but in education; and in "The Scholemaster," left unfinished at his death in 1568, he denounced the barbarous system of teaching then in vogue, which consisted in cramming the young memory, with the result of turning out mere "lubbers," and when memory was at fault bringing down the ruthless rod on the helpless victims. He advocated "education," in the true sense of the word, with all the force of his logic and wit. "Multum non multa" was the motto he adopted from the Roman Pliny; the school was by his method to become "a sanctuary from fear;" it was to develop, not to stifle, the energies of the mind; it was to set the "wit" at work, to try the judgment, to train the memory to a habit of sure retentiveness. "Pleasure," said this renowned scholar, "allureth love; love hath lust to labour; labour always obtaineth his purpose."

It was well for the wounded heart of the Princess that at this crisis she found a teacher like Ascham, with whom accuracy and understanding were combined principles; she learned not merely to turn an elegant expression, but to hold intelligent converse with the mighty dead of Greece and Rome. The day opened with the Greek Testament, and this was followed by the speeches of Isocrates and the tragedies of Sophocles, in reading which the tutor pointed out the moral truths which, followed by her, would eminently fit her for her lofty station, and enable her to buffet the severest tempests of fortune. By the way, Queen Elizabeth was proud of her penmanship and of her skill in music: it is remarkable that both of these were special accomplishments of Ascham, and that he had been her instructor in caligraphy. To this silent and thoughtful period, this spring-time of unseen development after the first wild storm of nascent passion and bitter repression, belongs the influence of the Yorkshire tutor; how powerful it may have been there is no record to reveal, but it may justly be allowed to have widened her views of life and strengthened her ambition. And when Ascham left his pupil in 1550, their parting was not for ever. Five years later, on escaping from a greater danger that had almost brought her head to the scaffold where her mother's had fallen, she summoned him to her side to read with her the thrilling speeches of great Greek and Roman orators, and studied the pleadings of the statesmen and the manners of the people. When as Queen of England she had to guide the restive bark amid the countless quicksands of European diplomacy, and to smile upon the fulsome flatteries of courtiers, Roger Ascham was still beside her, and she spent her mornings with the still poor tutor as she had done when a fair-haired girl with a wounded heart.

A Latin letter to a learned foreigner, written by him after leaving the Princess in 1550, deserves to be quoted, not merely as a proof of her diligence, but also because it reveals to us how she was able to conquer her feelings and simulate a simplicity of taste utterly at variance with her voluptuous nature and the loud extravagance of her regal days:—

"At her age, a little over sixteen, such seriousness and condescension with dignity have never been heard of. She has the keenest zeal for true religion [i.e. against Popery] and polite learning; a wit that is exempt from female weakness, a masculine power of application, a quick perception and a retentive memory. She converses in French and Italian as freely as in English, and in Latin with ease, correctness, and judgment; she also speaks Greek fairly, and often is pleased to talk in that language with me. Her writing of Greek and Latin is unsurpassed for elegance. Although highly skilled in music, yet it does not delight her very greatly. As to personal decoration, she is φιλόκαλος μάλλον ἢ καλλωπιστὴς [i.e. neat but not gaudy], always so despising the outward adorning of plaiting of the hair and of wearing of gold, that in the whole manner of life she may be compared to Hippolyta rather than to Phœdra."

This sounds like a satire on the gorgeous Elizabeth of later years.

SUNSHINE AND STORM.

Elizabeth at Hatfield by the Lea, nineteen miles from the din and Court of London, in her simple dress of Puritanic severity, plodding quietly through the somewhat dreary tasks of Roger Ascham, and smiling upon him as if Greek were all to her and he the best and dearest creature in the world, estranged from her brother and her sister, —that is a picture of pathetic loneliness, but not without a tint of humour. When would the day arrive on which this obscured star, this true daughter of the majestic Henry, should emerge from the weary chrysalis gloom of Hatfield? One day a message, like a gleam of sunshine, came from her weakly brother with whom she had romped before all this trouble. He wished for her portrait, which was accordingly despatched with an infinitely more charming letter. "The face," said the student of Demosthenes, "I grant I might well blush to offer, but the mind I shall never be ashamed to present. For though from the grace of the picture the colours may fade by time, may give by weather, may be spotted by chance; yet the other, nor time with her swift wings shall overtake, nor the misty clouds with their lowerings may darken, nor chance with her slippery foot may overthrow."

Elizabeth, it is plain, was watching with keen interest the storm that lowered in the heavens and was soon to break mercilessly on the head of Somerset. Meanwhile she was blessed with the gift of Hatfield, where she had spent those many days of silent outlook and contemplation. At last, after two years of exile, she rode through London to St. James's Palace, with "a great company of ladies, lords, knights, and gentlemen;" and two days later she received a ceremonious welcome at the Court (March 1551). Why all this show of deep regard under the new administration of the Earl of Warwick (Northumberland)? Was it only another trap? Could she have foreseen that in two years a son of Northumberland would be married to the gentle and accomplished Lady Jane Grey; that in a month from that event Lady Jane would be proclaimed as Queen, and in other seven months perish as a traitor on the scaffold, the vision would have darkened with a black pall the brightness of that day's pomp. By-and-by, when she has passed through yet deeper gloom, we shall find that Elizabeth, like other strong natures, had a firm faith in "Fortune." As yet, perhaps, this religion had not taken possession of her soul; but may we not be allowed to guess that the prophetic belief of Catharine Parr had never died out of her memory?

Once more she saw the tables turned against her sister: she, in her youthful bloom, witnessed the fascination that her tall figure and queenly bearing, her lovely eyes, and, not least, her small, elegant, coquettish hand had upon the lords of Edward's Court; and how meagre and ungraceful a welcome had been vouchsafed to her grave sister, over whose once fair, pure face the sorrows of neglect had now wrought emaciation and wrinkles, and who, with her suite, came to a Protestant Court with rosaries and crosses, flaunting her hatred of the new faith. But Elizabeth was the pink of perfection; her solid learning and her sober garb and ways awakened in the heart of Edward, now a lad of fourteen, all the love that had slumbered since their simple childhood; he addressed her as his "sweet sister Temperance." The Reformed party looked up to the daughter of Anne Boleyn with respect, and Lady Jane Grey herself pointed to her as a model of propriety, declining to wear some apparel of cloth of gold and velvet sent by the Princess Mary; for, said she, "my Lady Elizabeth followeth God's Word." It will appear curious that the rich attire and precious jewels bequeathed by King Henry were only once looked at by her until the political necessities of Mary's reign compelled her to wear them; that "her maidenly apparel which she used in King Edward's time made the noblemen's wives ashamed to be dressed and painted like peacocks, being more moved with her most virtuous example than all that ever Paul or Peter wrote touching that matter;" and that when Mary of Guise, mother of Mary, Queen of Scots, set all the ladies of the Court to curl and double curl in French style, she alone "altered nothing, but kept her old maidenly shamefacedness." If we follow her from this display of October 1551 to her retreat at Hatfield, we shall find the same strict humility,—a slender retinue, mere trifling sums spent on nothing, a few serious books, a very little charity, and a balance to her credit at the end of the year.

The cards played by Northumberland on the pallet of the dying Prince were soon revealed. Elizabeth was to have been disposed of somehow, perhaps packed off to Denmark as wife of Christian III., while Edward signed away to this upstart duke's daughter-in-law, Lady Jane Grey, the crown which Henry VIII. had bequeathed to his own daughters. When all was over with the Prince, they received an invitation in his name, but Elizabeth, either warned or wary, did not move from her retreat in Herts.

FROM PURITAN TO CATHOLIC.

It was everything to Elizabeth that she should stand by her father's will and appear as a firm supporter of kingly authority. The proposal of the Duke of Northumberland, after the proclamation of Lady Jane, that she should resign her title for a pension, she rejected with boldness and prudence, on the ground that she had no claim until the claim of Mary was dealt with. She made no movement whatever; she was, or pretended to be, ill, until the cause of Mary had proved victorious and the people had called that princess to the throne with an almost frantic enthusiasm. When London streets were illumined with bonfires, and the people sang and shouted and banqueted and tossed their caps on Mary's proclamation, then did this wise sister move down to London at the head of five hundred horsemen clad in the colours of the Queen.

In the triumph of the hour Mary received her warmly; but in many hearts the sight of the two sisters as they rode together through the city—the one prematurely worn, the other in the freshness of maidenhood, looking like an embodied memory of her great father—must have awakened a sigh of regret that the crown had not fallen on the younger brow. Amid all the pomp she loved so well, Elizabeth must have known that a dark arch lay before her, that Mary's narrow creed was certainly laden with disaster. The first note of quarrel sounded from the tomb of Edward, when Elizabeth refused to accompany her sister to a requiem mass in the Tower. The divorce of Catharine of Arragon was yet unrevoked, the insults and injuries of Anne Boleyn were yet unavenged; and the Queen must have known that the name of her sister, whose deep and far-seeing craft she little dreamed of, was not only the watchword of the great Protestant party but far more popular than her own. With an honest simplicity Mary set herself heroically to the conversion of her sister. After a wasted month of rigorous example she determined that Elizabeth must become a Catholic or leave the Court. Elizabeth knew how to yield (as we shall afterwards observe in her dealings with the Parliament), and, with affected simplicity, shed tears of love in ample profusion at her sister's feet, declaring that she knew no creed but that in which she had been strictly trained. The result, as may be guessed, was her conversion. Mary, at least, believed her.

In the ceremonies of the coronation Elizabeth took rank next to the Queen, dressed in a robe of crimson velvet, and sitting in a chariot drawn by six horses and covered with cloth of silver. Her meekness, however, stopped short at the passing of an Act of Parliament repealing the divorce of Catharine of Arragon; she stormed, and for days declined to see the Queen. If simple Mary, under the influence of the wily Imperial ambassador, thought of depriving Elizabeth of her right of succession to the throne, withheld all tokens of affection, and allowed none of the Court ladies to visit her without permission, the Princess appeared serene and joyful amid the adoration of the gallant youths who thronged the Court.

Perhaps she learned of the dark suggestion instilled into Mary's mind that she ought, for the Queen and Church's sake, to be committed to the Tower, and it was with a relieved heart that she made her way with a brilliant guard of honour towards Ashridge, on the 6th of December, 1553, with a gift of Mary's richest jewels, in return for her own assurance that her belief in the old religion was conscientious. On arriving at the mansion where her love had been awakened six years before by the visit of the Admiral, she wrote, with the seeming earnestness of a true Catholic, for crosses and other appointments for her chapel. Mary complied with gladness; but deep at the bottom of her soul there rankled the memory of her mother's wrong, and the dread fear that the daughter of Anne Boleyn would be the cause of further mischief.

SENT TO THE TOWER.

There were rumours of conspiracy afloat, the centre, if not the head, of these being the handsome Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devon, a scion of the White Rose. Of the twenty-six years of his life, fourteen had been spent in the Tower. Restored by Mary to the honours of his father, whom Henry VIII. had sent to the scaffold, he at once became a popular favourite, and even aspired to the hand of the Queen. Around him the plotters gathered for Mary's overthrow. First of all were the Protestants, who relied upon his marriage with the daughter of Anne Boleyn, goaded into revolt by the revival of Popery; there were the defeated supporters of Lady Jane, ready, if other course were not open, to strike for Elizabeth; there was a vast body of pure patriots, determined to prevent a foreigner like Philip of Spain from marrying their Queen and degrading England to the position of an outlying fief of his empire; and behind all these was concealed the sovereign of France, jealous of any accession of power to his great continental rival. Elizabeth could not be unaware of this deep dissatisfaction. Bishop Gardiner, who had almost a paternal affection for Courtenay, obtained from the "young fool" a confession of something like a plot, and that a marriage to Elizabeth had been suggested. He would sooner return to the Tower, boasted Courtenay, than ally himself to her. The conspirators were forced into action in January. On the 25th of that month Sir Thomas Wyatt, the most conspicuous figure of the insurrection, sent advice to Elizabeth to retire from Ashridge to Donnington Castle, so as to be at a greater distance from London and from peril; so did Sir James Croft. The Queen heard of this, and invited her to court, with the promise of a hearty welcome. The Princess expressed her horror at the conspiracy, but remained at Ashridge on the plea of illness. She fortified and garrisoned the house. The defeat of Wyatt was followed by his execution on the 11th of April.

Whatever has been said as to the cruelty of Elizabeth's arrest, and although Mary's "confessor," the Imperial ambassador, had shown a deadly spleen against that same princess for the safety of the Faith, Elizabeth's seizure was perfectly justifiable on the evidence in the possession of the Government. With due care, attended by physicians from the Queen, the Princess was conducted from her country residence, a little over thirty miles from London, learning by the way the terrible news of the execution of the noble and innocent companion of her childhood, Lady Jane Grey. She was ill indeed; she was seized with fainting fits, and only after four days did she reach Highgate (15th February, 1554). Her state of absolute exhaustion rendered her incapable of further progress for a week, and during that period of dreadful suspense wild reports were spread: by some that she was suffering from poison; by others that she bore with her the same shameful secret as when a girl of fourteen she had accepted the carresses of Seymour. But the haughty, self-reliant Tudor was mistress of herself again, and as she came down in her open litter from the heights of Highgate towards the city, she showed no trace of fear: while the crowds that pressed around her gazed in silence or with sighs and tears on her pale, determined face and the white dress that clothed her as a symbol of her innocence. She was imprisoned in the Palace of Whitehall.

Wyatt confessed that the aim of the conspiracy had been to place Elizabeth on the throne and save England from a hateful connection with Spain. It was decided by the Council that she should be committed to the Tower. She might well be struck with horror at the prospect of entering the theatre of so many tragedies, where her own mother's head had fallen. Her room at Whitehall, and the garlens beneath were watched by troops. She declared her innocence; she demanded of her jailers if they knew she was the daughter of a king. On the morning of the 17th of March (Saturday) the barge was waiting for her. She beseeched the two earls who came with this information only to stay till the next tide; but she was told that neither time nor tide allowed of this. Then she begged permission to write but six lines to her sister: and, in a tender moment, the Earl of Sussex bent upon his knee and swore that he would dare to carry her message and return with an answer. Firmly and clearly she wrote in her best style of penmanship, elaborately decorating the signature with all her customary flourishes. Even at that moment—perhaps the most agitated of her whole eventful history—she showed the utmost coolness and wariness. She had covered with writing the first page of a sheet of paper and a small portion of the second, at the bottom of which was placed her signature. Observing, with the instinct of genius, that the vacant space might be used for a fatal forgery, she filled it with vertical and horizontal strokes, all drawn with perfect firmness.

A vain appeal. On Sunday morning she was conducted to the drowled Tower. She was compelled to land at the Traitor's Gate: and as the Marquis of Winchester sternly said, "You have no choice," and offered his cloak to protect her from the rain, "she dashed it from her with a good dash." Stepping on the stairs,—the self-same as her mother's foot had once touched,—she exclaimed, "Here landeth as true a subject, being a prisoner, as ever landed at these stairs. Before Thee, O God, I speak it, having no other friend but Thee alone!" "If it were so, it was the better for her," said the mocking Winchester. The warders knelt and said, "God preserve your Grace!" At the threshold of the Traitor's Gate she sat down upon a wet stone. "Better sit here," said she to the Lieutenant of the Tower, "than in a worse place; for God knoweth, not I, whither you will bring me." At this her usher, who had been permitted to attend her, was constrained to weep, and the Princess rebuked him for taking away her courage instead of acting as her supporter. She entered the prison; the gloomy doors were locked and bolted; and then, without a tear, surrounded by a few domestics, the heroic Tudor prayed for grace to build her house upon the rock.

For two months the Tower was her "living tomb." For several weeks she was strictly confined to her room, and no stone was left unturned to convict her; for it was insisted that the Faith would have no peace so long as she remained alive. Outside, pamphlets and various eccentric means of attack upon the Queen were read and witnessed in the city; within the Tower her marvellous fascination—"the spirit of a thousand devils," was an expression used in later years—turned her foes into worshippers. In spite of a rigorous examination by members of the Council,—in spite of the equivocal speech of Wyatt on the scaffold, which merely declared her innocent of being "privy of my rising or commotion before I began,"—in spite of the (alleged) torture of one of her domestics,—in spite of the Imperial rancour, Elizabeth was not condemned. The popular voice was on her side. Her treatment all through was harsh in the extreme; and only after she had complained of the effect of the confinement on her health, and a conviction was felt to be legally impossible, was she permitted to take exercise in the Queen's apartments, under strict guard and with the windows closed. A little boy of three or four years of age was accustomed to bring flowers to the prisoners, but one day he was prevented from giving any to the beautiful princess. On the following day the child came again, and whispered through a hole in the door, "Mistress, I can bring you no more flowers now." She only smiled. The Constable, suspecting a correspondence with Courtenay, gave orders that the "crafty knave" should appear no more in the precincts of the Tower. At last the heart of Mary softened towards her "little sister," and on the 19th of May the hope of England passed forth through the gloomy portals of the Tower.

PRISONER AT WOODSTOCK.

Elizabeth had made up her mind for death, and stated, in after years, that during her confinement she had but one request to make—that she should be executed not by the axe but by the sword. It is no wonder that when she saw a hundred men in front of the prison one May morning, she demanded to know whether "Lady Jane's scaffold were removed." She was informed that she was soon to be released. "Her safety," says Professor Wiesener, "was in a great measure due to a special feature of the English character, a scrupulous regard for the form and letter of the law, as well as to her prudence, her popularity, and Gardiner's prepossession in favour of Courtenay."

Her journey had all the aspect of a triumph.

QUEEN ELIZABETH.

As she passed up the Thames, Mary was shocked to hear the boom of three cannon shots fired from the Steel-yard ; the lads of Eton came forth to greet "the Lady Elizabeth ;" and all the way from London to Woodstock (near Oxford) crowds welcomed her with tears and prayers, threw cakes and nosegays into her litter, and shouted, "God save your Grace !" At the manor she was as much a prisoner as at the Tower ; she had only a few attendants, books and pens were forbidden, and her hands and face became swollen under the treatment she received. She was incessantly at war with Bedlingfield, her honest but stern guardian. At her own request she received permission from the Lords to have an English Bible ; and other books of a learned and innocuous character, subsequently granted, helped to wile away the weary months of her captivity, her classical studies and her bitter worrying of Bedlingfield being diversified by needlework, meditation, and prayer. At last determined by any "crooked way" to obtain release, she humbly conformed to the Catholic ritual by confessing before partaking of the Holy Communion, and ordered her chaplain to use only the Latin service. Having grievously complained to Bedlingfield, that her plight was more ignominious than that of the vilest prisoners in Newgate or the Tower, inasmuch as these could have their mind opened to the authorities (Mary having forbidden further correspondence after the receipt of one letter from Elizabeth), her guardian was moved to report her conversation to the Council.

She recovered her liberty from no feeling of justice or generosity, but as a matter of State policy. When it was supposed that the Queen was pregnant, the Spanish Government began to relent, hoping to win public favour by her release, and at the same time to secure her banishment from England by a marriage with the Duke of Savoy. When this scheme of Philip had utterly collapsed, partly through Elizabeth's "resolution to remain a maiden," he attempted to persuade her to accept a home in Flanders with the Queen of Hungary. The Catholic Philip failed to drive her into a honourable exile in the same way as the Protestant Northumberland had failed in the reign of Edward VI., not through any vow of virginity on the part of Elizabeth, but because of her immovable and proud determination to fix her own destiny and to abide by her claim to the crown of England. At last, when Mary was at Hampton Court awaiting her confinement, she sent for Elizabeth, with the view of offering a pardon, for she still clung to a belief in her sister's guilt. On the 25th of April Elizabeth departed from the cage of Woodstock, leaving behind her a memorial verse, cut with a diamond on a pane of glass, which sums up this wretched episode :—

"Much suspected by me,
Nothing proved can be,
Quoth Elizabeth, prisoner."

FREEDOM AT HATFIELD.

Although at Hampton Court, she was for some time virtually a prisoner, and the wily Gardiner urgently plied her to confess her guilt to the Queen, with the promise of forgiveness. With her old unbroken boldness she assured the crafty bigot that she would lie in prison all her life rather than acknowledge as true the accusation of disloyalty. Late one night, about the end of May (1555), she was summoned to the presence of the Queen. Was it to end in death at last ? Not so. Before her sister she again declared her innocence ; and the Queen dismissed her kindly, adding in an undertone the words, "God knoweth."

The insane persecution of the martyrs that took place during her residence at Hampton Court, and the minor conspiracies that arose only to be speedily suppressed, rendered the palace far from being a pleasant abode. Owing to the flood of ladies who streamed to visit the Queen, Elizabeth was permitted to remove to Outlands, four miles distant. In the early autumn, while with the Queen at Greenwich, the Princess, now twenty-two years of age, was pressed to negotiate a marriage with Philip's son, Don Carlos, a lad of ten ; but she talked off the danger with her usual skill, which served her so frequently and to such splendid purpose, after her accession to the throne. Having acquitted herself as an excellent Catholic, she was permitted to retire to her own Hatfield, where once again she enjoyed the companionship of Ashley and Parry, and read the old Greek orators with Roger Ascham, who, like his royal pupil and the incorruptible Cecil, had professed himself a Catholic.

Even then the course of Elizabeth did not run smooth. In consequence of the conspiracy of Kingston in the interest of the "jolly liberal dame" (March 1556), Ashley and others of her domestics were sent to the Fleet ; and strong suspicion, perhaps justly, fell upon the Princess, whose residence was therefore filled with soldiers ; but Mary, instead of believing her guilty, presented her with a valuable diamond. When at Court in autumn she again incurred the royal displeasure by rejecting the proposal of marriage to the Duke of Savoy; she was driven away to Hatfield, and it was once more mooted that she should be declared illegitimate. Under this fresh trouble, and her sister's insults, she was attacked with illness. Her life was almost despaired of. Thus hunted to the verge of the grave she determined on fleeing to the Continent; but the French Ambassador succeeded in dissuading her from this suicidal course.

The declaration of war with France, ending in the loss of Calais, at last brought peace and mirth to Hatfield, and the broken-hearted Queen decided that Elizabeth should be her heir. It is pleasant at the evening of Mary's pitiable life, and the dawn of her sister's glory, to learn of their friendship and happy interviews. Life went merrily at Hatfield in these last months of Mary's reign. Elizabeth had even the pleasure of refusing the hand of Eric, King of Sweden, with Mary's own permission, and of corresponding with Philip in affectionate terms. Her troubles as a princess ended, her cares as a queen began, when her courageous and honest but misguided sister passed away from earth, at daybreak on the 17th of November, 1558.

ACCESSION TO THE THRONE.

The first news of Mary's death was received at Hatfield with a suspicion that one more trap was planted for her, and she despatched a trusted counsellor to St. James's Palace, to obtain proof from one of the Court ladies in the shape of a ring that the deceased Queen had always worn since her marriage. Meanwhile a deputation from the Council arrived at Hatfield. She shed no tears for Mary, but with a deep sigh fell on her knees beneath a tree in the open park, exclaiming, "A Domino factum est istud, et mirabile oculis nostris" (It is the Lord's doing, etc.)

That day there dawned a new England—England peaceful, industrious, prosperous, content, doubly patriotic, yet throwing her eyes across the world; England in the plenitude of her will, her intellect, and her conscience, and in the strength of her wooden walls: England that is "merry England," but whose mirth is only a cheerful undernote in the serious Psalm of Life. And the lady who comes like Aurora—no darling of modern romance like Mary Queen of Scots, over whom men quarrel now, and whom they admire as warmly as when the red wine may have shone through her transparent neck—has come to help England with the meed of her self-control born of many years of persecution, sorrow, and thought. With all her faults, she was worthy of the most poetic romance that England has produced; our great housekeeper and heroine, saving, crafty, and strong, was the "Faerie Queene" of Edmund Spenser.

She meant to take up England where her father had left it, to erect the love of country above the passion of creeds. Henry had embodied in himself the spirit of moderation and compromise; and, like him, his second daughter, heedless and contemptuous of all forms of religion, set about the construction of a broad, solid, independent England, steering a middle and seemingly hesitating course between Catholics and Calvinists, holding them back from each other's throats until material comfort and prosperity had taught them to subordinate religious passions to a deeper feeling—that of reverence for the commonwealth of England. Her brother's and her sister's reigns were the governments of "doctrinaires," of "religious theorists;" that of Mary being reactionary and un-English, simply throwing the country beneath the heel of a foreign Power, the Pope of Rome. The two extremes had equally failed. The country was ripe for guidance by a spirit like Elizabeth's. Men hoped that the eleven years of plunder, misrule, bigotry, poverty, and financial strain that had intervened since Henry's death were only a passing nightmare; and of Queen Bess they sought no more than that she should step into the shoes of "bluff King Hal."

From her, we who have followed her career from childhood shall not look for what is noblest; we know that "the child is father to the man." The Elizabeth who charmed Catharine Parr and yet filled her heart with sorrow, who when her first lover perished on the scaffold concealed her feelings with a gibe, who filled the soul of Roger Ascham with delight, who revelled in the carnival of Hatfield, who was sober Puritan and earnest Catholic by turns, who in the most tragic moment of her life suspected a possible forgery, who defied by her tenacity and dissimulation the detection of her secrets, who at the tenderest stage of life bore her father's death with philosophic calm—we shall find her the same when Queen of England. Let it be said that Elizabeth had only her self-interest in view, the fact remains that this was fortunately identical with the interest of the country, and she was so completely successful that the devotion paid to her was a close approach to hero-worship.

THE CORONATION.

Within three days of Mary's death she had already sounded the keynote of her policy, by gathering several statesmen to her council-board whose opinions were utterly diverse from those which had misguided her sister's reign. Yet it was apparent that she did not wish to break rudely and offensively with the past, for men like the Marquis of Winchester, who had shown so little grace to her on the steps of the Tower, were still retained; and that nobleman, a loyal supporter of the Tudors, continued in the office of Treasurer until his death. But these were not to be her directors and inmost confidants. It was William Cecil who had prepared her for action in the crisis: it was he who had sketched the proclamation within an hour from Mary's death; and it was to him she addressed these words at Hatfield on the Sunday after that event, in presence of the Privy Council: "This judgment I have of you, that you will not be corrupted by any manner of gifts, and that you will be faithful to the State; and that without respect of my private will, you will give me that counsel that you think best." Another of the statesmen who brought the fresh blood of the coming time was Sir Nicholas Bacon, father of a still more distinguished son, who became the herald of modern experimental science, and next to Shakspeare was the greatest child of the Elizabethan reign. Other statesmen of great ability came later, such as Walsingham; but to Cecil above all England and Elizabeth owed largely the foundation of firm peace and solid prosperity,—a man who may have been too prosaic in his old age for young courtiers and imaginative eagles like Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, but who deserves to be for ever remembered as the—

"Right noble lord, whose careful breast
To menage of most grave affairs is bent,
And on whose mighty shoulders most doth rest
The burden of this kingdom's government."

Elizabeth has been lauded for her knowledge of human nature; and this was very specially and very fortunately exhibited in the selection of men so shrewd and moderate as Cecil and Bacon and so astute as Walsingham for the control of the destinies of England.

Previous to the coronation, Elizabeth made her first public departure from the policy of Mary by authorizing the use of the English Liturgy, and forbidding the elevation of the host; but at the same time, anxious that the Catholic party should not feel uneasy, nor the Calvinists exult too loudly and offensively over this comparatively trifling change, and that religious tumults should not arise to mar the first dawn of her reign, she prohibited the clergy from preaching on controverted topics, and the performance of plays or interludes till after Hallowmas. When her accession was announced to the Pope, he refused to acknowledge her, declaring that she was illegitimate and England a fief of the Holy See; but in the meantime the English Catholics remained in peaceful submission to their sovereign.

The fascinating manners of Elizabeth, as displayed in the processions before and at the coronation, acted powerfully on the feelings of the people. As she passed from the Charterhouse to the Tower on the 28th of November, riding on a palfrey, and clothed in a riding-dress of purple velvet, the hearts of the citizens of London were conquered by the graceful notice paid to their enthusiasm, and her little impromptu speeches were as irresistible as the arrows of Cupid. And when she reached the terrible fortress of so many ghastly memories, of one fierce memory in her own short life, she struck a deadly blow at the irritating policy of her two predecessors—a blow that must have echoed widely, and deepened the dawning confidence of a nation a-weary for rest and pining for prosperity—when, with all her majestic queenliness, she said: "Some have fallen from being princes of this land to be prisoners in this place; I am raised from being prisoner in this place to be prince of this land. That dejection was a work of God's justice; this advancement is a work of His mercy." Previous to her coronation, she also adroitly felt the pulse of the nation in another matter, by seceding at Christmas from the celebration of the mass, leaving the chapel with her ladies just as it began,—an action which she could readily have attributed to sickness, had it provoked any strong expression of complaint throughout the country.

The procession from the Tower to Westminster on the day previous to the coronation, most gorgeous in itself, acquired a charm of its own from the peculiar and intimate zest of the fascinating Queen. In spite of Roger Ascham's praise of her simplicity of taste, it is no secret that her fondness for display and glaring colours was a special weakness; and apart from her own greediness for adoration, she delighted in seeing her subjects spend their holidays in mirth, well aware that by this simple remedy a great deal of popular discontent would be drawn off. As she left the Tower, she had still one sentence to utter in condemnation of the horrors of the uncompromising Government from which she and thousands more had suffered, and which had driven away the commerce of the country: with upraised eyes she expressed her gratitude to Heaven for delivering her "out of the den, from the cruelty of the raging lions." Seated in a sumptuous chariot, she rode in glee through the streets amid the noisy cheers of thousands, and under the triumphal arches, one of which bore upon it the words, "Deborah, the judge and restorer of the house of Israel." When an old man shouted, "I remember King Henry the Eighth," her face is said to have brightened with gladness, as became a "natural child;" in Cheapside she accepted from the Corporation an English Bible, kissing it, and promising to read it diligently; and with a kindly word she bade farewell to the city, in answer to a song chanted in her honour at Temple Bar by a group of sweet-voiced children. Two other incidents of this journey of a characteristic nature must be mentioned,—that she received a splendid and well-filled purse from the city companies "marvellous pithily;" and that "a branch of rosemary, given her Grace with a supplication by a poor woman about Fleet Bridge, was seen in her chariot till her Grace came to Westminster."

ELIZABETH AS A STATESMAN.

Shocking though the fact may seem to many, it was her attachment of religious feeling that rendered the Queen so fortunate in carrying forward the work of compromise between the two parties of the country. There is no lack of proof as to her absolute irreverence; she complained to her ladies of the smell of the oil used at the coronation; and when the Protestants of Holland in her riper years offered her the sovereignty of their country, so far was she from understanding their scruples against attending mass, and rebelling on this ground against Spain—it was only a form to her—that, posing herself theatrically in a white dress, she exclaimed, "What! if I were to begin to act some scene in a dress like this, should you regard it as a crime?" She stood as an embodiment of pure intellect above all parties, "the very type of reason untouched by imagination or passion." The massacre of St. Bartholomew thrilled all England with indignation, but failed to move the heart of the Maiden Queen. Her only religion was the prosperity of England.

"Her Majesty's desire," said her Address to her first Parliament, "was to secure and unite the realm in one uniform order, to the honour and glory of God, and to general tranquillity;" she required the Commons to "eschew contumelious and opprobrious words, as heretic, schismatic, and Papist, as . . . enemies to concord and unity, the very marks which they were now to shoot at;" she would never, from wanton adherence to her own fantasy, give occasion for such "tumults and stirs . . . as had risen of late days," or interfere, through her private affection, with the quarrels of foreign princes, "to the impoverishment of her realm;" in fine, "nothing, no worldly thing under the sun, was so dear as the love and good-will of her subjects." This is what we have been accustomed of late years to hear called the policy of "masterly inactivity."

This first Parliament passed the Supremacy Bill and the Act of Uniformity. Philip of Spain, through his ambassador, attempted to alarm her into opposition to the proposed religious changes, declaring that such a course was simply "rushing to perdition;" but the Queen boldly replied that she would not permit the money of her people to be carried out of the realm to the Pope; and while declining to adopt the title of "Head of the Church" won and worn by the illustrious father in whose footsteps she intended to follow, she threw back the impertinence of the Spanish ambassador with the petulant remark, that "she hoped to be saved as well as the Bishop of Rome."

She was the last of the Tudors. Her single life lay between the freedom of England and its subjection to France, for next to her stood Mary Stuart, the wife of the Dauphin. On the other hand was Spain, the richest and mightiest nation of the world, eager to attain universal dominion and impose a universal Church, and already Philip had offered her his hand in marriage. The safety of England lay in the jealousy of those two Powers; but at the same time English politicians were alive to the dangers that would spring up if Elizabeth were to die without issue. On this one subject, and on that of settling the succession, she differed from her advisers, and when a deputation from the first Parliament waited upon her with a view to obtaining her consent to marriage, no satisfactory reply was furnished, but merely the statement that for her it would be enough that "a marble stone should declare that a queen, having reigned such a time, lived and died a virgin." It is not to be credited for a moment that she had any aversion from marriage in itself, but the question of the succession was the card she retained in her own hand to play against the cabinets of Europe. On all sides there were suitors: the offer of a Spanish alliance by marriage with the Archduke of Austria, whom Cecil declared to be a fool although his head was as big as the Earl of Bedford's: from France in later years came the dwarfish Duke of Anjou, Elizabeth's "Frog," with a gigantic nose and a croaking voice, whom she tempted so far as to place a kiss upon his lips, and a ring upon his finger; Scotland was eager for her marriage with the Earl of Arran and the union of the two countries, but she spoke of him as a "mad fool;" there was Eric of Sweden, who, unfortunately, courted by proxy, and after forwarding a right royal gift and promising his early appearance, deemed it best to remain at home; in England the Earl of Arundel and Sir William Pickering were mentioned. There was one man, however, whom she really loved, but with whom marriage was "impossible"—Sir Robert Dudley, second son of the Duke of Northumberland, and, as malevolent gossipers asserted, the great-grandson of a carpenter. In October 1562, the Queen was seized with small-pox at Hampton Court. The physicians informed Cecil of her dangerous condition, and that she had probably but a few days to live. The Council were hastily summoned to the scene. On the evening of the 16th she became speechless, and the trembling statesmen deliberated on the hopeless subject of the succession far into the night, deciding that the question should be settled by the Crown lawyers and the judges. The Queen, herself conceiving that death was near, began to speak of Dudley, asserting the innocence of their relations, confessing that she had long loved him dearly, and praying the Council to appoint him Protector of the realm after her death. Fortunately for England, Elizabeth rapidly recovered from her malady; but no pressure of Parliament was ever able to make her sacrifice her "maidenly shamefacedness."

It belongs to history rather than to biography to follow the intricate windings of European diplomacy during her reign, although the individuality of the Maiden Queen exerted an incalculable force in guiding England safely through the quicksands. We can now look back with calm judgment, and however indisposed we may be to justify the means by which the independence and prosperity of England were secured, however ridiculous and morally contemptible may appear to us the diplomatic flirtations and the lying of Elizabeth (Green declares she was "without a peer in Christendom"), we may yet join in the chorus of past centuries in honouring her as the "Maiden Queen," because she chose for England's sake to lead a lonely life as the last of the proud Tudor dynasty, and to leave her crown and her success to the son of her mortal enemy, Mary, Queen of Scots. Her policy, if not a noble, was a simple one, to be queen of a strong, independent, and loyal England, and her "crooked ways" sink into oblivion beneath her sacrifice and heroism. Her autocratic instincts sometimes clashed with the decisions of Parliament, and she met the opposition of the bolder members by imprisonment; but when the Commons had gained sufficient courage to assert their rights and the justice of their Bills,—for example, in the maintenance of freedom of speech and the abolition of the monopolies she had lavished on her favourites,—Elizabeth in the end bowed to them with perfect grace and gratitude, acknowledging that she had no object in life beyond the happiness of her people. Great credit falls to her for the restoration of a pure coinage, and a document still exists, prepared by her to recommend its advantages to the consideration of the country.

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

The unhappy fate of Mary, Queen of Scots, has thrown a dark shade over the character of her English rival. But again we must measure acts not by sentiment but by considerations of justice and political necessity. Mary was the bitterest foe of English independence. Relying on the authority of a foreign Power, the Pope of Rome, she refused to acknowledge the right of Elizabeth to the English throne. A Catholic ruler in Scotland, especially under such conditions, was dangerous to the safety of the English commonwealth,—extremely dangerous when that sovereign possessed a fascination, ability, and unscrupulousness so great as Mary's. We know the madness of Elizabeth's jealousy and hatred of the Scottish queen, and that Mary while confined in England had taunted her with abominable charges beyond all forgiveness. The sting of her loneliness was probably never felt so deeply by the Maiden Queen, as when a minister whispered one night into her ear at Greenwich that her sister of Scotland was favoured with a man-child. The ladies stopped in their dance to wonder at the spectacle of her, who was gay and lively but a minute before, sitting "with her hand on her cheek." She exclaimed to some of her attendants "that the Queen of Scots was mother of a fair son, while she was but a barren stock." Melville relates a characteristic anecdote, that when she received him on the following morning, she met him with a beaming face and clad in radiant apparel, making "a merry volt" and declaring "the joyful news...

When Mary's passion for the murderer of her husband had driven her from the battlefield to seek a refuge in the kingdom of Elizabeth, it was absurd to expect that the Queen would restore her to the Scottish throne, as she demanded, so long at least as she maintained her right to the English crown. The wisdom of retaining her as a prisoner is more than questionable, as she became the object of Catholic and other than Catholic sympathy, and the fountain of several plots, e.g., of the abortive Holy War of the Earls of Westmoreland and Northumberland, which was followed by a ruthless slaughter of the northern Catholics (1569), and of the slender rebellion of Daere in the same year; of the conspiracy of the first of English nobles, the Duke of Norfolk, who aimed at Mary's hand and perished on the scaffold (1572); of the conspiracy of Throgmorton (1584), in consequence of which the Spanish ambassador was expelled from England; and finally of the Babington Plot (1586), which brought Mary to the scaffold. The warrant for her execution was brought by Secretary Davison, and after many delays received the royal signature. When the head of Mary had fallen at Fotheringay, the same castle where Edward Courtenay had been confined while Elizabeth had suffered the tortures of her Woodstock cage, the Queen sent Davison to the Tower, either from real anger at the pressure which had forced the signature from her unwilling hand, or from a desire, as is commonly believed, to make it appear to the world that she had not voluntarily consented to the unamiable and unpopular execution. Had she done well for the peace of England? So long before as 1576 she had suspected the incorruptible Cecil—her own better conscience, whom she often drove from her in tears—of plotting in the interest of Mary, and he had suffered "very sharp reproofs;" now that Mary was sacrificed, she attacked him for her murder in such bitter terms that he gave himself up for lost, and offered to resign his office. One fact must be mentioned with regard to the many attempts to assassinate Elizabeth, that she herself had no fear, so strong was her belief in what she called her "fortune."

THE ARMADA.

The Catholic world was thrown into consternation by the fate of the Scottish Queen. During her imprisonment the Pope had released English Catholics from their allegiance to Elizabeth by a "Bull of Deposition" (1570); the same Power had abetted the missions of the Jesuits, and lavished money for a blow at English rule in Ireland. Spain had deemed herself the champion of Catholicism; but what excuse had she, now that Mary was dead, for directing her forces against England? Could it be anything beyond political aggression? English seamen, like the Puritan Drake of Plymouth, were sweeping the wealth of the Indies by piratical expeditions; and instead of offering redress, the Queen of England accepted a costly present—always an irresistible temptation to her—from the adventurer, and in the manner of a studied insult elevated the daring mariner to the honour of knighthood. Hence it came that Philip, erst the wooer of Elizabeth, sent forth "the most fortunate and invincible Armada" to conquer England, in May 1588. The story of its disaster is well known; how the winds were "weary with wafting the ships, and the ocean groaning under their weight," as they sailed exultingly up the Channel like a crescent moon across the sky; how Drake insisted on playing out a game at bowls when they were in sight at Plymouth; how England's "navy of oak with an admiral of osier" stung the sluggish fleet, while the storms completed the ruin of the Armada and of Spain, and made England the mistress of the seas. But no jot of the triumph rightly belongs to Elizabeth; her parsimony starved the sailors, and she was only driven to grant meagre funds when Admiral Howard exclaimed, "For the love of Jesus Christ, Madam, awake and see the villainous treason round about you!" She made a stirring speech to the thousands of her "loving people" who had assembled under Leicester at Tilbury for the defence on land; but when the country had been saved by the private means and determined action of men like Drake and Howard, the captious and niggardly woman boggled over the expenditure and called them to account; while she rode to Tilbury and lauded her petty favourite as the saviour of England.

THE ELIZABETHAN COURT.

In her court and in her many progresses, the vanity, voluptuousness, selfishness, and despotism of her nature were only too apparent. She neglected her toiling statesmen, and piled her favours on the butterflies of the Court. She showed off her accomplishments to the pawky Scottish envoy, and greedily swallowed the compliment that she danced more "high and disposedly" than his royal mistress. She was the owner of three thousand dresses, eighty wigs, and chains and jewels without number. She accepted New Year's Gifts alike from dukes and dustmen. It was a common thing to see the Queen in gaudy attire floating, like Cleopatra, down the Thames in a richly-draped barge, with many others in its train, or borne on a litter by the greatest nobles of the realm, or riding from mansion to mansion at the head of a large body of "gentlemen pensioners," everywhere receiving the most brilliant and flattering entertainment, such as the famous display at Kenilworth, which savoured more of the dreams of the "Arabian Nights" than of the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. Boxing the ears of her maids or of her favourites, banishing them from her court in a storm of wrath when they presumed to marry without her permission—and she was constantly discovering to her deep vexation that the appearance of personal affection assumed by her lovers was after all merely devotion to her as a sovereign not as a woman.—these are venial sins in comparison with the meanness which led her, on the death of Leicester, to dry her tears and order the seizure of his goods in payment of money she had lent him, or the heartlessness with which she signed in firm hand the warrant for the execution of the gallant Essex, and played the virginals on the morning of his execution.

After all,—excluding her habits of profane swearing, of lying, and of scandal-raising levity, which were quite as undignified as her custom of addressing Burghley as her "spirit," Leicester as her "bear" and "sweet Robin," and Hatton (whom she fancied for his fine dancing) as her "sheep,"—much of her reckless and open flirtation and egregious love of admiration by men is to be explained and forgiven in view of the fact, that in the terrible loneliness of her nature she felt an intense longing for deep personal attachment. And while this courtly splendour served to bring around her the fervent support of the noblest families, we must not ignore that at the root of the foolish gallantry and flattery paid to her there lay a deep national respect; for, as Professor Gardiner has expressed it in his recent "Introduction to English History," "the homage, absurd as it came to be, which was paid to the imaginary beauties of the royal person was in the main only an expression of the consciousness that peace and justice, the punishment of wickedness and vice, and the maintenance of good order and virtue, came primarily from the Queen, and secondarily from the Church."

HER LAST DAYS.

The picture drawn by Mr. Green of the closing days of "Good Queen Bess" is so succinct, yet

"No outer triumph could break the gloom which gathered round the dying Queen. Lonely as she had always been, her loneliness deepened as she drew towards the grave. The statesmen and warriors of her earlier days had dropped one by one from her Council-board . . . As she passed along in her progresses, the people whose applause she courted remained cold and silent . . . Her own England—the England which had grown up around her, serious, moral, prosaic—shrunk coldly from this child of earth and the Renaissance, brilliant, fanciful, unscrupulous, irreligious. She had enjoyed life as the men of her day enjoyed it, and now that they were gone she clung to it with a fierce tenacity. She hunted, she danced, she jested with her young favourites, she coquetted and scolded and frolicked at sixty-seven [at sixty-nine she showed her foot to the Duke of Nevers, who gallantly kissed it!] as she had done at thirty . . . But death crept on. Her face became haggard, and her frame shrunk almost to a skeleton. At last her taste for finery disappeared, and she refused to change her dresses for a week together. A strange melancholy settled down on her: 'she held in her hand a golden cup which she often put to her lips: but in truth her heart seemed too full to need more filling.' Gradually her mind gave way. She lost her memory; the violence of her temper became unbearable; her very courage seemed to forsake her. She called for a sword to lie constantly beside her, and thrust it from time to time through the arras, as if she heard murderers stirring there. Food and rest became alike distasteful. She sat day and night propped up with pillows on a stool, without a word. If she once broke the silence, it was with a flash of her old queenliness. Cecil [son of the illustrious statesman] asserted that she 'must' go to bed, and the word roused her like 'a trumpet. 'Must!' she exclaimed; 'is must a word to be addressed to princes? Little man, little man! thy father, if he had been alive, durst not have used that word . . .' She rallied once more when the ministers beside her bel named Lord Beauchamp, the heir to the Suffolk claim, as a possible successor. 'I will have no rogue's son,' she cried hoarsely, 'in my seat.' But she gave no sign, save a motion of the head, at the mention of the King of Scots. She was, in fact, fast becoming insensible; and early the next morning [24th March, 1603], the life of Elizabeth—a life so great, so strange, and so lonely in its greatness—passed quietly away." M. #### HIS PARENTAGE AND BIRTH; STATE OF THE EMPIRE.

"I WILL find a bridegroom for your pretty ward," was the parting speech of the Tsar Alexis to his host and Prime Minister, Artemon

Matveief, one evening. The Tsar was a widower, in the prime of manhood, after twenty-one years of married life. His children then living were afflicted, the one with blindness and lack of mental power, the other with bad health. There was no heir to the throne, and so every one expected that the Tsar would marry a second time, but the bride could not be selected.

The Tsar was even better than his word. He found a husband for the pretty, modest, dark-eyed Natalia Naryshkin, the daughter of the old chamberlain, Cyril Naryshkin, of noble family, who had fallen in battle. The bridegroom upon whom the Tsar's choice fell was himself, Alexis Mikailovitch. It was on the occasion of the presentation of the eligible Russian maidens to the Tsar, that he commanded the attendance of the shapely, dark-eyed Natalia. The 11th of February, 1670, was the day fixed for the candidates for the Tsar's choice to assemble from town and country; and subsequently Natalia Naryshkin was elected Tsaritzza.

This choice caused a great deal of unpleasantness in courtly circles; and some anxiety was felt for the safety of the bride-elect, and for her family. The reigning favourites of the Tsar feared that her accession would imperil their position; and a repetition of former acts, by which Tsaritzas-elect had been removed by sudden death or banishment, was feared. The Tsar's first intended bride had been dressing for the first time in her royal robes, when her attendants, by twisting her hair-plaits very tightly, caused a slight fainting fit. This weakness was magnified to the Tsar by Court intrigue; the unfortunate Euphemia Vsevolozhsky was pronounced epileptic by physicians bribed for the opinion, and she with her relations were banished to Siberia.

The fate of the Princess Marie Dolgorouki had been even more tragic, for she had died suddenly on the eve of her marriage with Tsar Michael. Thus the fears expressed for Matveiev's ward were by no means unfounded, for the opposition to the match was very strong, and soon declared itself openly.

One morning, not long after the Tsar's choice had been publicly understood, two letters were secretly handed in, accusing the Prime Minister of sorcery, and attributing to him the crime of having, by means of enchantments, deceived the Tsar, and caused Natalia to find favour in his eyes by witchcraft. Such an accusation as this could not be permitted to pass uninvestigated. As a matter of course the marriage was delayed; and after a severe scrutiny, accompanied by the question by torture, the accused was pronounced guiltless. The royal wedding was then quickly celebrated; and thus, after a delay of nine months, Natalia became Tsaritzza of Russia, in the midst of much public festivity and rejoicing.

The Tsar Alexis was perfectly contented with, and really devoted to, his wife. He could not bear to be separated from her; and the Court pleasures went on apace, notwithstanding the simmering dissatisfaction of the Tsar's daughters and their connections. But the joy and delight of the Tsar culminated when, on the 30th of May, 1672 (9 June N.S.), a son, Peter, was born, who in after years became Peter the Great.

On the 20th of June, the christening of the future Tsar took place. Alexis, his father, had chosen the child's name, and he was accordingly christened upon the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul. We have before us details of the ceremony. The babe "was borne to the church in a cradle placed on wheels," while the path was sprinkled with holy water. The royal confessor performed the ceremony. Next day there was a most splendid entertainment, the speeding of the parting guests being accompanied by a present of sweetmeats, a fashion since adopted by our City Companies.

Another ceremony, and one peculiar to Russia, was then performed. This consisted in the measurement of the child. The youthful Peter, not yet great, was laid upon a board, and his height (or length) and width painted thereon. This birth-measure is still preserved in the church of the patron saint at St. Petersburg.

Peter is described as a very strong and healthy lad. His mind and body were both active, and developed rapidly. At six months old he was able to trot about, and was a great favourite, and beloved by his parents. His attendants included a special staff of dwarfs, and all kinds of toys were supplied in profusion: but miniature weapons were his chief delight, and he appears early to have displayed a taste for "soldiering." He was reared in the lap of luxury; but, as we shall see, he subsequently discarded it in favour of the simplicity of living shared by his subjects.

Peter has been termed a "savage," and perhaps in some respects, to Western minds, he appeared so. But let us glance at the education the child received, before we pass an opinion upon the man. We must remember that at the period of his boyhood, the education even of the upper classes was very limited indeed. Reading, a little history and geography, perhaps singing occasionally, and grammar or a smattering of arithmetic, were perhaps the only attainments possible, except amongst ecclesiastics. Now what learning had the future Tsar? Very little. Schools had been scarcely introduced in Russia, and pictures were the chief means by which the knowledge of the outer world was conveyed to the youth of that period, even to the scion of the house of Romanoff. Peter was so far fortunate that he was allowed a tutor, Nikita Zotof. By him the young prince was taught from his Book of Hours and Church Service, and writing, with singing, were included in his accomplishments.

In 1676, while Peter was still quite a child, the Tsar died suddenly, and Theodore, his son, then a lad of fourteen, was named his successor. This of necessity brought about a considerable change in the surroundings of our hero. For the new Tsar's relatives were opposed to the influence of the Naryshkin faction; and the former caused the banishment of Matveief, a sentence accentuated by a revival of the old charge of sorcery. The relatives of the Tsaritzza were also banished; and even the Tsaritzza herself and her children (Peter and a daughter Natalia) were sent to Preobrazhensky, a small dwelling-place near Moscow, and there they passed the greater part of the six years of Theodore's reign. The young Tsar's health was never robust, and his short sovereignty was troubled by Court intrigue. But a change was in store for the Naryshkin party, and it came about through the marriage of the young Tsar Theodore.

We have said that Court intrigue was rife, but never more so than at the marriage of the Sovereign (there were no Emperors of Russia then). Theodore's desire for matrimony called forth the usual disputes. The Miloslavskys were in power; and it was determined by Dölgorouki, the chief of the Strelitz, or National Guard, to undermine it. He influenced his followers, and Agatha Grushetsky, niece of Zborofsky, a Polish noble, was chosen. Theodore saw her as was intended, and liked her. Immediately a false report concerning her was set on foot by the Miloslavskys, but was quickly shown to be false. The Tsar married Agatha, but she soon died, and on her death the ex-minister, Matveief, used his influence so that his god-daughter was chosen for Theodore's second wife. Matveief was recalled from banishment, and his estates restored.

It will now be seen that the party of the dowager Tsaritzza had gained the upper hand, and when Theodore died, which he did in May 1682, a few months after his second marriage, Peter came to the front. It is true he had another elder brother, Ivan, son of Alexis by his first marriage. But Ivan was nearly an idiot; the nobles feared that the power would be wielded by his relatives, the Miloslavskys; and this did not suit the Russian aristocracy at all, for they and the powerful Miloslavskys were unfriendly. So the nobility declared for Peter, who would be led, no doubt, by the Ex-Prime Minister; for he was popular. So the aristocracy, all but two individuals, declared for Peter, and the popular voice supported them. The step-mother was Regent, as head of the family; but the Princess Sophia was much vexed on Ivan's account, and, in defiance of etiquette, addressed the people in an impressive speech. This conduct on her part roused the Strelitz, and a massacre ensued, which lasted three days. Inflamed by a baseless story of the assassination of Ivan, the people attacked the nobles, and more than sixty members of the highest families were slain. Sophia was proclaimed Regent. In that revolt, Matveief and other relatives of the Tsaritzza Natalia were slain. But at length order was restored, and Ivan and Peter were crowned together as Tsars, Sophia being the wire-puller of the puppets.

The coronation took place upon the 6th July, and every endeavour was made to keep this twin ceremonial so rigorously, that no perceptible difference should be observed between the youthful Tsars. Their robes were cut from the same cloth, and even the candles they held were exactly of equal length. The throne formerly used by Alexis was divided by a bar, and the boys sat together to be crowned. The usual ceremonies were observed, and the coronation was an accomplished fact. We must, however, pass over the judicial troubles of the time, and proceed to look upon Peter as a youth.

BOYHOOD OF PETER: HIS DESIGNS FOR SHIP-BUILDING; HIS EXPEDITIONS.

The young Tsar, while under the guardianship or regency of Sophia, was not very much troubled by her. She wielded the power, and left Peter alone as much as possible. Although, as he was obliged to affix his sign-manual to many important documents, he could not be ignored. There is nothing to show that she regarded him with any jealousy,—indeed there are records to the contrary; yet she certainly was Regent, and governed well on the whole. But Peter had little taste for anything but arms and military arrangements and objects. It is on record that when he was living at the Palace near Moscow, he often had arms supplied to him, but it was not until he was eleven years old that he had any real cannon, which on that occasion he fired himself. All this time he kept on very good terms with his eldest brother, whose weak condition, intellectually speaking, rendered him unfitted for State ceremonial. Peter, on the contrary, had grown up tall and healthy, and looking mere like a lad of fifteen than eleven. We read that this was the impression he made upon the Swedish ambassador in 1683; and that "when the envoy gave his letters of credence, both Tsars rose; but Ivan somewhat hindered the proceedings" from his imperfect understanding of them, "and gave his hand to be kissed at the wrong time." "Peter was very eager, and had to be pulled back until his eldest brother had had a chance of speaking."

It was at the end of that year, 1683, that the youthful Tsar formed the nucleus of the famous Preobrazhensky regiment, which is to this day one of the Imperial corps. He became very friendly with some German officers, and, with their assistance, enrolled a few volunteers, who went by the names of the Play-Soldiers or "Amusement Grooms." It was soon however found that the number of volunteers largely increased, so much so eventually that they quite overran the village, and had to be billeted in the neighbouring hamlet of Semenofsky, from which place another regiment was subsequently named. In this way volunteering for a soldier's life became fashionable, and many of the nobles enrolled themselves as privates, as the young Peter had done, and worked up to the higher grades as he did. An attack of measles and a subsequent illness in 1684 somewhat interfered with the warlike games of the young Tsar; but when he was again able to lead his troops, he exercised them in all strictness, and according to martial law. In this way,—in constructing forts, in the feasts that followed, in drinking and smoking and social intercourse, Peter formed his mind at thirteen. He was "hail fellow well met" with any one, no matter what his position, from whom he could obtain information, or by whose assistance he could conquer any mechanical difficulty. He was particularly fond of anything in the way of mechanism or handicraft, and in 1697 his sister Sophia said that he was acquainted with "fourteen trades."

It was not until 1698 that Peter sat at the Council of State; but even then his thoughts were far away with his soldier comrades and the mimic warfare waged at Preobrazhensky; but soon after this he seems to have begun study seriously; and it was then that the great idea of ship-building took possession of him. It came to be developed in the following ways:—

It appears that Peter had heard of a certain instrument for measuring distances; and when Prince Dolgorouki was about to go to France, the young Tsar requested him to procure an astrolabe and a sextant. The Prince brought them; but when directed to explain their use, he was obliged to confess that he had quite forgotten to inquire how to use them. In this emergency some one suggested that a certain Frantz Zimmerman, a Dutch merchant, might perhaps know, as he was a man of attainments. He was sent for, and solved the mystery so greatly to Peter's delight, that, under Zimmerman, the Tsar began to study hard, and thenceforth the merchant was Peter's constant companion. As he was wandering about with Zimmerman, Peter discovered in an out-house an old and dilapidated English-built boat, which he at once took for his model, and desired that it should be repaired and set afloat. This was the pioneer of the Russian navy. This boat is supposed to have been presented by Queen Elizabeth to the Tsar Ivan the Terrible. At any rate, it is now known as the Grandfather of the Russian Fleet, and is preserved in all sanctity near the Cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul, in St. Petersburg. We will now see how the young Tsar progressed in his boat-building.

When Peter had discovered the English boat, he was mightily impatient to launch it; and the remarks of Zimmerman, that with sails it would "go against the wind," was sufficient to fan his curiosity into a flame. The boy Tsar was all impatience to repair the boat, and a certain Carsten Brandt was pressed into the service. He had already been shipbuilding for Alexis on the Caspian, but his ship had come to an untimely end. Brandt entered heart and soul into the project, and in a short time the boat was launched on the river Yanza, and, with Brandt at the helm, sailed up and down. The royal lad could wait no longer, he leaped into the skiff, and, instructed by the Dutchman, manœuvred his first vessel.

As appetite comes with eating, so desire for more came with this first success. Peter was most anxious to sail his new acquisition upon a broader sheet of water; and at length his ambition was gratified. He made an expedition to Lake Plestcheief; and finding it was impossible to transport his first ship to the place, he determined to construct new ones on the spot. But notwithstanding Peter's energy, and the continual encouragement his assistance afforded,—for he worked with Brandt and his friends,—winter arrived before his preparations had been completed, and Peter was obliged to return to Moscow, but in the full hope that the spring would see his vessels sailing upon the lake. The only relics of this achievement are the remains of a church dedicated to the Virgin at the Ships, and a few piles presumably belonging to the old landing-place.

So Peter returned to Moscow; and as he could not proceed with his building, he turned his attention to the soldiers again; and even then it is evident that plot and counterplot were being prepared between Sophia's partisans and the aristocratic party on Peter's side, which eventually led to the overthrow of the former. Peter now began to look about for a bride, as it was advisable the throne should have a male heir; and finally the young Eudoxia Lopukhin was chosen for or by Peter, and the young couple were wed on the 6th February, 1689. But if his sister and her advisers fancied that matrimony would keep Peter at home, they were in error. As soon as the spring began to open, Peter was off again to his boat-building on the lake, and it was with much difficulty that his mother and his wife persuaded him to return.

"Come to us, oh, lord, without delay, and I, through the kindness of thy mother, am alive. Thy little wife Dunka petitions this."

Peter could not resist this appeal, and he came back to Moscow, where his affectionate relatives kept him for some weeks. At length he again escaped, and devoted much time to the ships at Pereyasavl, and finished them. He was then compelled by the threatening aspect of the political horizon to remain in Moscow, for the storm which was to break over the land and destroy Sophia's party was rapidly gathering. The ill-success of two expeditions to the Crimea brought Sophia's government into disrepute, and Peter's refusal to meet the generals and officers when they returned did not improve matters. Sophia then took occasion to sound the National Guard, and did all she could by gifts to keep up her waning popularity, and at length she assembled a considerable band of the Strelitz in the Kremlin. Peter was meanwhile at his palace at Preobrazhensky, and the feeling already engendered between his immediate followers and the adherents of Sophia had become very antagonistic,—so much so, that one of Peter's messengers to the Kremlin on the 17th August had been seized and beaten. This occurrence was exaggerated, and the idea arose that the moment for action had arrived, and that Sophia had taken the initiative. Peter's friends accordingly hurried out to Preobrazhensky, and awoke him in the middle of the night, urging him to fly. He jumped up, and, as he was, ran to the stables, saddled a horse, and escaped to the woods, whither his friends soon brought his clothes, when he rode off to the monastery of Troitza, where he took refuge. Here he collected a small band of Strelitz; and subsequently a large number of adherents marched to Troitza. This did not please Sophia at all, and she made an attempt to interview Peter; but he sent her a menacing message not to approach, for she might "be treated in a way she would not like." Much incensed, she returned to Moscow, and endeavoured to win over the Strelitz who remained. But they had begun to perceive that Peter's cause was in the ascendant; and the departure of the various foreign officers from Moscow to attach themselves to Peter, in obedience to his directions, settled the question. The Galitzins were banished for obeying Sophia in preference to the Tsar; other adherents of Sophia were put to torture and to death; and finally Peter wrote to his brother to inform him that they two should reign, and requesting his brother's permission to commence his improvements at once. All his requests were immediately granted, but Peter would not go to Moscow till Sophia had left it. She was sent to the monastery of De Vitchy; and as an inmate she died, in 1704, having meantime annoyed Peter continually by her intrigues.

For several years, Peter, though the ruler, took only a formal part in State business. Ivan was the nominal Tsar; but as his health rendered it impossible that he could do the work of the State, Peter and his counsellors governed the kingdom. His chosen (foreign) companions were General Gordon and General Lefort. The former of these was a Scotchman who had joined the Swedish service, and was taken prisoner by the Poles, and while serving with them was offered a position in the Russian army. This he accepted, and thereafter he was simply a Russian subject. He married a Russian lady, who was never permitted to leave the country, even with her husband, for the Tsar feared to lose his warrior chief if he permitted his family to go with him upon any embassy or mission. Patrick Gordon's diary, in English, is still extant.

Frantz Lefort was a Genevese, and after serving for a time with the Prince of Curland, was recommended to the Russians. He served in the Crimean campaigns above referred to, was an excellent soldier, frank, unselfish, simple, and possessed a most winning manner. When Peter required sympathy he went to Lefort, but when more robust advice was required he was apt to seek General Patrick Gordon. The Tsar's Russian associates were those amongst whom he had been brought up, those who had served in his regiment, and his former child-companions, and Zimmerman was of course included. With these he would visit the Strangers' Quarter, and minge in their sports and pastimes, their ceremonies and their dissipations; for there were no such drinkers as Peter and Lefort, who deserved his name in this respect. These German revels were kept up till late at night,—dinner was eaten at noon,—and frequently till morning; various games and diversions marked these festive meetings, fireworks, dancing, masquerading, practical jokes, and carol-singing, for which Peter accepted alms, like his poorer companions, without scruple. All this time Russia was not benefited by any law or decree. The Ministers ruled the country in a happy-go-lucky style, and nothing was done. The Tsar interested himself only in boat-building or fireworks, which he exhibited with great delight. But the fireworks soon paled and vanished, the ships on the lake became neglected and rotted as they lay. Scarce a remnant remained of the flotilla which was once the pride and delight of Peter the Great; for twenty-five years the Tsar never visited the lake, and then (in 1722) the ships were of no use. Meantime he had visited Archangel; and we may glance at the interesting records of his trip and of his first sea-voyage.

PETER GOES TO ARCHANGEL.

Peter having obtained his mother's permission to go, a permission saddled with a condition that he would not go sailing on the sea, which promise the Tsar did not keep, set forth from Moscow in July 1693, and on his arrival went on board his ship the St. Peter, and ran two hundred miles across the White Sea. Possibly then his promise occurred to him, for he returned and told his mother what he had been doing. Rude and sensual as he was, Peter seems always to have treated his mother with respect. But she, and the people also, was alarmed at the news that he had risked himself in such a frail bark on the open sea, and caused little Alexis to write a letter to his father,—or rather caused a letter to be written in his name,—begging him to return home. Peter replied in the following strain, as we gather from Mr. Schuyler:—

"By thy letter, I see O! O! thou hast been mightily grieved—and why? I: thou art grieved, what delight have I? I beg thee make me who am wretched happy by not grieving about me for in very truth I cannot endure it."

But he did not return nevertheless, for Archangel had a great attraction for him in the crowds of people he encountered, and in the never-fading interest he took in the ships of various nationalities he found there. Here he conceived the idea of establishing Russian trade, for his empire had no representatives at the Russian port. His efforts did not end here. At a subsequent visit he practised various industries. All this time his pleasures were not in the least abated, and he indulged himself as much as ever, but never lost sight of the welfare of his kingdom. He worked at the forge and lathe; he encouraged industry; and only when winter's approach drove him southward, did he quit the scene of his useful labour. But early in February of the ensuing year (1694), his mother died suddenly. Natalia, the Tsaritzza, was only forty-two. This was a great blow to Peter, for, as we have seen, he was really attached to her, and was much influenced by her, though we read that she never could look with favour upon his improvements. "His desire for novelty, and his inclination towards foreigners, were never shared by her."

Peter remained at Moscow until May, when he again travelled to Archangel, and ventured out in his yacht. A storm came on, and every one, including Peter,—who pluckily was steering the ship,—gave himself up for lost. But the Tsar did not despair, even though he received the last rites of the Church; for he managed to reach the shore at length, exhausted but in safety. But nothing could daunt Peter's energy. He was awaiting the frigate bought at Amsterdam, and the launching of his own built at Archangel. On the 21st July, the vessel arrived from Holland—a frigate of forty-four guns. A week after, Peter, in the Holy Prophecy, and Bertulin, in the Apogee Paul, followed by the St. Peter and various English ships, sailed out into the White Sea. A code of signals was invented by Peter for the occasion. The Russian ships ventured out as far as was prudent, and then returned to Archangel, whence the Tsar quickly set out for Moscow. Here his restless energy found vent in autumn manœuvres, but of a more serious kind than we are now accustomed to. Two large bodies of troops were opposed,—nearly 8,000 men in each,—and a regular and not altogether bloodless campaign was initiated. All was arranged as if for a real battle. No powder was used in the bombs, we are told, but many severe contusions and broken limbs testified to the earnestness of the fighting. A fort was built, and regularly mined and stormed, with all necessary pomp and circumstance. Meanwhile both besiegers and besieged drank deep, and enjoyed themselves tremendously. Gordon, in his diary, gives all particulars, but we are unable to quote them. The mimic war was well carried on, and was a good preparation for the more serious business of campaigning which was to come. This campaign was nearer than any one then supposed.

Even at that early date, it will be seen that the Russians were desirous to obtain a hold upon the Black Sea, and a southern outlet, as well as an extension of territory eastward. We have already mentioned the war waged against the Tartars by Sophia, and its unsuccessful issue. Peace had nominally been made, but it was not, at any rate, formally ratified; for many outrages had since the actual cessation of hostilities been committed by the Tartars, and the small body of Russian troops remaining in the bordering territory were powerless against these nomadic hordes. War was, therefore, somewhat suddenly declared, for the "ostensible purpose of reducing the Crimea," though Mr. Schuyler, in his "Memoirs of Peter the Great," says, "Actually the plan of the campaign included getting possession of the Dnieper and of the Don, two Russian rivers which were useless for trade so long as their embouchures were in possession of the Mussulmans." The real reasons for war it is difficult to tell. However, the campaign was decided upon, and the operations commenced by an attempt at the capture of Azof; but no success attended the expedition that year. Two small forts were, indeed, taken, but Azof was not. All through the campaign Peter worked like a common soldier as well as a general. He did anything that needed doing at the moment, but he could not stave off defeat. The assaults failed, and the Russians suffered considerable loss as they retired. This ill-success had a very depressing effect upon Peter, who had during the operations against Azof been as cheerful as man could possibly be, and had kept up the spirits of the soldiers as few in his circumstances would have cared to do or to attempt.

ACCESSION OF PETER; CAPTURE OF AZOF.

But it is not to be supposed that Peter, although repulsed, considered himself beaten. This was not at all his character. It was very unlikely that he would accept a defeat when he had had no opposition in his life; or if he had been partly opposed by his mother, he had always found a method by which he eventually gained his ends. So in this graver case. He was as determined as ever to have his own way; that was the secret. He retired to Moscow, it is true, but only to prepare for a fresh departure—to make ready for another campaign. This year, 1696, was a memorable one in the reign of Peter, for then his brother Ivan, the nominal Tsar, died, and Peter was thenceforth the actual and apparent, as he had been co-equal, Sovereign for some years. His plans for the reduction of Azof were matured, and it speaks volumes for his indomitable energy that he succeeded. His army, grafted on the small Plav Regiments he had so long previously instituted, was increased to 75,000 men; a commander was appointed, a Russian named Skeln, Peter himself being merely a captain. A flotilla of barges was constructed, and floated down the river. At length the transports were ready; and, notwithstanding his weakness from illness, he proceeded to Voronezh, and set about his plans. On the 12th April, three of the newly-constructed ships were ready; and in them, on the 26th May, the Tsar and his men reached the capital of the Don Cossacks, and overtook Patrick Gordon and his division. Some Turkish ships were in the river, and the Tsar's force was too weak to attempt to cope with them; but the bolder made a diversion, and attacked two of the Turkish vessels while they were transferring ammunition; with good results, for the fleet weighed anchor and sheered off, all but two, which were destroyed. This was an auspicious omen for the Russians, and the great danger was removed.

There was another point in the Russians' favour, and that was the slothfulness of the garrison of Azof. Throughout all the winter they had made no attempt to fill up the trenches evacuated by the enemy, nor to erect any further obstacles to their approach, doubtless believing that Peter had had enough of it. But they evidently did not correctly estimate the Tsar's character. His bull-dog determination must have surprised them when they beheld him and his reinforced army come and take up their old positions quite quietly in the old trenches. The Tsar was now pretty confident of success, and shot an arrow bearing a message containing very honourable terms into Azof. These suggestions were replied to by the Turks with a salvo of cannon. So Peter's well-meant offer was despised. The siege was accordingly prosecuted with great vigour. An immense mound was erected, so that it dominated the walls of the town; and when the German engineers arrived, they pointed out places from which the most impression could be made on the walls. The impatient Cossacks, however, would not bide the time. They united and delivered unsupported a most vigorous attack, actually penetrating within the walls. But as no Russian troops assisted them, they were obliged to retire to a bastion, of which they retained possession. Next day a general assault was ordered; but before it was executed, the Turks surrendered on condition that their lives were spared, and that all should, with their families, march out with the honours of war. This was granted, and the conditions were honourably fulfilled. The town was found in a very dilapidated state, and no booty rewarded the visitors, except as far as regards cannon, for even small arms and ammunition seemed almost entirely wanting.

True to his instincts, Peter's first care was for a harbour for his flotilla. The town was then put in a state of defence; and when all this had been done to his satisfaction, Peter and his generals returned to Moscow, where they were received with every demonstration of delight, for, as Peter himself remarked, "The labourer is worthy of his hire." The entering into Moscow was made on the 10th October.

But Peter did not rest idly upon his laurels. He was now actual Tsar, and made up his mind to carry out his long-cherished project—a fleet; not a mere pleasure squadron for show, but a fleet worthy of his realm and of his growing renown. He sent abroad for shipwrights, and at home he made demands upon the people of all grades. Clergy and laymen alike were called upon to contribute; merchants and landed proprietors,—all were obliged to unite according to their means in equipping mortar-boats and other vessels. The ships were built by foreign contractors, and the Venetians particularly distinguished themselves as shipwrights under Giacomo Moro. Azof was colonized, and the Russian power established there. Peter also despatched numerous representatives of his noblest families to distant countries to acquire the art of shipbuilding, some to Venice, others to England, more to Holland. This order was a great hardship upon the people, thus summarily dismissed from home with their wives and families, and at their own proper expense. It is a curious commentary upon this action of the Tsar, that although many of these nobles became eminent in the councils of the Tsar and his successors, not one distinguished himself in naval matters.* Travelling then was not common among Russians, neither were the facilities great for the movement from place to place, particularly by land. The expenses were enormous; education and knowledge of foreign languages, and even of geography, among Russians extremely limited, so the need for improvement must in Peter's active mind have been very pressing when he despatched these nobles and their families into exile amid strangers, and at their own expense, for we do not read that the Tsar was in any way niggardly. He did it all for the benefit and for the ultimate improvement of his native country. So Peter, now the Tsar of all the Russias, emerged from his self-willed boyhood, a practical, passionate man, but kind-hearted withal; and though almost ignorant, as we should call him, yet the prime mover for the education of the people who had been committed to his charge.

We will now touch upon the western wanderings of the Tsar and his sojourn in Holland and England.

THE TSAR IN WESTERN EUROPE; IN GERMANY.

Macaulay writes that Peter's journey is an epoch in the history, not only of Russia but the world; and there is no doubt that it was a very important epoch in the history of Peter's native land. The Tsar had determined upon reforms at home, he had made up his mind to subjugate the Turks, and as a first step a fleet was necessary. He had already sent away fifty so-called volunteers to learn ship-building, but now he determined to follow his own prescription and take a journey to Holland, where the art had reached a high stage of perfection. But it did not suit Peter to go in his character of ruler. He was very averse to all kinds of show and state. An embassy was therefore appointed in which the Tsar occupied a position inferior to his friends, and he, with some fifty others, proceeded in the suite of General Lefort and the other two envoys. The suite consisted of nobles chosen by the Tsar himself, many of them being his old playmates and associates of his boyish days, when soldiering and shipbuilding had been practised as amusements. The embassy numbered two hundred and fifty persons. This being arranged, and the government having been placed in the hands of a regency of three persons, to whom supreme authority was given, the Tsar set off, himself in the strictest incognito, on the 20th March, 1697.

The embassy first made for Vienna, but in those days it was not an easy matter to reach the Austrian capital. At the time of Peter's departure it was particularly difficult, for Poland was in a state of ferment. The journey, therefore, was undertaken viâ Riga and Dresden. Owing to the impatience of the Tsar, Riga was reached much sooner than the authorities had anticipated, and the reception of the embassy was not so well arranged as was thought desirable. Here they were obliged to remain a week. The Tsar, as full of curiosity as ever, and very desirous for information as usual, went about examining the fortifications, and peering into all kinds of places. On one of these excursions he was roughly ordered away by a sentry, and was much offended. But the man was scarcely to blame for his conduct, seeing only an ordinary-looking individual taking notes; and Peter had really no ground for complaint. Apology was, however, made, and the ambassadors were satisfied. But Peter was terribly bored at Riga, and took the earliest opportunity to leave it. Nobody gave him any entertainments, and we can imagine that his curiosity was satisfied; and there being no employment or amusement provided for him, Peter would find it dull. He disliked the town very much, and referred to it as "a cursed place."

The Tsar departed with all form and ceremony, and passed through the Duchy of Curland, where the Duke, an old friend of Lefort, entertained the Tsar and his friends, Peter consented to lay aside his incognito for a little while in the Duke's presence. Hither Frederick the Elector, afterwards King of Prussia, sent to ascertain whether the Tsar of Russia really were amongst the new arrivals; and the information he gathered induced the Elector to meet the Tsar, who was coming by sea to the port of Pillau, with polite attentions and offers of hospitality. Consistent in his assumed character, Peter returned for answer that there was nobody of such distinction on board the ship as to deserve the Elector's compliment, and no visits could be received. The Tsar put up in obscure apartments, and refused all visits from the Elector, though he went out in a close carriage and paid his respects to Frederick, and was afterwards entertained by him at his country residence, where he took part in various sports, and witnessed a bear-fight.

All this time Peter was almost unattended, and it was not until the embassy arrived that any grand doings occurred. Then, greatly to Peter's delight, fireworks and other entertainments were given in honour of the embassy, and the two rulers are reported to have got on together very well indeed. Nearly a month was passed at Königsberg, and then Peter took up his abode at Pillau for a time. An incident showing Peter's temper is related by Mr. Schuyler. It occurred at the close of his stay with Frederick. The Elector had promised to visit the Tsar on his name day, and Peter had, with his usual energy, made preparations for his anticipated guest's reception. He had also manufactured some fireworks for the occasion; but at the last moment the Elector had been obliged to go to Memel, and sent one of his councillors to represent him, and to make his apologies. The narrator says: "Peter was childishly vexed; and in his passion at not being able to show his fireworks, vented his rage on the envoys. He took it amiss that they left the room to refresh themselves after their journey, and had them brought back. Looking sourly at Count von Kreyzen, he remarked in Dutch to Lefort, 'The Elector is very good, but his councillors are the devil.' Then imagining that he saw a smile upon Kreyzen's face, he rushed at him, and cried, 'Go! go!' and pushed him backward. His anger did not cool till he had written a letter to the Elector, his 'dearest friend,' half of complaint, half of apology."

When he left he journeyed hastily to Coppenburg, and here he encountered Sophia, the Electress of Hanover, and her daughter Charlotte, who came from Hanover on purpose to meet him. We have some interesting memoranda of this meeting from the ladies' letters. They note that Peter wanted some one to teach him to eat properly; but, the daughter adds, "he has a natural unconstrained air that pleases me." We learn something of his appearance, too, which is worth transcribing: "The Tsar is very tall, his features are fine, and his figure very noble. He has great vivacity of mind, and a ready and just repartee. . . . It could be wished that his manners were less rustic." In another letter the Electress says: "I could embellish the tale of the journey of the illustrious Tsar if I should tell you that he is sensible to the charms of beauty; but to come to the bare fact, I found in him no disposition to gallantry. In dancing they (the Muscovites) took the whalebones of our corsets for our bones, and the Tsar showed his astonishment by saying that German ladies had very hard bones." The conclusion of their observations is that, "If he had received a better education, he would be an accomplished man, for he has many good qualities, and an infinite amount of natural wit."

This we may assume is a very shrewd guess, and showed that the German ladies gauged Peter the Great very correctly, and summed him up cleverly.

PETER THE GREAT IN HOLLAND.

Peter soon proceeded to Holland, and in a small town called Zaardam, or Saardam, he took up his abode. The house in which he lived for a short time is still to be seen, and many illustrious visitors have been to Zaandam to see it.

PETER THE GREAT.

At that time a considerable ship-building trade went on in the twin villages of East and West Zaandam, separated by the river Zaan. The villages were united in 1811, and are only five miles from Amsterdam, up the estuary of the Y. Here Peter arrived on the 18th of August, attended by only six companions, to learn the art of ship-building, which was then carried on in perfection at Zaandam. It was Sunday when he arrived, and he and his friends put up in the inn, "The Otter," until he could obtain the lodgings which an old acquaintance, a Moscow smith, offered him. Peter lost no time in setting to work. The very next day he entered himself as a carpenter; but the popular curiosity had been aroused concerning him, and he could not remain unknown nor unobserved, for his great height made him at once remarkable. The circumstances attending his discovery are interesting.

Peter had purchased some fruit which had been emptied into his tarpaulin hat, and as he went along the streets of Zaandam, he good-naturedly shared his plums with the boys, who were attracted by his appearance and dress. Some of these self-constituted attendants, impelled by mischief, or because they did not consider they had had plums sufficient, began to hoot the foreigner, who laughed and teased them, so that their anger found vent, boy-fashion, in "heaving" mud and stones at the Tsar. The riot increased, so that Peter was obliged to take refuge in an inn, and to send for the Burgomaster.

Some disclosure was then absolutely necessary, and the worthy magistrate put forth a proclamation to the effect that all distinguished foreigners were to be respected. Suspicion as to the Tsar's identity was confirmed by the receipt of a letter from Russia, telling of the embassy and of Peter's movements. This letter contained a full description of the illustrious foreigner: seven feet high, known by the twitching of his face, the restless movements of his hands, and a mole on his cheek. There was no mistaking him; the news got about, and Peter was so beset that, after only a week's residence at Zaandam, he was fain to leap aboard of his yacht, and, notwithstanding the state of the weather, run up to Amsterdam to be relieved from the prying eyes of the natives. His embassy had just arrived, and with them he took up his abode. Thus it will be seen that Peter had very little leisure for his boat-building at Zaandam. Inquisitive to a degree, he had inquired into everything, and seen all the manufactures; so, with the exception of having fitted a bowsprit to his yacht, he did little work on the Zaan.

At Amsterdam the Embassy received a hearty welcome, and fêtes were given in honour of it. But Peter was only anxious to commence his apprenticeship to ship-building. He made himself known to the chief magistrate, and inquired whether he (Peter) could not work unobserved in the dockyard. The Burgomaster put the request before the East India Company of Holland, and the directors resolved to permit the "high personage" to work within their dockyard; and they also gave him a residence within the pale, wherein he could live and work undisturbed. Their courtesy did not stop here; they also determined to build a vessel, so that the said personage might have an opportunity to observe all the successive steps by which a completed frigate was arrived at. The energetic Tsar at once sailed to Zaandam for his tools, and began to work at once at Oostenberg, where the docks of the Company were situated.

Here, within the dockyard, Peter the Great of Russia worked for a period of four months like a common carpenter. With him were associated ten of his friends, under the direction of a Dutch foreman. So amenable was Peter to discipline, that on one occasion, when visitors were present, the foreman called to him as "Peter," and desired him to assist his companions. Without a word Peter the Great threw down the implement he was using, and "lent a hand," as he had been bidden. He never asserted his dignity, indeed he very strongly resented any very respectful address paid to his exalted rank; while on the other hand he would converse familiarly with anyone who addressed him as Peter the Carpenter. His whole aim was to be of use and to learn. He practised tooth-drawing upon his attendants, which no doubt was satisfactory—to Peter. He learnt to bleed subjects in the hospitals. He experimented as a tailor and as a shoemaker. All this time he was daily working upon the frigate, which was at length completed; and then Peter's active mind sought fresh fields and pastures new.

This was not from caprice or from love of change, but because he was not satisfied with the happy-go-lucky way in which ship-building was carried on at Amsterdam. Peter wanted something firm to build upon,—a theory on which he could work, a plan for vessels which he could not obtain in Holland. His Dutch carpenters did not satisfy him, and were put under supervision at home. This temper led Peter to determine to go to England to observe the British modes of construction. The project was carried out. King William III. of England sent him a yacht armed and elegantly fitted. Peter obtained the King's permission to visit Deptford ; and on the 17th January, 1698, he set sail from Holland, in British ships sent for the purpose.

PETER IN ENGLAND.

The Tsar arrived in England on the 3rd February, and was rowed up the Thames. He took up his quarters at a house in Norfolk Street, Strand, now a hotel, where the King soon paid him a personal visit. It is reported that Peter received His Britannic Majesty very coolly, and without his coat. It is stated by the Earl of Dartmouth that Peter had a favourite monkey, which was accustomed to sit on the back of his chair; and as soon as the King was seated, the monkey jumped upon him wrathfully, and many apologies had to be made for the favourite's conduct. The Tsar was very desirous to see the opening of Parliament, and asked the King's permission, but he did not wish to be seen himself. So he was perched in a gutter on the roof, but got so laughed at that he was obliged to retire.*

Admiral Mitchell was appointed to Peter's suite, and was ordered to be in constant attendance. The winter of 1698 was very severe, quite Russian in its intensity of cold; but notwithstanding all climatic drawbacks, Peter's energy of movement was not sensibly abated. He visited all important places in the metropolis, and in many of his expeditions, Lord Carmarthen, a rather eccentric nobleman, was his companion. These friends would carouse together, and a mild beverage of raw brandy warmed with pepper was habitually consumed to tickle their jaded palates. When Peter had sufficiently visited our sights, including the theatres, where he made some acquaintances, he went to Chatham, Woolwich, and Deptford dockyards, and the various establishments. At the last-named place he occupied Evelyn's house, Sayes Court; and here his vagaries attracted attention. He left the house in a very dirty condition, for Russian manners were not patterns for cleanliness in those days. Evelyn's servant reported it to his master as "right nasty." One childish amusement of the Tsar consisted in his being wheeled in a barrow through the beautiful holly hedge. Evelyn notes in his diary that "I went to Deptford to see how miserably the Tsar had left my house after three months making it his court. I got Sir Christopher Wren, the King's surveyor, and Mr. London, his gardener, to estimate the repairs, for which they allowed me £150 in their report to the Lords of the Treasury."

But notwithstanding his eccentricities, Peter continued very steadily at work. He laboured all day at Rotherhithe or Deptford, and then would retire to sip at a public-house near the Tower (the Tsar's Head), where he and his boon companions would indulge in strong libations. Most of his time was spent at the water-side. He visited Portsmouth, however, and witnessed a sham fight and a naval review. He also went to Oxford and was made a Doctor of Laws. Peter turned his sojourn in England to good account, for he not only mastered the theory of ship-building, but he engaged many useful persons to return with him to Russia in various capacities,—ship designers, engineers, surgeons, and many more. The Tsar and the King were always on very friendly terms, and the Russian ruler consented to have his likeness painted. This picture is, or lately was, in the gallery at Hampton Court.

Peter's stay in England was now drawing to a close. His whole mind was occupied in ships and shipping. Social duties did not trouble him. Venice was his next aim, for there he hoped to learn how to build the light vessels used on the Mediterranean. The impression he left behind him in this country is well summed up by Bishop Burnet of Salisbury, as follows:—

"He is a man of hot temper, soon inflamed, and very brutal in his passion; he raises his natural heat by drinking much brandy, which he rectifies himself with much application. He is subject to convulsive motions all over his body, and his head seems affected with these. He wants not capacity, and has a larger measure of knowledge than might be expected from his education, which was very indifferent; a want of judgment, with an instability of temper, appear in him too often and too evidently. He is mechanically turned, and seems designed by nature to be a ship-carpenter rather than a great Prince."

Peter left England on the 2nd of May, and returned to Amsterdam, where his absence had caused his followers alarm, in consequence of the non-arrival of letters, owing to the severity of the season. His intended visit to Venice was put aside by news from Russia, where things were in an unsettled condition. Other continental news also tended to hasten his departure. He was desirous to visit Vienna, and make himself acquainted with the Austrian army and tactics. He did not seem best pleased with his visit to Vienna, as the very strict court ceremonial bored him, though his political arrangements appear to have been satisfactory. He now made preparations to go to Venice, and, indeed, a portion of his attendants had already started thither, when alarming news was received from Moscow. A revolt of the Strelitz regiments had taken place, and the insurgents were marching on Moscow. General Gordon, who had been left in the city by the Tsar, deserved the confidence reposed in him. He met the mutineers and entirely defeated them; numbers were killed, and many officers thrown into prison to await the Tsar's return. Peter made no delay in returning to Moscow, where he arrived on the 4th of September, having been absent from his capital just seventeen months. He did not stop in Moscow, but, with his councillors, drove out at once to his palace of Preobrazhensky, and so hastily that he did not even visit his wife.

PETER AS A REFORMER.

The outbreak that had recalled Peter to Moscow originated in the fear that the Tsar would never return to his subjects; and that as he had then been away so long a time, the nobles, or the malcontent section of them, affected to believe that he had practically abdicated the throne. In addition to these, there was the well-founded conviction that Peter, on his return, would bring with him a number of foreigners, who would be the means of introducing reforms to which the Russian character is strongly opposed. However, as we have seen, the rebellion was speedily repressed by General Gordon, who, because he was a foreigner, kept himself in the background while negotiations were pending with the rebellious troops. But when action was determined upon, he crushed the insurgents, and reserved a number for sentence by the Tsar.

These sentences were merciless. Peter's brutal nature developed itself in the most sanguinary manner. Some unfortunates were broken on the wheel; others were buried alive, their heads alone remaining above ground. Many were executed by the Tsar's own hands, so anxious was he to be avenged upon the rebels. It is related that Ivan Orloff, one of the conspirators, came to put his head upon the beam before the ferocious Tsar, who had already decapitated several victims. Orloff, finding a head in the way, brutally kicked it aside, saying, "If this is my place it ought to be vacant." The Tsar, even in his rage, was struck by the coolness and defiance of the remark, and at once pardoned Orloff, who subsequently was ennobled, and became the ancestor of several celebrated statesmen. At length the red hand was stayed, and the massacre, which had spared none of those implicated from punishment, save the fortunate Orloff, ceased. In this, as in a subsequent case, Peter's naturally savage disposition was brought out in full light. It can scarcely be advanced in his favour that punishment was necessary. No doubt it was, but not such wholesale cruelty and bloodshed as this which disgraced his name.

Reforms now came thick and fast. A decree was made to prohibit, under penalty of a heavy fine, the wearing of long skirts and beards. The soldiers and civilians had been in the habit of wearing long tunics. These, in Peter's opinion, interfered with freedom of action, in battle particularly. Beards were also ordered to be shaved; but on payment of a certain sum, they might be retained. By these laws Peter procured a very substantial sum for his treasury; while, by forbidding any noble to be accompanied by more than a few attendants, he made locomotion more easy in the crowded streets. He soon appointed himself virtual head of the Church; not in any way interfering with the administration, but reserving power to control it. The 1st of January in the year 1700 was declared to be the beginning of the year, instead of the 1st of September, which had hitherto been regarded as New Year's Day. That these disturbances of cherished customs created much dissent, may be imagined; and numbers preferred to pay the fines rather than adopt new reforms.

After Peter had set these and many other reforms—such as the printing press and cheaper literature—in motion, he went down to superintend his great project of connecting the rivers Volga and Don. It was while thus occupied that his great friend and bold adviser, Lefort, died, at the early age of forty-six. This was a great blow to the Tsar, who at once returned for the funeral, and in the procession occupied a post as lieutenant, which was the rank he actually held in the deceased officer's regiment. On more than one occasion Peter thus set an example of obedience to authority—to the considerations of military etiquette.

It was about this time that an incident is said to have occurred, which possibly matured Peter's warlike designs. One of his young drummers in the famous "Toy Regiment," being tired after parade one day, went to sleep in the guard-room and dreamed a dream. This vision he related to his mother, as it was very firmly imprinted upon his memory. He fancied he saw a high mountain, and on it an enormous rock. Upon the rock was seated an eagle in act of devouring a crow. This, of course, meant something; and the drummer's mother gave it the following interpretation, which came, as it was doubtless intended it should, to Peter's ears:—The mountain was Moscow; the rock, the Kremlin; the eagle, Peter; and the crow being devoured was the young King of Sweden, Charles XII. This mystic warning was eagerly adopted by Peter, whose somewhat superstitious nature recognised in it a good omen. He at once declared war against Sweden, and perhaps changed his opinion as to the value of omens after a time. We now have to look at

PETER THE GREAT AS A SOLDIER.

In the year 1700, it became to the Tsar's mind evident that Russia should possess a seaport on the northern coast, in the Gulf of Finland. To gain this point the war with Sweden was initiated; and a pretext was not wanting. The old personal grievance, which Peter still cherished, supplied it. He had been repulsed at Riga when on his first journey in Europe; on Riga he would vent his wrath. So war was suddenly declared, greatly to the astonishment of Charles, who had just ascended the throne of Sweden. To make more certain of success, Peter had managed to enlist Denmark and Poland on his side; and thus the contest was set on foot. Charles XII., however, somewhat astonished his would-be conquerors by appearing before Copenhagen with a fleet, and blockading it. Meanwhile the Polish efforts against Riga were foiled by the determination of the garrison. Peter was not idle at Narva; but the Swedes, having made a treaty with Denmark, suddenly arrived at Riga, and raised the siege of that place. They were then in a position to march against the Russians near Narva. Peter sent his men out to stop them on the highway, now deep in snow; but the wily Charles led his men by the byways and unfrequented roads; and in the midst of a snow-storm, which half-blinded the Russians, bore down upon their lines. The result of this attack was success. Peter hurried off to bring up his reinforcements; but meantime the Swedes carried all before them. Twenty thousand Muscovites fell, and thousands were taken prisoners; and these men, their clothes designedly rent into rags by their conquerors, were sent back to Peter through the icy desert, starving. The officers were retained by Charles XII.

But the Tsar was not discouraged. "The Swedes will teach us how to beat them yet," he remarked, and bided his time; while Charles, despising him, overran Poland and Saxony.

Peter would have his port. He had noted the capabilities of the Neva for sea traffic; and, while reforming his army, kept the sea before his mind. In 1701 many skirmishes took place, and the Russians began to be successful. Small engagements also were fought against the Swedes on the Lakes, in which Peter's ships were conquerors at two to one, which led the Tsar to hope that he soon would beat his enemies on even terms. In 1702 a battle was fought at Marienburg, in which the Swedes sustained a decided defeat, and General Bauer got possession of an interesting little widow of fifteen years old, who had been wed but the day before to a Swedish sergeant. The General, struck with her beauty, inquired concerning her. Her name was Catherine—an orphan—educated by Dr. Gluck for charity's sake. The gallant Bauer offered to protect her, and to supply the place of the sergeant deceased. The maid-wife had no alternative; and she was received by the General, who, two years afterwards, was obliged to relinquish the pretty Catherine to Prince Menchikoff "on demand," to act in a similar domestic capacity to him. Not long after, Peter himself, visiting at Menchikoff's house, espied the young beauty, and she was promoted to the household of the Tsar. This "beggar maid" was afterwards Empress of Russia.

But, in the meantime, Charles XII. was not particularly concerned about these little defeats his troops sustained. Peter had been busy inspecting a certain island; and as he heard of the defeat, he struck his staff into the marshy soil at the mouth of the Neva, saying, "Here shall Peter's castle stand" (Petersburg). The island referred to was quickly fortified. The place was most suitable. A fort was erected, which subsequently blossomed into Kronstadt, and defied the British and French fleets. Piles were driven into the soft earth of the mainland. Peter had been in Holland, and had learnt pilodiving. The nobles were requested to come and bring their serfs to assist. They came and built houses; the city grew apace. Charles XII. heard of it, and said he would shortly come and burn it, or, if worth keeping, he would retain it. The island was well fortified by that time; and when Charles at length woke up to the reality, it was too late. In all these preparations Peter had, as usual, been the moving and the master spirit and executant. He built or designed, played carpenter or surgeon, with equal facility. When the Swedes at length came, they were checked at the island. This was in 1704. The building of St. Petersburg was commenced on the 27th May of the year preceding. Charles, frequently unsuccessful at sea, now determined to try a bolder flight and to attack Moscow. The Swedes had overrun Poland, and at length attacked Peter's army at Grodnow. The Russians retreated in a very masterly way through a difficult country. Intrenched at Hollosin, the Russian lines were frequently assaulted unsuccessfully, till at the seventh attack Peter gave way. Nothing now prevented Charles from advancing on Moscow, when he suddenly turned aside to the Ukraine, the Cossack territory. The famous Mazeppa had promised him assistance, but had reckoned without his host. The Cossacks as a body declined to be disloyal to Peter the Great, so the Hetman, with only a few deserters, joined Charles. A large Swedish force, left by the King to defeat Peter, only with difficulty cut through the Russians, leaving baggage, guns, and all their provisions in Peter's hands. This was a great disaster for Charles XII. Instead of an assistance, the few hundred hungry Cossacks proved an encumbrance. After a terrible winter, the Swedes made a detour to attack Moscow, but en route they endeavoured to subdue Pultowa. This celebrated battle turned the scale against Charles. Wounded in the foot, and carried into the fight on a litter, the Swedish monarch saw his troops dispersed, and himself a fugitive, in two hours after a desperate combat. Peter displayed great valour and courage, and was that day promoted to the rank of Major-General, for he had fought under orders as a captain, and had thus most narrowly escaped, the bullets perforating his hat and saddle, and breaking a crucifix on his chest. The Tsar pursued Charles to the Turkish frontier, and captured a portion of the remnant of the force which had joined the Swedish monarch in his flight. This was in June 1709 :—

“Dread Pultowa's day,

Peter returned victorious to Moscow to his domestic happiness; and two years after he publicly married Catherine Alexina, late the mistress of Menchikoff and Bauer and himself. She possessed an extraordinary influence over Peter, and she alone could subdue those fits of passion and epilepsy to which his frequent excesses had greatly contributed. She is described as being very beautiful, possessing a sweet voice, and never out of temper. She often interfered successfully to lessen the severity of Peter's decrees, and saved many lives of her humbler subjects. With him she was all in all, and her strong will and resolution induced Peter, at least on one occasion, to act in a way which saved him. She accompanied him in his campaign against the Turks, who had declared war at the instigation of Charles XII., who was still in Turkey. Before starting on this campaign, he was married, as we have stated. The war began. Peter, in this advance into Turkey, was in a measure deserted by his allies, and he at last arrived at the Pruth, with a small army not exceeding forty thousand men, to oppose the Turkish forces, swelled by auxiliaries to a total of a quarter of a million strong. Peter was therefore obliged to retreat, and in so doing was surrounded. There was now no hope for him. He became melancholy, and retired to his tent despairing. But Catherine bade him bestir himself, and be brave. She herself went through the camp, addressing the troops and requesting all to give their money to her to bribe the Grand Vizier. A large sum was at once collected unknown to Peter. Her jewels, of great value, were also sent by a messenger to treat for terms, and the Vizier graciously accepted the gifts, and permitted a parley. The terms were hard—Azof was relinquished; Charles XII. was granted safe passage through Russia, and all Peter's hopes of conquest in the South were shattered. Charles of Sweden was very indignant when he learnt that a treaty had been made with Peter, whom he hoped to see a prisoner. His conduct was very violent, and he at last had to fly for his life from the Turks, whose hospitality he had greatly abused.

Peter returned home; and in 1712 another public wedding with Catherine was celebrated, and the Tsar turned his arms against Sweden. In the following year a series of encounters took place in Pomerania. Peter possessed himself also of Helsingfors, and his new fleet engaged and defeated the Swedish squadron near the Island of Aland. By the close of that year, Stralsund was the only place remaining to Sweden in Pomerania. The order of St. Catherine was instituted in honour of the naval engagement above-mentioned. The library of Abo was transferred to St. Petersburg, which now became the seat of government, and a place of great commercial activity. About this time a Princess was born, amid great rejoicing.

Nothing was now to be feared from the King of Sweden, and Peter, accompanied by Catherine, took (in 1716) another tour in Europe. On this occasion the royal pair visited Hamburg, and many other places; they also spent some time in Copenhagen. Here Peter enjoyed a great triumph, for some Dutch and English war-vessels put in, and the Tsar proposed that they should all unite and endeavour to sweep away the Swedish fleet. This little arrangement was agreed to ; and to his great delight, Peter obtained the supreme command. He declared that that moment was the proudest of his life, when he hoisted his flag on board his ship. Thence Peter proceeded to Lubeck, and subsequently to Amsterdam, where he was warmly welcomed by his old associates. Even now he objected to have honour paid him, although he was not so absurdly exigent in the matter as before. Peter Zimmerman, as he was called, was in good spirits, and enjoyed his sojourn vastly. Catherine had just given birth to another child, which died almost immediately ; and when Peter visited Paris, she remained in Holland. The Tsar was received in the French capital with great cordiality : every one did him honour, and he was greatly pleased with his reception. He purchased or was presented with numerous works of art, etc., destined to embellish his new capital.

PETER THE GREAT IN PARIS.

The Prince Regent sent Marshal de Tessé to meet Peter at Dunkirk, and the party arrived in Paris on the 7th May. The Russian monarch was splendidly lodged and entertained at the Louvre ; but the Tsar got tired of the splendour very quickly, and having examined the furniture and the magnificent arrangements, he declined to sit down at the splendidly-appointed supper table. He asked for a glass of beer and a piece of bread, and then requested to be shown less pretentious lodgings. He and his suite were accordingly conveyed to the Hotel des Invalides ; and a camp bed was fetched, which for that night was set up in a large wardrobe. But with all this love of simplicity, Peter was in no way disposed to relinquish any of the forms of respect due to his rank. On these points he was very punctilious with the Regent, and remained at home till the Duc d'Orleans had paid his visit of ceremony. He treated the Regent only as his position entitled him to be treated. But to the young King, aged seven, he was more deferential, though on the first interview he took the child in his arms and embraced him. Next day, when the King was coming down to Peter's carriage, as the Tsar had come to the King's, Peter sprang out, and taking the boy up in his arms, carried him up the steps into the reception room.

During his stay in Paris, he visited the arsenals and workshops, the tapestry and other manufactures. He took particular pleasure in studying maps and plans of fortresses, and the Jardin des Plantes. He fraternized with the soldiers at the Invalides; and in his usual demeanour displayed a mixture of friendliness and dignity which was thoroughly characteristic. He ate and drank a great deal. He wore the same simple costume that he had worn in Holland, and in this matter of dress he differed considerably from those around him. He went to Versailles ; and hearing that Madame de Maintenon was living at St. Cyr, he proceeded to pay her a visit. The lady was not up when the Tsar arrived ; but nowise daunted, Peter penetrated into her chamber, drew aside the curtains, gazed at her a few moments in silence, and left the room without having uttered a word. He was particularly struck with Richelieu's bust, and at his tomb exclaimed, " I would give half my kingdom to such a man as you, who would teach me how to govern the other half." After passing some time in the French capital, Peter returned with the Tsaritsa, viâ Amsterdam to Russia, where the conduct of his eldest son caused him great anxiety.

DOMESTIC TROUBLES IN RUSSIA ; CONCLUSION.

Whatever had been the faults of Alexis, and he had plenty, there can be no doubt that in Peter's treatment of his son the Tsar was most unnecessarily cruel and unjust. Alexis was greatly opposed to all the improvements that his father wished to carry out. His mother aided and abetted him to the utmost ; yet Alexis was an unnatural son, as well as a most unfeeling and most licentious husband. The Tsar wished to fix the succession upon a stranger rather than permit Alexis to come to the throne ; and Alexis formally renounced all claim to it. Peter then gave him his choice, either to amend his ways or to become a monk. He chose the latter, and Peter left the kingdom and went on his travels. After an interval the Tsar directed his son to join him at Copenhagen. This Alexis was persuaded not to do ; and he accordingly turned aside and went to Italy, after in vain attempting to interest the Emperor of Germany in his fortunes. From Italy he was recalled by Peter under a solemn promise and understanding that he would be favourably received if he complied with his father's commands. Alexis consented to return with the ambassadors ; but on his arrival in Moscow, in February (1718), he was made a prisoner. And then the dark and cruel side of the Tsar showed itself in all its terrors. He accused his son, and forced him to sign a renunciation of all claim to the succession ; and Alexis was questioned closely as to his and his companions' intentions and plots. Various charges were preferred, and confessions extorted from Alexis' mistress and his confessor. For five months these pre-determined proceedings were carried on. The Prince was accused and condemned to death. But the very day on which the sentence had been pronounced, Alexis was taken ill in prison. Some writers allege that he was poisoned; some that Peter himself executed his son, or was present at his execution. But however that may be, it is a fact that the Tsar sacrificed his son, and subsequently many others; bishops, priests, and the Prince's relatives on his mother's side, being executed, impaled, or, when no evidence was forthcoming, poisoned. Nor did Peter's vengeance stop here. He made a decree to exclude his grandson, Alexis' son, from the throne; but his own son by Catherine died, and as a matter of fact, his grandson Peter did reign after Catherine's death.

But notwithstanding his cruelties, Peter still continued his reforms for the benefit of his subjects; and all his efforts tended to the aggrandisement and prosperity of his kingdom. The death of Charles XII. changed the aspect of the political horizon; and the alliance with Sweden, which had been talked of, and the descent upon Scotland, with the Spanish occupation of France, were all put a stop to. The war with Sweden went on for a time; but by the congress at Nystadt, in Finland, it was agreed to consent to all Peter's demands; and all his conquests were thereby secured to him. The peace was signed in September 1721. This event landed Peter upon the pinnacle of his glory. The popular joy was unbounded, and the Tsar was induced to accept the title of Emperor of All the Russias, Peter the Great, and Father of his Country.

His natural energy would not permit him to remain long inactive. He descended upon Persia, with which country he had discovered a pretext for war. He made his preparations, and, accompanied by Catherine, embarked at Astrakan. But his expedition turned out a failure, though the Russians succeeded in capturing Derbend. They were obliged to retire. He lost his ships, and was threatened by Turkey. But he subsequently obtained by diplomacy all he had hoped to gain by force, and a settlement was made on the Caspian Sea. Peter returned to Moscow, and subsequently proceeded to St. Petersburg. On the 1st February, 1724, Catherine was crowned Empress, her husband himself placing the diadem upon her brow. An order of St. Catherine was instituted for "Love and Fidelity,"—pledges which the patroness did not keep, for Peter's life was now embittered by his wife's infidelity and her excesses. Raised from the populace to the Imperial purple, the peasant nature cropped up. Her treason was discovered, her lover beheaded, and Peter very nearly had her also executed. He drove her to the spot where the head of Moens de la Croix, her paramour, had been set upon a pole, and hoped to enjoy her distress. But Catherine disappointed him. She betrayed no emotion whatever; and this self-command probably saved her life. After this Peter's health gave way. A long-neglected disease had been slowly but surely undermining his constitution; and this one of his last acts brought to a crisis. He made up his mind, contrary to all advice, to proceed to Lake Ladoga to inspect some ship-building. Thence he proceeded to Lachta; but a storm coming on, they anchored. A boat was putting off from another vessel, and ran imminent danger of destruction. Peter sent a boat to their assistance, and subsequently, with his usual energy, set out to help. Not being able to reach the boat in distress, he leaped into the water, and waded to the assistance of the soldiers. This act of humanity so greatly increased his disorder, that he had to retire immediately to St. Petersburg. His attack was incurable, and after living for days in great agony, he expired on the 28th of January, 1725, at the age of fifty-three, in the Peterhof Palace.

The body of Peter the Great, after lying in state, was laid to its last long rest in the Church of SS. Peter and Paul, at St. Petersburg. To his people he is nothing less than a saint; and to all people he stands forth as a marvellous embodiment of strength and energy, the Founder of a mighty Empire. He was a curious combination, full of contradictions, and yet thoroughly consistent to the great aims he had set before him,—the improvement of his kingdom and the welfare of his people. For these he sacrificed his son, and led up to his own death. He was subject to fits of cruelty, and his excesses were gross in the extreme. But, on the other hand, he was kind-hearted and generous and self-denying. Hundreds of people were assisted by him, and in Holland he is still most gratefully remembered. His public acts, more than those of any other Sovereign, speak for him, even if his domestic and private vices and deeds throw him personally into the shade of our condemnation. A barbarian, he civilized his people; a King, he worked like a slave. By his master mind he overcame all obstacles. In his later years he became much more sober and religious, and had a great respect for sacred forms and observances. His last words were, "I believe, and I trust."

A WORKING KING; ORIGIN OF THE KINGDOM OF PRUSSIA.

HISTORY has frequently given us, in those monarchs and men of might to whose names the epithet "the Great" has been attached, examples of genius, fulfilling difficult tasks with a precocious and complete ability that set ordinary rules at defiance. "Our general was but a boy," the army of Italy might well have said, of the young Bonaparte, "when with his Amazonian chin he drove the bristled lips before him," confounding the skill of veteran opponents. "Born a soldier" was the impressive comment of honest Major Lawrence upon young Robert Clive after the siege of Arcot—the "Boy Bachelor" was the honourable nickname bestowed upon young Wolsey when he took his university degree at fifteen years of age.

But it was not so with the great man of whom we have now to speak. Frederick of Prussia was a man who had to learn the art of war with much labour and perseverance, and whose triumphs were the results of hard and continued work. What others achieved at a stroke, was sometimes attained by Frederick only by repeated blows. While many kings appear to most advantage in the sunshine of success, his qualities appeared at their best amid defeat, danger, and misfortune. His was the courage that "mounteth with occasion;" and however dark the night of peril and sorrow might be, it never caused the iron heart of the undaunted king to quail, even for a moment. Whatever his faults may have been, he was a great reality in a period of shams; a staunch worker and watcher for the interests of his people at a time when the sovereigns of Europe generally were sunk in sloth and carelessness and vice.

The Emperor Sigismund of Germany, the monarch who summoned the great Church Council of Constance for the extirpation of the Hussite heresy in 1414, bestowed the Marquisate of Brandenburg upon Frederick von Buren, Burgrave of Nuremberg, of the noble race of Hohenzollern. Nearly two centuries and a half later, when the Peace of Westphalia put an end to the terrible Thirty Years' War, Frederick William, called the Great Elector, increased his territory by the addition of Magdeburg; and in 1700 his son Frederick became the first King of Prussia.

When Frederick, afterwards called the Great, was born, on the 24th of January, 1712, his grandfather, King Frederick I., was still seated on the new throne of the Prussian Monarchy. The new throne it may be called advisedly; for Prussia had only been elevated to the position of a kingdom for about twelve years. Indeed, there had been many who said the conversion of the Marquisate of Brandenburg into the kingdom of Prussia was simply a piece of ostentation that could have no effect but to draw upon the new monarchy the mingled contempt and dislike of the other powers of Europe. But this is incorrect, though Lord Macaulay's powerful and picturesque essay on Frederick the Great has spread the opinion widely throughout England. Elector Frederick knew perfectly well what he was about, when he laboured for years to remove the jealous objections of Austria to his assuming the royal title, and converting the Marquisate of Brandenburg, with its appurtenances, into the kingdom of Prussia. He was carrying out the idea of his father, the Great Elector, in endeavouring to obtain a new and improved position for the territory he governed, as a great Protestant power in North Germany, to hold the balance against Catholic Austria. At first the foundation of the Prussian kingdom was certainly looked upon as proceeding from the pride that finds pleasure in display; but the powers of Europe soon discovered that the new kingdom could hold its own among the monarchies, and the question was whether it might not become as dangerous a foe as it would certainly be a valuable ally.

FREDERICK WILLIAM I.; SPARTAN RULE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Only a year after his grandson's birth, the old magnificent, splendour-loving King Frederick died; and his son, Frederick William I., came to the throne. A very remarkable personage was this rough, thorough-going, hard-working monarch; and a notable contrast did he present, in his military uniform and with his garrison manners, to the scented, bedizened, brilliant fribbles who fluttered in most European courts. "Thou wouldst find me such a plain king," says bluff Harry V. to fair Princess Catherine of France, "that thou wouldst think I had sold my farm to buy my crown;" and the description would apply equally to this King of Prussia. Hard-working he was, and vigilant, and honestly bent on promoting the welfare of the people under his sway; but frightfully despotic and peremptory, unable to bear even the shadow of contradiction, and subject to fits of anger, during which he spoke and acted like a madman. Under his father, Berlin had been called the German Athens; under him, it might more properly be termed the German Sparta. His character had many of those traits which form what in England is termed "John Bull-ism," a hearty contempt for "oulandish" and "new-fangled" notions and modes of expression—a disposition to look backward rather than forward, to maintain the old, and turn with suspicion from the new. He looked with honest disgust on the extravagance of the courts of his time, whose selfish splendour was paid for by the poverty and misery of millions; but in his wish to bring up his family in a simple downright German-citizen fashion, he fell into the opposite extreme; and the hard discipline in the Royal Family, and the coarse fare put before the reluctant princes and princesses became a subject of wonder and ridicule among the envoys of the foreign courts at Berlin.

That Frederick William loved the Crown Prince, his son, and was anxious about his education, is undoubted; but never was the process of mental and physical training made more irksome to an unhappy pupil, than in the case of the young Prussian prince. Everything was presented to the eager, inquiring mind of the boy in the driest and most pedantic of forms; long portions of the Catechism; and numerous psalms, learnt as punishment tasks for juvenile misdoings, gave him a distaste for religious instruction generally. French teachers gave him a liking for the writers of France; while of the literature of his own country, which certainly at that time was in a most degraded condition, he had scarcely any notion. One part of his education had a powerful influence on his later career, by developing, in him military talent and the wish for military fame. A notion of making Prussia formidable by the possession of a great well-drilled army, was one of the most practical of Frederick William's ideas. He had a standing establishment of sixty thousand troops, "sixty thousand good reasons against foreign encroachment," he used, with grim humour, to call them—and the Crown Prince was, at an early age, attached to a juvenile corps, and made to go through the grades and fulfil the duties of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel of cadets. The young prince did his duty cheerfully and well; and to this early initiation into the details of the military art may be attributed not a little of the distinction Frederick afterwards attained as a soldier.

THE CROWN PRINCE A CONTRAST TO HIS FATHER; MISUNDERSTANDINGS.

But a willing horse may be spurred into rebellion; and by trying to achieve too much, the king turned the cheerful submission of his son into sullen and bitter opposition. The young prince's appreciative mind had been awakened to admiration of the French classic literature of the period. He loved the poetry of Racine and Corneille, and appreciated the wit of Molière; afterwards all his admiration was enlisted for that most dangerous of literary or moral guides, the great scoffer, Voltaire. The king's mind, on the other hand, was uncultivated, and his enjoyments were coarse. He hunted with the perseverance of a Squire Western, and solaced himself of an evening with the company of the members of his "Tobacco College," a beer-drinking, pipe-smoking symposium, to which the chief officers and counsellors belonged, and at whose meetings practical jokes of the coarsest nature were played off upon visitors. The king insisted that his son should be a member of this delectable society; and the youth occasionally gave vent to expressions of scorn and disgust at the proceedings. There was naturally no lack of "smiling pickthanks and base newsmongers" to report such outbursts to the king, who, already possessed with an uneasy feeling that his son was intellectually his superior, began to look upon the prince with suspicion and dislike. The continual hunting parties at the country palace of Wusterhausen were as little to the prince's taste as the coarse humours of the tobacco college; and his military duties became at last a burden to him, when the king insisted upon his continually wearing a tight uniform, and wearied him out with a long course of tedious and oft-repeated manoeuvres. The estrangement thus begun, quickly became serious. The father looked upon his son as a degenerate, lounging, flute-playing, supercilious coxcomb; while the son hardly concealed his contempt for the coarseness of the boorish father, who was embittering his life with absurd restrictions and commands.

Political circumstances now rendered the state of matters worse than before, by setting the heads of the royal house at variance. The queen was a daughter of George I. of England, and greatly wished to see the completion of a double marriage, the preliminaries for which had been negotiated with England, and which was to unite the Crown Prince to a daughter of George II., while his eldest sister, Wilhelmina, was to become consort of Frederick Prince of Wales. But causes of discontent, not unconnected with the vagaries of the Prussian king's recruiting officers, had arisen between the two crowns; and Austria, anxious to prevent an alliance between Prussia and England, had sent one of her most astute diplomatists, Count Seckendorf, to keep the king's anger alive against "his brother the play-actor," as he scornfully dubbed George of England. The queen, very injudiciously, enlisted her children on her side against their father, in her endeavours to carry out her plan of the double marriage; and the poor, passionate, angry king had the bitter consciousness that his wife and his children were engaged in a political intrigue against him.

STRANGE WHIM OF FREDERICK WILLIAM; VISIT TO DRESDEN; A SYBARITE COURT; ILL-TREATMENT OF THE CROWN PRINCE.

A fit of hypochondria, almost amounting to insanity, was the consequence. Frederick William, in an access of religious melancholy, actually cherished the extraordinary idea of abdicating the throne altogether, and passing the rest of his life with his wife and daughters at Wusterhausen, in alternate exercises of agriculture and prayer; one of the princesses was to superintend the store-room and linen closet, another to be the housekeeper for the family, and so on. An antidote was found in a visit to the splendid court of Augustus, the Elector of Saxony and King of Poland.

This potentate was in himself the personification of all the vices and misrule that led to the tremendous crash of thrones in Continental Europe at the end of the 18th century. Indescribably dissolute and extravagant, he kept up a court whose splendour was maintained by grinding his unhappy Saxon subjects in a mill of taxation, whose wheels never ceased turning. He had abjured the faith of his fathers to obtain the empty honour of the Polish crown, and ground his Saxon subjects with renewed oppression, to maintain the splendour of this useless dignity. Like the Emperor Augustus, he could boast that he had found his capital built of brick, and left it of stone, if not of marble; for he was magnificent in his notions, and delighted in seeing new and stately buildings rise in the fair city on the banks of the Elbe. Rich collections of pictures, jewels, curiosities of all kinds, bore witness to the wealth of this royal voluptuary; but in the country districts, among the patient agriculturists, and in the manufactories and the mines, on which his taxation rested with a crushing weight, curses not loud but deep were uttered against the ruler who wasted his subjects' substance in riotous living, and useless wars, and corruption of all kinds. If the sturdy, plain old King of Prussia had required anything to strengthen him in his habits of military discipline and parsimony, he would have found it in the warning example afforded by the splendid vanity fair of wickedness in full operation at Dresden. Indeed, to some of his immediate friends he expressed in no measured terms his disgust that the Crown Prince, by whom he was accompanied, should have beheld the mysteries of this detestable court.

The festivities of Dresden seem to have rendered the Crown Prince especially dissatisfied with the quiet, plain, work-day life he was expected to lead in Berlin; and from this time began those dissensions between Frederick and his father, which at length resulted in the imprisonment of the Crown Prince, and the execution of one of his dearest friends. It has been too much the custom to throw all the blame on the father in these matters; and the brilliant but one-sided narrative of Lord Macaulay, in his famous essay on Frederick the Great, has tended to confirm this impression. But at least half the fault certainly belonged to the prince, who seems to have taken a pleasure in crossing the inclinations of the king on every subject. When the king expected his son to be attending to his military or political duties, the latter was practising the flute in secret with Quantz, the musician, privately smuggled into the castle for surreptitious music lessons. On one occasion, Master Quantz had to take refuge in a cupboard in the prince's apartment, on the king's unexpectedly appearing. The unhappy musician passed a very bad quarter of an hour, while the king, who seemed to suspect all was not right, was peering and prying about the room. Then the Crown Prince would insist upon reading French books,—preferring the writings of those philosophers whom the king held in a detestation proportionate to his utter inability to guess what their works were about. The Prince, moreover, besides committing other indiscretions, got into debt, and borrowed money in secret, to keep his father in the dark; and a very dangerous companion, young Lieutenant von Katte, a seductive but dissolute youth, managed to inoculate him with certain crude notions concerning predestination as an excuse for sin on the score of necessity, a doctrine that horrified and enraged the king, to whom these things were duly reported, and who got to look upon his eldest son as an effeminate, degenerate dreamer, utterly unworthy of his position. The unfortunate youth submitted for a time to the indignities put upon him; and this was interpreted as cowardice by the old tyrant, who growled out contemptuously, as he threatened the Crown Prince with his uplifted cane, that if his own father had treated him in such a fashion, he'd have run away a thousand times; but that the Crown Prince had not the spirit for that. Wilhelmina, afterwards Margravine of Bayreuth, and the elder and favourite sister of Frederick, gives, in her interesting memoirs, a specimen of what her brother had to bear, told in his own words: "They're always preaching patience to me," said the poor prince to the good sister, who came secretly to comfort him; "but nobody knows what I have to endure. I get cuffed every day, am treated like a slave, and haven't the slightest amusement. They stop my reading and music and science, and I'm always in peril of my life, and surrounded by spies; I haven't even proper clothes and other necessities; but what has quite overpowered me is the last scene I had with the king at Potsdam. He sent for me; and the moment I appeared, he caught me by the hair, flung me on the ground, and after exercising his feet on me, he dragged me to the window, and fastened the cord of the curtain round my neck. Fortunately I had time to scramble up and to seize his two hands; but as he pulled the cord with all his might, and I felt myself being strangled, I at last cried for help. A chamberlain rushed up, and forcibly released me from the king's hands. Tell me yourself, is there any means left for me but flight? Katte and Keith (the lieutenant and a good-natured page) are ready to follow me to the ends of the earth; I have passports, and bills of exchange, and have arranged everything so well, that I don't run the slightest risk. I shall flee to England; there I shall be received with open arms, and have nothing more to fear from the king's anger. . . . So soon as the king undertakes a journey outside his dominions—for that will give me more security—everything is ready for the attempt."

AN EXPLOSION; ATTEMPTED FLIGHT OF THE PRINCE, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

The brutality of the king seems incomprehensible even in a hot-tempered man, spoiled by arbitrary power; but there was a continual cause of bitterness in his secret mind, in the consciousness that his family were again intriguing against him, to bring about the English marriages. At length an opportunity for flight occurred. The king undertook a journey to the south of Germany, and the Crown Prince was to accompany him. Young Frederick determined, at the first chance, to flee to Holland, and thence to England. He was stopped at the very moment of putting his plan into execution. A misdirected letter to his friend and accomplice, Katte, fell into the king's hands, and left no doubt as to the enterprise, and the manner in which it was to be carried out. The king was furious. He had the prince arrested and put in close confinement, and when the unhappy youth was brought before him, struck him in the face with his cane. At Wesel he was examined as a state prisoner by the king, who threateningly asked him why he had attempted to desert. "Because you have treated me not as your son, but as a slave," replied Frederick. "Thou art a miserable deserter!" thundered the king, "who has no heart and no honour in his body." "I have as much as you," was the prince's retort, "and I have only done what you told me a hundred times you would have done in my place!" The king in his fury drew his sword, and would have stabbed his son, had not the commandant of the fortress, a General Mosel, arrested his arm, crying out, "Kill me, sire, but spare your son." Frederick was again led away a prisoner. Keith, warned by a line in pencil by the Crown Prince, made his escape. Katte was less fortunate; he received a warning, but tarried too long, and was arrested just as he was about to mount his horse and flee. The king returned to Berlin, fully convinced, and not without reason, that there was a plot against him, and that his wife and children were the chief conspirators. He swore that the prince should die, and the Princess Wilhelmina also. The whole court was in consternation; and only one person, a brave lady attached to the queen's household, dared to remonstrate with the angry master. "Till now," said this undaunted dame, "it was your pride to be a just king, and God has blessed you for it. Now you are going to become a tyrant; but dread the anger of God! Sacrifice your son to your fury; but be assured of the anger of heaven. Think of Peter the Great and Philip II.; they died without heirs, and their memory is held in horror among men."

The fortress of Cüstrin was designated as the prison of the Crown Prince, who was kept in the strictest and hardest confinement. Books, pen and ink, and even a knife and fork at mealtimes, were denied him; but the commandant, President Münchow, who pitied him, managed to procure him some light alleviation of his woes. Poor Katte and even the prince himself were to be tried as deserters. The court-martial condemned the former to degradation, and imprisonment in a fortress, declaring itself incompetent to deal with the Crown Prince. But the king, in great anger, pronounced Katte guilty of lèse majesté, and caused him to be beheaded. The prince himself was in great danger; but foreign courts, and especially Austria, intervened and remonstrated; the king, also, was partially satisfied by the execution of Katte; and in a short time a message was sent to the prince, to the effect that his father would not completely pardon him, yet his close imprisonment should cease, though he would have to remain within the walls of the fortress, and to do the duty of a councillor in the meetings held in the castle. The prince had sufficient good sense to see the object of his father in this proceeding; and by industry and attention to his duties strengthened the king's milder intentions towards him. An interview took place between father and son, and a real reconciliation followed. Still the sturdy old king was determined that the prince should receive a lesson for life. Frederick remained some time longer at Cüstrin; but now he sat beside the president at the meetings of the council, and countersigned all its decrees. At a great entertainment given in Potsdam, to celebrate the betrothal of the Princess Wilhelmina to the Margrave of Bayreuth, Frederick was suddenly introduced to the court; and his reinstatement in his military rank completed the reconciliation.

A HAPPIER PERIOD; MARRIAGE OF FREDERICK; LIFE AT RHEINSBERG.

The period of peril and suffering through which Frederick had passed, strengthened his character, and taught him caution. From that time he learned to watch the king's humours with unerring sagacity, and to appreciate the warmth of heart and the real worth concealed under the rough manners and violent temper of the sturdy old Brandenburger. The king's suspicions of intrigues with England were also finally set at rest by Frederick's marriage, in obedience to his father's will, with the Princess Elizabeth Christine, of Brunswick Bevern, a niece of the Empress of Germany. This marriage was, however, a heavy sacrifice made by the prince for the sake of peace. He disliked the bride forced upon him by his father's Austrian policy, and never during his long and childless married life did he admit her to his confidence. Though he lived to see the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage day, the golden wedding, usual on such occasions, was not celebrated; and his consort, who survived him eleven years, died without ever having seen his favourite residence of Sans-Souci. In his later years he would dine with the queen occasionally at Potsdam; but on such occasions, beyond a grave salutation at meeting and parting, he never took any notice of the poor lady, nor addressed a word to her; so that she sat at the head of her table, in the most mournful sense of the word, a "state statue." With his marriage a brighter period of his history begins. He was established in the castle of Rheinsberg, near the town of Ruppin, where the regiment he commanded was quartered; and here, for some years, he led a very pleasant life, of a kind that gave little indication of the great qualities that were one day to excite the wonder of Europe. He surrounded himself with a society of wits and gay companions, chiefly of French extraction, founded a romantic order of knighthood, called the order of Bayard, to contain only twelve members, with the French chevalier's famous motto for their sign, "Without fear and without reproach." Literature, especially of the French classical school, was assiduously cultivated; and Frederick himself produced many verses founded on the model of Voltaire, for whom he had a great admiration. A guest of Frederick's has some highly enthusiastic remarks in a description of Rheinsberg and its inmates. He says: "All who live in the castle as guests, enjoy the most unlimited freedom. They see the Crown Prince and his consort only at table, at theatrical representations, balls, concerts, and other feasts in which they can take part. Every one thinks, reads, draws, writes, plays on instruments, employs or amuses himself in his room until dinner-time. Then we dress neatly, but without splendour or extravagance, and betake ourselves to the dining-room. All the employments and amusements of the Crown Prince exhibit the man of mind. His conversation at dinner is inimitable; he speaks much and well. No subject appears strange or too lofty for him; on every one he finds a number of new and apposite remarks. . . . He jests and banters sometimes, but without malice, and can accept a witty repartee without offence."

With the old king he had come to a perfect understanding. So long as the Crown Prince's regiment made a good appearance, and fulfilled its part well at the great annual manoeuvres, and so long as Frederick himself showed a certain interest in state affairs, his father was satisfied. Indeed, like most arbitrary and passionate men, he was rather pleased than otherwise that his son should not interfere with his plans; and especially since Frederick, in a campaign he served under the now veteran Prince Eugene, had given proof of personal courage and readiness, the king's mind was at rest on an important point; and he no longer feared that his brave subjects would be ruled after his death by a degenerate and frivolous trifier, or that the brave army which, especially the brigade of giant guards, had been his especial delight, would lack a leader to point the road to victory. "Here stands one who will avenge me!" he said one day to the Austrian envoy, as, leaning on the shoulder of his son, he listened, with bitterness in his heart, to the attempted excuses of the Vienna court, for the neglect and coldness manifested towards his house by that of Hapsburg. Indeed, during his last years, Frederick William showed in a very practical manner that his son had his full confidence. Thus, when he fell ill, he decreed that the prince's signature to state documents should be equally valid with his own; and the prince, on his part, took care to flatter the parental weakness, especially by an occasional present of some gigantic recruit, for the famous Saxon guard.

FREDERICK'S LITERARY LABOURS; HIS ACCESSION; END OF THE RHEINSBERG DAYS.

The companions of Frederick during the pleasant Rheinsberg days appear to have understood his character very imperfectly, or hardly at all. He seemed so fond of pleasure, so given to producing very indifferent verses in bewildering abundance, so ready to admire second-rate literary performances, and to look upon Voltaire, with whom he kept up a correspondence for many years, as a literary deity, that they were inclined to regard him as one likely to postpone business to enjoyment, and to prove a good-natured, literature and art-loving, and not over-industrious king. Two works of some importance, written by him at this period, showed that at any rate he was capable of sustained literary effort, and that theoretically he understood both the position of political affairs in Europe and the duties and responsibilities of a ruler. The first of these works is entitled "Considerations on the Present Condition of the European State-system;" the second is a refutation of the Florentine Machiavelli's historical work, "The Prince," and sets forth in glowing words how virtue, justice, and benevolence, and not despotic power, should be the foundation of a monarch's throne. Voltaire edited this last-mentioned work, and sang its praises in the loudest key. How far the practice of the royal author agreed with his professions, the world was soon to learn.

The great wish of the old king, as his last hour drew nigh, was to leave no shadow of doubt in the minds of his friends as to the completeness of his confidence in his son. "I die content," he cried, in the presence of the whole court, "in the consciousness of having so worthy a son and successor." When he felt that his last hour had almost come, he summoned all the principal civil and military functionaries around him, and solemnly adjured them to show to his son the zeal and fidelity they had shown so long towards himself. Then with the calmness of a man conscious of having endeavoured to do his duty, he prepared for death. He expired on the 31st of May, 1740.

And now the startled inhabitants of pleasant Rheinsberg found that the new King Frederick II. of Prussia could appear in a character very different from that of the refined and polished, if somewhat sarcastic host. They looked forward to increased prosperity, and to fêtes and banquets at Berlin on an enlarged scale. But Frederick knew that with him the serious business of life was beginning; and when he came suddenly upon one of his followers who was writing a letter inviting a brother to come to Berlin, on the chance of a merry life in the king's company, Frederick, looking over his shoulder, took the unauthorised invitation out of his hand, tore it to pieces, and said very gravely, "These fooleries are over now." Not that he was ungrateful to those who had suffered for him in long past days of trouble. The father of poor Katte was created a count and field-marshal; Duhan, Frederick's old tutor, who had been banished by the angry father, was recalled and liberally pensioned. Keith, who had escaped just in time to avoid Katte's fate, and Münchow, who had shown Frederick kindness at Custrin, were both promoted by the new king, who moreover made himself popular by a liberal distribution of seed-corn in districts impoverished by a winter of unprecedented length following upon a bad harvest.

FREDERICK THE RULER; AUSTRIA AND THE PRAGMATIC SANCTION.

Under his predecessor, Prussia had been far better governed than any other part of the great German Empire; for sturdy old Frederick William, with all his faults, had been ever anxious to promote the welfare of his people. But it had been material prosperity alone that the king thus advanced. His own mind had never been cultivated; he looked upon intellect generally as a dangerous thing; and journalism, as tending to encourage the expression of thought, he held in especial horror. Frederick understood that intellectual activity was as necessary as improved agriculture and manufactures to the progress of a state. Instead of forbidding the circulation of newspapers, he assisted in the establishment of two journals in his capital. Freedom of speech and writing, far surpassing the liberty allowed even in England at that period, prevailed throughout his States. On the fifth day after his accession he issued a decree abolishing the use of torture, a cruel and foolish custom which prevailed in the rest of Germany for a considerable time longer. Perfect toleration was his principle with regard to religious matters. As he expressed it "in his States every man could work out his salvation in his own fashion (nach seiner façon), and he cared little for the voice of libel and slander. Especially in Berlin, lampoons and squibs of a stinging character were very frequently circulated. Frederick laughed at the wit in these productions, when there was any to laugh at; and for the rest let them and their authors severally alone. "I and my Berliners understand each other very well," he once observed to Sir Thomas Mitchell, the English ambassador; "they say just what they like, and I do just what I like, and we're both of us satisfied." At one time, when he had incurred some censure, especially among the housewives of Prussia, by an increased duty on coffee, a wag brought out a caricature, in which the king was represented sitting on a stool with a coffee mill between his knees, turning the handle with one hand, and with the other collecting the berries that had fallen to the ground. Copies of this delectable picture were stuck up on the walls of Berlin; and once the king, riding through the streets of Berlin, came upon a crowd staring at one of them. When he found what it was, he said drily to one of his attendants, "Fasten it lower on the wall, the people cannot see it properly." But as he turned his horse's head to ride away, there was a shout of laughter; and amid a cry of "Long live the King!" the objectionable placard was torn down by a hundred eager hands, and destroyed.

The celebrated giant-guard had been a very expensive institution; and the king, who intended that his soldiers should be like those of the fifth Harry, warriors for the working day, accordingly disbanded it, the men being distributed among other regiments. So great had been the cost of this corps, that Frederick was enabled, by the suppression, to add 10,000 men to his regular army.

That army was soon to have work to do, very different from the parades and field-days in which Frederick William had delighted. On the 20th of October, 1740, the Emperor Charles VI.

of Germany died. For centuries there had been a grudge between the Austrian house and that of Brandenburg. The latter house had several times suffered injustice at the hands of the princes of Austria, with whom land hunger was hereditary. Various principalities in Silesia, such as Brieg, Jägerndorf, Wohlau, and Liegnitz, having fallen by inheritance to the princes of Brandenburg, had been withheld from the rightful heirs by Austria, quick to grasp, and tenacious to hold. Under Charles VI. there seemed a prospect that the different crowns of the Austrian house would be dispersed at that monarch's death, for he had no son; therefore, though various European powers had claims to different parts of the great Austrian heritage, the emperor had succeeded in obtaining the adhesion of the governments to a new law of succession, known as the Pragmatic Sanction. That the promises had not been very readily given, may be gathered from Prince Eugene's pithy advice to the emperor to emphasize the measure with an army of 180,000 men; but at the time no single state was strong enough to resist singly, and there was no bond of union among the dissatisfied states. So the Pragmatic Sanction was concluded, by virtue of which the Archduchess Maria Theresa, his daughter, and wife of Francis of Lorraine, should succeed to his hereditary dominions.

FREDERICK BEGINS THE FIRST SILESIAN WAR; 1740.

Charles went down to his grave in the belief that this arrangement would be peaceably carried out; but the reckoning had been made without the apparently insignificant denizen of Rheinsberg, who was thought more apt at criticizing a French tragedy than likely to play a dangerous political game. But under the outward aspect of a somewhat epicurean philosophy the new king of Prussia concealed a fiery and determined ambition. He found his country well prepared for war; his coffers full, his army well disciplined and numerous. His grandfather, the first king of Prussia, had once said bitterly, with regard to this Silesian claim, "If God and time give no other opportunities than we have now, we must be content; but if God sends it otherwise, my successors will know and learn what is fitting for them to do and to leave undone." And the change in public affairs having now brought the opportunity, Frederick determined to strike a blow to gain fame for himself and the province of Silesia for Prussia.

He began his operations secretly, and with great despatch. Even the massing of Prussian troops on the Silesian frontier did not open the eyes of the Austrian cabinet to the real intentions of the philosophic king; though the ambassador in Berlin gave timely warning. An additional envoy, Count Botta, however, was sent to Berlin, and pointedly told the king that the roads were so bad in Silesia at that time as to make travelling there an impossibility. "The worst that could happen would be that a man might soil his clothes," replied the imperturbable king, who perfectly understood Botta's allusion. The Austrian warned him seriously of the perils of the step he contemplated, reminding him that his troops, handsome as they appeared, had not yet been under fire. "You confess that my troops are handsome," cried the king impatiently; "you shall soon allow that they are good, too."

With a sudden invasion of the province, the first Silesian war began in the winter of 1740. The Austrian government had no army worthy of the name to oppose the Prussian forces in Silesia, and were not able even adequately to garrison the fortresses. Some towns yielded at the first summons. "Here on the table lie the keys of the town gates," said the politic mayor of Grüneberg to the officer who demanded those implements in the name of the King of Prussia. "I will not give them to you upon any consideration; but if you choose to take them, I cannot prevent you." Glogau, Breslau, Ohlau, and Brunzlau, the most important fortresses, were soon in the king's hands. Neisse, the strongest of all, was bombarded; and though it still held out, when the troops were sent into winter quarters, the Prussians were masters of the province. To Jordan, one of his Rheinsberg friends, who was distinguished by his love of peace, Frederick, whom the rapid and prosperous result had put into the best of spirits, wrote in the following terms:—

"My dear Herr Jordan, my sweet Herr Jordan, my gentle Herr Jordan, my good, my mild, my peace-loving, my most benevolent Herr Jordan! I have to announce to thy cheerfulness that Silesia is as good as conquered, and that Neisse is already being bombarded; I prepare thee for important projects, and announce to thee the greatest good luck that ever proceeded from the lap of Fortune. Let this suffice for the present. Be my Cicero in defending my cause; in carrying it out I will be thy Cæsar. Farewell! thou knowest that I am, with heartiest affection, thy faithful friend."

If this letter shows too much of the exultation of the man who goes into war "with a light heart," the next, addressed to Jordan a few days later, is objectionable for the hardly disguised cynicism of its tone. It could not be a very good-natured or even conscientious man who could write in such a strain as the following, concerning one of the most terrible necessities of modern warfare: "I have the honour to announce to your philanthropy that we are making preparations, in right Christian fashion, to bombard Neisse, and that if the town does not surrender willingly, we shall be compelled to batter it to the ground."

But Neisse held out bravely against the Prussians. The besieged took the trouble to keep the ice in the moat broken, and ingeniously drenched the walls with water every day, which soon made them as slippery as sheets of glass; and Frederick was fain to return to Berlin to receive the congratulations of his subjects upon what had been effected. The open country lay in the hands of the Prussians, but no victory in the field had yet laid the foundation of Frederick's military glory; and, in general, his action in challenging Austria to a trial of strength was looked upon as the temerity of a madman.

MOLLWITZ AND CHOTUSITZ.

At Mollwitz, near Brieg, on April 10th, 1741, was fought the first battle between Frederick and the Austrians; and on this day Frederick appeared in a very disadvantageous light, although the victory was won for him by the discipline and steadiness of his troops, especially the infantry, and by the knowledge and experience of the stout old Field-Marshal Schwerin, who had learned the art of war under no less a master than Charles XII. of Sweden. But the right wing, where the king commanded, was thrown into confusion; Schwerin himself counselled Frederick to retire across the Oder, and bring up reinforcements. The king not only quitted the field, but actually rode as far as Oppeln, outstripping the corps of gendarmes who accompanied him. At Oppeln, where he arrived at midnight, he found the gates shut against him, for the town was occupied by Austrian troops. It was more than twenty-four miles from the battle-field, towards which Frederick now turned back, to find that his troops had won the victory—in his absence! It is only justice to the king to say that in his memoirs he frankly confesses the faults he made before and at Mollwitz, modestly adding that he tried to avoid those faults, and to do better in future.

One thing the battle of Mollwitz had plainly demonstrated, namely, that the Prussian troops could manoeuvre as steadily on the battle-field as on the parade-ground, and that they were worthy to look the veterans of Prince Eugene in the face. Austria was not invincible; and accordingly the Continent was up in arms. The Austrian inheritance was now the carcass round which the eagles were gathered together. Charles Albert of Bavaria laid claim to part of the empire of Charles VI., and hoped to obtain the suffrages of the electors for the imperial crown of Germany. Frederick entered into alliance with Bavaria, and likewise with France, while the Queen of Hungary had Saxony and England as her allies. The progress of the Prussians in Silesia was rapid, and Charles Albert and the French were approaching. Obligated to fly from Vienna, Maria Theresa took refuge at Presburg among the magnates of her kingdom of Hungary, and placed herself and her little son under their protection. "Moriatur pro rege nostro, Maria Theresa"—We will die for our monarch, Maria Theresa—was the cry of the Diet, when the young queen appeared in the council hall with the little archduke in her arms. If she were only relieved from the Prussian invasion, there would be a chance against her other enemies; the English ambassador arrived with strong representations from George II., declaring the cession of Silesia, however bitter it might appear, to be an absolute necessity; Frederick had, moreover, received the homage of the magnates and estates of Lower Silesia at Breslau; and moreover managed to win over the heavy and stupid Elector of Saxony Augustus to his side, in spite of the opposition of the minister Brühl, who hated Frederick, and suspected his sincerity, not without reason.

A victory gained by the king at Chotusitz, under circumstances that proved how much he had profited by the experiences of Mollwitz, induced Maria Theresa, with a heavy heart, to listen to the counsels of England, and cede Silesia to Frederick. Peace between Austria and Prussia was thereupon proclaimed, to the dismay of France and Bavaria, against whom the Queen of Hungary was now able to turn her arms. She was victorious; and the Elector of Bavaria, who had been raised to the imperial throne under the title of Charles VII., was obliged to retreat from Prague, where he had established himself. The French army made a disastrous retreat towards the Rhine, during which many thousands perished; and the Queen of Hungary, strengthened by a new alliance with England, Holland, Sardinia, and Saxony, thought of nothing less important than deposing the Emperor and compelling Frederick to restore Silesia. Madam, what's good to take, is good to give back," old George II. of England had written to her.

THE SECOND SILESIAN WAR, 1744; TREATY OF AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, 1748.

Frederick had no wish to see Austria raised to a position of paramount authority. Accordingly he renewed his alliance with France, and in 1744 the second Silesian war began. But his French allies deceived him, his two chief generals, Schwerin and the Prince of Dessau quarrelled, and the former quitted the army in disgust. Frederick himself committed some faults during this campaign, and admitted that the whole advantage was on the side of Austria. "Good fortune has often worse consequences for princes than disaster," he wrote in his memoirs; "it intoxicates them with conceit, while disaster teaches them caution and moderation."

In the next campaign he was more fortunate. After narrowly escaping capture at the hands of a band of Croats, by assuming the disguise of an ecclesiastic, when the convent of Camenz, where he was visiting the abbot, was suddenly surprised, he gained the important battles of Hohenfriedberg and Soor. "It's a pleasure to fight with you, gentlemen," said the officers of an Austrian detachment, on encountering a Prussian corps; "one always finds something to learn." The Prussian officers replied with equal civility, that the Austrians had been good teachers, and had by their fiery onslaught taught them how to defend themselves. In the following campaign "the old Dessauer," as the soldiers called the grim hereditary prince, won a splendid victory for Frederick over the Saxons at Kesselsdorf. The veteran, familiar with battle-fields for half a century, was looked upon as invulnerable by the soldiers who followed him unhesitatingly wherever he chose to lead, and on this occasion performed prodigies of valour. Thereupon in Dresden, which city he entered as a conqueror, Frederick signed a new treaty of peace. It is pleasant to observe that on the evening of his triumphal entry he found time to drive to a quiet lane, where, in an upper chamber of an unpretentious house, his old tutor Duhan lay dying. The king sat down by the bedside, and spoke words of comfort and kindness to his old friend, who with a light of joy and gratitude in his failing eyes declared "that now he had seen his beloved pupil once more, he could depart in peace." Much has been said by various unfriendly biographers of the harshness of the king's character: that he was bitter and sarcastic, and showed in many instances a deep contempt for his fellow-men, is not to be denied ; but it is bare justice to record of him that he never failed to remember with warm and hearty gratitude the services of those who had stood by him in misfortune, or had shown him anything like disinterested affection and regard.

Thus with consummate skill, though at times with few scruples concerning abstract justice, and very little regard for the faith of treaties, Frederick had picked his way through the perils of the long war he had stirred up. He had won the object for which he fought, the province of Silesia, and had astonished Europe by the display of the prowess of his troops. With far more truth than Henry VIII. in the affairs of France and Austria he could say, "Qui je défend est maître." Prussia now occupied a far higher place in the councils of Europe than she could have claimed in 1740 ; and when in 1748 the general peace of Aix-la-Chapelle put an end to the war, a special clause guaranteed to the vigorous and unscrupulous King of Prussia the possession of the province for which he had risked so much.

A PERIOD OF PEACE; FREDERICK'S SYSTEM OF RULE; PERSONAL GOVERNMENT; SANS-SOUCI.

Eight years of peace followed upon the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; eight years during which the indefatigable king laboured unceasingly, and in most instances judiciously, for the progress and improvement of his country. That here and there his zeal was indiscreet, there is no doubt—notably, when he interfered with the administration of justice; sometimes when he attempted improvements, in the way of manufactures, agricultural processes, and military arrangements. According to his idea, the state was a body, of which the king represented the heart whence life-blood circulated through the whole complicated organization. He wished, as far as possible, to do everything himself, and therefore would have no influential cabinet, but merely men of detail around him. "Apply to me personally; I'm your Prime Minister," was the admonition he addressed to a deputation of the Chamber of Commerce. Even matters of detail were settled by the king personally, and his enormous memory often enabled him to astonish all around him; he seemed minutely acquainted with particulars that seldom come to the knowledge or linger in the minds of kings. One day a patent for the appointment of a 'Landrath,' or rural magistrate, was placed before him for signature. On seeing the name in the patent, Frederick refused, in spite of the eulogium pronounced by the minister on the candidate, to ratify the appointment. At his command a certain volume of the records of the superior courts was brought. "See here," said the king, with his finger on an entry in a certain page, "this man has had a long lawsuit with his own mother for a few acres of land, and she has been obliged to take an oath, on her very death-bed, about a miserable affair like that. How can I expect a fellow with such a heart will work for the good of my subjects? No, that will not do; let them choose some one else!" By dint of very early rising—his hour was sometimes four o'clock in winter, and even earlier in summer—Frederick managed to get through an immense amount of business, political, military, and general, in the course of the long forenoon, and thus to preserve a part of the day for intellectual and scientific pursuits. His flute remained for many years a favourite means of relaxation to him. In the short intervals of rest between various tasks of business, he would walk to and fro in the room, extemporising, while his thoughts would wander far away; and many a good idea, he would say, came to him during these musical playhours. He built a new palace at Potsdam. This building was to be the Rheinsberg of his better days, Rheinsberg itself having been transferred by him to his brother Henry; to this residence he gave the name of Sans-Souci, and 'the philosopher of Sans-Souci' was the signature he appended to many literary treatises dated from this palace. Here also it was that the sturdy countryman whose mill stood on a bit of freehold land surrounded by the royal domain, refused, like Naboth of old, to sell the inheritance of his fathers to the king; and Frederick, not being an Ahab, let the building stand where it was—a monument of the exceeding justice of the invader of Silesia. "Ce sont-là jeux de Prince, on respecte un moulin, on vole une province," wrote a satiric poet. But there was a deeper meaning in the name. On the terrace was a square marble pedestal, surmounted by a statue of a reclining Flora. Beneath this pedestal, so privately built that very few were aware of its existence, was a vault, in which the king had determined that his ashes should one day rest. "When I am there," he said once to a friend to whom he entrusted the secret, "I shall be 'sans souci.'" He spoke the truth; for, active and diligent to the last, he was a king whose cares could end only with his life.

FREDERICK AND HIS ASSOCIATES; A JOURNEY INCOGNITO.

The brilliant company who assembled around the royal table at Sans-Souci—consisting of poets like D'Argens and Baculard d'Arnaud, men of the world, and supple courtiers like the Abbé la Mettrie, men of science like Maupertius, the president of the Academy of Berlin—contributed to make the king's parties brilliant and intellectual. Dargens, Frederick's literary secretary, was also a welcome guest. Algarotti and Bastiani, the ingenious Italians, contributed to the meetings the charms of their somewhat servile wit and ingenuity. Then there was the ingenious Baron Pölnitz, a most convivial and jovial character, but much given to quarrelling, and debt, and irregular living—inasmuch that it was forbidden in Berlin, by public mandate, under a penalty of a hundred ducats, to lend him any sum of money whatever, and the king laid down formal rules for the eccentric baron's behaviour, to which Pölnitz had to subscribe. He was especially to keep clear of the ambassadors, and behave himself at table. A very different kind of guest was Colonel Forçade, bravest of officers, to whom the king himself brought a chair when the veteran, who had been wounded in the foot at Soor, leaned for support against a window in the presence chamber. The two Keiths—James, whom Frederick advanced to the dignity of a field-marshal, and his elder brother George, Lord Mareschal of Scotland, both fugitives from their country ever since the rebellion of 1715—found a home at Berlin and Potsdam, and were always treated with special confidence and honour by the king. The field-marshal met a soldier's death at Hochkirchen. His brother George, the Earl Marcschal, lived to be eighty-eight years old, and used to declare that the king, had he lived some centuries earlier, would have been burnt by the Inquisition, for that Frederick's power of fascination in attracting people to him amounted to sorcery.

Stout old Field-Marshal Schwerin, too, who had left Frederick's service somewhat in dudgeon, was won back by the politic king. At Frederick's summons, Schwerin came to Potsdam, and had a private interview with his master. The attendant hussar in the ante-chamber heard the voices of the king and his visitor raised in anger during the interview. But presently the storm abated; the old field-marshal came forth with a satisfied smile on his bronzed face, and the king called out, "Your Excellency will dine with me." The reconciliation was complete—greatly to the advantage of Frederick, who never had a braver or more efficient officer in his army than Schwerin. But the man whom the king looked upon as the great and especial "lion" in the brilliant society of Potsdam was Voltaire, whom disappointments and annoyances in France, coupled with warm invitations from Frederick, induced to take up his residence for a time at Potsdam;—infinitely to his sorrow, for he had faults of which the king was impatient, and at the same time was little disposed to conform to the military strictness of the rules which the king, punctilious in all things, laid down even in his friendships. They quarrelled; and Voltaire quitted Potsdam in disgust, to be afterwards subjected to insult and arrest at Frankfort, at the secret command, it is said, of Frederick, and at last to establish himself as the 'philosopher of Ferney,' on the banks of the lake of Geneva. In their actual quarrel Voltaire appears to have been in the wrong; but Frederick was not free from blame. In fact, he seems to have been considerably disenchanted by closer intercourse with the man whom in his earlier days he had idolized as the prince of poets and philosophers. "I shall not want him more than a year," he once said, in confidential talk to a courtier; "we squeeze an orange, and then throw away the rind." And this was at a time when he had completely turned Voltaire's head with honeyed words of welcome. But Voltaire deserved it; he himself was extravagantly lauding the king's poems in public, while in private he sneeringly described the royal manuscripts submitted for his revision and correction as "the king's dirty linen sent to him to wash."

One of the most agreeable events of this period was a journey the king made incognito to Holland. His chief object was to visit the art collections, with a view to a gallery at Potsdam. Dressed in a plain cinnamon-coloured coat, with gold buttons and a black wig, and accompanied by a single officer, Colonel Balbi, and by a page, he assumed the character of a travelling flute-player. In the hotel at Amsterdam, where he ordered a certain costly kind of pâté, the hostess, judging the strangers by appearances, asked if her guests could afford to pay for so expensive a dish. The king, entering into the joke, played a sonata on his flute, to convince mine hostess that he was no ordinary musician. "Very good sir," she observed; "I see you can pipe very well, and I suppose you can pay your way. You shall have the pâté."

THE GREAT COALITION AGAINST FREDERICK.

A very different time was approaching—a time when the very existence of the king's throne was to be threatened, and when utter ruin was to stare him in the face for years; a time that taxed to the utmost every resource of his acute mind and iron resolution. Maria Theresa had never forgiven him for depriving her of Silesia; and now, as Empress of Germany and Queen of Hungary, and with undisputed and despotic authority over the warlike resources of vast dominions, she resolved to organize a great coalition against Frederick, to recover Silesia, and to reduce the kingdom of Prussia once more to the Marquisate of Brandenburg. To form such a coalition, at a time when Europe was at profound peace, for a purely personal object, might appear almost impossible; but at that time the chief authority in the great Continental States was in the hands of women whom Frederick had offended by his bitter satire and his contemptuous jests. The Czarina, Elizabeth of Russia, was the first to join the Empress-queen; then followed Saxony, where the Electress-queen was Frederick's bitter enemy. France, nominally under the sway of the slothful and debauched Louis XV., was so entirely ruled by the female favourites of that worthless monarch, that Frederick was accustomed sarcastically to designate the different periods as the reign of Petticoats First, Second, and Third. Madame de Pompadour now ruled the unhappy country and the miserable king. Frederick had sarcastically replied, "I don't know her," when she sent greetings to him at Berlin. Maria Theresa, on the other hand, had condescended to address her as "princess," "cousin," "dearest sister." On such grounds as these France was brought into the coalition organized by a vindictive woman against a hated foe. At length Austria, Russia, France, the Germanic body, Saxony, and Sweden stood united together against Prussia, which, but for a promise of help from England, could not count on a single ally; and the princes and leaders in the French camp at Agincourt did not count more confidently on the defeat of the foe on the eve of that memorable battle, than did the united powers on the annihilation of Prussia at the commencement of the great Seven Years' War.

THE FIRST CAMPAIGN OF THE SEVEN YEARS' WAR, 1756.

They little knew the man with whom they had to deal. Frederick had been aware, from the first, of the intrigues that were being carried on against him. A traitorous secretary in the Saxon Privy Council office had for a long time sent him copies of the documents and state papers exchanged between the Austrian, Russian, and Saxon courts. From France, too, he had intelligence of the intended attack; and had secretly and swiftly prepared his plan of defence. The Allies intended to surprise him by a sudden attack; but he was ready first for the fight, and after peremptorily demanding explanations of the intentions of Austria, and being refused, he suddenly, in August, 1756, poured his army into Saxony, and marched straight upon Dresden. Augustus, Elector of Saxony and King of Poland, a monarch after the fashion of Louis XV., at once fled to Poland with his favourite, Count Brühl. Frederick seized the originals of the state papers relating to the coalition, and by their publication set himself right in the opinion of Europe. Whatever he might have done formerly, in the way of aggression, this time he was evidently acting in self-defence, and was the injured party. The Saxon army was entrenched in a strong but ill-chosen position at Pirna, near the Bohemian frontier; Frederick left a sufficient force to watch the camp of the enemy, and with the rest of his army marched into Bohemia, and defeated Marshal Browne and a great Austrian army at Lowositz, thus gaining the first battle of the contest. And it was under very honourable conditions; for the triumph had been gained by a tremendous charge with the bayonet after the Prussians had fired away all their ammunition.

By this victory Frederick prevented the junction of the Saxon and Austrian armies. He had done more. The Saxon army was so completely surrounded, that it could not move. In an attempt to break out of the trap, the commissariat and baggage fell into the hands of the enemy; and the whole Saxon force, after remaining for three days and nights without food or shelter, exposed to the pitiless rains of a cold October, vainly hoping for relief from Marshal Browne, was obliged to surrender at discretion. The troops who thus laid down their arms were compelled to swear fealty to the Prussian flag; but Frederick gained little by this augmentation of his army. Reluctant soldiers were useless in a life and death struggle; in time they nearly all found their way back to their former comrades, deserting by hundreds. Saxony remained in the hands of Frederick, as a vast storehouse of provisions and warlike material; while the unhappy people, first taxed to maintain the war against their enemies, were now compelled to contribute funds for fighting their friends. All Europe, meanwhile, was astonished at the turn affairs had taken; and began to comprehend that the "Marquis of Brandenburg," as Frederick's enemies affected to call him, would not be conquered so quickly as his foes had been willing to believe;—and so the armies went into winter quarters.

1757; PRAGUE, KOLLIN, ROSSBACH, AND LEUTHEN.

The next year, 1757, was the most memorable in Frederick's life, and the one that contributed most to win him the title of "the Great." The task before him was tremendous. In Bohemia, the Austrians were marching against him; from the west he had to look for the invasion of his territories by the French; while Russia, Sweden, and the Reichsarmee—a force composed of men from the different German States—stood in the background. Anxious above all things to separate his foes, the king marched into Bohemia to lay siege to Prague; and there he encountered an army worthy of his steel. The Austrians whom he had now to oppose were far better disciplined than their predecessors of the first and second Silesian wars; and though, in the first great battle of the campaign, fought under the walls of Prague, the Prussians were victorious, it was at the cost of eighteen thousand men, and of a number of gallant officers, including brave old Schwerin, who fell, pierced by five bullets, while gallantly cheering on his grenadiers, and waving a flag he had taken from a Prussian captain, as he rode in advance of his men. "His death," said Frederick, "made the laurels of victory fade for me." The Austrians lost twenty-four thousand men by this terrible battle, including their leader, Marshal Browne, who died of his wounds some weeks later.

Prague still held out; and Marshal Daun, a wary and experienced Austrian commander, was advancing to its relief. On the 18th of June, at Kollin, Frederick experienced his first great defeat. He fought desperately, until at length one of his officers called to him, "Sire, do you mean to take the battery alone?" On that day Frederick lost fourteen thousand men. In the evening he was seen sitting by a well by the wayside, thoughtfully drawing figures in the sand with his stick. "Children," he said, with tears in his eyes, as the survivors of his famous regiment of guards marched past him, "you have had a bad day to-day; but have patience, I will make all well again." An old trooper came up to the king with kindly words of comfort, and a hatful of water. "Drink, your majesty," quoth the veteran, "and let battles be battles. It's well that you are still alive. Our Lord God lives yet, and can give us the victory once more." The bitterness of defeat was perhaps increased for the king by the consciousness that it had been partly caused by his own obstinacy in suddenly changing the plan of the battle, against the advice of his best officers—among others, of Prince Maurice of Dessau.

It was a tremendous blow; and the king himself expected nothing less than utter ruin to follow. But, like Shakespeare's "Harry the Fifth," he said, "'Tis true that we are in great danger; the greater, therefore, should our courage be." More determined still than the English king, he did not even bid his foes "achieve him, and then sell his bones;" for he was resolved not to fall into their hands, alive or dead. He always carried a swift and sure poison concealed on his person, and told his friends he had "one certain means out of his troubles." Meanwhile his energy seemed to be redoubled, as his enemies narrowed the circle which they had drawn around him. And if it required danger and tribulation to bring out the true strength of his character, such stimulus was certainly not wanting. His best general, Winterfeld, was killed in an unsuccessful attack on the Austrians. The Duke of Cumberland, defeated by the French at Hastenbeck, signed the wretched convention of Kloster Seven, by which he engaged to dissolve the army he commanded. A great Russian army invaded Prussia, and defeated the Prussian Field-Marshal Lewald at Grosz Jägerndorf. A mighty French force, under the Prince de Soubise, marched into his territories from the west; while in the east, in the direction of Silesia, the huge forces of Austria were assembling to strike a final blow. Here was enough to daunt the most fearless spirit, and to make the boldest leader turn pale. But "they are silent griefs that rend the heartstrings," and Frederick was never without a few confidential friends, to whom he spoke out his griefs, to his great relief; and, strange to say, during this period of deadly peril and strife, his poetic faculty, such as it was, did not desert him. Our great English critic has given us a humorous picture of Frederick as "a vigilant, sagacious blue-stocking, bearing up against a world in arms, with an ounce of poison in one pocket, and a quire of bad verses in the other." But it was this faculty of forcibly tearing his mind from the dangers of the present, that gave the great king the strength to continue the strife. And when he looked around on the indomitable faces of his officers and men, he felt assured, as he declares in his own words, of ultimate victory.

When, at the beginning of November, the Prussians had, at Rossbach, to face the army of Soubise, three times more numerous than their own, their situation was like that of the English before the battle of Agincourt. The French looked upon the "Marquis de Brandebourg" as a beaten man, and celebrated their victory in advance, with much blowing of trumpets and parade of military music and dancing. These rejoicings were entirely premature. On the 5th of November, Frederick inflicted upon Soubise a crushing defeat, and sent their legions reeling back from Rossbach towards the Rhine. Never was a more complete rout; the fugitives were pursued, and captured in battalions. Frederick, with less than 22,000 men, had defeated 64,000, and inflicted a loss on them of 8,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. And now, while his troops were in the full flush of victory, the king determined, in spite of the lateness of the season, to march into Silesia, and drive out the Austrians, who had taken Schweidnitz, and established themselves throughout the province. He set his army in motion, traversed Germany with wonderful speed, and at the beginning of December encountered the Austrian army of Prince Charles of Lorraine at Leuthen.

Here he gained a far more splendid victory than that of Rossbach; for now the triumph was owing to a rare combination of courage and skill. "That battle was a masterpiece," said Napoleon the Great. Thus the campaign of 1757 ended with the success and glory of the Prussian arms, and a new alliance was concluded with England; a splendid subsidy from that country enabled Frederick to establish a second army in the field under Ferdinand of Brunswick.

SEVEN YEARS' WAR, CONTINUED; YEARS OF DISASTER.

We have not space to detail at length the progress of the famous struggle. Suffice it to say that, in the next year, after victory had once more crowned the king's armies at Zorndorf, she deserted his standard for more than two years. At Hochkirchen, on the 14th of October, the Austrians surprised his camp by night, and Frederick had to retreat with the loss of 9,000 men and 101 guns; but the Prussian officers declared this to be "only a flesh-wound, which would soon heal." "Where have you left your cannon, cannoners?" cried the king, jestingly, as his bereaved artillerymen marched past. "The devil has carried them off in the night," was shouted from the ranks. "Then we'll get them back from him by daylight, eh, grenadiers?" cried Frederick. "Yes," was the reply, "and we'll charge interest too." The year 1759 was signalized by a disaster far more tremendous than that of Hochkirchen. At Kunnersdorf, near Frankfort-on-the-Oder, after defeating a Russian army, and capturing ninety cannon, the exhausted Prussian army was led by the indefatigable king, beneath an August sun, against the fresh Austrian troops of the fiery Laudohn. The result was so entire a defeat of the Prussians, that Frederick for the first time despaired utterly. "To tell the truth," he wrote to his minister, Count Finkenstein, "I think that all is lost. I will not outlive the fall of my country. Farewell for ever!"

But while the Russian general was holding a council of war, to determine whether the fugitive Prussians were to be pursued or not, Frederick was collecting his scattered army; though he had lost more than 18,000 men, and 172 guns, a few days later found him entrenched in a strong position, and ready as ever to fight it out to the bitter end. By a series of masterly manoeuvres he had almost retrieved the losses of Kunnersdorf, when the fatigues of the campaign proved too great for the weak body, till now sustained by that iron will. The king fell sick. But he summoned his generals, who found him lying, pale and haggard, in a hut, suffering intense pain. He said he had assembled them to tell them his plans, and to convince them that he could not at that moment show himself to the camp. "Tell my brave soldiers," said the king, simply, "that mine is no simulated illness; and assure them, moreover, that though I have had much misfortune during this campaign, I rely upon their valour, and that nothing but death shall separate me from my brave army." The close of the campaign was marked by fresh misfortunes; 12,000 men, under Finck, had to surrender to the Austrians, and the whole forces of Frederick comprised only 24,000 men; but he would not yield an inch.

TRIUMPH OF PRUSSIA; CLOSE OF THE WAR; CONCLUDING YEARS OF FREDERICK'S REIGN.

The next year brought a change. At Liegnitz and Torgau, Frederick won splendid victories. But the aspect of the Prussian and Saxon dominions was lamentable. Ruin and devastation were apparent everywhere. "We become at last like strolling players," wrote Frederick to his friend Algarotti, "who have no hearth or home. We wander through the world, to enact our bloody tragedies wherever they allow us to set up our theatre." One year more Frederick held out against fearful odds; and then, on the 5th of January, 1762, came the decisive turn of the wheel in his favour. On that day died the Czarina Elizabeth of Russia, the most inveterate of Frederick's foes, excepting only Maria Theresa herself. Peter III., Elizabeth's nephew and successor, was an enthusiastic admirer of the Prussian king; and Russia was thus detached from the coalition. England and France made a separate treaty; Saxony could do nothing, and Frederick had only Austria to fight against. Then at last the haughty spirit of the Empress-queen gave way. At the beginning of 1763, the treaty of Hubertsburg put an end to the war. Frederick kept Silesia; and the fearful struggle, with all its ravages, simply left the political condition of things as it had been at the commencement.

THE PARTITION OF POLAND; FREDERICK AND CATHARINE OF RUSSIA.

The chief events of importance during the period of nearly a quarter of a century, throughout which Frederick's reign extended, after the peace of Hubertsburg, are the short war of the Bavarian succession, and that great outrage upon the law of nations, the first partition of Poland.

Lord Macaulay justly designates the first partition of the unhappy country as "that great crime, the fruitful parent of other great crimes." In 1772, the three courts of St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Berlin signed two manifestoes, on the 19th of February and the 5th of August respectively, in which the King of Poland was required to cede certain parts of his dominions, amounting to about a third of the whole territory, and containing almost half the population of his kingdom. The cry of indignation with which this outrageous demand was received, resounded throughout Europe; but the three powers were too strong to allow even a chance of successful resistance; and the king and the parliament, hastily convened at the startling news, signed the required cession with heavy hearts. West Prussia, or Polish Prussia, which he had long coveted, fell to the share of the Prussian king. This acquisition greatly increased his strength, by uniting the straggling and scattered portions of his territory, and giving compactness and unity to the whole. It was, indeed, a prize of worth, and might have excited the cupidity of a far more scrupulous monarch than Frederick. Six hundred thousand souls were thus added to the number of his subjects. A large share of the plunder naturally fell to Catharine, though there is considerable doubt whether the nefarious scheme originated with her or with the King of Prussia. The whole great district between the rivers Dwina, Dneiper, and Dmtesch, comprising a large portion of Lithuania, with Minsk, Witepsk, etc., was incorporated with the Russian Empire, which gained one million eight hundred thousand subjects by this tremendous act of spoliation. But the lion's portion undoubtedly on this occasion fell to Austria, for her share comprised the richest and most populous regions—Galicia, Lodomeria, a part of Lublin, and Cracow, with valuable salt mines, the property of the crown, several districts of Volhynia and Podolia; on the whole, almost three hundred towns and villages, with nearly three millions of inhabitants. The utter injustice of the whole proceeding was betrayed by a defence of the lamest and most impotent kind put forth by Austria and Prussia in their own vindication. Catharine was wiser in her generation. She seems to have said of the King of Poland, as Macbeth said of Banquo:

"I could

With bare-faced power sweep him from my sight,
And bid my will avouch it."

And, bolder than the guilty tiffane, she took possession of her share of the plunder, and kept it by the right of the strong hand.

FREDERICK'S ACTIVITY TO THE END; HIS DEATH.

To the very last day of his life the king was hard at work. Only a few days before his death he spoke the remarkable words: "My life is nearly ended; I must use the time I still have. It belongs not to me, but to the state."

He died in 1786, after a reign of more than forty-five years. But the tomb he had designed for himself at the terrace at Sans-Souci was deemed inadequate to contain the ashes of a monarch who had done such things as he had achieved. His corpse was brought to Berlin, that his relics might rest among the people whom he had governed for nearly half a century, generally with justice, often with kindness, always with vigorous energy, and a hearty desire for the public good.

AN EPOCH IN THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

THE history of Alexander forms an epoch in the history of the world. Whatever difficulties we may have in making an exact estimate of his personal character, we can hardly assign too much importance to the great events of his life, and their permanent influence on the condition of the human race. The overthrow of the great Asiatic monarchy which had so often threatened the political existence of Greece, the victorious progress of the Macedonian arms from the plain of Thebes to the banks of the Danube, and from the Hellespont, the boundary of rival continents, to the Nile, the Jaxartes, and the Indus—these have formed in all ages the theme of historical declamation, and the subject of general admiration. But the diffusion of the language and the arts of Greece, the extension of commerce by opening to Europeans the road to India, and the great additions made to natural science and geography by the expeditions of Alexander—these are the real subjects for enlightened and critical research.

Of the numerous writers who treated of the campaigns of Alexander, not a single contemporary remains; and our information is entirely derived from compilers who lived several centuries after the age of Alexander, and even founded their narratives on such contemporary records as then existed. With the exception of Arrian, not one of them was equal to the subject; and even he was often too deficient in knowledge of Asiatic geography to enable him to make a proper use of his materials. The accounts of the different writers, though agreeing in all the great events, offer no small discrepancies when we come to details, and, with the exception of Arrian's History, are marked by a general absence of sound criticism.

ALEXANDER'S BIRTH, PARENTAGE, AND EDUCATION.

Alexander III., commonly known as Alexander the Great, was the son of Philip II., King of Macedon, and was born B.C. 356. His mother was Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of Epirus, through whom Alexander claimed a descent from the great hero Achilles.

If we knew nothing more of Alexander than that Aristotle was his master, the memory of the philosopher would preserve that of the pupil. But it is a rare coincidence to find the greatest of conquerors instructed by the first of philosophers—the master of all knowledge teaching the future master of the world. Some of the great projects of Alexander might pass for the mere caprice of a man possessed of unlimited power, if we did not know that Aristotle had given him lessons in political economy, and written for his use a treatise on the art of government. That the pupil, amidst all his violence and excesses, possessed a vigorous and clear understanding, with enlarged views of the advantages of commerce, and of the nature of civil government, is amply confirmed by some of the most prominent events of his life.

Unfortunately, Aristotle was not his only master: the flattery of Ly-machus, and the obsequiousness of his attendants, conspired to cherish those ungovernable passions which seem to have descended to him from both his parents.

Of Alexander's youth numerous anecdotes are related. These cannot be depended upon as literally true; but they are, perhaps, none the less on that account of historical value. That he excelled in every manly sport, disdaining only wrestling, is certain; that his spirit was one of the most dauntless that ever dwelt in a human breast, we also know: with both of these facts it well accords that when the fierce but noble and shapely steed Bucephalus was brought to the court, and no one among the crowd of courtiers who came with Philip and his son to see the boasted animal could soothe or master it, then the boy Alexander, scornfully indignant that a horse of such symmetry, strength, and mettle should be sent away for want of a rider, grasped the bridle, turned the head of the animal towards the sun and away from its shadow, stroked and soothed it, leaped swiftly and quietly on its back, and gave it the rein before them all. The military education of Alexander commenced from his boyhood; and his first essay in arms was made at the battle of Cheronæa (B.C. 338), when his father crushed the united forces of Thebes and Athens with their allies, and established the Macedonian supremacy in Greece.

ASCENT TO THE THRONE.

Philip was murdered in B.C. 336, during the celebration of his daughter's marriage, when he was just on the eve of setting out on his Asiatic expedition at the head of the combined forces of Greece. His sudden death inspired the States which had been humbled with some hope of throwing off the yoke of the Macedonian kings. Alexander, in his twentieth year, succeeded to the monarchy and to the great designs of his father. Though threatened with danger on all sides, from the movements of the barbarians in the north, and the restless Greeks in the south, his courage and address saved him. The Thes-salians readily chose him as the head of their confederacy, and the Amphictyons confirmed him in the honours which had been granted to Philip.

His education may be said to have been finished though he was yet young. He had always looked upon himself as the successor of heroes; he deemed it his duty, as well as honour, to wield the sword of Achilles. His heart had been warmed by poetry, and his intellect had been trained by study. His frame was robust and handsome, though not tall; his head bent slightly to one side; his eye was lively and piercing; his countenance was one of manly beauty.

His next step was to march an army into

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

Boeotia, to check the beginning of insurrectionary movements, by showing himself at the gates of Thebes. His vigour secured for him greater honour than Philip had ever received, and the States of Greece, Lacedæmon excepted, transferred to him at Corinth, with abject flattery and mean submission, the office of commander-in-chief against Persia, which they had already conferred on his father.

In giving a brief sketch of the chief events of Alexander's short life, we may observe that, without a constant reference to maps, it is impossible to form any idea of the rapidity of his movements, the natural obstacles which he had to encounter, or the immense extent of country which he overran in a few years. All military history without geographical detail, is only a heap of confusion.

THE BARBARIANS OF THE NORTH; A FALSE REPORT; THE CAPTURE OF THEBES.

In order to leave no troublesome enemies behind him, he resolved to reduce the barbarians of the north to obedience. From his residence in Macedonia he marched, in the spring of B.C. 335, in ten days to the passes of Mount Hæmus (the Balkans), crossed them in spite of the opposition of the natives, and descended into the great plain of the Danube. Here he defeated the Triballi; and after crossing the Danube at a point which it is now impossible to determine, he struck terror into the Gæte, who lived on the northern banks, by the rapidity and decision of his movements. On his return, he led his troops against the Illyrians and Taulantii, whom it was necessary to reduce to submission before he could safely quit his kingdom.

A false report of his death during this expedition, gave the Greeks once more hopes of throwing off the hated yoke of Macedon; and the Thebans set the example by murdering two officers of the Macedonian garrison, which had occupied the Cadmeia, or Acropolis, of the city ever since the battle of Chæronea. But while they were indulging in the anticipation of recovering their independence, their ever-active enemy made his appearance before their city. It appears as if Alexander would have been satisfied with a reasonable submission; but party violence in Thebes prevented all concession, and the proposals of the Macedonian king were rejected with insult.

After a short resistance, Alexander's troops entered the city, when one of those horrid scenes of carnage ensued which form a necessary part of a conqueror's progress. It was then that the Phocians, with the Plataeans and other Boeotians in the army of Alexander, inflamed by the remembrance of what they had once suffered from this unprincipled city, slew all before them, "even those who made no resistance: they murdered the supplicants in the temples; they spared neither woman nor child." The number killed is stated at 6,000, which may possibly be exaggerated; the survivors were sold for slaves, except the ministers of religion, and a few who were the friends of the conqueror, or who had opposed the revolution. The temples and the house of Pindar, it is said, were spared; but all the rest of the city, except the Cadmeia, was levelled to the ground, and Thebes, for the present, was blotted out of Greece. Alexander did not march farther south, though the Athenians had been active in organizing the late resistance. One such example was sufficient for a warning.

ASIATIC EXPEDITION; ALEXANDER AT TROY.

In the spring of B.C. 334, Alexander set out on his Asiatic expedition with a force of about 35,000 men, and a very small supply of money. The largest component part of his army was Macedonian, with about 7,000 allied Greeks, some mercenary troops and several bodies of Thracians, 1,500 Agrianian light infantry, and some other bodies of troops. His cavalry, on which his success in a great measure depended, was mainly composed of Macedonians and Thessalians.

Having arrived at Sestos in twenty days, and crossed the narrow channel of the Hellespont, the descendant of Achilles and his friend Hephæstion did honour to the mounds that were said to contain the remains of the mighty hero and his beloved friend Patroclus. Youthful enthusiasm may have been one motive to the display made before the army on this occasion, but it was no less a part of Alexander's policy to induce his followers to look upon him as the representative of the greatest warrior of the heroic age.

Scorning, it is said, the lyre of Paris, he asked to see the harp which Achilles had struck as he sat indignant by the mournful sea, and soothed his mighty soul by singing the deeds of ancient heroes. We think it scarcely possible to doubt the truth of this anecdote; it corresponds precisely with all we know of Alexander, and illustrates very finely both his ruling ambition to emulate the deeds of the mystic heroes, and his true and noble appreciation of the great Homeric song. The passage to which he referred is one of the most truly sublime ever uttered by the lips of man.

THE PERSIAN MONARCHY; THE BATTLE OF THE GRANICUS.

At the period of Alexander's landing in Asia, the unwickly and disjointed monarchy of the Persians exhibited many weak points. The Persians themselves, the ruling caste, were comparatively few in number. One monarch, with absolute power, claimed the sovereignty of almost countless nations, and of an immense extent of country, the parts of which were in many cases separated by natural boundaries which were difficult to pass. The provinces that lay remote from the seat of government could only be maintained by the presence of an armed force, under a military governor nominated by the king. The partition of the empire and the distribution of power were, therefore, essential to the very existence of the Persian monarchy; but this system was also the remote cause of its weakness and dissolution. Each powerful governor was kept in submission by no other motive than fear of punishment; and when he felt himself able to defy his master, the bond of union was for the time broken. Hence some provincial governments passed quietly from father to son, the monarch tacitly consenting to an arrangement which he could not prevent.

Darius, the King of Persia, who was contemporary with Alexander, seems to have been ill qualified to retrieve the falling fortunes of the monarchy; he was deficient in courage and military skill, and had no hope of opposing the invader but by turning against him the arms of the Greeks themselves. From the time of Cambyzes, the son of the first Cyrus, to the age of Alexander, we find renegade Greeks constantly in the pay of the Persian monarch, ready to serve their new paymaster against those who were united to them by kindred and language. The civil commotions which so often disturbed the peace of Grecian communities were also continually driving refugees to seek from the King of Persia the rank and property which they had lost at home. At this time, the hopes of Darius rested on Memnon, a Greek of Rhodes, whose military skill might have made him, with better opportunities, a formidable opponent to the Macedonian king.

The first combat between the invaders and the Persians was on the banks of the Granicus (now, perhaps, the Oostvelt), a river which falls into the Sea of Marmora. The Persians possessed an elevated position on the east bank of the river, which their generals determined to defend, contrary to the advice of Memnon, who being, as it appears, not in the command, could only recommend for the present the safer expedient of a retreat. But the dispositions of the Persians were totally unsuited to oppose the violent attack of Alexander's cavalry, which crossed the river and maintained itself on the opposite bank until the light infantry that followed had time to come up, when the compact front of the Macedonians, bristling with their formidable spears, broke the less disciplined lines of the Persian cavalry, and secured a complete victory. To the daring personal courage of Alexander, who himself killed two Persians of the highest rank, and to the long spears of the Macedonians, the victory may be mainly attributed. The Greek infantry in the Persian army was cut to pieces, with the exception of two thousand, who were sent into Macedonia in chains, and condemned to slavery.

Alexander showed after the battle that he knew how to win affection by flattering self-love, as well as to lead men to conquest. He visited his own disabled soldiers, listened to the talk of their exploits and their wounds, and gave to the parents and children of those who had fallen privileges of distinction and immunity from civil burdens. Twenty-five horsemen belonging to the Companion cavalry—a kind of military order, perhaps, instituted by Alexander—had fallen in the first assault; Lysippus, the famous sculptor, was ordered to make their figures in bronze, which were placed in the town of Dium, in Macedonia, and afterwards adorned one of the public buildings of Rome.

This success was of the utmost importance to Alexander, by preparing the submission of most of the Greek towns on the Aegean, in which he adopted the policy of establishing democratic forms of government, with the double purpose of showing that he had come as the liberator of the Greek States, and perhaps, too, with a view of preventing their combining against himself by the constant occupation they would have in quarrelling with one another.

VARIOUS ACHIEVEMENTS.

To crowd into the compass of this short life the military operations of Alexander's campaigns would be a useless attempt; even Arrian's narrative is often too meagre and unsatisfactory to enable us to form a clear conception of the events. Nothing but a careful examination of a map, as we have already hinted, can give the reader any notion of the vigour of the Macedonian general.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

One of the most memorable events between the Battles of the Granicus and the Issus was the capture of Halicarnassus, in Caria, which Memnon only left when it was no longer possible to hold out. This memorable siege is minutely described by Arrian.

The progress of Alexander southward was marked by an event in which the durable features of nature bear witness to the truth of history. In proceeding from Phaselis to Perga, he sent part of his troops by a newly-made but difficult route in the interior; he himself proceeded along the shore of Lycia, where the mountains rise from the sea step by step, like a ladder, having between the base of the ladder (or climax, as the Greeks called it) and the sea a beach, which offered a shorter and much more convenient road. The projecting cliffs, however, over which there appears to have been at that time no way, would render it necessary for the men in some places to wade through the water, though not without danger; but a favourable opportunity was offered for accomplishing this by a depression of the sea in this part, consequent on the blowing of a north wind.

After gaining the strong post of Celænæ, near the source of the Meander, the Macedonian general marched to Gordium in Phrygia (B.C. 333), where he had an opportunity of turning to profit the belief of a superstitious age. The empire of Asia was promised to him who should untie the complicated knot which fastened to the pole of a chariot the yoke and collars of the horses. Alexander relieved himself of the difficulty either by cutting the cord, or some equally expeditious process. The promptitude of his resolution, and the presence of a victorious army, could not fail to secure him the credit of having fulfilled the intentions of the deity.

The army was now increased by fresh reinforcements from home, and the return of the new married soldiers who had been sent to winter in Macedonia. In approaching the passes which lead from the central plateaus of Asia Minor into the plains of Cilicia, Alexander must have been in the track of the Greeks who accompanied the younger Cyrus in his expedition against his brother, not quite a century before; and in the march from the mountain pass to Tarsus (the modern Terssoos), on the Cydnus, probably followed the same route. A remarkable narrow defile, about twenty miles north of Tarsus, which is cut in the rock, has been conjectured to be the pass described by Xenophon and Arrian. At Tarsus the career of Alexander was nearly terminated by a fever, either caused by fatigue, or by throwing himself, when heated, into the cool stream of the Cydnus. A similar act of imprudence at Terssoos is said to have been fatal to the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa.

A little before this time Memnon died, and with him the best hopes of Darius. This skilful commander, at the time of his death, was in the Ægean with a powerful fleet, to which Alexander had nothing to oppose; he was master of Chios, the chief part of Lesbos, and ready to fall on Eubœa and Macedon, with the prospect of being supported by the Lacedæmonians. His sudden death relieved Alexander from an opponent whose operations in Greece might have compelled him to give up the dazzling prospect of Asiatic conquest.

THE BATTLE OF ISSUS.

From Tarsus, Alexander marched, partly by the route of the younger Cyrus, along the Gulf of Issus to the little town of Myriandrus, in Syria. Darius had for some time occupied an extensive plain in Syria, well adapted for the evolutions of his large body of cavalry, and for the disposition of his immense army. Contrary to the advice of Amyntas, a Greek deserter, he abandoned this position for one in which defeat was almost certain. An offshoot from the range of Taurus runs down to the Gulf of Issus (the modern Gulf of Skanderoun), and terminates in the high land of Cape Khyuzur. The mountains press close on the shores of the Gulf of Issus, leaving in some places a plain barely large enough for the battle-ground of an army: in one particular spot the passage is so narrow as to be capable of an easy defence. By this unguarded pass Alexander had advanced into Syria, while by another pass further north in the mountain range, Darius moved from Syria to the plain of Issus, with the river Pinarus in his front. He was now in the rear of Alexander; but he had engaged himself in a position where victory might be confidently expected by the Macedonians.

Alexander marched back through the Syrian pass, and found the Persian king prepared for battle in the plains of Issus. The left wing of the Macedonian army was protected by the sea, and the dispositions on the right were such as to prevent the superior force of the Persians from effectually out-flanking the Greeks on that side. The Persian king, though possessing a far superior force, waited the attack on the opposite bank, as if conscious of his inferiority, and anticipating a defeat. Alexander himself, who was on the right wing, crossed the stream, attacked the Persians with impetuosity, and soon put their left wing to the rout. The 30,000 Greek mercenaries in the Persian army offered a stout resistance to the main body of the Macedonians; and the Persian cavalry on the right, who were opposed to the Thessalians, fought bravely as long as their king remained on the field of battle.

The Persian king himself gave the signal for flight when he saw his left wing entirely routed; and the cavalry, soon following the example of their leader, turned their backs with the rest of the army. The slaughter, though perhaps exaggerated, must have been prodigious from the nature of the ground; and Ptolemy, the future King of Egypt, who was in the battle, relates that in one narrow pass the pursuers crossed the road on the upheaped bodies of the slain. Darius succeeded in escaping over the Euphrates by the usual ford at Thapsacus (35° 20' N lat.); but his wife, his infant son, and his mother, who had attended him to the field of battle, fell into the hands of the conqueror, and experienced from him the most humane and respectful treatment.

THE CAPTURE OF TYRE AND GAZA.

The victory just described—about the close of B.C. 333—may be considered as having decided the fate of the Persian monarchy: it opened to Alexander a passage towards Egypt and Babylon, and checked the designs of Agis and Pharnabazus in Western Asia and the Aegean. One obstacle only lay in the way, which proved more formidable than the armies of Darius. A single day was sufficient to disperse a numerous army, but the labours of many months were necessary for the capture of Tyre.

This great commercial city was situated on an island, and separated from the mainland by a channel about half a mile wide; which, on the side of the continent, was shallow and muddy, but had about eighteen feet of water close to the island. The island itself was defended by lofty walls, and well supplied with all the ammunition of war. For many centuries this wealthy city had been the great entrepot between the Eastern and the Western World; and through it the inhabitants of Europe had long received those Asiatic products which we find mentioned in the oldest Greek writers. Her commerce and her ships had penetrated to all known seas; and her adventurous traders, through many intermediate hands, received the products of countries which the Tyrians themselves never visited. Her merchants were princes, and her warehouses were stored with all that contributes to national wealth and domestic comfort. We find in Ezekiel xxvii., a most glowing picture of the prosperity of this great emporium, expressed with all the sublimity and strength of the ancient Hebrew poetry.

The cities of Phœnicia submitted to Alexander on his approach, and the ancient Sidon yielded without a blow; but Tyre, proud of her naval superiority, refused to grant all that was demanded, and prepared for a vigorous resistance. Alexander, in order to assault the place, was compelled to unite the mainland and the city by a causeway, which was not effected without great difficulty. It is said that Nebuchadnezzar had taken the city by the same means; but if the story is true, his causeway must have been of such a nature as to be easily removed. It is more probable that the island was not occupied till after the old city, which was on the mainland, had been taken by Nebuchadnezzar. Alexander's work still remains, and the island of Tyre is now part of the mainland. After a laborious blockade of seven months, the place was taken by storm, and the impatience of the besieging army was gratified by the slaughter of 8,000 Tyrians; 30,000 more were sold into slavery; and if we trust the authority of Diodorus and Curtius, the conqueror was guilty of the inhuman act of crucifying 2,000 men on the seashore.

The last bulwark of the Persian monarchy was now gone, and the dominion of the sea, as well as of the land, was in the hands of the Macedonians. Under the Persian monarchy, Tyre enjoyed favours and privileges, on condition of furnishing the main part of the navy in all the wars with the Greeks,—a condition to which the Tyrians were probably not adverse, as it gave them additional means of crushing the Greeks, whom they hated as their rivals in the commerce of the Mediterranean. The siege of Gaza, one of the strong towns of Palestine, occupied Alexander for two months; but the obstinate defence of the inhabitants did not preserve the city from being taken, nor the women and children from being sold into slavery.

AT JERUSALEM; THE CONQUEST OF EGYPT.

After the siege of Tyre and Gaza, according to the authority of Josephus, Alexander marched to the holy city of Jerusalem, intending to punish the inhabitants for their refusal to supply him with troops and money. The high priest, Jaddus, went forth to meet the conqueror, attended by the priests and people, and accompanied by all the imposing insignia of the Jewish religion. Alexander was so struck with this spectacle, that he pardoned the people, adored the name of the Most High, and sacrificed in the temple, according to the directions given him by Jaddus.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

The Book of the prophet Daniel was shown to him, and the passage pointed out in which it was foretold that the King of Grecia would overcome the King of Persia. With this, as the historian says, he was well satisfied, interpreting himself to be the person foretold by the prophet. The story appears only like another version of the visit to the temple of Ammon, in Lybia, which we shall mention immediately, and will not, in our opinion, bear the test of examination. Arrian says nothing about it.

Nothing now remained to check the march of Alexander into Egypt, which yielded without striking a blow. In seven days the army marched from Gaza, through the desert to Pelusium, the frontier town of Egypt on the east. The Persian Governor found resistance hopeless, and the country passed at once under the dominion of the Greeks, an event to which circumstances had been long gradually tending. From the time of Amasis (B.C. 560), the Greeks had received permission to settle in Egypt, and, at the time of Alexander's invasion, there can be no doubt that the country contained a large proportion of that nation. Under Persian government, Egypt had always been an unruly and troublesome province, and the contest for the possession of it between the Greek and Persian, and the Persian and Egyptian, had more than once been doubtful. The Egyptians hated the Persians for their religious intolerance and the desecration of their temples, while the more accommodating Greeks readily associated their own with the religious usages of the Egyptians, and were willing to assign to both a common origin.

From Pelusium Alexander visited the sacred city of Heliopolis, renowned for its temples and obelisks, and Memphis, then the great capital of Egypt; south of this point there is no reason for supposing that he ever went. He then sailed down the Canopic, or western branch of the Nile, and entered the Lake of Mareia, where he founded the city of Alexandria, which still preserves his name.

From motives of policy, vanity, or curiosity,—or, perhaps, under the influence of all three,—Alexander determined to visit the far-famed temple of Ammon, an object of religious veneration to the Egyptians, and also probably the centre of a considerable trade. The site of this curious spot is now ascertained to be Siwah (29° 12' N lat. 44° 54' E long.), where the ruins of a temple, and the hot springs, confirm other evidence as to its locality. Arrian's description of Alexander's interview with the priests, and his notice of the oracular responses, are limited to a general remark, which shows that he did not think the story worth telling. Other authorities inform us that Alexander was honoured with the title of the Son of Jupiter, and a promise of the empire of the world.

THE BATTLE OF ARBELA; DEATH OF DARIUS.

Alexander, having received some reinforcements from Greece, and established the government of Egypt on a wise and liberal footing, set out to attack the Persian king, who had again collected a considerable army. In the spring of B.C. 331 he marched to Tyre, where he made some stay; from thence to the ford of Thapsacus on the Euphrates, and across Mesopotamia to the Tigris. Such a march makes but a small figure in the brief narrative of Arrian, and is but an inconsiderable part of the military operations of Alexander; it amounts, however, to over 800 miles.

The King crossed the Tigris, and, advancing through Aturia, found Darius encamped on the banks of the Bumadus, near a small place called Gaugamela, or the Camel's House. The immense disproportion between the Persian and Grecian armies was no disadvantage to the less numerous but better disciplined force of Alexander, though the victory was not obtained without a struggle. As on former occasions, many divisions of the Persian army behaved with courage, and the Asiatic cavalry made a strong resistance; but the early flight of the timid king left the Macedonians a certain victory. Darius fled to Ecbatana (Hamadan), in Media; and Alexander, who no longer had any reason to fear such an opponent, marched unmolested to take possession of Babylon and the empire of Asia. This battle is more commonly known by the name of the Battle of Arbela (now Erbil), up to which city Alexander pursued Darius. Arbela is between forty and fifty miles east of Gaugamela.

The Battle of Arbela may be considered as an epoch in the life of Alexander. Though Darius was still alive, he could no longer be considered as king: his power was crushed; the fairest part of his empire had submitted; and the progress of the conqueror was henceforward attended with almost immediate submission. But the conduct and temper of Alexander began to undergo a change. Intoxicated with success, he gradually assumed the state and manners of an Asiatic sovereign, and, unrestrained by habits of self-control, he gave way to the most guilty excesses, which, if we trust the evidence of history, it is equally futile to palliate or deny.

The ancient city of Babylon, which had so long resisted the first Cyrus and the first Darius, yielded without a blow at the approach of Alexander. The Macedonian adopted a more prudent and generous policy than the Persian monarchs. Xerxes had ruined the temples of Babylon, and even had dared to profane the shrine of the great Bel, and to murder the high-priest. Alexander gave orders to restore the temple of the deity, and showed himself a worthy proselyte by sacrificing to Bel, according to the rites prescribed by his ministers the Chaldeans.

A march of twenty days brought the Macedonians from Babylon to the banks of the Choaspes (the Kerah), on the east side of which stood the city of Susa (Sus), then the chief residence of the Persian kings, and the depositary of their treasures.

From Susa the active monarch advanced to the Pasitigris (the Karoon), and thence along the valley of Ram Hormuz to the mountain pass (Kala-i-Sifid, the White Castle) which led into Persia Proper, the original seat of the Persians. His object was to surprise Persepolis, in which he succeeded; and, according to some accounts, he burnt the palace of the Persian kings in a fit of drunken madness, and at the instigation of Thais, an Athenian woman of no reputation who had accompanied the army. It is difficult, however, to believe all the circumstances as they are related.

From Persepolis Alexander marched to Ecbatana (B.C. 330), but not by a direct route. On his approaching the city, Darius fled past the ancient Rhagæ, and through the passes of the Elburz Mountains, to seek a refuge in the Bactrian provinces. In fact, he was now a prisoner in the hands of the Bactrian satrap Bessus, who accompanied him in his flight, and assumed the command.

At Ecbatana, the Thessalian cavalry and many of the allied troops, having terminated their period of service, were honourably dismissed, with full pay and presents. Some who preferred a life of adventure were enrolled as volunteers. The Thessalians sold their horses to the King, and, with the rest of the Greeks, received a safe convoy to the shores of the Mediterranean.

The march of Alexander from Rhagæ (the modern Rey, whose extensive ruins lie near Teheran) to his entrance into India, is the most obscure part of his history. The brief narrative of Arrian, our sole trustworthy authority, only enables us to form a general idea of the movements of the army. The surprising rapidity of his movements, and his capacity to endure toil, are not surpassed by what is recorded of Genghis Khan and Tamerlane, though we may readily admit that Arrian, in this part of his work, may have exaggerated and fallen into error from unavoidable ignorance of the country. It is the same with distance as with time; both of them are unfavourable to clear perception. As the history of a remote age is comprised in a few words, so the immense spaces of Asiatic geography dwindle into insignificance, and make no impression on the mind of the reader. But nothing is wanting except a clear conception of the distances traversed by Alexander and the obstacles encountered, to convince us that of all the conquerors who ever troubled the peace of mankind, he was the most unwearied and daring.

From Rhagæ the Macedonian commander passed through one of the defiles in the Elburz Mountains, commonly known by the name of the Caspian Pass, and in one night accomplished, while pursuing Darius, a distance of 400 stadia, through the arid wastes of Parthia, with foot-soldiers mounted on horses. Just as Alexander was coming up with the fugitives, Bessus took to more hasty flight, while two of his Persian attendants assassinated their unfortunate monarch, and made their escape with 600 horsemen. Alexander sent the body to Persepolis to be interred in the tomb of the Persian kings.

FURTHER CONQUESTS; DEATH OF PHILOTAS.

The army now advanced into the ancient Hyrcania, comprising a part of the modern Mazanderan, a country hemmed in on one side by lofty wooded mountains, and on the other stretching in a sloping plain to the great inland waters of the Caspian. The King's object was to gain over the remnant of the Greeks who had served in the army of Darius; for the progress eastward might be dangerous, and the occupation of the conquered provinces insecure, if he left in his rear a body of armed Greeks. After some negotiations, they came and surrendered at his camp, and Alexander had the good policy to pardon them all, and to take a great many of them into his pay on the same terms as they had served the Persian king. Some Lacedæmonian ambassadors to King Darius, who surrendered at the same time, were put in chains.

In Zadracarta, the capital of Parthia (a city whose site is totally unknown), Alexander stayed fifteen days. His next progress was towards the frontier of Areia, along the northern verge of the Great Salt Desert, and to Susia, a city of Areia. According to a policy often successfully imitated, he left the government of Areia in the hands of the Persian satrap Satibarzanes, and prepared to lead his soldiers into a still more remote land.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

The traitor Bessus had fled into Bactria (Bokhara), one of the remotest possessions of the Persian monarchy, where he had rallied round him a few Persians, and a considerable body of the natives of the province. He had assumed the royal name of Artaxerxes, and placed the tiara erect on his head, the symbol of Persian sovereignty. A new claimant thus arose to the empire of Asia. Alexander set out towards Bactria, but was speedily recalled by the news of Satibarzanes having revolted almost as soon as his master had turned his back. With a body of cavalry and mounted spearmen, and his ever faithful Agrianians, the unwearied King returned before he was expected; in two days he marched 600 stadia and entered Artacoana (Herat?), the capital of the province, to which he gave a new ruler. His course, which seems to have been changed by this unexpected revolt, was now bent to the country of the Drangæ, or Sarangæ, and to their capital. The limit of this march in this direction it is impossible to determine; but we must look for the country of the Drangæ on the banks of the great Helmund, which flows into the Lake of Zerrah.

Here one of those events in Alexander's life must be briefly noticed which cast the darkest shade on his character. Philotas, the son of Alexander's faithful general Parmenion, was accused of conspiring against the King, and of having long harboured treacherous designs. The charge may be true; at least, Philotas was tried by his Macedonian peers, who pronounced him guilty, and carried the sentence into execution by transfixing him with their spears.

The father was absent in Media at the head of an army. A letter from Alexander, conveyed by one of the Companions to three other commanders in Media, contained the sentence of Parmenion. It was thus that a Persian king used to issue his decrees of death against a governor whom he had reason to fear. No proof of Parmenion's guilt is brought forward, and the absence of all real charge against him tends rather to show that the tyrant had basely murdered the son and feared the just resentment of the father.

ALEXANDER CROSSES THE OXUS; REACHES THE JAXARTES.

The army now advanced probably along the valley of the Helmund to the Ariaspi, a people to whom the first Cyrus had given the name of Orosangæ, or benefactors, for their aid in his Scythian expedition. Their civilised manners secured to them the favour of the second great conqueror of Asia. The Arochoti, sometimes called the White Indians, a people who live west of the Indus and south of the great mountains, were subdued by Alexander. These operations, as well as the complete conquest of the Areii were accomplished in the winter-time, "in the midst of much snow, want of provisions, and hard suffering on the part of the soldiers." Nothing but the general's own capacity for endurance could have maintained the discipline of his army.

Alexander, in his progress to the mountains, built a city, which he called by his own name Alexandria, supposed by some to be the modern Candahar; this, however, we may dispute. His course now lay over the Caucasus, as his historians term the western part of the Hindoo Koosh, the mountain range that here separates the waters that flow southwards or into the ocean from those that contribute to the lakes of Central Asia. The greater part of the mountains were lofty and bare of wood, but formed the residence of a great number of people who here found food for their cattle. Bessus laid waste the country on the north side of the mountains, in order to impede the progress of his pursuer; "but," to use the simple and energetic words of the Greek historian, "Alexander moved onwards not a bit the less; with difficulty, indeed, through deep snow and without provisions; but still he moved on."

On the near approach of Alexander,—it was in the year B.C. 329,—the Persian satrap crossed the Oxus, burnt his boats, and retreated to Nautaca, a town of Sogdiana. Alexander advancing, took in succession Aornos and Bactra; the latter is conjectured to be near the modern site of Balk, which lies on the line of road that the conqueror probably followed. The Oxus is described by Arrian as the largest river crossed by Alexander, except the rivers of India, and as flowing into the Caspian Sea; its breadth was about six stadia, which proves that Alexander crossed it about the melting of the snow in the mountains, in May or June; the current was deep and rapid, and its banks offered no materials for constructing boats or rafts. In five days, however, Alexander passed all his army over by means of floats made of the tent skins of the soldiers stuffed with dried reeds and grass. Before crossing this mighty stream and entering on a new world, he sent home his disabled Macedonians and such of the Thessalian volunteers as were no longer fit for service.

The traitor Bessus fell into the hands of Alexander soon after he had crossed the river: after being kept a prisoner for some time, his nose and ears were cut off by order of Alexander, and he was sent to Ecbatana to be put to death.

From the Oxus the army marched to Maracanda (Samarcand), the royal city of Sogdiana, and at a later period the seat of the wise and vigorous government of Tamerlane. The impetuous Macedonian still advanced eastward till he reached the banks of the Jaxartes, which he proposed to make his frontier against the Scythians, or the nomadic tribes occupying the country now possessed by the Kirghiz. After taking several cities, to which the inhabitants had fled for refuge, he at last assaulted Cyropolis, on the Jaxartes, a town which claimed for its founder the great Cyrus. This place is conjectured to be Khojund.

After taking Cyropolis, Alexander crossed the river, defeated the cavalry of the Scythians, and pursued them under the burning heat of a Bucharian summer. The army was exhausted by thirst, and the commander himself was compelled to recross the river in consequence of illness caused by drinking the unwholesome water, the only kind that is found in these barren steppes. A city founded on the banks of the Jaxartes, which bore the name of Alexandria, was designed to commemorate the limit of his conquests, and to serve as a frontier against the nomadic tribes.

THE MURDER OF CLEITUS.

Military operations having come to an end for the season, Alexander recrossed the Oxus and spent the next winter at Bactra, or Zariaspa. It was at this time that, during a festival in honour of Castor and Pollux, and the drunken revellings which followed, that Alexander murdered his friend Cleitus.

This was the most tragic of all Alexander's bursts of passion. His appetite for adulation had grown so insatiable that he not only permitted flatterers to place him above his father, and to insult that father's memory by lauding him as the son of Ammon, who awaited an apotheosis like that of Hercules, but himself claimed all the merit of Philip's later victories. Cleitus was one of those who revered the late king, and had taken deep offence at Alexander's wanton insults to the Macedonian soldiers. Wine had loosed the restraints of prudence, and he rebuked the flatterers severely. He went farther, and boldly awarded the palm to the father above the son, since Philip had created the force which alone had enabled Alexander to conquer,—the force whose chief leaders, Parmenio and his son, had been put to death, and the soldiers scourged with Persian rods.

The more such language provoked Alexander, the more did Cleitus persist in it; till, holding himself forth as the champion of the old Macedonian party, he exclaimed, with an air of defiance, "This hand, Alexander, saved your life at the Granicus! Listen to the truth, or invite to your suppers none but barbarian slaves."

Alexander's attendants had put his dagger out of his reach; his chief officers clung round him as he rushed at Cleitus, whom others tried to remove from the room. But the King's fury only provoked Cleitus to more bitter taunts; while Alexander exclaimed that his officers were acting to him the part of Bessus to Darius. At length overpowering their resistance, he transfixed Cleitus with a pike which he snatched from an attendant, the blow being accompanied with the taunt, "Go now to Philip and Parmenio."

The sight of his friend weltering in his blood produced an instant and complete revulsion of feeling. Overwhelmed with remorse, he lay upon his bed for three days and nights, refusing all food, and repeatedly calling upon Cleitus, whose name he coupled with that of his nurse, Laniée as the second saviour of his life.

The lover of freedom, who looks beyond the exploits which blind men to the littleness of her enemies, could hardly desire to see the humiliating lesson read more plainly, unless it were in the abject flattery and superstition in which Alexander at length found solace. While the prophets discovered at once a cause and excuse for his deed in the anger of Dionysius, and the philosophers told Alexander that his regret was a too generous sentiment, inasmuch as his will was the only law, the army passed a vote that Cleitus had been justly slain, and their leader obtained the praise of magnanimity by refusing to allow his murdered friend to be unburied. But the best remedy for his grief was in renewed action, for which the enemy gave him ample opportunity.

In the spring of B.C. 328, Alexander re-crossed the Oxus at a place marked by a fountain of water and a fountain of oil. He paid a second visit to Samarcand, in order to tranquilize the country, and spent the severe season of the next winter in quarters at Nautaca; the cold of this region rendering winter operations impracticable. In the following spring (B.C. 327) he assaulted a strong natural fortress, in which Oxyartes the Bactrian had deposited his wife and daughters. The place was almost inaccessible, and well furnished with provisions, and, in addition to, this, a recent fall of snow had rendered the scaling of the rocks more difficult. By means of the iron pins used for securing their tents and strong ropes of linen, some adventurous soldiers ascended the steepest face of the fortress by night, and by the suddenness of the surprise, frightened the garrison into a surrender.

Alexander thus not only got possession of the strongest post in Sogdiana, but he found there a wife in Roxana, the daughter of Oxyartes, whom his followers pronounced to be the handsomest woman they had seen in Asia, after the wife of Darius.

THE CONQUEST OF INDIA.

After capturing another almost impregnable fort, Alexander moved southward about the end of spring, crossed the Caucasus (Hindoo Koosh), and marched to Alexandria.

The progress of the army from Alexandria to the passage of the Indus is difficult to trace. In his march, Alexander crossed the Choës, or Choaspes (the river of Cabul?), and the Gyraeus, both of them then considerable streams; he took the important town of Massaga (Massagour), and once more assailed one of those mountain fortresses, by name Aornos, which seems, from the peculiar difficulties which it offered, to have had additional charms for the adventurous spirit of Alexander. The place was captured in spite of a vigorous resistance, and the army advanced by a road, which they were obliged to construct for themselves, to the bridge of boats over the Indus, which Ptolemy and Hephaestion had been sent forward to make.

Neither Aristobulus nor Ptolemy have informed us, says Arrian, how the bridge across the Indus was constructed; he conjectures, however, that it was made by boats fastened together with planks laid across them, and the whole kept steady by baskets of stones let down from the prow. It is only from November to April that such a bridge could be thrown across the river, for this is the period when it is not flooded. Alexander, who had spent the winter between the Cabul and the Indus, must have entered India early in the year B.C. 326. His route was the same as that of Timur and Nadir Shah, the object of whose plunder was the city of Delhi.

The first Indian town Alexander came to was Taxila; and here the army enjoyed a little repose after its trials. Taxilas, the king, had saved himself by previous submission; and it seems not unlikely that the dissensions among the Indian rulers of this country materially facilitated the operations of the Macedonian army.

Alexander's progress was towards the Hydaspes, a large river swollen by the solstitial rains. His boats that had been constructed on the Indus had been taken to pieces and brought across the country to the banks of the river; but a more formidable enemy than the swollen Hydaspes presented itself on the opposite bank. Porus, an Indian king, one of the great rulers of that region, was stationed there with a formidable army and a train of elephants, that rendered all attempts at landing too dangerous to be hazarded. By a manoeuvre, Alexander, with part of his troops and his strong Companion cavalry, crossed the river in another place before he was discovered. The troops of Porus were upon this drawn up in order of battle in the plain, with a line of elephants in front; the rest of the dispositions of the Indian prince showed him a master of the art of war as practised at that day in India. Unlike the timid monarch of Persia, Porus made a gallant defence; but the Macedonian cavalry, and the compact mass of the infantry bristling with their spears, directed by the courage and skill of Alexander, were a force that no Indian army could resist. The whole loss of the enemy was, according to Arrian, about 23,000; while the number that fell on the side of the conqueror is stated so disproportionately small as to lead us to doubt the accuracy of Arrian's authorities. Two sons of Porus fell in the battle; and the gallant father at last yielded to Alexander, who treated him with the respect due to his rank and courage, and restored to him his kingdom with extended limits. In this battle a number of elephants fell into the hands of the Greeks, and from this time we may date the use of that animal in European warfare.

We are told that Alexander founded two cities, or probably military posts, one on each bank of the Hydaspes. One city was called Nicaea, to commemorate his victory; the other Bucephala, in honour of Alexander's horse Bucephalus, which, after carrying his rider safely through so many battles, died in the last encounter, worn out by old age and fatigue.

From the Hydaspes the army advanced to the great Acesines, or Chin-ab, which Ptolemy describes as fifteen stadia, or considerably above a mile in breadth. It was crossed on boats and on skins. The country between the Chin-ab and the Hydraotes (Ravee or Iraoty), to which Alexander was now advancing, is said to be a sheet of hard clay, without a blade of grass except on the banks of the rivers. Over this tract he marched, and crossed the Hydraotes to attack a new enemy. A second Porus, who was king of the country between the Acesines and Hydraotes, had fled as the enemy approached, and hence received the name of coward.

But all the Indians east of the Hydraotes were not cowards; the Cathæi, a warlike tribe, were determined to oppose the invader. Three days' march brought the Greeks to Sangala, where the Cathæi were stationed on an eminence with a triple line of waggons around it. The city was captured with the usual slaughter, and the power of the brave Cathæi was for the time broken.

FORCED TO TURN BACK.

The King was still eager to pass beyond the Hyphasis, a river which, under the name of Garra, joins the Chin-ab ( $29^{\circ} 30' N.$  lat.) Report magnified the wealth of the countries east of the Hyphasis; and the adventurous conqueror probably thought to make the Ganges the boundary of this progress. But his Greek troops, exhausted with fatigue, disappointed in finding the country poor, and seeing themselves now only a handful of strangers in a foreign land, could not be induced either by threats or persuasions to cross this river.

In vain did Alexander harangue his officers; they were as resolute as the men. He shut himself up in his tent for two days, indulging his moody grief, not that there were no regions left to conquer, but because he was at length made to feel the curb which dependence on fellow-men possesses on the strongest will. He recovered himself so far as to submit with a good grace. As if still persisting in his design, he offered the preliminary sacrifices, but the omens proved unfavourable, and he yielded to the will of the gods what was forced upon him by his followers.

The Hyphasis was, therefore, the boundary of Alexander's conquests, and of that victorious progress to which no other history offers a parallel.

The Macedonians, a race hitherto looked on with contempt by many of the Southern Greeks, furnished the officers for this bold undertaking; the Republics, whose names and exploits form the subject of all previous Grecian history, had no representatives in the glories of the Indian conquest. It appears, farther, when we consider the small number of Macedonians, Thessalians, and soldiers from Southern Greece, who formed the original army, or were afterwards added to it, that Alexander's force must have been constantly recruited from the nations among whom he came, and must have presented at this period a strange and motley aspect of Asiatic and European troops officered by Macedonians.

We must now pass briefly over the remaining events in Alexander's life. The army retraced its steps to the Hydaspes, where a fleet was constructed of the timber which this river still abundantly supplies from the upper parts of its course. On descending the river to its confluence with the Acesines, the fleet experienced at the junction of these streams the dangerous rapids, which are said to exist only in July and August. The long ships of war suffered severely.

The Malli, a powerful Indian tribe, who seem to have chiefly occupied the lower course of the Hydraotes, were next attacked. After some further fighting, the troops moved downwards (B.C. 325) to the confluence of the Indus and the Chin-ab at Mittun ( $28^{\circ} 55' N.$  lat.), where Alexander gave orders to found a city and to build dockyards. Here he left Philip as satrap, with all the Thracians that belonged to the army, and a sufficient number of soldiers of the line to ensure the military occupation of the country.

NAVAL EXPEDITIONS.

With his fleet increased, Alexander sailed down the Indus, visiting the royal city of Sogdi, doubtless a corrupted name, and establishing there a dockyard. Musicanus, an Indian prince who lived lower down the stream, surrendered, and his city received a foreign garrison. Oxycanus, another prince, resisted, but in vain; his two cities were taken, and himself made prisoner. His next acquisition was Sindomana, the capital of Sambus, which is probably the modern Schwan. Musicanus in the meantime revolted, but his second career was short; he was caught and hanged, together with the leaders of the movement.

The narrative of Arrian is here obscure and corrupt. It appears, however, that part of the army was sent from the banks of the Indus by land towards the country of the Arachoti and Drangæ (through Candahar); from Candahar they were ordered to proceed to Carmania.

At Pattala (Tatta?), the apex of the great delta of the Indus, Alexander established a naval station, and laid the foundation of a city, which he no doubt anticipated would prove the centre of an extended commerce. The enterprising monarch himself explored the two great arms that embrace the delta of the Indus. In the western, he experienced the dangers of this rapid and destructive stream, swollen to increased fury by a strong wind from the sea; while the rapid ebb and flow of the tides, which at full moon rise about nine feet, left his boats suddenly on dry land, and as suddenly returned to surprise them. At last he reached the mouth of the stream, and beheld the great Indian Ocean; he floated onward till he was fairly in the open sea, with a view of ascertaining, as he said, if he could spy any land. He next explored the eastern branch, which he found more practicable, and opening into a wide estuary.

Nearchus, the commander of Alexander's fleet, received orders to set out on a voyage along the coast towards the Persian Gulf, as soon as the change of the monsoons would allow him.

To estimate this achievement, we must remember that the Greek knowledge of the geography of these distant regions had advanced little beyond the fables of Homer and the mystical wanderings of Io, as described by Æschylus. The theory that the earth was a flat circle, surrounded by the river Ocean, had a tendency to bring the outer parts of the earth into an imaginary proximity. Thus, when Alexander's soldiers reached the Jaxartes, they thought they were on the banks of the Sandais; and when they saw crocodiles in the Indus, they supposed they had reached the Nile. The better information which Alexander doubtless possessed, from the surveys of the empire made since the time of Darius Hystaspis, only reduces his project within the limits of a sagacious instead of a foolhardy daring; and the achievement of Nearchus was the true opening of the Indian Ocean to the commerce which has since enriched the world. The difficulty of the voyage was enhanced by the barrenness of the shores along which it lay, for navigation was still dependent on communication with the land.

MARCH THROUGH THE DESERT OF GEDROSIA; RETURN TO SUSA.

Alexander himself set out with his army somewhat earlier, about September B.C. 325. The route from the delta of the Indus to Bunder Abbas (Gombroon) on the shore of the Persian Gulf is practicable for elephants and also for an army when attended by a fleet with supplies. This line differs very little from that which Alexander would follow in his sixty days' march from the western limits of the Oritæ to Pura (Furag?). Scarcity of water drove the army on one occasion to seek it by digging on the sandy beach of the ocean, the coast of which they followed for seven days. But the sufferings of the soldiers in this arid desert, if we follow the accounts of Arrian and Strabo, were almost beyond description, owing, perhaps, as much to the want of supplies for so large a number of men, as to the barrenness of the country itself.

From Pura the army advanced without any difficulty to the capital of Karmania (the modern Kirman). Here Alexander was joined by Craterus with the elephants, and the detachments already spoken of as sent through Candahar. Nearchus also joined the King here, having conducted the fleet in safety to Harmozia, a place on the mainland opposite the barren island of Harmuz.

From Kirman, Hephæstion led the mass of the army, with the beasts of burden and the elephants, down to the coast, as the road along the Persian Gulf was more practicable in the winter season that was approaching. The King himself advanced with his lightest troops and the Companion cavalry to Pasargadæ, the burial-place of the great Cyrus. He found the tomb rifled by some robbers, who cared not for the honour of the great national hero who for more than two hundred years had slept undisturbed. The golden coffin that contained the embalmed body of the monarch was the object of the plunderers; but after taking off the lid and throwing the corpse from its resting-place, they were unable to carry off the booty on account of its weight. Alexander ordered the mutilated body to be restored to the tomb; and Aristobulus tells us he himself received the King's command to repair the damage that had been done, and secure the remains of the great Persian warrior from any similar insult.

Leaving Pasargadæ, Alexander came to Persepolis, the city which he is said to have burned at his former visit. If we may trust Arrian, the sight of the mischief he had done gave him no satisfaction. Here he named Peucestas, a Macedonian, satrap or governor of the province of Persis, in the place of the Persian governor, who was hanged for mal-administration. Peucestas forthwith followed a course of policy which Alexander well knew how to appreciate. He adopted the dress and usages of the country, and made himself a perfect master of the Persian language. The Persians, as we are informed by the historian, were naturally pleased with him. His example, to a certain extent, may serve as a pattern to modern nations who occupy a foreign land.

AT SUSA.

At Susa, on the banks of the Ulai or Choaspes, (B.C. 324), the army at last rested from their labours; and the interval of leisure was employed in enjoying the festivities of marriage. Alexander took to himself another wife, Barsine, the eldest daughter of Darius. If we may trust Aristobulus, he married also at the same time Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus; thus sharing the honours of his Bactrian wife Roxana with two of Persian stock. Eighty of his chief officers at the same time received each an Asiatic wife from their royal master, who seems to have assigned the women to their respective husbands, just as he would have parcelled out so many governments.

The wives of Craterus, Perdicas, Ptolemy, the future King of Egypt, Eumenes, Nearchus, and Seleucus, are specially mentioned by the historian. "The marriages," he adds, "were celebrated after the Persian fashion: seats were placed for the bridegrooms, and after the wine, the brides were introduced, and each sat down by her husband. The men took the women by the hand, and kissed them, the King setting the example. Alexander gave a dowry with each. Every other Macedonian who chose to take an Asiatic wife was registered, and received a present on his marriage: the number who followed the King's example was above ten thousand.

However politic these intermarriages might be as a means of conciliating rival nations, they brought the disgust of the Macedonian veterans to its climax. A mutiny broke out at a review held at Opis on the Tigris; and when Alexander offered to send home the wounded and disabled, the soldiers cried out that he had better dismiss them all, and make his future conquests by the help of his father Ammon. At this taunt Alexander leaped down among the crowd, followed by a few of his guards, and seized thirteen of the ringleaders, who were led off to instant execution. Then haranguing the soldiers, who were cowed by the example, he reproached them with ingratitude to their King, who, having borne the chief part in all their toils and dangers, had given them the substantial rewards of success, reserving for himself only the honours and cares of the tiara. In fine, he ordered them to take their discharge; and he shut himself up in the palace, committing its guard to Persian troops. Soon the veterans came flocking round the palace, throwing down their arms and praying for forgiveness. A solemn reconciliation cancelled the resentment which Alexander had never ceased to feel since the mutiny on the Hyphasis, and 10,000 of the most worn veterans were sent home under Craterus, who was appointed to succeed Antipater as a viceroy of Macedonia.

The feastings and revelry that attended the marriage celebrations were diversified by every kind of amusement that music, theatrical representations, and all the talents of the most skilful artistes of the Greek nations could supply; but in the midst of this scene of perhaps riotous festivity, we must not overlook the wise policy of Alexander, by which he endeavoured to blend the conquerors and the conquered into one nation by the strong tie of intermarriage. It was obviously also a further design of Alexander, as we see from his historian, to train the natives of Asia to European arms and manoeuvres; and by incorporating them with his troops, and forming new bodies, to render himself independent of the control of his Macedonians.

CLOSING EVENTS.

Discovery and works of utility still engaged his attention. He sailed down the Karoon into the Gulf, examined part of the delta of these rivers, and, ascending the Siat-el-Arab, went up the Tigris as far as Opis. In this voyage he removed several of those large masses of masonry, commonly called bunds, which were built across the river for the purpose of making a head of water and favouring irrigation; but they proved at the same time an impediment to navigation, which it was the conqueror's policy to improve and extend.

Alexander went about the close of the year B.C. 324 to Ecbatana, the northern capital of the empire, where Hephestion, his favourite, died. The grief of Alexander, which was, no doubt, sincere, displayed itself in all the outward circumstances of sorrow; but from the mass of contradictory accounts, Arrian found no little trouble in extracting a probable and rational narrative.

On his route towards Babylon from Ecbatana, Alexander diverted his grief by subduing the Cossæi, a mountain tribe of robbers, whom he entirely rooted out, as he thought; but they soon showed themselves again. It seems as if the temperament of Alexander required a feverish excitement, and that rest and inactivity would have proved more fatal to his existence than the most incessant toil. Neither the severity of winter, nor the difficulties of the country, proved any obstacle "to Alexander and Ptolemy the son of Lagus, who commanded part of the army." On his approach to the ancient city of Babylon, he was met by embassies from nearly every part of the known world, who had come to pay their respects to the new lord of Asia.

The priests of the temple of Belus endeavoured to persuade the King that he could not safely enter the city; the great Belus himself had given this warning. Their motives, as Arrian tells us, and as we might readily suspect, were not so disinterested as they appeared. The great temple was in ruins, and the priests had made little progress in rebuilding it, according to the orders given during Alexander's first visit; they enjoyed, however, its ample revenues, which, like prudent economists, they had no wish to expend upon a useless building. The King despised the warning of Belus and his priests, and entered the city.

AT BABYLON.

In Babylon, Alexander proposed to fix the seat of his empire, and to live in a style of splendour unknown even to the monarchs of the East. His projects were grand and characteristic. He sent Heracles to build vessels on the Caspian, and to explore these unknown waters, which Herodotus had a century before declared to be an inland sea, but other opinions connected with the Euxine of the Great Ocean. He excavated a basin at Babylon to hold the vessels that should navigate the Persian Gulf and the Euphrates, while he spared no pains to induce skilful seamen to repair to his new capital. The circumnavigation of the Arabian peninsula, and the subjection of its predatory hordes, were also part of his plan; but no commander of those who were sent out ventured farther than Cape Makela, at the entrance of the Gulf. The improvement of the agriculture of the fertile Babylonian plains was another object of his policy: as a preliminary to which, the numerous canals for irrigation required repair, and the great drain from the river during the season of the floods, the Pallacopus, was rendered more efficient.

ALEXANDER'S DEATH.

In the midst of these undertakings and the preparation for his Arabian expedition, Alexander died. The immediate cause of his death was a fever, probably contracted whilst superintending the work in the marches round Babylon, and aggravated by a recent debauch. The daily bulletins during his illness may be seen in Arrian. He seems to have had no physician. For nine days he tried to shake off the fever, conversing with his generals about his schemes, playing at dice with Medius, and rising each day to bathe and offer sacrifice. At last he was unable to make this effort; and by the time his generals had been summoned round his bed, he had become speechless. His last act was to take off his signet ring and deliver it to Perdiccas; but it was reported, that just before his utterance failed him, he was asked to whom he bequeathed his kingdom, and that he replied, "To the strongest!"

The soldiers, hearing of his approaching end, surrounded the palace, and being admitted without their arms, they passed before his bed in mournful and respectful silence, while their dying leader made them signs of recognition. His generals slept in the temple of Serapis, hoping to learn by a dream whether he might be healed if he were transported thither; but the oracle bade him be left where he was.

He died at the early age of thirty-two years and eight months; during the whole of which time his sword was actively employed in diminishing the numbers of the human race.

Of fair complexion, with a glittering eye and features of regal beauty, his frame, strong by nature and moulded into a finer symmetry by the physical culture of a true Greek education, wielding his arms with grace, vigour, and swiftness, the white plume above his princely forehead ever dancing in the thickest of the fight, Alexander was a noble specimen of the ancient Greek soldier. Impelled by a resistless and unquenchable desire of empire and fame, that had nourished itself on the glorious deeds of ancient heroes, fiery in his anger, swift in his repentance, and kingly in his generosity, ever aiming to surpass the deeds of Achilles, of Hercules, and of "the great twin brethren," with the poems of Homer and his sword beneath his pillow, Alexander realized the ideal of the ancient martial hero. The old virtue of pride—and it was really, as has been observed, when in a noble form, the best practical virtue the ancients possessed—was his in great measure: he would contend at the Olympian games, he said in his youth, if he had kings for his competitors. Personal valour, an indispensable quality in the old hero, he had even to excess; it set him on the back of the fierce Bucephalus when a boy, and it enabled him when a man to curb and guide his fierce and haughty army. He loved poetry, he loved science; he had the fire and fluency of an orator, and the cool intellectual force of a thinker. He always honoured the gods and aspired to be enrolled among their ranks,—a trait indispensably necessary in the Hellenic hero. A certain romantic element, indicative of, and produced by, ardency of temperament, and vividness of imagination, played an important part in his character and history. It was precisely such a romantic element which spread out before the eye of Napoleon the magnificent picture of an Eastern empire to rival that of Alexander, and it has, we incline to believe, characterized all great conquerors.

"On the whole," remarks one writer, "we hesitate not to pronounce the character of Alexander morally noble and intellectually great. Judged by a fair standard, his generous and self-respecting conduct towards the loveliest women in the world, his generally mild conduct to the vanquished, and the true chivalric valour of his heart, may still merit our applause. His intellectual powers were certainly of a very high order; the two grand, indispensable components of a great mind, a strong judgment and a clear imagination, he possessed. His utter dauntlessness, embracing this substantial mental framework as his armour embraced his physical frame, lent a certain imposing soldierly aspect to the whole; while the gleam of romance that burned over all, seemed well figured by the white plume which waved over his helmet.

"We have reached a very different era from that of Alexander, and the wheels of the world will roll backwards ere mankind can again consider an Alexander their noblest hero; that vein of ferocity which we think is undesirable, and that occasional yielding to the pleasure of intemperance, which even the Bacchic worship of the day can only palliate and not accuse, set him very far below what we look for in a Christian hero; yet we can still honour his indomitable valour, his moderation, his sympathy with the glories of poetry, his generosity; and not only realise, but to some extent sympathise with, the salutations with which ambassadors from the ends of the earth greeted him, when he finally took his seat on the throne of Asia. One of the highest German authorities affirmed his superiority to Julius Cæsar in tenderness of feeling, in 'generous and lofty disinterestedness of character,' in taste for the beauties of art, and in what he styles 'organic genius of state;' while Arnold, whose profound classic lore and warm, true, sympathetic heart render his opinion of great weight, pronounced him, what we should not certainly venture to declare him, the greatest man of the ancient world."

Historians have delighted in speculating on what would have been the result had Alexander lived to come into contact with the nations of the West. Considering the vast resources of his empire, his prudent skill in turning them to the best account, and his profound knowledge of the art of war, we may be quite sure that he would have accomplished deeds surpassing any that he had yet achieved. But his success would only have tended to overwhelm the rising civilization of the West beneath the backward wave of that Orientalism which had already been once repelled from the shores of Greece. The world was reserved for another destiny, to be moulded by Roman energy, Roman law, and the stern Roman sense of duty.

Meanwhile the conquests of Alexander had a prodigious and, upon the whole, a most beneficial effect in bringing the East within the sphere of Hellenic civilization. It may be true that the spread of that civilization was due rather to his successors than to himself, and that his one moving principle was the insatiable lust of conquest. But perhaps the reaction from blind admiration of his exploits has led some to a too sweeping denial of those civil qualities which time was not granted him to develop. Even amidst the rapid course of conquest, the pupil of Aristotle, the founder of Alexandria, and the projector of the voyage of Nearchus, was not altogether indifferent to the cause of science; and the genius which organized his army, and so reduced his vast empire to order, had equal capacities for civil administration, though it may be doubted whether his impatient temper could have rivalled the work of Cæsar or Napoleon. The cities that he founded in the distant regions of Asia may have been designed chiefly as the outposts of a great military empire; but they became, in fact, the germs of powerful States, which were influenced by Greek civilization from their very origin, and commercial centres by which communication was kept up between the nations of the West and the distant realm of India, and even China. The increased facility of intercourse—an object at which Alexander was ever aiming—formed a result of his conquests only second in importance to the diffusion of the Greek language.

ALFRED THE GREAT,

THE ILLUSTRIOUS KING OF WESSEX.

"Alfred was the noblest as he was the most complete embodiment of all that is great, all that is lovable, in the English temper. He combined, as no other man has ever combined, its practical energy, its patient and enduring force, its profound sense of duty, the reserve and self-control that steadies in it a wide outlook and a restless daring, its temperance and its fairness, its frank geniality, its sensitiveness to affection, its poetic tendencies, its deep and passionate religion. . . . Scholar and soldier, artist and man of business, poet and saint, his character kept that perfect balance which charms us in no other Englishman save Shakspeare."—Gibbon's History of the English People.

A STORY OF SAXON ENGLAND.

A STORY of a thousand years ago; a story of a time when "this England of ours" was not under the rule and government of one sovereign, but when one king was in the south, another in the centre, another on the east coast, another in the far north; when what is now Lowland Scotland was not Scotland at all, but most of it was known as Strathclyde, and included in the Northumbrian kingdom, ruled over by a king of Teutonic race. The Britons, descendants of the Cymri and Lœgrians, who invaded the island in the half-mythical times before the Roman galleys touched the Kentish coast, had been driven back to the mountains and moors of the west and north, to the rocky peninsula of Cornwall, to the inaccessible fastnesses of Wales, and to Strathclyde, between which and the huge, frowning mountains of Albin the Clyde and Forth flowed to the western and eastern seas.

A story of a thousand years ago; and across the faint light of the dawn of English history, and many shadows thrown by vague popular traditions and legends formulated into grave chronicles by monkish writers, we see dim figures of kings, churchmen, and warriors, almost as indistinct as the effigies on the antique tombs of the cloisters of the Saxon churches; and the real history of these once powerful men is nearly as illegible to the eyes of the student of our own times as the inscriptions which recorded the dignities and the deeds of those whose bones lie beneath the sculptured slabs. But one figure stands out clearly to all time—a king, a warrior, a lawgiver, a scholar, a wise, brave, and gentle-hearted, God-fearing man, who lived and died as a king should, the foremost of his time, and the consolidator, if not the framer, of the institutions which, amid so many trials, have survived to these later ages, and made England great.

NOT KING OF ENGLAND.

We commonly speak of Alfred, or Ælfred ("the rede, or counsel, of the elves"), as King of England. That title he never bore, and never claimed to bear. He was King of Wessex, as his father Ethelwulf and his grandfather Egbert, or Echbright, had been before him. Egbert had, by the vigour of his personal character and his success as a warrior, absorbed into his own dominion the Saxon kingdoms of Kent and Essex, as his predecessor Ceadwalla had subdued and annexed Sussex, and had established a controlling influence over Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumbria; but the latter were, in respect of internal government, independent. Egbert was not, as our school histories tell us he was, the first King of England, that is, the sole King; but he was the most powerful of the Saxon Kings, and as such chosen Bretwada, or Chief King, who, in case of the union of the kingdoms against a common enemy, would act as leader.

THE KINGDOM OF WESSEX.

The history of the gradual fusion of the Heptarchy (seven Saxon kingdoms), or of the Octarchy, which some modern historians prefer to speak of—for Northumbria had been divided into Deira and Bernicia, and there were still contentions and rival claimants—is a tangled thread which we need not stay to attempt to unravel. The fact remains that Wessex was the most powerful of all the Saxon kingdoms, and that its King, Egbert, a direct descendant of Cerdic,—who, in 495, landed on the Hampshire coast, near the mouth of the Avon, and was the first King of Wessex,—exercised an authority greater than that possessed by any of his predecessors. He had been banished from his native country, when, after the murder of King Cynewulf, Bertric, or Brithtric, had contrived to be elevated to the throne, and for thirteen years had served under Charlemagne, the great King of the Franks. At his court, and while accompanying him in his campaigns, he had acquired not only military but political knowledge, which stood him in good stead when he was recalled to assume the kingship after Bertric had been accidentally poisoned by drinking from a cup which his infamous wife, Eadburga, daughter of Offa, King of Mercia, had prepared for a young court favourite of whom she was jealous. There had been a long friendship between the Franks and the Anglo-Saxons. The most earnest of the missionaries of the Christian faith to the semi-savage Franks, and the most eminent of the scholars invited to the Court of the great Charlemagne—Bonifacius, Willibrod, and the learned Alcuin, versed in all the scholarship of his day, and chief teacher at Charlemagne's school at Aix-la-Chapelle—were of British birth. The Saxons of Wessex, or of Mercia and the other States, were nominally Christians. There were churches at Glastonbury, Wimborne, Sherborne, and many other places. Ecclesiastics were the leading spirits of the great council, the Witenagemote (or assembly of wise and noble men), and the ministers and advisers of the King. Charlemagne, too, was a Christian; and an alliance between the Franks of the continent and the Saxons of the island was desirable, in defence not only of their common Christianity, but of their respective nationalities even, against the attack of enemies, heathen, savage, cruel, and remorseless, the renowned Northmen, the Scandinavian pirates, to whom our common histories give the generic name Danes.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

THE GREAT BRETWALDA.

Egbert moulded his policy on that of the great warrior King of the Franks. Dr. Pauli, the famous German historian, who has studied so carefully the history of these times, says: "The rough, honest Saxon not only learnt from the more refined Frank a greater dexterity in the use of arms and a more polished demeanour, but he marked attentively what was passing before his eyes: he saw how, in a skilful hand, the reins of government might be made to unite and hold in a straight course the numerous Teutonic races, between whom originally no political connection subsisted. From the moment when he set foot on his native land as its king, the idea was uppermost in his mind of forming one entire kingdom, which might be able to keep its enemies in check, and effect much internal good, out of the numerous small States, which, in their present state of isolation, had the greatest difficulty in maintaining their existence." If he did not quite realize this design, he at least acquired, in the thirty-eighth year of his reign, such a supremacy that we may fairly claim for him the position of the greatest as well as the last of the Bretwaldas of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms. Mr. Sharon Turner, the historian, says: "The tale that he (Egbert) assembled the Anglo-Saxon States, and, abolishing the distinction of Saxons and Angles and all provincial appellations, commanded the island to be called England, and caused himself to be crowned and denominat<sup>d</sup> King of England, seems not to be entitled to our belief."

It was well for Saxon Angle-land, that mother of the England of the future, that in these early years of the ninth century the ruling spirit was a man of clear head and resolute will, of trained administrative and military capacity. The great struggle between the Saxons and the heathen pirates of the North, marked for a hundred years and more by massacre and rapine, by the destruction of cities, monasteries, and churches by flame and sword, was about to commence; and had it not been for the statesmanlike ability in consolidating a national power, and the resolute courage of the great Bretwalda and his greater grandson Alfred, the religion, the laws, and social institutions of his country, in their infancy as yet, but the seed of great developments yet to come, might have been swept away.

THE SEA-KINGS OF THE NORTH.

The Northmen were descended from the same stock as the Anglo-Saxons and the Franks, and the languages spoken were so similar as to be mutually intelligible; but the conversion of the Teutonic peoples of the South to Christianity had broken every tie of nationality which might once have united them. The Saxon Cerdic, who had established the Kingdom of Wessex, gloried in being a direct descendant of Woden, or Odin, the chief figure of the Scandinavian mythology; and even long after the formal acceptance of Christianity, a superstitious reverence of the name prevailed. But the still heathen Northmen looked upon the Saxons and Franks as renegades from the Scandinavian faith; and to the love of rapine and slaughter, the main occupation of their turbulent lives, added an intense hatred of the Christian faith.

These northern pirates are spoken of by the chroniclers of the time as Danes or Normans, according as they came from the islands of the Baltic or from the coast of Norway. The leaders were allied to the princely races of the north; and their occupation was considered the noblest career in which warriors and men of rank could engage. Among the Scandinavians, the eldest son of a king remained at home to inherit the government, and his brothers were sent to sea to gain their subsistence as pirates, ships and equipments being supplied. They were permitted to assume the name of kings, though possessing no territory; and in legend and ballads they are commemorated as the Sea-Kings of the North. The title, in the northern tongue, was "Viking," king of the bays, from their practice of swooping down on the small craft which might contain treasure, when collected in apparent safety in bays or inlets of the coast. The ocean swarmed with these brigands of the sea, who sometimes landed and attacked towns, and then went away with the gold, silver, and jewels they could collect, leaving behind them burning houses and the bodies of the townspeople they had murdered. The land kings sometimes made a successful resistance to these incursions, and even sent out ships to pursue the pirates. The chronicler Saxo mentions that one Danish king destroyed seventy of the sea-kings' ships.

Not only fierce warriors of royal ace, the Vikings and their sons, were pirates; but the occupation was so lucrative, that men of importance and wealth equipped ships and took to the sea. Young boys were sent out with the Vikings and other leaders of renown, as in the days of chivalry they were sent to act as pages and esquires to famous knights. When a ship, or galley rather, for they were propelled by oars, returned from an expedition laden with ill-gotten spoil, the successful leader was welcomed as a hero and, those who failed to secure rich prizes were despised.

Witikind, of Scott's poem "Harold the Dauntless," was, we may suppose, a sea-rover of this kind :—

"Count Witikind came of a regal strain,
And roved with the Norsemen the sea and the main.
Woe to the realms which he coasted, for there
Was shedding of blood and rending of hair!
When he hoisted his standard black,
Before him was battle, behind him wrack;
And he burned the churches, that heathen Dane!
To light his band to their barks again."

Mr. Sharon Turner tells us, "The sea-kings of the North were a race of beings whom Europe beheld with horror. Without a yard of territorial property, without any town or visible nation, with no wealth but their crews, and no hope but from their swords, the sea-kings swarmed on the boisterous ocean and plundered in every district they could approach. Never to sleep under a smoky roof, nor to indulge in the cheerful cup over a hearth, were the boast of these watery sovereigns, who not only flourished on the plunder of the sea and its shores, but who sometimes amassed so much booty, and enlisted so many followers, as to be able to assault provinces for permanent conquest."

The land kings themselves not unfrequently resorted to piracy as an amusement for the summer months, or as a means of increasing their resources, attacking one another's dominions with the greatest ferocity. "The victors of one day were the victims of the next; and he who was consigning without pity the women and children of other families to the grave or to famine, must have often found on his return but the ashes of his paternal habitation, and the corpses of those he loved." So prevalent and absorbing was this piratical instinct, that in Iceland and elsewhere, wealthy parents would insist on having their treasures buried with them, in order that their sons, having no inheritance, might be compelled to associate themselves with the Sea-Kings.

CRUELTY OF THE SEA-KINGS.

Some of the Vikings, known as the Bersekir, lashed themselves into paroxysms of insanity before conflict, and then rushed like wild beasts to the commission of the most terrible crimes. But the majority, if equally sanguinary and unscrupulous, were more clear-headed, and as remarkable for individual activity and prowess as for rapacity and cruelty. The old Sagas, or ballad poems, chanted by the unknown Homers of the North, delight in relating how the fierce sea-warriors could run across the oars while they were in motion, or throw three javelins to the mast-head, catching them alternately. Thierry, the French historian, quoting from old Frankish Chronicles, says: "A sort of religion and patriotic fanaticism was thus allied in the souls of the Scandinavians with their disorderly spirit and insatiable thirst of gain. They shed the blood of priests with pleasure, were particularly gratified in pillaging churches, and tethered their horses in the chapels belonging to palaces. When they had wasted with fire and sword some canton of the Christian territory, they would say in derision, 'We have sung the mass of lances; it began at dawn of morning, and has lasted until night.'"

They were as fearless as ferocious. Their descendants—for the Danish blood runs in the veins of our sea-coast population—are the finest and most adventurous seamen in the world, so permanent are hereditary characteristics; and it was the piratical instinct (only now, in some cases, we give it a milder name) which animated the English adventurers who made themselves so formidable on the Spanish main, and so gallantly captured rich galleons in the days when Elizabeth was Queen. At a time when the navigators of other seas were careful not to lose sight of the coast, and sought shelter when gales blew, the bold Vikings ventured into the open and unknown seas, eager for new adventures. "Often," we are told, "were their fragile barks wrecked and dispersed by the violent storms of the Northern seas; often did the rallying sign remain unanswered; but this rather increased than diminished the confidence of the survivors, who laughed at the winds and the waves from which they had escaped unhurt. 'The force of the storm,' they would sing, 'is a help to the arms of our rowers: the hurricane is in our service; it carries us the way we would go.'"

Since the last "Vikinger brave died upon the wave," and his body was borne on his burning ship to the mystery of the horizon, there have been pirates many—buccaneers, Greeks (some of them "the mildest-mannered men that ever scuttled ship or cut a throat"), Algerians and Dyaks, rovers of the blue Ægean or the Indian Seas,—but none more terrible, none so picturesque, as the Northmen, who kept the British island in turmoil for two hundred years, and whose descendants ultimately conquered it, for the Normans (Northmen) of whom we are so proud were the children of the Scandinavian sea-king Rollo and his band of pirates.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

ATTACKS ON BRITAIN.

It was not probable that Britain, which could be reached in fair weather in a few days from the Norwegian or Danish coasts, would be long exempt from the attacks of these daring Norsemen. Three years before the death of Egbert, they had passed the narrow straits beyond the mouth of the Thames, skirted the southern coast of the island, and found a favourable landing-place on the coast of Cornwall. The prudence and skill of Egbert had probably guarded the parts of the Wessex coast most convenient for an invader; but Cornwall was beyond the proper limits of his kingdom, although the British folk there had promised allegiance to the powerful Bretwalda. On some parts of the Cornish coast the Northmen landed, and were welcomed by the people, who perhaps thought the well-armed warriors would help to deliver them from the Saxon supremacy to which they had so unwillingly submitted. It was well for them that, on the contrary, the Saxons were able to deliver them from the Vikings. Egbert soon heard of the arrival of the strangers, and a strong force, led by the eorls and caldermen of Wessex, marched swiftly into the Cornish land, and drove such of the fierce invaders as survived the battle back to their vessels. There was another landing shortly afterwards on the Dorsetshire coast, and for a time the Danes held their own; but on a second visit they were grievously defeated by Egbert.

Wessex was too strong for the pirates; but Wessex was not all the land. The eastern coast, East Anglia and Northumbria, were near to Scandinavia; and not many years after the repulse in Cornwall, Northern pirates made raids in that part of the island. At first they did not attempt to possess themselves of territory, but ascended the great rivers until they found a commodious station, then they quitted their barks, moored them or ran them on shore, and penetrated the country on marauding expeditions. It would not have been safe, perhaps, to attack large towns, but villages and homesteads were ravaged; and if there were not much gold or silver, there were horses and cattle. In some instances small entrenched camps were formed near the coast, to which, after disposing of the booty, the pirates returned. Kent, although at that time annexed to Wessex, was practically remote from the centre of Egbert's power; and in 851, a Danish band passed a winter in the Isle of Thanet, refraining, perhaps, from ravaging, and so provoking the hostility of the Saxon Danes and churls; and four years afterwards a similar winter camp was formed in the Isle of Sheppey. There are some records of earlier visits to Kent. Ethelwulf, son of Egbert, was at that time nominally King of Kent, really a lieutenant for his father.

ACCESSION OF ETHELWULF.

Egbert died in 838, and Ethelwulf succeeded to the throne of Wessex. Some of the old chroniclers assert that while a youth he had been trained in the cloister, under the care of the famous Swithin, and had become a monk; but that the Pope relieved him from his vow to enable him to become king. This could scarcely have been the case; for, as we have seen, he was made King of Kent many years before his father's death; and, besides, while holding that high office, he married Osburgla, daughter of Oslac, a nobleman of royal descent, who held the high office of cupbearer to the King. It would seem probable, indeed, that there was a previous marriage, for his eldest son, Athelstan, who succeeded him as King of Kent, was so much older than his brothers, that some writers have supposed that he was really a son of Egbert, a younger brother, not child, of Ethelwulf.

BIRTH OF ALFRED.

Osburgla was the mother of a large family; and in 849, at Wannating, one of the royal residences, on the Berkshire downs, now known as Wantage, she gave birth to her fourth son, on whom the name Alfred (appearing in the old chronicles as Ælfred or Alurel) was conferred. Osburgla appears to have been a woman of superior character, loving, of equable temper, and of considerable intelligence, loved by her children, with whom she lived in peaceful retirement, in homely Saxon fashion.

Ethelwulf governed with discretion, and was not deficient in courage. While King of Kent, he had successfully repelled several attempted invasions by the Northmen; and in the government of Wessex had the advantage of the assistance of one of those energetic ecclesiastics who figured so prominently in the middle ages, when Churchmen were almost the sole possessors of the education enabling them to manage the details of public affairs, and were quite as ready, if occasion were, to don the helmet and suit of mail, and acquit themselves in knightly fashion in the field, as to wear alb and rochet in the church. A Churchman of this kind was Ealstan; Bishop of Sherborne; he had been the friend and adviser of King Egbert, who, however, generally managed military matters for himself; but, both as minister and general, Ealstan was the right hand of Ethelwulf. Another active adviser in ecclesiastical but not in more directly political matters, was the famous Swithin, or Swithun, Bishop of Winchester, whose memory is still preserved in connection with an annual forty days of rain. Dr. Pauli says: "While Ealstan's activity shone forth conspicuously during the earlier years of the King's reign, in warding off his dangerous enemies, the influence of Swithin was paramount in times of peace, when the Church raised her head higher than ever; and whilst the former was never remembered with sufficient gratitude, the name of the latter was ere long enrolled among the saints in the calendar."

INVASION BY DANES.

All the promptness and skill of Ealstan were required when Ethelwulf became King of Wessex. The Danes were harrying the southern coast, and not always unsuccessfully. But at each place of any importance, there were brave caldermen, or governors, who fought well against the pirates. At Hantstone, the precursor of the modern Southampton, twenty-four Danish galleys were repulsed in one day by Wulflerd; but about the same time the Danes, after desperate fighting, effected a lodgment on Portland Island. The year after Egbert's death, they made inroads and perpetrated frightful atrocities in the countries of the East Angles and Kent, Canterbury, Rochester, and London especially suffering. Thirty-five vessels landed bands of Danes on the Dorsetshire coast, near Charmouth, and, although met by Ethelwulf himself, maintained their ground, compelling the West Saxons to retreat. Two years before the birth of Alfred, Bishop Ealstan, and the caldermen Eanwulf and Osric, of Somersetshire and Dorsetshire, inflicted a severe defeat on the Danes near the mouth of the river Parret, in Dorsetshire.

THE FIRST NAVAL VICTORY.

Although the little world of Wantage was peaceful enough when the great Alfred was born, there were danger and perplexity at the extremities of the Wessex land; and probably King Ethelwulf was seldom at the side of his wife in the quiet homestead on the Berkshire downs. Alfred was two years old when, in a great battle at Wicombeorg (Wembury), in Devonshire, the invaders were routed; and about the same time Athelstan, King of Kent, who had prepared ships, ventured to encounter the daring North-men on their own element, off Sandwich. It was the first sea-fight in our annals, and, like nearly every other sea-fight in which the English have been engaged, it was a victory. Eight of the Danish vessels were captured, and the remainder of the fleet scattered. There was great loss of life on both sides; and it is not likely that the prisoners taken by King Athelstan had much mercy shown them. In those days, neither Saxon nor Dane knew much about the quality of mercy. "Vae victis!" woe to the vanquished, was the practical motto of those who fought under the Saxon banner of the white horse, as of those over whose armed galleys floated the effigy of the Northmen's raven.

NEW INVASIONS; THE BATTLE OF ACLEA.

Still they came. The desire for revenge, the lust of plunder, the animosity of those who believed in Woden against those who worshipped, when they worshipped at all, in Christian churches, were too powerful to permit Britain to remain unmolested. In 852, a powerful Danish fleet of 350 vessels made its way up the Thames. A band of pirates landed on the Isle of Thanet. Other and more numerous bands quitted their vessels at places higher up the river, and marched northwards into Mercia, levying as they passed along the tribute of plunder. King Berthwulf was unable to resist them; and, returning to the south, the Danes crossed the Thames into Surrey, whence they could make their way into Kent, and so rejoin their ships with all their plunder. Some writers have asserted that in this expedition London was ravaged; but the fact would appear to be that the river was crossed at a point considerably higher up, perhaps near Chertsey, and that then the Danes took a circuit through the fertile country, pillaging the homesteads on their way. The old Roman road skirted the range of hills of which Leith Hill is the highest point; and along that road marched the blood-stained, booty-laden Danes. Near Leith Hill, the pretty little village Ockley preserves the name of Aclea (the plain of oaks), where King Ethelwulf and his son Ethelbald, then grown to man's estate, and a strong force, awaited their approach. The Saxons were posted on high ground; and when the Danes approached, rushed upon them with determined valour. Each side fought with desperate courage; and the Saxons at length achieved the victory. The Danes were slaughtered or driven from the field. Of those who fled, some perhaps took refuge in the great forest of Andredswald, which then covered what we now know as the Weald.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

of Sussex, there perishing of starvation, or meeting death at the hands of the Saxon churls and keepers of swine who dwelt there. The rich booty was secured by the Saxons; but it is not likely that it was returned to the original owners.

ALLIANCE WITH MERCIA.

For a time the Danish raids ceased in Wessex; and Ethelwulf, feeling secure from invasion in Wessex, assisted the new King of Mercia, Buhred, to subdue the fierce chiefs of North Wales. The two Kings led their forces into the Isle of Mona (Anglesey); and the principal Welsh leader, Roderic Mawr, acknowledged their supremacy. The alliance between Wessex and Mercia was strengthened after this by the marriage of King Buhred with Ethelswitha, daughter of the King of Wessex. This expedition involved the necessity of postponing for a time the execution of a project dear to Ethelwulf's heart,—a pilgrimage to Rome. Better adapted by inclination for an ecclesiastic than a prince, though discharging the duties of his station with sense and manliness, the King desired, as most pious men in these days, to visit Rome and personally receive the blessing of the Pope. He felt that he and his people had much to be thankful for. The victory at Aclea had released the Wessex folk from immediate apprehension of danger. In the words of a modern historian, "the people had again a short breathing-time; the peasant could once more follow his plough unmolested; in churches and cloisters holy men might sing and read, as before, to the glory of God, and instruct the people in their faith and in all kinds of useful learning." The last clause of the sentence, however, must be taken with considerable qualification. Many of the clergy themselves could not have construed a sentence of the Latin Psalms they learned by rote; of all the people who knelt in the churches, scarcely one, even were he an calderman, a thane, or even a princely descendant of the great house of Cerdic, could, if he were required to append his name to a document, do other than make a rude mark, and, indeed, scarcely knew one letter of the alphabet from another. Among the ecclesiastics there were a few fair scholars, though not so many as in the churches and monasteries north of the Humber; and to their hands was entrusted all absolutely necessary literary work.

THE CHILDHOOD OF ALFRED.

Ethelwulf, in his occasional visits to Wannating, had learned to love with an exceptional love the youngest of his children, the boy Alfred; and although not thinking it prudent to own his wishes at present, and so excite the jealousy of his elder sons, desired that he should be his successor on the throne. It is very probable, indeed, that the child had already given precocious evidence of natural ability, which his father, who had been the pupil of Swithin, preferred to the rougher and uncultivated qualities of Alfred's brothers. The cares of state, the duties of his office, made it advisable for Ethelwulf to remain for the present at home; but he resolved that his young son, then five years old, should be sent to Rome. It is doubtful whether the mother, the good Osburgha, had not passed away before this resolve was taken; at any rate she was not within the purview of history, and was probably dead. There is a pretty story told by Asser, the chronicler of Alfred's reign and his most confidential friend, to the effect that the boy was stimulated to commit to memory a considerable amount of Saxon poetry by a promise made to him by his mother, that she would give him the handsomely illuminated book which contained it; but a comparison of dates shows that when Alfred was twelve years old, the age at which the matter is said to have occurred, his father had married a second wife, and Osburgha must either have been dead or divorced; and, in the latter case, it is most improbable that her children should have been permitted to reside with her. Around Alfred, as around other famous men, gathered legends and stories many, growing from hand to hand, affectionately believed in and grafted into history by credulous chroniclers, who trusted very considerably to imagination for the facts of their biographical episodes. It is quite possible, however, that Alfred became fairly acquainted with the productions of the Saxon bards from hearing them, in his childhood, repeated by his mother.

THE YOUNG PRINCE IN ROME.

With an honourable escort, ecclesiastics and men of noble birth, young Alfred crossed the Channel, and passed through the country of the West Franks to Rome. There he was received by the able and patriotic Pope Leo IV., a man of Roman birth, who, possessing more than a slight share of the military spirit of the time, had encouraged his fellow-countrymen to drive back in a very effective manner Moorish pirates who had invaded the States of the Church, and repaired the fortifications which defended the Vatican quarter of the famous city. The Pope gave the little prince a warm welcome, adopted him as his "spiritual son," or godson, and—perhaps as the result of a private communication from Ethelwulf—anointed him as the future King of Wessex.

It is commonly stated, but the matter is open to some doubt, that Alfred returned to Britain after a brief stay in Rome, returning thither with his father two years afterwards. Some modern investigators of the history of the period have suggested that the young prince remained at Rome until the arrival of his father. If so, he probably benefited by the education given at the Saxon school established in that city by Ina, King of Wessex, a hundred years before, when he and his queen made the pilgrimage from which he never returned.

KING ETHELWULF'S VISIT TO THE POPE.

Be that as it may,—and the history of two years of Alfred's early childhood is not of paramount importance,—his father Ethelwulf, in the early part of 855, made preparations to fulfil the purpose he had so long cherished. He assembled the Witenagemote, entrusted to it the duty of providing for the government of the kingdom in his absence, and made over more than the tenth part of his private income—and as king he had the most land, and was consequently the richest man in his dominion—in favour of the Church, for the salvation of his own soul and the souls of his ancestors. Charles the Bold, King of the Franks, grandson of Charlemagne, gave him a splendid welcome and a royal escort to the boundaries of the kingdom. The royal visitor was entertained at the court of the French King, and rested at the stages of the journey in the castles of powerful nobles. Then the Alps were crossed, and, through the rich plains of Lombardy and the picturesque passes of the Apennines, the Saxon King made a memorable journey to the Eternal City. When he arrived there, Leo was dead or dying, and the great strife between the Popes and the Emperors was beginning. But the reception of Ethelwulf was not affected by political dissensions. All united in giving honour to the powerful Saxon monarch who had given such proofs of his devotion to the Church. On his part, he had taken the surest means to gain favour. His baggage train contained costly gifts, a crown, dishes, and figures, all of pure gold, and robes of exquisite texture, with golden embroidery. He scattered money profusely, rebuilt and re-endowed the Saxon school, and made provision for the annual payment of sums to supply oil for the Easter lamps on the shrines of St. Peter and St. Paul. The promise of an annual present to the Pope himself was the origin of the famous Peter's Pence. He remained in Rome more than a year, and then, after Easter 856, Ethelwulf and Alfred, then eight years old, started on the return journey.

This memorable sojourn in the ancient capital of Christendom, the most famous city of the whole earth, must have made a great impression on the mind of Alfred, young as he was. "One cannot but feel," says Mr. Thomas Hughes, "that such an episode in his young life must have been full of fruit for him upon whom was so soon to rest the burden of a life and death struggle with the most terrible of foes, and of raising a slothful and stolid nation out of the darkness and exhaustion in which that struggle had left them." Dr. Pauli says: "The impressions which at this period his susceptible spirit received proved indelible; we recognise them in later days influencing the Saxon king, who, next to the love for his own people and their language, which he inherited from his mother, cherished an affection for those we call classic, and who steadily endeavoured to cultivate his desire to become familiar with them in spite of the greatest obstacles."

THE YOUNG BEAUTY, PRINCESS JUDITH.

On the return journey, he learned more perhaps at Paris than he did at Rome itself. Charles the Bold prided himself on reverence for learning, and had assembled at his magnificent court some of the greatest scholars of the age. Grimbold, a Churchman of great learning, famous, among other things, for his skill in music, was there; and John Erigeus, a scholar of Irish birth, resided at the palace as teacher of the royal family and the children of the nobility. Ethelwulf stayed at Paris for six or seven months, and it was soon apparent to his friends that there was an especial attraction in the eldest daughter of Charles. The Princess Judith was a beautiful and attractive girl in her fifteenth year; and by midsummer, the Saxon King had formally proposed to Charles for the hand of his daughter in marriage. The couple, so ill-matched in age—Ethelwulf was at least fifty—were solemnly betrothed in July; and on the 1st of October the marriage took place at the royal palace of Verberie, on the Oise. Archbishop Hincmar, of Rheims, officiated—a statesman as well as prelate; the bold minister who, Churchman as he was, resented Papal interference in the temporal affairs of Christian kingdoms.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

Judith of France not only became the wife of the King of Wessex, but had a crown placed on her head. Osburgha, her predecessor, had not been crowned, nor had the wife of Egbert; for since Eadburga, the poisoner, had so disgraced queenhood and womanhood, the West Saxons, while they revered the King's wife, would have no queen as sharer of the throne.

TRoubles AT HOME.

When Ethelwulf returned to England with Alfred, he found his kingdom in a disturbed condition, and ready for a revolt. His son Ethelbald openly denounced his father for permitting his young wife to be crowned; and he was supported by Bishop Ealstan and Ealdorman Eanwulf, certainly the most influential men in the kingdom. Ethelbald was at that time King of Kent, his elder brother Athelstan having, it was supposed, died before the King had started on his visit to Rome. Besides his objection to the coronation of Judith, Ethelbald was provoked by the intelligence of the reception given by the Pope to young Alfred, which he considered a setting aside his own right to the inheritance. The plea, too, was advanced that Ethelwulf had acted unconstitutionally in not formally resigning his crown before visiting Rome, as his predecessors Caedwalla and Ina had done. The three leaders of the revolt, with other nobles, met in the Witnawr, or Great Wood, the Forest of Selwood, on the borders of Somerset and Wilts, and there bound themselves by a secret oath, the precise nature of which is not known, but it most probably bound them to attempt to dethrone Ethelwulf and place Ethelbald on the throne.

The King was popular with the mass of the people; but those of low rank, dependent on the favour of more powerful personages, were of course compelled to take what course would best please their masters. A civil war seemed imminent; and most kings in the position of Ethelwulf would have asserted their right, collected their followers, and exerted all their power to crush the conspiracy. But he, anxious to avoid a war in which father and son would be opposed, suggested that the great council of the Kingdom should assemble and take the position of affairs into consideration. The result was that an arrangement was arrived at by which Ethelwulf resigned the crown of Wessex to his son, himself becoming King of Kent. He was perhaps the less averse to this arrangement, because the laws of the Kentish kingdom did not prevent Judith reigning as Queen.

DEATH OF ETHELWULF; A GREAT SCANDAL.

Two years afterwards Ethelwulf died, and by his will (in which a very liberal provision was made for the Church and the poor) arranged that his second son Ethelbert should succeed him as King of Kent, but be excluded from the succession of Wessex; and that if Ethelbald should die childless, the kingdom should devolve on Ethelred and Alfred in succession. The three younger brothers had remained with their father in Kent. At the time of his death, Alfred was ten years old. Judith must have been more like a sister to the youths than a stepmother, and they appear to have lived together very affectionately. But within a year of Ethelwulf's death, a great scandal occurred, Judith actually marrying Ethelbald, the eldest son of her late husband,—a marriage described as "contrary to God's prohibition and the dignity of a Christian, contrary also to the custom of all the pagans." The clergy, especially Swithin, expressed themselves strongly against the union; but Ethelbald was self-willed and obdurate, and not unpopular with his subjects, and Judith, beautiful and intelligent, seems to have exercised a fascinating influence over the more powerful nobles. In defiance of the custom of the kingdom, she not only maintained the state of a crowned queen, but also signed documents as "Judith Regina." Her lease of power, however, was short, for Ethelbald died in 860, less than three years after the death of his father. The double widow, then only about nineteen years old, sold all her possessions in this country, and went back to her father's court. Soon afterwards she eloped with a Flemish noble, Baldwin Brasdefer, and went direct to Rome, where Judith, who appears to have been irresistible, persuaded the Pope to sanction the marriage, although her father was terribly angry with her. He gave her his forgiveness, however, on the intercession of the Pope, and made her husband Count of Flanders, giving him all the country between the Scheldt, the Sambre, and the sea, that he might be the bulwark of the Frankish kingdom against the Northmen. Friendly relations with the English kingdoms appear to have been preserved, for we find that the eldest son of Baldwin and Judith married Elfrida, the daughter of Alfred, and her daughter was Matilda, who became wife of William the Conqueror, and through her all succeeding sovereigns of England trace a direct descent both from Alfred the Great and Charlemagne.

Ethelwulf's testamentary disposals of the kingdoms were disregarded. Ethelred did not succeed to the throne of Wessex after the elder brother's death; but Ethelbert, King of Kent, did, and there was a united kingdom, the more necessary as the Danes were renewing their invasions. Alfred resided with his brother, and, after his death in 866, with Ethelred, who then became King.

ALFRED'S YOUTH; SUFFERINGS AND COURAGEOUS PIETY.

When Ethelbert died, Alfred was eighteen years old. Although suffering occasionally from a malady, the nature of which is not known, but probably epilepsy, he was strong and active, and during his years of "enithhood," or preparation for the active, especially military, duties which would devolve on him, he proved himself to be an adept in all the manly exercises in which noble youths were trained. He acquired also a considerable amount of learning, probably more by the exercise of his own active intellectual powers than by direct tuition, and was particularly well acquainted with the Saxon poems and songs which formed the literature of his time. It is quite possible that his young stepmother, Judith, who had been well taught at her father's court, had stimulated his desire to possess some acquaintance with the scholarship of the age. He was comely in appearance, and his attractive manners made him an especial favourite with the people generally. The general assembly of the kingdom, in accordance with the wish of Ethelred, acknowledged him as heir to the throne; and, as second in power, and probably by far the first in natural gifts and acquirements, he occupied the highest position in the kingdom, and was invested with a certain degree of authority in the state. His biographer, Asser, to whom in after years Alfred spoke very freely about his early life, tells us that there was a perpetual struggle in the youth's mind between a strong religious sense of duty and sensual temptations which continually beset him. He prayed earnestly for help to conquer himself; "he used often to rise at cock-crow in the early mornings, and repairing to some church or holy place, he cast himself before God in prayer, that he might do nothing contrary to His holy will." He even prayed that some sickness might beset to him, which would be of use in subduing his body, without rendering him powerless or contemptible in the performance of the duties to which he was called. A small book, in which were written some of the offices of the Church, and many of the Psalms, was carried constantly in his bosom.

MARRIAGE WITH ELSWITHA.

The epileptic attacks, or whatever was the physical malady which troubled his early years, ceased before he had attained manhood; chroniclers assure us in answer to direct prayer. At twenty years of age, he thought of matrimony, and was betrothed to Elswitha, a descendant of the royal family of Mercia, and daughter of Ethelred, the great Earl of the Gaini, a district the name of which is preserved in the modern Gainsborough. The Earl was a man of great influence at the Mercian Court; and as Alfred's sister had been married to the King of Mercia several years before, the two kingdoms were now united by a double bond.

A TERRIBLE THORN IN THE FLESH.

There were splendid festivities in Mercia when the marriage took place, "the guests were innumerable," and the banquet and rejoicings lasted for several days and nights. In the midst of the festivities the bridegroom was attacked by sudden and violent pains, the first symptoms of a terrible and mysterious disease, the nature of which no Saxon physician could understand, and from which he was never permanently relieved. "Such," we are told, "was the dreadful anguish it perpetually produced, that if for one short hour it happened to intermit, the dread and horror of its inevitable return poisoned the little interval of ease." If this description be not greatly exaggerated, it would almost seem a miracle that any man, even one so greatly gifted, resolute, and lofty-minded as Alfred, could have performed not only the ordinary duties of life, but actions which made him the greatest of British sovereigns. Probably, if a guess may be hazarded, the malady was chronic neuralgia, tic-doloreux, which causes, especially in individuals possessing a fine, nervous temperament, the most acute pain of which the human frame is susceptible. Whatever its nature, here was indeed a "thorn in the flesh," which all his life long Alfred had to endure. That he did endure it, master it even, by the force of his will and the power of his patience, shows what a great and courageous nature he possessed.

THE DANES AGAIN.

The marriage festivities were scarcely ended when the storm which had been long threatening broke in force. All southern and middle England were arming for the defence of all they loved, all they valued; for their homes, their churches, their laws, their wives, daughters, and infants in arms. The Danes were there, reeking with blood and raging for further plunder. Six weeks after Mercian Elswitha had become his bride, Alfred, the hope and mainstay of Wessex, of all Saxon England, indeed, in defiance of bodily pain, was in arms as the leader of the people, as the champion of the nation against the pirates of the North.

DEATH OF REGNAR-LODBROG THE SEA-KING.

When in 866 Ethelred became King of Wessex, there were Danish troubles on the north-eastern coast. Regnar-Lodbrog (Regnar of the hairy breeches, as he wore leggings of undressed goat-skin), one of the most ferocious of the sea-kings, had more than a year before made preparations for an attack on Northumbria. Regnar had been for more than thirty years one of the greatest scourges of the North Sea. The Baltic, Friesland, Saxony, and parts of the coast of Gaul had been the scenes of many terrible exploits; and now he contemplated an achievement which would throw all others into the shade. He constructed two ships of greater size than had been before known; and, with a band of several hundred followers, he embarked. "The pirates exultingly cut their cables, and declared, in their usual poetic style, that they had given the reins to their two great sea-horses." They could give the reins, but they could not guide. The huge vessels proved to be unnavigable by the skill at the command of the Norsemen, drifted ashore, and were wrecked on the shoals off the Northumbrian coast. The fierce warriors landed, and, knowing that their retreat was cut off, marched into the country, ravaging and killing as their wont was. Ælla, King of Northumbria, gathered a large force, and attacked and defeated the marauders. Lodbrog, after performing prodigies of valour, was taken prisoner, and, having been cruelly tortured and placed in a dungeon swarming with vipers and adders, was put to death. One of the most vigorous and popular of the old Scandinavian poems is supposed to be the death-song of this renowned Viking. It is a chant breathing the spirit of an indomitable savage, whose last words are a taunt and defiance to his slayers: "I laugh with delight; soon shall I be in the halls of Odin, drinking from overflowing cups. I am vanquished; but may the javelin of one of my sons pierce the body of Ælla!"

AN EXPEDITION OF REVENGE.

Such was the burden of the song chanted in the home of the sea-king when his death was known; and his sons made solemn vows to avenge it. Relatives and friends, and a crowd of adventurers from every kingdom of the North, assisted in the expedition. Eight sea-kings of renown, twenty jarls, or secondary chieftains, equipped their fleets and embarked their bands of desperadoes. Never before had so formidable a force been united in any expedition. By an error of the pilots, the coast of East Anglia, not of Northumbria, was reached. Unable to resist so great a force, the East Anglians received the invaders in a pacific manner. They were not prepared to fight the pirates; but they could endeavour to hurry them off; and as for the Northumbrians, they must take care of themselves. So the Danes waited for reinforcements, accepted presents (not very willingly offered, perhaps, if the truth were known) of provisions and horses, and then set out northwards, crossed the Humber, devastated the country, and made their way to York, leaving a track of blood and flame behind them. The two Northumbrian Kings—for there were two, Osbert, who claimed to be the rightful monarch, and Ælla, who had for a time usurped the supremacy—forgot for a time their own quarrel, and united against the common enemy. A great battle was fought beneath the walls of York, in which the Saxons, who at first had gained some advantage, were defeated. Osbert fell on the field; but Ælla was taken alive. The sons of Lodbrog, Hubbo, Ingvar, and Alfden, were among the victorious leaders; and it was but little mercy the torturer of their father could expect from them. Terrible was the death inflicted on King Ælla of Northumbria.

Leaving a strong garrison at York, the victors turned southwards. Northumbria was no longer a Saxon kingdom, for Scandinavian settlers were encouraged to cross the North Sea; and the district between the Humber and the Firth of Forth soon became the head-quarters of the Danish power. Encouraged by their great success, the leaders contemplated nothing less than the subjugation of Mercia, East Anglia, and Wessex, and so obtaining possession of the entire island.

MASSACRES AT CROYLAND AND MEDESHAMSTED.

The famous Saxon Abbey of Croyland, in Lincolnshire, was sacked, and the abbot and monks were massacred; but not before the Saxons of the locality had made a brave attempt to defend it, and three of the northern kings had been slain. The monastery at Medeshamsted (Peterborough), six miles distant, was then attacked and burned. In the fierce fighting which accompanied the assault, one of the sons of Lodbrog was killed ; and, to avenge his death, his brother Hubbo slew with his own hand eighty-four of the monks, when the place was taken. The superb monastery was then burnt, the conflagration lasting fifteen days.

The scenes of these terrible doings were partly in East Anglia, partly in Mercia. The King of the former state, Edmund, was captured in his royal residence, and taken before the Danish leaders, who demanded that he should acknowledge himself their vassal. This he refused to do ; and then he was bound to a tree, and the warriors, having amused themselves by shooting arrows at him, smote off his head with a battle-axe. The Saxons regarded him as a martyr for conscience's sake ; and so it came about that there is a St. Edmund the Martyr in the ecclesiastical calendar ; and that the town which marks the place of his interment is known as Bury (burgh or town of) St. Edmunda.

A DANISH KING OF EAST ANGLIA.

One of the Sea-Kings, Godrum, was made King of East Anglia, and the people were reduced to a condition of abject slavery. Mercia was then exposed to the attacks of the enemy ; and on the emergency, the King, Burhed, applied to his brother-in-law the King of Wessex to assist him. Ethelred and Alfred at once placed themselves at the head of a large army, recruited from all classes of Wessex men, bishops, abbots, and monks even taking up arms. The Danes had possessed themselves of Nottingham, a strongly situated and fortified town ; and there they defied the attacks of the Saxons, refusing to meet their assailants in the open field ; and, on their side, the Saxons had not the means to undertake a prolonged siege. Ethelred and Alfred therefore withdrew their forces ; and the King of Mercia entered into a treaty with the Danes, by which they promised to withdraw to York, whither they went for a time ; but having recruited their strength, they again appeared south of the Humber. Mercia was unable by itself to stem the torrent ; and on Wessex devolved the task of defending Saxon England.

FIGHTING AT READING.

A powerful force of Danes took ship on the East Anglian coast, and making their way round, entered the Thames. Their boats were shallow, drawing little water, and Reading, situated at the junction of the Thames and Kennet, was taken. A strong fort was erected, and it served as a centre from which predatory excursions were made. Ealderman Ethelwulf, the same who eleven years before had routed the Danes near Winchester, collected such a force as he could ; and at Englefield, a few miles from Reading, encountered a Danish army. The Danes far outnumbered the Saxons ; but the brave and pious Ethelwulf shouted, " They be more than we, but fear them not. Our Captain, Christ, is braver than they ! " The fighting was long and furious, but the Danes were driven back behind the entrenchments at Reading.

THE BATTLE IN THE VALLEY OF THE WHITE HORSE.

While these events were taking place, Ethelred and Alfred were preparing their forces. They reached Reading four days after Ethelwulf's success, and slew a number of the Danes, whom they surprised outside the entrenchments ; but before they could prepare their camp, the Danes sallied out and a fierce battle ensued. The Saxons fought bravely for many hours ; but the Danes, trained warriors, at length gained the day, and the Saxons were compelled to retreat westward along the south bank of the river, and then over the downs towards Wantage, Alfred's birthplace. The main army of the Danes followed them in two divisions, one commanded by two Kings, Bagseg and Halfdene, the other by the Jarls. The Saxons adopted a similar arrangement, Ethelred, himself leading one body, and his brother Alfred the other. The Danes were posted on an eminence at Aescesdune (Ashdown, in Berkshire), and were protected by a thick underwood. King Ethelred, who, like his father, was slow in action, and scrupulously observant of religious duties, heard mass in his tent, while the well-aimed darts of the Danes were falling thick and fast among his soldiers, who dared not move without the King's orders. He was urged to give the word to advance, but replied that no human work should interfere with his religious duty. Alfred was more alert. The Danes were preparing to swoop down on the inactive Saxons ; but the young Prince took upon himself the responsibility of giving the word to advance, and, forming his army into a solid phalanx, dashed forward. The armies met, and a desperate hand-to-hand encounter ensued. Each side fought with desperate courage, and the hill-side was soon strewed with Danish and Saxon corpses. Mass being finished, Ethelred went to the aid of his brother and fought bravely, killing the Danish King Bagseg with his own hand. The Danes wavered, then broke, and retreated in confusion, followed by the victorious

Saxons as far as Reading. The slaughter was terrific. Ethelwerd, a chronicler of the time, says, "From the time the Saxons first landed in Britain, never was there such a battle known." There still may be seen, on the Berkshire downs, an enormous white figure supposed to represent the Saxon white horse, formed by the removal of the turf and exposure of the chalk beneath. This was first done nearly a thousand years ago; and for further history of the matter we must refer to Mr. Thomas Hughes' "Scouring of the White Horse."

Great, however, as was the victory, it was far from decisive. The Danes rallied at Reading, reinforcements arrived, and there were other fierce battles, in which they were the victors, especially at Basing and Merton (perhaps Morton, near Reading), King Ethelred being slain in the latter encounter.

ALFRED, KING OF WESSEX.

Alfred was now, at the age of twenty-three, the King of Wessex. Ethelred had left two young sons; but the principle of succession settled by King Ethelwulf, that his sons should succeed each other on the throne, to the exclusion of the children of any one of them, was adhered to; and, indeed, in those days of danger, there could be little question as to the propriety of Alfred, who had already exhibited so much ability and courage, being chosen king.

Some of the chroniclers of the time tell us that Alfred, when he had laid his brother in the tomb at Wimborne Minster, and felt that the responsibility of government was now to be borne by himself, "lost heart and hope, and suffered himself to doubt whether God would by his hand deliver the afflicted nation from its terrible straits." The Danes penetrated into his kingdom, and, summoning all his strength, Alfred encountered them near the fortress of Wilton, in Wiltshire. At first it seemed as if victory would declare for the Saxons; but a feigned retreat by the Danes led Alfred and his army into a position where they were attacked by a concealed force, and defeated.

In the first year of his sovereignty, eight or nine pitched battles were fought, generally with disastrous results to the Saxons. The resources of the country were exhausted; and, with the concurrence of his nobles and advisers, Alfred arranged terms with the opponents he could not subdue. The Danes, on terms favourable to themselves, withdrew from Wessex, embarked on the Thames, and coasted round to Northumbria, where they landed, afterwards invading Mercia, and committing such ravages that King Burhed abdicated, and went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he soon afterwards died. His wife, it is supposed, took refuge with her brother Alfred, who, weakened and dispirited, was unable to afford assistance to the Mercians.

SUCCESSSES AT SEA.

Seeing the advantage to be derived from being able to encounter the Danes on the sea, Alfred had constructed a small fleet of ships, and in 875 successfully attacked and dispersed piratical cruisers off the coast of Dorsetshire. In the following year, a large force of the Danes landed at Wareham, and ravaged that part of the country, forming a strongly entrenched camp for their head-quarters. Alfred hurried to the scene, but the enemy were too strongly posted to permit him to attack them with any hope of success. Negotiations were entered into, and the Danes promised, on condition of the payment of a certain sum of money, to quit the country. The most solemn oaths were taken to bind each party to the fulfilment of the contract. Alfred swore on holy relics; the Danish leaders on a bracelet supposed to have belonged to Woden, and smeared with the blood of sacrifices. Before twelve hours had passed, the Danes had broken the contract. They attacked a body of Saxon horsemen, killed the men and seized the horses. They then entered Devonshire, and established themselves behind fortifications in Exeter.

SIEGE OF EXETER.

It was a critical time for Wessex, but the young King was equal to the occasion. He manned his ships with men accustomed to the sea; he collected a large force of his countrymen, and marched to Exeter, which he besieged. The Danes who had been left at Wareham embarked instantly to reinforce the garrison at Exeter. A hundred and twenty vessels formed the Danish flotilla; but from the occurrence of storms and fogs they were unable to reach the mouth of the Exe. Alfred's sailors, taking advantage of the condition of the enemy, attacked them boldly and with success. Some of the Danish vessels were captured; but the greater portion struck on the rocks at Swanage, where they were dashed to pieces. The Danes at Exeter offered to surrender on conditions to which Alfred acceded. There were more promises and solemn oaths, and they quitted Wessex, and made their way, some into Mercia, now virtually a Danish kingdom, and others into Gloucestershire, where for a time they remained at peace. Soon, however, a fresh band of invaders landed on the coast of South Wales, and an alliance with the Danes in Gloucestershire was soon brought about. Disregardful of promises and oaths, they again invaded Wessex with an enormous force. The royal castle at Chippenham, on the left bank of the Avon, was seized; and from this rallying-point their bands ravaged the country, destroying everything with fire and sword. Henry of Huntingdon says, "They overspread the land like locusts, and seemed, like them, to rise out of it."

A PANIC IN WESSEX.

Alfred, with all his energy, was unable to raise a force to cope with the enemy. A general panic seized all classes. In Devonshire alone was anything like a stand made. Some of the bravest followers of the King had collected in a fortress known as Kynwith. They were besieged by the Danes, who hoped that the want of provisions—there was not even a well in the place—would force them to surrender; but the gallant garrison made a sudden sortie at the dawn of day, surprised the Danes, and slaughtered the greater number of the besiegers. But this was only one brave episode of the disastrous time. The people generally had lost heart. In the words of Dr. Pauli, "the inhabitants, once so brave, but whom no hero-hearted calderman now gathered under his banner, were seized with fear and terror; those who were able took their few remaining goods, and hastened to the sea-coast, to find a passage to the opposite kingdom of the Franks, and there seek refuge. In particular, bishops, priests, and monks endeavoured to convey to a safe asylum beyond sea the relics, precious stones, and ornaments belonging to their monasteries. The people who remained were reduced to the condition of servants and beggars by their cruel oppressors, and both country and people were in the wildest disorder."

Certainly Alfred was no longer the trusted leader of the Wessex men. The small landowners, losing their trust in his power to help them, submitted without resistance to the invaders, hoping to be permitted to retain some portion at least of their property. "No command, no prayers, no entreaties of their once beloved King could move them to sacrifice their small possessions and their own personal safety for the preservation of the whole State." In scarcely any of the districts was there an earl, a noble, or a bishop who would place himself resolutely at the head of his property or diocese, and set a bold example of venturing on one last and desperate struggle.

IN THE ISLAND OF ATHELNEY.

Alfred was vanquished for the time, and deserted by his subjects; but he did not desert. A few faithful adherents still remained with him; he concealed himself from the Danes, but on the north bank of the Tone, in Somersetshire, was a marshy district, such as abounded throughout the island in those unscientific days. Stagnant water, rushes, and willows, were the chief features, but there were small plots of land, a little elevated, where a few poor peasants dwelt miserably. To one of these spots, Atheling-eye, or the royal island as it came to be named, and to this day known as Athelney, came Alfred with his wife, and, as is supposed, her sister, the former Queen of Mercia. He was joined by some of his friends, and for five months remained there in obscurity, living as he best could on fish and such supplies as the poor but faithful friends of the neighbourhood could procure. Of course legends enough have gathered about the records of this time of concealment, and are far more familiar now than actual events; but they need not be reproduced here. We have to deal with a real man, so far as we can discover traces of him; and we have evidence enough that in the marshes of Athelney he was planning some means by which he could relieve his kingdom from the cruel enemy that was feeding on its vitals. The Danes probably thought the young King was dead; some of the Saxons, perhaps, thought he had fled to France or Rome; and neither, we may well suppose, imagined that the leader of the little band that not unfrequently made a raid on some weak outlying post of the Danes in the neighbourhood of Athelney, and carried away provisions, was other than a petty marauder, certainly would not suspect that it was Alfred himself, who, by such exploits, provided food for the refugees in Athelney. In after life, he related to his friend Asser many incidents of this dreary time; and the good chronicler easily exaggerated them into stories of mysterious visions of encouragement from St. Cuthbert and other saints, which lost nothing in transmission from chronicler to chronicler.

THE KING HAS COME AGAIN!

That Alfred had means of knowing what was going on in the country around is most likely. The fishermen of the Parret and the Tone, whose huts were in the island where the King was hidden, had eyes and ears; and the Danes little thought that the wretched Saxon peasant whom they would scarcely notice except to wantonly maltreat, was watching their movements, and that the acutest brain in all Wessex was pondering over the scanty items of information so brought, and preparing slowly but very effectively for action. By the spring of 878, Alfred and his followers had constructed unobserved strong fortifications on an eminence near the island, naturally protected by the marshes amid which it was situated; and suddenly the royal standard, the golden dragon of Wessex, was there unfurled, and Saxons and Danes alike knew that "the King was alive again." The revulsion of feeling was amazing. The courage of the people revived almost as if by miraculous influence. "They all joyfully hastened to him," we read, "and courage began to return to the fainthearted." The nobles of Somerset hastened to the King with such forces as they could collect; and soon from all parts of the country came armed men to strengthen the Saxon army. A few preliminary successful skirmishes with the Danes gave confidence; and then Alfred, at the head of a large force, moved from the fortress to a place known as Egberts-stan (now Buxton-Deveril, near the Forest of Selwood, in Wiltshire. Here he was joined by many from Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire; and thence he marched towards Chippenham, the stronghold of the Danes, who had received with alarm the intelligence of the reappearance of Alfred at the head of a large army. At Ethandune (near Westbury), the former met. Alfred kept his army in close order, adopting the phalanx formation he had previously found to be so effective. The Danes fought furiously, but their fierce onslaughts were repelled; and, after a fierce fight, they were defeated, and those who escaped slaughter, fled in confusion towards Chippenham. The conquering Saxons were in no mood for mercy. Alfred had steelled his heart for the work he had to perform. The prisoners were killed, the fortress was besieged, and, after fourteen days, the Danes in Chippenham surrendered, and Alfred was once more lord of Wessex.

THE DANES ACCEPT CHRISTIANITY.

An unexpected incident now occurred. Guthrum, the Danish leader, the most powerful and famous of his race then in England, not only formally submitted to Alfred, but offered to adopt the Christian religion. Alfred joyfully acceded to the proposition, and shortly afterwards Guthrum, with thirty of his chief followers, was solemnly baptised, Alfred himself being his sponsor, and giving him the name of Athelstan. There was, however, a political treaty to be arranged. Alfred, satisfied with recovering the independence of his own kingdom, did not attempt to interfere with the Danes in other parts of the island. It was agreed by Alfred and the Saxon Witanagemote on the one hand, and Guthrum and the nobles of East Anglia on the other, that a definite boundary should be fixed, dividing England into two parts, from the mouth of the Thames, along the river Lea to its source, and then along the course of the Ouse till the Roman Watling Street, the broad road leading to Chester, was reached. North and east of this line was to be the Danelagh, or Danes' land; south and west Alfred was King of the Saxon people.

ALFRED A LAWGIVER.

To consolidate the kingdom which he had so bravely re-created was the next work of Alfred. He reconstructed fortifications, and built many new fortresses; organised an army, in which one-half of the able-bodied natives of his kingdom were always ready for service, and established a regular and well-provided naval force, the fleet being composed of far larger and better equipped ships than had ever been seen on British waters. He established a code of laws, not, as some have asserted, first introduced by him in their entirety, but collected from the laws made in the times of the earlier kings, but in the late troubled times allowed to fall into disuse. To these laws he made additions, and, what was of more importance, established means by which they could be enforced. Although judges nominally existed, they had allowed their functions to devolve on servants and inferior officers, who were for the most part grossly inefficient and corrupt. It has been stated the King caused more than forty of them to be hanged for misconduct. He limited the power possessed by the nobles of summary jurisdiction, and put a restraint upon their exercise. It has often been stated that he originated trial by jury, but that institution existed long before his time. There is no doubt, however, that he adopted means by which juries were made more independent and efficient. He rebuilt London, which had been almost destroyed by the ravages of the Danes, and he appointed a governor, armed with power to preserve order and encourage trade.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF LEARNING.

Alfred clearly saw that the education of the people was an important element in the well-being of a State. He studied hard himself, and he encouraged others to study, appointing teachers to instruct men of position, in order that they might be better able to discharge their duties. He invited to his court scholars of eminence, and endeavoured by all the means in his power to raise the standard of education among the clergy. It has been often asserted, but on very slight authority, that he established the schools which afterwards developed into the University of Oxford; but it is beyond question that he gave a wonderful impulse to learning, and that his own writings contributed greatly to its promotion. He was nearly forty years old when he began to study Latin; but such progress did he make that he was soon able to translate many works into the Anglo-Saxon language. Among the translations by him which are still in existence are Pope Gregory's "Pastorale," a directory and manual for bishops and other clericals, to which the King himself contributed a very remarkable preface; the great treatise by Boethius, "De Consolatione Philosophiæ;" and the "General History" of Orosius, one of the earliest attempts to write a history of the kingdoms of the world and their geographical positions; a free translation of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History;" and a selection from the works of St. Augustine. Other works are mentioned by his biographers, but no copies of them are known to be in existence.

When it is recollected that these literary studies and achievements were carried out amid the pressure of arduous duties of statesmanship, and by a man who almost incessantly suffered intense physical pain, we cannot but wonder at and admire his firmness of will and incessant mental activity. He was expert in mechanical science, and designed buildings. His zeal for the Church was great, and he sent embassies to Christian Churches in foreign lands, even to the Nestorian Christians in remote India.

ANOTHER INVASION AND DEFEAT OF THE DANES.

In 894, sixteen years after the treaty by which England was divided between the Saxons and the Danes, there was a new invasion by the Northmen. An attempt had been made in 885, when a band landed in Kent, and besieged Rochester, but were driven away by the King's soldiers. About 894, one of the most renowned of the sea-kings, Hasting (whose name is still preserved in the well-known attractive place of resort on the south coast), made another attempt, with about three hundred vessels. He divided his force into two bodies. One landed in Kent, near Romney; Hasting himself led the other up the Thames and Swale, and disembarked near Sittingbourne. Alfred, at the head of a powerful force, followed his line of march, and at last overtook him and utterly routed him at Farnham, pursuing the fugitives with great slaughter. While so engaged the news reached him that descents were being made on the southern, especially the Devonshire, coasts. By rapid marches, Alfred reached Exeter, then besieged by the Danes, and defeated them. Hasting had quitted the Thames, and his ships had reached the Severn, where Alfred gained another victory. The Danes retreated into Northumbria and East Anglia, and again made their way to the Thames, and sailed up the little river Lea. Alfred followed, and, by diverting the water of the stream, compelled them to abandon their ships. Defeated in every encounter by the energy and ability of Alfred, the Danes retreated, and Wessex was at peace, except from a few desultory attacks by Danish pirates, easily captured by the large ships and bold seamen of the Saxon fleet.

DEATH OF ALFRED.

On the 28th of October 901 (or 900, the record is rather uncertain), Alfred the Great died, and was buried in the monastery at Winchester, which he had founded. In 1642, the Parliamentary troops broke open the tomb and scattered the ashes of the dead, the great Alfred's among others. He was happy in his domestic relations, and left behind him three sons and two daughters, each of whom exhibited marked ability and energy of character. Asser, the father's friend and biographer, says of the sons (the elder of whom, Edward, succeeded to the throne):—"They had the love of all about them, and showed affability and gentleness to all, both natives and foreigners, and were in complete subjection to their father. Nor amongst those other studies which pertain to their life, and are fit for noble youths, were they suffered to pass their time idly and unprofitably, without learning the liberal arts; for they have carefully learned the Psalms and Saxon books, especially the Saxon poems, and are continually in the habit of making use of both." The girls of the royal family were trained, we are informed, "in all kinds of womanly work." His admirable wife, Elswitha, survived him six years, and died at the court of her son. She was amply provided for by her loving husband, the Great Alfred, as we name him "Alfred the truth-teller," as he was reverently designated by an author of the Norman time.

VARIOUS ESTIMATES OF A GREAT MAN.

THAT wonderful delineator of human nature in its strength, and weakness, its wisdom, and its folly, the late William Makepeace

Thackeray, was fond of relating to his friends a certain notable reminiscence of his childhood and has indeed introduced the incident in the preface to his most famous work. It appears that in the year 1819, the future great novelist, then a little pale-faced, Anglo-Indian child, of seven years, was brought from Bengal to England, in obedience to the inexorable sanitary law which forbade the rearing of the children of English parents under the burning Indian sun. On the way, the ship put in at St. Helena; and the native bearer, taking little Sahib William for a walk into the interior, halted beside the fence of a garden, within which a stout man might be seen walking to and fro, with his hands behind him. "That's Bonaparte," whispered the dusky cicerone, eagerly; "he eats a sheep every day, and as many children as he can catch."

NAPOLEON.

Such was the aspect under which the greatest personage of modern history was first represented to little Thackeray; and the character ascribed to Napoleon the First by the Indian bearer was hardly an exaggeration of the popular notion concerning him. In England especially, "Boney" among the people generally was synonymous with "Bogey"—a kind of abstraction—a monstrous chimera, made up of all manner of contradictory vices and horrors. "Corsican upstart," "Corsican thief," "homicide," "ogre," "tiger" (sometimes, as in the Burning Chronicle of 1815, spelt tygor). Were among the opprobrious epithets flung upon him in the days of the consulate and empire; and so great was the jealousy lest the favorable impression should increase, which, in spite of all the terrible tales about "Boney," undoubtedly existed in many parts of the United Kingdom, that young Bianconi, a travelling pedlar, who afterwards introduced "long cars" in Ireland, was arrested, and seriously warned to desist from selling little leaden effigies of Bonaparte, as a seditious and treasonable proceeding. And yet for this ogre the French nation continued, year after year, to make colossal sacrifices in men and money! Led by this "tygor," veteran soldiers faced enemy after enemy with a devotion worthy of the followers of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. The name of this "upstart" represented to the great majority of the French nation, not only victory and triumph in the field, but safety and success at home; and sacrifices, perils, and difficulties were alike forgotten, when the shout of "Vive l'Empereur" burst forth, and the well-known figure appeared, so conspicuous in a plain attire among the glittering throng of surrounding marshals. Never was a public character the theme of so much panegyric and of so much obloquy, as this wonderful man—whose fate it was to prove the very heights and depths of prosperity and misfortune—to stand for a while before the nations, a wondrous example of the space a single man may fill, and the influence he may exert over the destinies of his time,—and to furnish in his fall the most tremendous lesson the world has seen of the instability of earthly power, and the frailty of human greatness.

In looking back at the history of Napoleon the Great, nothing is more remarkable than the almost diametrically opposite views taken by his various biographers, alike concerning his character and influence. Some can see in him only the reckless soldier of fortune, subordinating all interests to his own selfish advancement, "wading through slaughter to a throne," and "shutting the gates of mercy on mankind;" others recognize in him the statesman no less than the warrior, and point approvingly to the mark of his hand on the whole social life and well-being of France. Some can see nothing but the glory in his career; others, nothing but the wrong. Of Hazlitt, for instance, and the American Abbott, it may be said, as Macaulay said of Malcolm, the writer of the Life of Clive, that "their love passes the love of biographers, and they can see nothing but wisdom and justice in the actions of their idols." On the other hand, Lamartine, the republican, detests the French Emperor as the personification of tyranny; and Sir Walter Scott, whose lengthy "Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" is utterly unworthy of his genius and reputation, twists the facts to the advantage of the legitimate sovereigns, and mingles authentic proof and mere hearsay, in the fashion of a hasty and prejudiced compiler, holding a brief for a political party. And yet these portraits of Napoleon are all like him to a certain extent. Partiality and prejudice have warped them, and in many instances they are caricatures; but each represents, with tolerable accuracy, one phase of that character, in which good and evil, strength and weakness, were strangely mingled. That Napoleon committed great faults, and even crimes, no one who dispassionately reviews his history can deny; but it is equally certain that a positively bad man could never have gained the affections of his followers to the extent of making them forget all ties in the one engrossing idea of following him. "He had the genius to be loved," wrote the greatest female poet of our century; "then let him have the justice to lie honoured in his grave."

And here we propose to give a sketch of his marvellous career and his strangely compounded character, as they appear at a sufficient distance to remove the distortion produced by a near view of great objects. Sixty years have elapsed since the grave closed over the captive, before whom, in his days of greatness, emperors and kings had abased themselves. Time has cleared away much prejudice; and now in the light of fuller and clearer information, we will endeavour to bring before our readers Napoleon the ruler and the man, taking care to "nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice."

EARLY YEARS AND EDUCATION.

Napoleon Bonaparte, or, as the name was generally written, "Buonaparte," the second son of Carlo Bonaparte, advocate, and his wife Letitia, was born at Ajaccio, in Corsica, on August 15th, 1769. The family was of great antiquity, and undoubtedly noble, the name appearing in more than one libro d'oro, or Golden Book, as the Italian records of nobility were called, from the fourteenth century downwards. At the time of Napoleon's birth, Corsica had recently been annexed to France; and Pasqualide Paoli, afterwards known, during his visit in England, as the friend of Johnson and Goldsmith, and a distinguished member of the literary club, was carrying on a desperate struggle to free his country from the yoke of France. Carlo Bonaparte was a friend, and, for the time, the aide-de-camp of Paoli; but he afterwards wisely acquiesced in the new order of things; and in time was sent to the French Assembly of Notables as a Corsican deputy. The chief care of Napoleon and his four brothers, Joseph, Lucien, Louis, and Jerome, and his three sisters, Elise, Caroline, and Pauline, fell upon his mother, a woman of heroic stamp, worthy to have been a Roman matron. Napoleon, in his later days, frequently bore testimony to her admirable qualities, her firmness, courage, and wisdom. "Nothing overawed me," he said; "nothing disconcerted me. I beat one, I scratched another; I made myself formidable to the whole family." His petulance was restrained, however, with a strong hand, by Mamma Letitia, "who abhorred falsehood, was provoked by disobedience, and passed over none of the children's faults." We have a humorous picture of him at the age of six, with his stockings about his heels, the pet and plaything of a girl's school, to which he was sent, clinging to the hand of a certain charming Giacominetta, and making angry and desperate charges, with sticks and stones, upon the graceless boys, who followed him in the streets, singing satirical rhymes about his untidy stockings, and his dangling after a girl. "Napoleone a mezza calzetta, fa l'amore a Giacominetta," sang these young satirists.

To bring up this numerous family suitably was a task of no small difficulty; for Carlo Bonaparte was poor. He was very glad to procure a nomination for young Napoleon as a pupil in the military school at Brienne; and here the boy remained from March, 1779, till the end of 1784. Here he gained a most undoubted character for ability, and was by far the best mathematical scholar; Bourrienne, his schoolfellow, and afterwards his secretary, speaks of him as an écolier très-distingué. In his general behaviour he was proud and reticent. Conscious of being at a certain disadvantage from his poverty, he kept aloof from the sports of the rest; employing his leisure hours in reading Plutarch's Lives and similar works. He cared nothing for ornamental literature, and hated Latin. The attempted infliction of a degrading punishment threw the proud boy into a violent hysterical fit. During a severe winter he proposed to the pupils the construction of a fort of snow, which was attacked and defended with equal courage, until the mingling of stones in the snowballs, and consequent severe contusions, caused the authorities to interfere with prohibition. In 1783 he was selected, as one of the then best scholars, to be sent to the military school at Paris in the following year; and thither he accordingly proceeded towards the end of 1784.

Bonaparte was just fifteen years old when he entered the military college at Paris; but he was already a man in intellect and judgment. Disgusted at the extravagance and luxury that prevailed in the college, he addressed to the sub-principal, Berton, after a residence of a few months, a remarkable document, in which he pointed out the folly of accustoming cadets, destined for a military career, to luxuries, as entirely new, to the majority of them, as they were unnecessary; and boldly suggested that, excepting matters of household drudgery, these young men would do better to wait upon themselves, than to depend on an expensive staff of servants. "Inured to a sober life, and accustomed to keep themselves neat," he wrote, "they would become more robust, would learn to brave the inclemencies of the seasons, and to bear with courage the fatigues of war, and they would inspire with respect and blind devotion the soldiers under their command."

MILITARY CAREER BEGUN; TOULON.

The authorities of the college lost no time in putting the young critic forward for examination. He obtained a sub-lieutenancy in an artillery regiment, before he had been in the military school a year; and the military college went on as before. Long afterwards, at a banquet where kings and princes were the guests, at Weimar,

Napoleon startled the illustrious circle by commencing an anecdote: "When I was a sous-lieutenant in the regiment of la Frère-justas Goldsmith, at courtly Sir Joshua's table, I horrified the company by the exordium 'when I lived among the beggars in Axe Lane.'"

At Valence in Dauphiné, at Douay in Flanders, and at Auxonne in Burgundy, where his regiment was successively quartered, the traditions concerning the young artillery officer uniformly speak of his strict sobriety, energy, and marvellous devotion to study. As at Brienne, he was now preparing himself for his future career, while his brother officers were taking their pleasure. At Auxonne he lodged at a barber's. Years afterwards, passing through the town as a general, he paused at the door of his old quarters, and asked the barber's wife if she remembered, as a former lodger, a young officer named Bonaparte. "Yes," she replied, "and a very disagreeable young man he was. He was always shut up in his room; and if he did walk out, he never condescended to speak to any one." "Ah, my good woman," rejoined her questioner, "if I had passed my time as you would have had me do, I should not now have been in command of the army of Italy."

Then came the French Revolution, sweeping away with its tremendous tempest blast the landmarks of the wicked tyranny that for centuries had reduced the mass of the people to the condition of beasts of burden. In the terrible period of the Reign of Terror, the young officer became a lieutenant-colonel (chef de bataillon). While the republican government was maintaining a desperate struggle for existence against foreign foes from without, and disaffected royalists within its own quarters, various important cities—Marseilles, Lyons, Toulon—revolted. The last-mentioned town, which contained enormous military stores, had received an English fleet into its harbour; and the Committee of Public Safety, to whom the conduct of the war had been entrusted, were resolved to retake the place at all hazards. After Generals Cartaux and Doppet, two military incapables, one of whom had been a painter, the other a physician, had utterly failed to take the place, brave old General Dugommier was invested with the chief command before Toulon; Bonaparte commanded the artillery. "Let that young man alone, he knows more than thou," was the unceremonious injunction of Madame Dugommier, to her husband, who was startled at the boldness and novelty of the young colonel's plan of attack. This plan consisted in concentrating all efforts against a work called the "Little Gibraltar," which was so situated that it commanded the harbour; consequently the capture of it would expose the British fleet to bombardment, and compel the ships to stand out to sea. Napoleon was the life and soul of the siege, looked to everything, and even, with his own hands, loaded a cannon, where a cannoner had been shot dead. Doppet himself says that at each visit to the outposts of the army, he was always sure to find the commandant of artillery at his post; "he slept little, and that little he took on the ground, wrapped in his mantle; he hardly ever quitted his batteries." The siege of Toulon was the first chance afforded to Napoleon to distinguish himself; and he seized the occasion with an energy and ambition all his own.

HIS RULES FOR ENSURING SUCCESS.

He next became general of artillery in the army of Italy; and here again General Dumerbion, to whose division he was attached, wrote to the convention to say that "it was to the skilful dispositions of the general of artillery that all the success of the expedition was owing." Never was there such a persistent worker as this indomitable young general. At a later period he became intoxicated with success, and giddy with the incense burnt before his shrine by unthinking worshippers; but in the earlier part of his career he was severely practical. "Victory," he was accustomed to say, "belongs to the most persevering;" and with him, this applied to victory over fortune generally, as well as to triumphs in the battle-field. He counted nothing done while anything was left to achieve. "There have been working kings," an American writer remarked, "such as Alfred, Gustavus of Sweden, and Charles the Twelfth; but not one of them achieved a title of what this man did." Thoroughness and efficiency with him were the passports to honour and success. In his school-days he had suffered by favoritism exercised towards those recommended by high birth or influential connections; and his sensible motto was, "The career should be opened to talent." By careful study, and the exertion of that luminous Italian intellect of his, he made himself thoroughly master of whatever work he had to do, and then he threw himself into the work heart and soul, with a confidence in his own powers, fully justified by the event. No fine theory that could not be worked out to a practical result, found any favour with him. He had a profound contempt for the visionary schemers—the ideologists he called them—who devised impossible nostrums for the ills of the state. "I want more head and less tongue," he said, when choosing men to fill the various departments of state. He cared nothing for oratory and eloquence, though he understood how to fire the enthusiasm of his soldiers by appealing to their passions. Of the chief speakers in parliamentary assemblies he said, "Their strength lies in vagueness. They should be brought back to the reality of facts. Practical arguments destroy them. In the Council there were men possessed of much more eloquence than I had. I always defeated them with the simple argument two and two make four." He inculcated undeviating industry and despatch in matters of business, on all with whom he came in contact. "I worked all day," was the excuse made to him by a man who had left his duty unfinished. "Had you not the night also?" asked Napoleon. "Ask whatever you please of me except time," he said to another; "that is beyond my power."

DAY OF THE SECTIONS; MARRIAGE.

The Jacobins and extreme revolutionists of the faubourgs were profoundly dissatisfied at the reaction that had set in, after the Reign of Terror. To their intense disgust, the howling sansculottes found themselves disarmed, driven from the public courts and tribunals they had clamorously dominated, and deprived of the daily stipend paid to them by the terrorists, whom they had supported. Several attempts at insurrection, made by the Jacobins, had been put down by military force; but now a far more formidable, because a better organized, opposition arose from the sections of Paris, among which a royalist spirit had spread; and it was the Faubourg St. Germain, the haunt of many concealed royalists and returned emigrants, from whence the Convention was now threatened with an organized attack, that should destroy it, as the 10th of August, 1792, had destroyed the monarchy. The "Lepelletier" or "Filles St. Thomas" section stood at the head of the conspiracy, and forty thousand men prepared to join in the contest. General Menou, who was in command of the troops who should have defended the Convention, was feeble and vacillating; indeed, he made such concessions to the armed insurgents, that his own side, suspecting him of treachery, arrested him. In great trepidation, the Convention nominated Barras, the principal of the Thermidorians, to the chief command; and Barras proposed his name to the Convention, as that of the best man to hold command under him. "Are you willing to undertake the defence of the Convention?" asked the president. "Yes," answered the young general. "Are you aware of the magnitude of the undertaking?" resumed the president, apparently wondering how Barras could have selected this under-sized stripling for such a duty. "Perfectly," was the reply, "and," continued Napoleon, fixing his deep grey eyes upon the speaker, "I am in the habit of accomplishing what I undertake."

There was no question as to the resolution of such a man. The five thousand troops available to confront the forty thousand national guards of the sections were put under his command. The sectionaries were highly incensed, and, under the command of General Damian, determined to attack the Tuileries, as on the celebrated 10th August. But Napoleon had posted his troops with such skill, and such consummate knowledge of the positions to be occupied, that the various columns of the sectionaries could not unite. Bonaparte's cannon swept the streets; and on this, the 13th Vendémiaire (5th October, 1795), he carried out the course he had recommended on the 20th June, 1792. The affrighted sectionaries fled, leaving nearly two thousand of their number dead in the streets. That evening Paris was quiet. The next day the Section Lepelletier and another were disarmed, and no further disturbance was to be feared. Bonaparte was rewarded for his services by being nominated second in command of the army of the interior; and early in the next year he was made commander-in-chief of the army of Italy.

The year 1796 was memorable in Bonaparte's career as that in which he held his first separate command, and first astonished Europe with the splendour of his genius. It is remarkable also as the year of his first marriage. This event took place on the 11th of March, a few days before his departure to join the army. His wife, Josephine, the widow of General Beauharnais, a French commander, who had perished by the guillotine in the Reign of Terror, was a Creole by birth. She was born in the island of Martinique, the daughter of a planter named Tascher de la Pagerie. She used in her later days to be fond of telling how an old negress had once prophesied to her that she would become "greater than a queen." She was somewhat older than her husband, who was devotedly attached to her, though he never permitted her to influence him in practical affairs. She was kind-hearted, amiable, and fascinating, but somewhat thoughtless and terribly extravagant, especially with regard to dress.

Bourrienne, who became Napoleon's secretary soon after this time, gives a tragical report of the disquietude, the alarm, and the fears of Josephine when her debts had reached some tremendous sum, and it became necessary to tell her husband about half their real amount. Once, under the Consulate, she was in debt 1,200,000*fr.*, about £48,000. Bourrienne got half the sum from the First Consul, from whom Josephine concealed the whole truth. Bourrienne, who had the duty of negotiating with the tradesmen, stared in wonder at the number of articles and at the prices charged. There were thirty-eight hats within a month, the feathers alone amounting to 1,800*fr.* The abatements made by the purveyors showed the exorbitant nature of their charges. One equitable dealer, who took 35,000*fr.* in payment of his account of 80,000*fr.*, boasted that he had still made "a very good profit."

HOW TO CONQUER ; CAMPAIGN OF 1796-7.

Nothing in all Napoleon's career produced a more splendid effect than the Italian campaigns of 1796 and 1797. At a later period he made war on a larger scale, and occupied a higher position ; but as yet the people had not grown accustomed to his victories, which, like the tactics by which he gained them, had all the exciting qualities of novelty. "He came to an army in rags ; our general was but a boy," says old Pierre in Thackeray's "Chronicle of the Drum ;" and, indeed, seldom has a commander been called upon to take charge of an army in so deplorable a state. "Soldiers, you are naked and ill-fed," said the young general in his first address to the troops. "Government owes you much, and can give you nothing. . . . It is my design to lead you into the most fertile plains in the world. Rich provinces and great cities will be in your power. There you will find honour, glory, and wealth. Soldiers of Italy ! will you be wanting in courage or perseverance ?" This, as perfectly well understood by the soldiers, meant—"It is useless depending on the weak Directory in Paris. What you want—food, clothing, and money—you must win for yourselves from the enemy." To make war pay for war, and to render his army self-supporting was Napoleon's motto, as it had been Wallenstein's a century and a half before. Strength and swiftness have been with justice declared the two essentials of successful warfare ; and sometimes celerity of movement may in some degree be made a substitute for numerical force. Bonaparte's policy was to attack his foes in detail in unexpected positions, to endeavour to annihilate one division of the foe before another could come to its assistance. He thus exacted from his men an enormous amount of labour in the way of marching ; but, as he himself declared, he worked their feet to save their heads. When he first joined the army, his youth—for he was only twenty-six—inspired some of the old generals who were to serve under him to attempt to give him some hints on policy and tactics. They little knew with whom they had to do. "Gentlemen," said the young commander-in-chief, "the art of war is in its infancy. The time has passed in which enemies are mutually to appoint the place of combat, advance hat in hand, and say, 'Gentlemen, will you have the goodness to fire ?'" (Alluding to the courtesies interchanged between the English and French at Fontenoy.) "We must cut the enemy to pieces, precipitate ourselves like a torrent upon their battalions, and grind them to powder. Experienced generals lead the troops opposed to us. So much the better. Their experience will not avail them against me. Mark my words ; they will soon burn their books on tactics, and know not what to do." And this was no vain boast. No man ever cared less for prescription and rule than Bonaparte, where he saw a shorter way than the usual one to his object. The whole campaign was a series of disastrous and bewildering surprises to the veteran generals opposed to him. No leader more fully possessed the invaluable art of concealing his intentions from the foe. Where he was least expected, he rushed suddenly, and, if possible, with superior numbers, on the foe's weakest point,—and succeeding in utterly bewildering his opponents by the rapidity and force of his blows ; at Montenotte, on the 12th of April, he inflicted a great defeat on the Austrian general, D'Argenteau. This was the first of a long series of successes. "My title of nobility," he said long afterwards, "dates from the battle of Montenotte." Pushing onward to make the most of the victory, he attacked and vanquished the Austrians again on the 13th and 14th at Dego and Millesimo, thus preventing the proposed junction of the Austrian and Sardinian armies. The veteran Beaulieu, the Austrian general-in-chief, after losing 12,000 men in a few days, was obliged to retreat into Lombardy, while General Colli, with his Piedmontese troops, was to defend the territory of his master, the King of Sardinia. But on the 20th the indefatigable young general defeated him at Ceva ; and on the next day gained the important battle of Mondovi. Important magazines fell into the victor's hands, besides ten colours and 1,500 prisoners ; and, true to his policy, Bonaparte im-

These events had come with startling suddenness upon the King of Sardinia, who had no idea how much of victory could be crowded into a single fortnight by a half-starved army, with a stripling for a commander-in-chief. To secede from the coalition, and propose first an armistice, and then a peace under conditions which left the French free to pursue the campaign against the Austrians in Lombardy, was the only method of preserving his own crown. He made peace accordingly, and Bonaparte led his troops onward to the Adige. The young general told his soldiers plainly, in a spirited address, that "they had as yet done nothing, because much still remained to be done." What he had already done, however, was more than the Convention had effected in three years. He had broken the coalition, and compelled the King of Sardinia to put his army on a peace footing. The cession of Nice and Savoy to France, and the expulsion of the Royalist emigrants from his dominions, with the surrender of important fortresses to the French, were the conditions on which peace was granted to the king. Old General Beaulieu fell back as the victorious French advanced. On the 3rd of May, the victory of Fiombo, and on the 10th, the exploit at the Bridge of Lodi, where, to the surprise of his enemies, he charged at the head of a column of grenadiers across a narrow bridge over the Adda, in the face of a murderous cannonade, gained him fresh reputation; and here it was that the soldiers, delighted at his courage, gave him the honourable nickname of the "Little Corporal." "There's no understanding it at all," grumbled an old Hungarian officer, a prisoner with whom Bonaparte conversed incognito in the camp. "We have against us a young general who is in front of us at one moment, harassing our rear in the next, and presently hovering on our flanks. There's no knowing where to take position. Now, this way of carrying on war is insufferable, for it's against all rule."

The victory of Lodi opened all Lombardy to the French; and soon afterwards Bonaparte made his triumphal entry into Milan. Parma and Modena, small duchies, were glad, like Sardinia, to make separate treaties; and the Neapolitan and the papal governments followed their example. By the end of June the tricolor of the French Republic was waving over every fortress in Lombardy, save Mantua alone. Here the Austrians determined to make a last stand for the possession of Italy. Beaulieu had thrown up his command, after being discouraged by numerous reverses. Four Austrian armies were successively despatched by Austria for the relief of Mantua. The first, under the veteran Wurmser, was beaten by Bonaparte at Castiglione, on the 5th of August; the second was destroyed in the battles of Roveredo and Bassano. The third, under Alvinzy, perished in the tremendous three days' conflict at Arcola. The fourth army represented the final effort of the Austrian Court against those whom it called the French Banditti. The genius of Bonaparte triumphed once more at Rivoli, where a crushing defeat put an end to the efforts of Alvinzy, who retreated to Tyrol, with the loss of half his men. Provera, in command of the Vienna volunteers and the rest of the army, was obliged to surrender with his troops, and Mantua fell into the conqueror's hands, after a four months' siege, during which the garrison of 30,000 men had diminished to 12,000.

BONAPARTE CONCLUDES TREATIES.

The Papal Government, that had commenced hostilities against the French, in the hope that the victory would be with Austria, was now glad to obtain peace by the treaty of Tolentino. The Directory, thinking Austria would be anxious for peace, sent General Clarke into Napoleon's camp as an envoy to conduct the negotiations. The young commander haughtily repudiated any interference with what he considered his rights. "If you come here to act under my instructions," he said to Clarke, "I shall always be happy to see you; if not, the sooner you return to those who sent you the better." But the idea of making peace with the Directory was still too bitter to be entertained by Austria. "In Vienna we know nothing of a French Republic," was the reply, at once laughty and childish, made to the first proposal of the French to negotiate. But the other Powers had by this time learned the necessity of recognising that new but exceedingly real and formidable power. Prussia and Saxony had come to separate accommodations with the French; and Russia, where the crack-brained Emperor Paul had just succeeded to the unscrupulous Catherine, was disposed to remain neutral. Still it required further defeat and humiliation before Austria at length, when Vienna itself was menaced, yielded to necessity; and the preliminary peace of Leoben was followed by the definite treaty of Campo Formio, the first great triumph of Napoleon as a negotiator. In the first article of their treaty the Austrian commissioners set down that their emperor recognised the French Republic. "Strike that out," said Napoleon. "The Republic is like the sun. None but the blind can fail to see it. We are our own masters, and shall establish any government we prefer." Perhaps he already contemplated in his secret soul the day when the French Republic should be changed into an Empire. He himself relates that after the terrible passage of the Bridge of Lodi he became conscious of his own strength ; and, confident in the unbounded attachment and devotion of his soldiery, the idea entered his mind that he might become a decisive actor in the political arena. "Then first," he says, "arose the spark of great ambition."

THE EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION.

He returned to Paris paramount in reputation and fame. Not only did he, like Coriolanus, "bring victory in his pocket ;" he had negotiated a treaty which put France in a new position before the world. No one could affect to despise or undervalue the Republic that had dictated peace to Austria. He was now the idol of the Parisians, who crowded the streets when he was expected to pass, and shouted his praises in the streets. The Institute enrolled him among its members ; the Directory gave entertainments in his honour. He seemed rather to withdraw himself from these demonstrations, and declined more than one intended fête. Concerning the people, he declared bitterly that they would shout just as noisily if he were being taken to the guillotine. Excepting in a military sense, he had little taste for outward pomp. But though he bore his honours modestly enough, a deep distrust was engendered in the hearts of the Directors, who could not but feel apprehensive when they contrasted their own waning influence with his popularity ; nor could they fail to note the outspoken sentiments of the soldiers now returning from Italy ; for not a few of these rough-and-ready swordsmen were for turning the lawyers out, and making the "Little Corporal" king. But he was not a man to spoil a chance by impatience. "The pear is not yet ripe," he said, and allowed the Directory to nominate him as commander-in-chief of a new warlike undertaking—an expedition for the conquest of Egypt, with the ultimate intention of operating against the possessions and influence of the English in India.

When Bonaparte embarked for Egypt from Toulon, in May, 1798, he was fully aware that the Government in France was tottering. "They cannot long retain their position," he said to Bourrienne, speaking of the Directors. "They know not how to do anything for the imagination of the country." He knew the French people well.

From the first, the enterprise was surrounded with great perils. Nelson was in the Mediterranean, with a fleet, in search of the French. The fleet, with the army of 14,000 men on board, however, succeeded in crossing to Africa. Here Bonaparte signalled himself by deeds greater than the achievements of Italy ; for he had to fight against the climate, the superstitious fears of his soldiers, and the hatred and fanaticism of the natives. He marched onward, conquering, to the cataracts of the Nile. At the battle of the Pyramids he inflicted a heavy defeat upon the Mamelukes, his ingenious plan of battle here being founded on his observation of the clumsy nature of the enemy's artillery. Early in 1799 he marched into Syria, occupied El Arish and Gaza without much difficulty, and took Jaffa by storm. His soldiers faced the horrors of the simoom and of the waterless desert as heroically as they encountered the foe ; and their leader, by cheerful participation in their hardships and toils, attached them still more closely to him. When the order was given that the army should march on foot, the horses and mules being reserved for the sick and wounded, he refused to have a horse retained for his own use, but walked at the head of his men. When the plague broke out at Jaffa, and despondency among his army increased almost to despair and panic, he visited the hospitals himself, examined the poor stricken sufferers, and shamed many waverers into courage by his intrepidity. At St. Jean d'Acre he met with an unexpected and serious check in besieging that fortress, the chief stronghold of the Pacha Ahmed, known as Djeddar, the butcher. Here he found himself opposed to the English sea-lion, Admiral Sir Sydney Smith, who had thrown himself into the fortress, and was the life and soul of the defence. For two months Bonaparte perseveringly continued the siege—a great army advancing to raise it was defeated by him at Mount Tabor—but was compelled to retrace his steps to Egypt. Then Capitar Pasha appeared with a great force before Aboukir, which he took. Napoleon, however, inflicted a tremendous defeat upon him, and re-took the place. It was at the end of July, 1798. Brave General Desaix had also had good success in Upper Egypt ; but it could not escape the sagacity of Napoleon that the whole great enterprise was a failure. Immediately after the landing of the army in Egypt, Nelson had appeared and annihilated the French fleet in the battle of the Nile on the 1st of August, 1798. The blow inflicted on the French had been terrific, and so far as the prospects of the Egyptian expedition were concerned, fatal. The communication between France and Egypt was cut off; and sooner or later the army, weakened by war and sickness, must be at the mercy of the enemy.

BONAPARTE'S RETURN; THE 18TH BRUMAIRE.

Events were also happening in France which convinced Bonaparte, even through the fitful snatches of intelligence he obtained, that the pear was ripening, and might be plucked by another, if he remained absent. The powerlessness and inefficiency of the Directory, with its two Houses of the Ancients, and the Five Hundred, became more manifest every day. In Italy there had been loss upon loss, and not even the heroic death of Joubert at Novi had been able to bring back victory to the French arms. Accordingly Bonaparte quitted Egypt secretly, after transferring the command of the army to brave outspoken Kleber, destined soon to perish under the hand of an assassin. On the 22nd of August, Napoleon embarked with a few friends at Alexandria, and thence made his way to his native Ajaccio, and so home to France by way of Frejus.

He was received by the people with acclamation, and his journey to Paris was a triumphal progress. The Directory received him with sickly smiles of distrust, and with that welcome "which the faint heart would fain deny, but dare not." A well-organized conspiracy enabled him, on the celebrated 18th Brumaire (9th of November, 1799), with the assistance of his brother Lucien, and backed by the troops, to effect a coup d'état to overturn the government of the Directory, the Council of the Five Hundred being driven out of their hall of assembly at the point of the bayonet. Some of the more tardy of the deputies had even to escape by the windows. It was a modern adaptation of Cromwell and the Long Parliament—a piece of brilliantly successful treason. The semblance of patriotism and zeal for the public good was maintained, as a cloak for ambition. Bonaparte professed himself full of indignation against the unfaithful guardians who had lost the fruits of the brave soldiers' victories. Lucien summoned an assembly of the most tractable of the members of the two councils; and after Bonaparte and the soldiers had been thanked for what they had done, a new government was instituted. Three consuls, of whom Bonaparte was to be the first, should stand at the head of the state. Two commissions were appointed to decide on a new constitution. A new ministry was appointed, and the consulate began. From this time we have to look upon Napoleon as a ruler; for as first consul he held the whole power in his hands; his nominal colleagues were entirely swayed by his will; and of the republic, the name alone remained. A phantom council, a senate, existed, but it was only to give a constitutional colour to the dictator's will. From the establishment of the consulate, until that transitional form of government merged into the empire, Bonaparte was gradually but surely doing away with everything that bore the republican stamp. This could not escape the observation of many; and yet his popularity was immense. All seemed to look to him. The great mass who desired peace, thought his strong hand could best maintain it. The soldiers, smarting under the disgrace of the last two years, looked to him to re-establish their former renown. Even the Royalists indulged a whimsical expectation, that as he had acted the part of Cromwell, he would take up the character of General Monk, and pave the way for a Restoration, in the person of the Bourbon Louis XVIII.; and propositions in this direction were absolutely made to him by agents of the exiled family. He repulsed them with contempt. He had not gathered the pear to hand it over to another.

THE CONSULATE; CAMPAIGN OF 1800; GREATNESS OF BONAPARTE.

The Consul began his administration of affairs by making proposals of peace to Austria and England. The autograph letter he addressed to George III. was answered by a dry, formal despatch, by an under-secretary of state. George III. with his old-world prejudices, was not the man to respond to a personal advance from the upstart Corsican. From Vienna he experienced a similar repulse; and now he had put himself in the right with the French people, who fully believed the war to be forced upon him against his will. The martial spirit revived in France in full force. Masséna was fighting in Italy against terrible odds. Mélas, the Austrian, had 180,000 men to oppose to his 40,000. A great army of reserve, 60,000 strong, was raised in France. Napoleon led this force over the great St. Bernard in May, 1800, and then by the Simplon and the St. Gotthard into Italy. Thoroughly planned, and elaborated with masterly strategy, the campaign of 1800 was brilliantly successful, and the great battle of Marengo, on the 14th of June, made Napoleon once more master of Italy. The victorious army was put under Masséna's command; and Bonaparte returned to Paris, higher than ever in the estimation of France and of Europe.

Brilliant successes of other generals, especially of Moreau, compelled the Austrians to make overtures for peace. Moreau's splendid victory at Hohenlinden (Dec. 3rd, 1800), paved the way to the treaty of Luneville, and at length, at the beginning of 1802, the treaty of Amiens was signed, the only peace ever made between Napoleon and the English Government.

But the peace of Amiens, the result of the short supremacy of a whig ministry, was not likely to be of long duration. Between the governments of England and France there was a rooted antipathy. George III. and his court could not frankly acknowledge the title of Bonaparte as head of the State, where the indispensable qualification of legitimacy was wanting. In their eyes he was from first to last the Corsican usurper, against whom every stratagem was permissible. "I did not usurp the crown," was Napoleon's defence. "It was lying in the mire. I picked it up. The people placed it on my head." And here he was right. The people looked upon him as identified with the triumph of the republic over invading kings—as the man who having risen by his transcendent talents, had declared that the career should be open to talent, and showed himself ready to promote men on their merits, without reference to birth or station. "The old privileged classes and the foreign cabinets," said Napoleon, "hate me worse than they did Robespierre." And here again he was right; for the very extravagance of the hideous "Terror" enabled them to hold up that wretched fanatic as a warning example of the evils of democracy, while under the Consulate the Republic flourished, and the work of reconstruction went steadily on. Neither side had confidence in the other. England saw with natural distrust how the consul's ambition grew with his fortunes. It was evidently his intention to make France the dominant power in Europe, and himself the despotic ruler of the French nation. To this end he worked with marvellous perseverance and sagacity; and in many respects the four years during which he ruled over France as first consul were marked by great and signal benefits that have left the mark of his hand upon the best institutions of the land he governed, in such a way, that in common justice they should be to some extent set against his subsequent errors and crimes. He aspired to be the head, not of a faction, but of the whole nation. and therefore at the outset of his rule set himself to conciliate all parties alike. Gradually he cleared the Government of the absurdities with which the revolutionary period had surrounded it. The ridiculous revolutionary calendar, with its decades and rain month, wind month, and fog month, was abandoned; many of the emigrants were allowed and even encouraged to return to France. Public worship was re-established in churches. Furthermore, during the consulate, and indeed during his whole rule, a spirit of unflinching energy was shown, in the improvement of agriculture, commerce, and manufacturing industry. Great public works were undertaken in France and in the countries subordinate to her rule. The road over the Simplon, for instance, is a monument of the greatness of Napoleon in this direction. Education, science, and art were all promoted by encouragement and reward; and by healing the wounds of the revolution, and working incessantly for the prosperity of France, the first consul built up his power in the hearts of millions of the French people.

But alas for the other side of the picture!—When the nation's confidence had once been fully gained, it was lamentably abused. Ambitious this man had always been—ardent, strenuous and aspiring; but while engaged in the hard struggle with fortune, prudence and sagacity had kept that ambition in check. But he had now, like Wolsey, to bear on his shoulders "a weight which would sink a navy—too much honour;" and, as Shakespeare says of the great Cardinal, it proved with him also "a burden too heavy for a man that hopes for heaven." His ambition became more and more ungovernable, and developed at last into the perfection of selfishness. He no longer looked upon himself as the trustee of the enormous empire whose destinies he wielded; but regarded that empire, and indeed the whole world, as bound to minister to his greatness. "Ye have my glory!" was in substance his answer to the exhausted but devoted people who appealed to him for rest and freedom. France, like a generous horse, bore him bravely through the burden and heat of a long battle day; he, like a merciless rider, pressed the willing horse until it fell exhausted beneath him.

FROM AMIENS TO AUSTERLITZ; NAPOLEON THE EMPEROR.

The peace of Amiens was not ten months old when its approaching termination was seen. The English had promised to evacuate Malta, but hesitated to do so in view of the warlike preparations of France, and that power's negotiations with Spain. Napoleon, already irritated against England by the attacks upon him in the newspapers, for he hated anything like a free press, insisted on a literal carrying out of the treaty, and resented the interference of England in continental politics. Lord Whitworth, the

NAPOLEON.

English, and General Andreassy, the French, ambassadors, left Paris and London almost simultaneously, so that they met at Dover. On the 18th of May, the English Government declared war. The French ships in English ports were seized and declared forfeited; the first consul, on his part, detained as prisoners of war all English residents in France. This renewal of the war was thus surrounded with circumstances tending to embitter the contest which continued until the fall of the Empire.

A new coalition of nations against France was now brought about—the third since the fall of the monarchy. The prime mover in this measure was Pitt, who had once more been called to the head of affairs. The powers who united with England were Sweden, Russia, and Austria. There was good reason, on the part of England at least, for making every preparation. Napoleon had publicly declared his intention of invading that country. He had assembled a large army on the heights near Boulogne, with the avowed purpose of crossing the channel, for which purpose a number of flat-bottomed boats had been prepared. The "army of England" was a standing menace; and the excitement in England was shown by the enrolment of 150,000 volunteers, and the augmentation of the regular army. In 1804, the Consulate gave place to the Empire. By an enormous majority of votes it was declared by the French people that the head of the state should assume the title of Emperor. Accordingly, Napoleon was crowned, with Josephine, at Notre Dame, in December, 1804. The state now assumed a more military aspect than ever. A new nobility was created, of generals who had distinguished themselves. From among these also were chosen those famous marshals who surrounded the Emperor's throne. The establishment of the legion of honour, into which the private soldier who distinguished himself by courage, could equally with the general gain admittance, was another step indicative of military achievements in contemplation. It was evident that the year 1805 would be a stirring and memorable time.

Whether Napoleon ever seriously intended this descent upon England will always remain doubtful. Many considered the threat to be simply a stratagem to divert attention from the real point of attack; but Pitt thoroughly believed in it, and would hear of nothing else. A parliamentary follower told him of the receipt of a letter from a correspondent, speaking of a great massing of troops on the Rhine frontier. "Then, sir," said the Prime Minister, "you have a very disaffected correspondent." Very suddenly and rudely was the illusion dispelled. At the end of August the Emperor suddenly broke up his camp, marched his army with unexampled speed across France, formed a junction with the armies raised by several of his marshals, and led 300,000 troops against southern Germany.

The allies were completely taken by surprise. Würtemberg and Baden made a treaty with Napoleon; who, advancing in his usual rapid way, completely surrounded the army of the veteran Austrian, General Mack, near Ulm. Mack was obliged to surrender, with all his force, and Ulm fell into the victor's power. Thence he marched to Vienna, which had no alternative but to receive the victorious invader within its walls. Meanwhile the great Russian army was coming to the scene of action. Napoleon, who loved to choose his own fighting-ground, took up a new position in Moravia, near the capital Brunn; and here was fought, on the 2nd of December, the tremendous battle of Austerlitz. The victory he here gained threw all Napoleon's previous triumphs into the shade. Fifteen thousand prisoners and a hundred pieces of artillery fell into his hands. Austria was humbled, and compelled to sue for peace; and the Russian army had to retreat in such confusion as precluded its rallying for some time.

The treaty of Presburg, signed on the 20th of December, after the Emperor Francis had personally visited Napoleon in the camp, broke the power of Austria, and made France the arbiter of the Continent. Thus the campaign closed with brilliant triumph for the Emperor.

But there was one notable exception. On the 25th October, the very day of the capitulation of Mack, at Ulm, the combined French and Spanish fleet had been attacked by Nelson at Cape Trafalgar, near Cadiz. Every Englishman knows the glorious story of that day. The victory that Nelson purchased with his life involved not only the defeat but the utter destruction of the French fleet, and from that day until the end of the war, ten years later, the French were never able to meet the English in a general engagement at sea. It has been well said of Napoleon's power, that it resembled the fabled might of those goblins who were struck helpless when they encountered a stream of running water. On land his word was omnipotent; but while France was gaining victories all over the Continent, her ships were hiding in harbour or hurrying from port to port, flying from British cruisers. The Nile had been a noble triumph for England, but the victory of Trafalgar was greater still, and might have taught a lesson to Napoleon of the uncertainty of success, had he been sufficiently master of himself to receive it.

JENA, EYLAU, FRIEDLAND, TILSIT.

In the year 1806, after these great victories, Napoleon had chiefly to deal with Prussia. This state had played an unworthy part during the struggle; consenting to stand aloof, lured by the promise of receiving Hanover. When, however, Austria had been vanquished, and Prussia put out of the field for a time, Napoleon showed no alacrity to cultivate the friendship of Prussia, whose weak, vacillating king he cordially despised. The defeat of Austerlitz and the consequent destruction of the coalition had broken the heart of Pitt, who came to London to die in February, 1806; and his great rival, destined to follow him to the grave in a few months, once more applied himself to the task of endeavouring to bring about peace with France. When, in the negotiations which ensued, Prussia found France ready to give back Hanover to England, her eyes were at length opened; and the national party, which had been for some time gathering strength, at length procured the declaration of war. England, ready to take part with any power against France, became reconciled to Prussia, with whom and Sweden she formed the fourth coalition.

The Prussian army, strong in numbers, was badly officered, and led by men of a bygone school, at whose antiquated notions Napoleon laughed. "Ils se tromperont furieusement, ces perruques" (they'll find themselves horribly mistaken, these old fogies), was his sarcastic remark, on discovering their expectation of his basis of attack. Even of Blücher, perhaps the best of them, Napoleon said, "He is a very brave soldier, a good fighter (un bon sabreur). He is like a bull who shuts his eyes and rushes forward, and sees no danger. As a general, he is without talent." On the 14th October, two battles were gained, one by Napoleon at Jena, the other by Davoust at Auerstadt. On that day of misfortune Prussia lost 50,000 men; and even this was not the worst. A wretched panic, favoured perhaps by the disaffection that existed towards the Government, seized upon the whole country. Strong fortresses yielded to the French without even a show of resistance; large army corps surrendered with suspicious alacrity. Napoleon entered Berlin as a conqueror, and had now only Russia to contend with. Thus 1806 closed with increased glory to the Empire; and the French people, intoxicated with glory, did not as yet murmur at the cost of these victories, though there was wailing in many a home over fathers, brothers, and sons whom the war had devoured. It is told how at this period Napoleon, during one of his progresses, having alighted with the Empress to walk a short distance on foot, met a peasant woman, who, being interrogated, said she was going to see the Emperor, who was to pass that way. "Why do you wish to see him?" asked Napoleon; "what have you done, but exchange one tyrant for another? You have had the Bourbons, now you have Napoleon." "No matter," rejoined the woman, "Napoleon is our king; but the Bourbons were the kings of the nobles." "This," said Napoleon, afterwards relating the anecdote, "comprehends the whole matter."

Russia had by this time recovered from the injuries of Austerlitz; and the campaign of 1807, which began with the new year on the plains of East Prussia, was directed against the armies of the Czar Alexander. The stubborn valour of the Russian foe was proved in two days' desperate fighting at Eylau, in which 30,000 men were slain and 50,000 prisoners taken. A panic of exhaustion followed this tremendous conflict; but on the 14th June, the seventh anniversary of Marengo, victory declared once more for Napoleon, and Alexander now made proposals for peace. The treaty of Tilsit degraded Prussia to the rank of a third-rate power, while it left Russia almost untouched. Napoleon thought it to his advantage to cultivate the friendship of the Emperor of Russia, who might aid him in carrying out colossal schemes of conquest, especially towards the East; for the King of Prussia he had a very hearty contempt, which he took no pains to disguise. He at once perceived the strong point of the Russian soldiers, their stolid obedience to orders, and their imperturbable coolness. "My soldiers," he said to Alexander, "are as brave as it is possible to be, but they are too much addicted to reasoning on their position. If they had the impassable firmness and docility of the Russians, the world would be too small for their exploits."

NAPOLEON AT HIS ZENITH; HIS ERRORS.

This may be looked upon as the highest period of the Emperor's power. In three successive years he had compelled the three greatest continental powers—Austria, Russia, and Prussia—to sue for peace. His will was paramount over the Continent of Europe. Not only had he raised himself to a position such as no soldier of fortune had ever attained; he had absolutely put his nearest relatives on thrones, where they sat

"state statues only," for they were expected to be utterly subservient to the will of the great Emperor. Lucien, the republican, the most resolute of the family, had quarrelled with his imperial brother, to whom he spoke his mind in a fashion Napoleon would not brook; but Joseph, Louis, and even Jerome, whom the Emperor was accustomed contumeliously to designate as "le petit polisson" (the little scamp), were accommodated with kingdoms; Joseph receiving Naples then, and afterwards transferred to Spain; Louis becoming king of Holland, and "polisson" Jerome receiving the brand-new kingdom of Westphalia, constructed out of territory plundered from the unhappy monarch of Prussia. Murat, Napoleon's brother-in-law, and Eugène Beauharnais, his stepson, were also remembered in this grand distribution of crowns and sceptres. And here the conqueror committed a grievous blunder. "La carrière pour le talent" had been his motto; the promotion of the deserving, irrespective of family claims; and here he put men like the listless Joseph and the hot-headed Murat into positions requiring the greatest circumspection and sagacity, because they were related to himself. And so now also the reaction began to set in. He had been guilty of acts of which his enemies made the most to his disadvantage. The Duke d'Enghien, a distinguished royalist, had been illegally captured, tried in an utterly irregular manner by a hurried court-martial, and shot in the ditch of Vincennes; an unhappy German bookseller, Palm, met a similar fate for distributing a pamphlet of a seditious character; the conscription weighed heavily upon France, and the immense sums exacted as "contribution" from Germany aroused the feelings of hidden anger in the population. Outwardly all was glitter and triumph; but the foundation of all this grandeur was unsound.

The insatiable ambition that made him interfere in the wretched politics of Spain now led the Emperor into a series of difficulties from which he never extricated himself. The long struggle in the Peninsula caused a continual drain upon the resources of the empire; and while this contest was going on, and the marshals were being wearied out by the imperturbable tenacity of Wellington, a new coalition was brought about; and in the campaign of 1809 the Emperor had once again to lead his legions to the Danube against the armies of Austria. The campaign of 1809 might have afforded food for reflection to the conqueror, had he not been too haughty and arrogant to profit by its teachings. The armies who now opposed him seemed animated by a new spirit; for Austria, the most persistently despotic of states, had actually begun, as an exorcist, to conjure up the mortified spirit of her soldiers with a new word, a word most unfamiliar on the lips of her statesmen—freedom. The arrogance of the invading armies, the boastfulness of the victors of Marengo and Austerlitz and Jena, had excited a feeling of anger in Austria; and by representing the combat as one of nationality against foreign usurpation and the domination of an alien race, the Austrian leaders excited an enthusiasm amongst their men that astonished their opponents, whose task was rendered exceedingly difficult. Indeed, the Archduke Charles astonished Europe by the tremendous energy of his attack on the French at Aspern and Esslingen, where the invaders left 11,000 men dead on the field, and had 30,000 wounded, Marshal Lannes being among the slain. But both sides had suffered alike, and during an armistice of six weeks Napoleon received such reinforcements as enabled him to fight the battle of Wagram, which once more put Austria in his power; and in the treaty of Vienna, signed at Schönbrunn, the Emperor Francis was obliged again to submit to the dictation of the imperious soldier of the iron hand. And now Napoleon, the child of the Revolution, the chosen of the people, the man who owed everything to the fidelity of the nation towards him, sought to strengthen and secure his throne by a marriage alliance with the imperial family of Austria. He divorced Josephine, who had borne him no children, and married, in 1810, Maria Louisa, the daughter of the Emperor Francis. In the next year his hopes of succession were crowned by the birth of a son, who in his cradle was invested with the title of the King of Rome.

THE RUSSIAN CAMPAIGN; DISASTER.

The continental system by which Napoleon endeavoured to ruin Great Britain through her commercial interests, by closing all the ports of Europe against her, had been carried out with unvarying tenacity under his orders. The injury inflicted upon Russia by the closing of her chief market, and the efforts of England and Sweden, brought about an alliance between the three countries. Napoleon, who had believed in the sincerity of the friendship of Alexander, was not unnaturally indignant. He declared war against Russia, and in his anger resolved upon the enterprise that proved his ruin—the invasion of the vast empire of the Czars and an expedition against Moscow. Europe had never seen such an army as Napoleon led into Russia in 1812. The nature of its composition showed the supremacy its leader had attained in Europe. Five hundred and seventy-five thousand warriors, with 1,200 pieces of artillery, crossed the Russian frontier at the end of June, 1812; and each of the vassal states had been obliged to contribute its quota. Prussia sent 20,000, Austria 30,000, Poland 60,000 men to swell the French forces, and the monarchs of Austria and Prussia, with a number of vassal princes, attended the levee of the master of the grande armée in Dresden, where he held his court before starting on the expedition which was to be his ruin. Never had the monarchs been so subservient to him. Some time before he had invited his former friend, Talma, the actor, to come to Erfurt, and play before a pit-full of kings (un parterre de rois). He could have repeated the invitation here, for never had the monarchs of Europe appeared so completely his obedient humble servants.

The plan of the Emperor was to advance with all speed, to bring the enemy to a general engagement as quickly as possible, and then to dictate a peace in the Russian, as he had done in the Austrian and Prussian capitals. The Russian plan, on the contrary, was to avoid a battle as long as possible; to retreat before the advancing foe, and draw him into the interior of a country whose barren and desolate wastes would yield but little provision or forage to that mighty host; and then the winter would come on; and as the Czar Nicholas said in after years, Russia had two leaders on whom she could rely—grim Generals January and February. Accordingly, as the French pressed forward, their foes fell back; and, compelled as they were to advance by different routes, their numbers were rather a hindrance than an advantage to the invaders.

The Russian soldiers, however, not understanding the Fabian tactics of their commanders, loudly demanded to be led against the foe, and were at length in a state of mutiny, refusing the "hours" or salutations of welcome with which they were accustomed to receive their officers. Accordingly, a stand was made at Smolensk, when the victory was gained by the French, but with great loss; and again the enemy retreated, and the French followed them up. On the 7th September, the fierce General Kutusoff having taken the command from Barclay de Tolly, a final stand was made at Borodino, to protect the capital; and a contest more obstinate than that of Eylau was maintained all day on the banks of the Moskwa. With the loss of more than 20,000 men, the enemy having lost 30,000, Napoleon advanced towards the ancient capital. When the gilded cupolas of Moscow were seen in the distance, the soldiers burst forth in shouts of triumph. Napoleon himself rejoiced at the sight of what appeared to be the goal of their enterprise. "It was high time," he observed.

The conquerors entered a deserted city. The streets were empty; in the houses costly goods and furniture were found in abundance, with none to claim them. Only tattered wretches were seen slinking about at street-corners, fleeing before the advancing soldiery. Napoleon took up his quarters in the Kremlin, and the army bivouacked in the streets. That night various fires broke out. At first they were attributed to accident; but the capture of some incendiaries, who boldly declared that they had been ordered by the governor, Rostopchin, to set the city on fire, showed to what lengths a fanatical people could go in their desire to destroy an enemy. Moscow, the ancient capital, the depository of the chief treasures of the Empire for centuries, the dwelling-place of 300,000 Russians, was to be sacrificed to ensure the destruction of the invaders who had dared to profane the soil of Holy Russia.

Four-fifths of the city were reduced to ashes. The Emperor himself was obliged to flee from the Kremlin, and was in imminent danger of being suffocated by the smoke. When the fire had burnt itself out, the soldiers once more returned to encamp among the ruins. Discouragement and doubt had already begun to spread among them. Napoleon wrote to Alexander, reminding him that he was still his friend, and evidently anxious for peace; but the war party, in whose hands the weak, vacillating Czar was, sternly replied that no negotiations could be begun while a single French soldier remained on Russian soil.

The position was growing critical. For some time no news had reached the Emperor from Paris, and he dreaded, not without reason, as the sequel proved, that his enemies might endeavour, in his absence, to overturn his government. His troops were unprovided with winter clothing, and provisions were very hard to get; so, after a period of indecision, Napoleon resolved to retreat. "This war resembles no other," said the Emperor gloomily. "At Eylau, at Friedland, we had to contend only with soldiers; here we have to conquer a whole nation."

Of that fatal retreat the story has been told a hundred times by men who themselves experienced its horrors. Nothing in the world's chronicle of human woe exceeds in horror the miseries of that fearful journey through the endless snow-covered plains, amid the aggravated terrors of a pursuing army, hot for vengeance, and plundering skirmishers, with lance and pistol, hovering on the outskirts of the retreating masses, cutting off, with cruel pertinacity, every unhappy straggler whom famine or exhaustion compelled to lag behind his comrades. Haggard, famine-stricken, and in rags, afraid to sleep by night for the deadly frost, afraid to halt by day for needful rest, for the murderous Cossacks hovering around them, they stumbled on, like overdriven cattle, until all bonds of discipline were loosed, and in brutal selfishness, engendered of misery, the soldier thrust his officer away from the camp-fire, and the famished wretches fought for the loathsome scraps with which they strove to keep themselves alive. At the passage of the river Berisina, where the pursuing army of Kutusoff came up with them, thousands perished in the half-frozen river. On the 5th December, Napoleon himself quitted the remains of the army; and, accompanied by two of his marshals, set out for Paris, by way of Warsaw, Dresden, and Mayence. The miserable relics of the army arrived at Wilna, where they were enabled to take some rest, and thence they hurried on to recross the Niemen. Talleyrand, the archtraitor, who served each party in turn, and betrayed them all round, marked the extent of the disaster, and declared it to be "the beginning of the end."

1813; EUROPE AGAINST FRANCE.

The subservient senate readily agreed that the armies were to be raised, for the campaign of 1813, to a strength of 800,000 men. A conscription, severer than any former levy, provided the necessary numbers; but the soldiers of 1813 were not like the veterans of former years. Brave they were, those poor conscripts, even to temerity, ready to encounter any danger, and inspired with a patriotism truly heroic; but many of them were mere boys, utterly wanting in the physical strength necessary for a long campaign. Selection had become impossible, and hardly any man who could carry a musket escaped enrolment. Meanwhile, Europe had marked the discomfiture of the great soldier until then considered invincible. The Prussian and Austrian auxiliary corps hastened to effect an accommodation with the enemy; and in Prussia a general uprising and revolt took place. The young men came by thousands to enrol themselves as volunteers, to fight for the freedom of their country. Contributions of money, and even of jewels and valuables, for the equipment of troops, poured in. A general enthusiasm had seized the country.

"Das Volk steht auf, der Sturm bricht los!" "The people rise—the storm's unchained," sang Theodore Körner, the Tyrtæus of the camp, himself destined to fall for his country in the struggle. A sixth coalition was formed against France, England again bearing a great part of the financial burden.

Napoleon showed all his former energy and resolution in the face of this great danger. He signalized the beginning of the campaign by gaining the three victories of Lützen, Wurtzen, and Bautzen, in Saxony; and then he occupied Dresden, and the King of Saxony renewed his treaty with him. This startling evidence that the great soldier still knew how to conquer made his foes pause. An armistice, and a congress at Prague, ostensibly for arranging a peace, gave them time to recover from their discomfiture, and to gain a most important ally in the person of Austria. When, on the breaking off of the conference and the renewal of the war, Austria declared on the side of the allies, it was felt that only exceptional good fortune, combined with consummate skill, could save Napoleon from ruin. Once again he inflicted defeat on his foes at Dresden; and here perished Moreau, who to his shame had taken service with Russia against his own country. But meanwhile Napoleon's marshals were blundering. Macdonald and Ney were separately defeated, and Vandamme, with 8,000 men, was taken prisoner. Retreat or a general battle formed the only alternative. Napoleon chose the latter, and at Leipsic, in the great Völkerschlacht, or battle of the nations, he encountered, with 170,000 men, the armies of Russia, Prussia, Austria, Sweden, and their allies, amounting to 300,000 men. From the 14th to the 18th, in a series of tremendous conflicts, the French struggled for victory; but on the 19th, Napoleon was obliged to retreat, with a loss of 80,000 men. One more gleam of success illumined the campaign for him. The Bavarians tried, at Hanau, to intercept his retreat, and he inflicted a crushing defeat upon them. But the end was near.

1814; USELESS STRUGGLE AND ABDICATION.

The allies had now 400,000 troops in Holland and along the banks of the Rhine; and the crows could now venture to attack the eagle in his nest. The commencement of 1814 saw foreign armies once more encamped on the soil of France. Never had Napoleon's military genius shone more brightly than now, and never had the French shown more clearly how much their success in war depends on a great leader. Like a hunted lion, he strove desperately to break the net which his enemies were drawing around him. Prussians, Russians, and Austrians were in turn overthrown at Champeaubert, Montmirail, Joinville, Nangis, and Montereau. But his generals deserted him, to make terms for themselves; the Senate, once so servile, declared against him; Talleyrand the archtraitor matured a scheme for the restoration of the Bourbons; while Napoleon was engaged near the frontier against one army of the allies, another made its way to the capital; and at length, while he was hastening to relieve the beleaguered city, he received the news at Fontainebleau, that Paris had surrendered, and he knew that the game was lost.

The island of Elba for an empire, four hundred of his old guard for an army, the retention of his title as emperor, and a large pension (which was not paid) for the maintenance of his little court—such were the terms offered to the fallen Cæsar by the allies, and perforce accepted by him. Napoleon quitted France, and Louis XVIII. ruled in the Tuileries. Louis was a good-natured, fat, indolent gentleman enough, strongly resembling his elder brother, the unhappy Louis XVI., in person and in character. “Il ny a rien de changé; il n’y a qu’un français de plus,” he said; and would have been content to let things remain much as they were. But the men around him were “far more royalist than the king;” they insulted and disgusted the army; they cashiered the old officers who had fought against the invader, and put in their places the emigrants who had intrigued in safety beyond the frontiers, and who now returned in swarms, hungry as locusts, for pensions and places. Such a wonderful amount of misrule and blundering did they concentrate into a few months, that before a year had fully gone, Napoleon was back again to strike once more for crown and empire.

THE LAST EFFORT; FAILURE AND RUIN.

The year 1815 will always be memorable for the famous Waterloo campaign. It was a desperate venture; and in view of the determination of the allies to stand together, and to enter into no treaty with Napoleon, could hardly succeed. Even if the French army had not suffered that crushing defeat on the 18th June, if the Emperor had succeeded in defeating the English and the Prussians, he would still have had to reckon with the enormous hosts of Austria and Prussia, aided by the large contingents, the states of Germany, Sweden, and the Netherlands would have been called on to supply. Exhausted as he was, through the enormous warlike drain on her population for years, France would have been quite unequal to such a tremendous task. Napoleon in former days had been the king of the people; but he had betrayed his trust, and was, in 1815, only the king of the army.

It would have been well for him had he died at Waterloo; for those six years of captivity at St. Helena are miserable to look back upon, and reflect no honour on the petulant captive anxious to parade his grievances, or on the great English government who surrounded him with infinitely petty restrictions, or the military governor who treated him like a convict. To guard with jealous care the man who had returned from Elba was necessary, and right but to refuse to address him except as “General Bonaparte” was petty; and the refusal to allow the single word “Napoleon” as an inscription on the tomb of the dead lion, showed a meanness of spirit worthy of the ministry who sent the “imperative orders” that no words should appear on the stone but the obnoxious name “General Bonaparte.” During that long agony the captive had one thing that had been denied him during the greater part of his heated, busy, toilsome career—time for reflection. Already at Elba he had begun to distinguish causes and effects more clearly, when the false glare thrown upon events by conquest and success had passed away. “I committed three great political faults,” he said. “I ought to have made peace with England by abandoning Spain. I ought to have restored the kingdom of Poland, and not have gone to Moscow. I ought to have made peace at Dresden (in 1813), giving up Hamburg and some other countries that were useless to me.”

The most convincing proof that his long captivity gave him time for profitable reflection is found in his remarks to Bertrand on the Christian religion. Dimly, and afar off, the captive seems to have seen the great fault in his own character, the devouring egotism which had made him look upon all things as revolving round him, in contrast with the love that forms the essence of gospel teaching. “The soul can never go astray,” he said, solemnly laying his hand on the Bible, “with this book for its guide.”

On the 5th May, 1821, Napoleon died. From the broken words that escaped him, the faithful watchers round his bed could gather that his last thoughts wandered to the land of France, to the son who had been his pride and hope, to the army he had led so often to victory. But mingled with these trembled on his dying lips the name of Him before whom the glory of the kings of the earth passes away as a tale that is told. H. W. D.

CÆSAR'S BIRTH AND DAILY LIFE.

THE subject of the following pages is without question one of the greatest of the great men who have played a part on the stage of this world. The deeds performed by Caesar, and the much vaster enterprises which he mediated, bear witness to his transcendent genius alike in war and peace. "He was great," says a modern historian, "in everything he undertook,—as a captain, a statesman, a lawgiver, a jurist, an orator, a poet, an historian, a grammarian, a mathematician, and an architect."

Caius Julius Caesar, the son of Caius Julius Caesar and Aurelia, was born B.C. 100, on the 12th of Quintilis, which afterwards in his honour got the name of Julia. His aunt Julia was the wife of Caius Marius, who was seven times Consul. His early life was spent at a time when the successes of Sulla had restored the government of the nobles ; and the list of Consuls at this period shows for several years the position which the great families had recovered in the State. It was the destiny of Cæsar to head a revolutionary movement, and take the last step in the downfall of the Republic.

In his seventeenth year Cæsar married Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna, by whom he had a daughter, Julia. This connection with Marius and Cinna, the two great opponents of the Dictator Sulla, exposed him to the resentment of the opposite faction. By Sulla's orders he was deprived of his wife's dowry, and of the fortune which he had inherited by descent, stripped of an office he held as Priest of Jupiter, and compelled to seek safety in flight. Sulla is said to have spared his life with great reluctance, observing to those who pleaded his cause that the youth "would be the ruin of the aristocratic party, for there were many Mariuses in Cæsar."

A MILITARY CAREER BEGUN.

Cæsar first served under M. Thermus in Asia, and distinguished himself at the capture of Mitylene (B.C. 80 or 79), but his reputation suffered by a report (possibly an unfounded one) of scandalous profligacy during a visit which he paid to Nicomedes, the King of Bithynia.

In the following year he served under Servilius Isauricus in Cilicia. The news of Sulla's death soon brought him back to Rome, but he took no part in the movements of M. Æmilius Lepidus, who made a fruitless attempt to overthrow the aristocratic party, which had been firmly established during the tyranny of Sulla. It is not unlikely, as is observed by Suetonius, that he had no confidence in Lepidus, and that he had penetration enough to see that the time was not come for humbling the aristocracy. Whatever opinion may be entertained as to Cæsar having very early formed a design to seize on the sovereign power, it is at least certain that from his first appearance in public life he had a settled purpose to break the power of the aristocracy, from which he and his relatives had suffered so much.

On his return to Rome he had an opportunity, of which he readily availed himself, of displaying those powers of speech, which were only second to his powers of action, in the prosecution of Dolabella for maladministration in his province of Macedonia. After this successful impeachment he retired to Rhodes, and for a time became a pupil of the rhetorician Molo, one of the greatest masters of the art, whose instructions Cicero had attended probably a year or two before Cæsar's visit.

Fortune seemed at once to claim him as a man of action. On his way to Rhodes his ship was captured by the pirates who had then undisputed mastery of the Mediterranean and Ægean. His ransom was fixed at the enormous sum of fifty talents (about £12,000), which he obtained from the maritime cities of Asia. Whilst he was their prisoner he often made threats of vengeance, as it seemed to them in sport ; threats which would seem doubly ludicrous from that puny frame which Shakspeare makes Cassius deride. But Cæsar soon proved that he was terribly in earnest. Before proceeding to qualify himself for being an orator, he manned a small squadron at Miletus, assailed the pirates in their haunts, carried them prisoners to Pergamus, and crucified them.

For some time after this Cæsar seems to have had little concern in public life, being kept in the background by the predominance of the aristocratic party, and the successful career of Metellus, Lucullus, Crassus, and Pompey.

About B.C. 69, being elected one of the military Tribunes, he had sufficient influence to procure an enactment for the restoration of L. Cinna, his wife's brother, and of those partisans of Lepidus who after his death had joined Sertorius in Spain. The following year he was Quæstor in Spain, and on his return to Rome he was elected Ædile for B.C. 65.

Just before entering on office he fell under some suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy to kill the Consuls Cotta and Torquatus, and effect a revolution. Whether there really was a conspiracy or not may be doubted : Cæsar's share in it at least is not clearly established.

The office of Ædile gave Cæsar an opportunity of indulging his taste for magnificence and display, by which at the same time he secured the favour of the people. He beautified the city with public buildings, and gave splendid exhibitions of wild beasts and gladiators. He lived at an expense which his income certainly did not warrant. "Many people observing this," says Plutarch, "thought that he was purchasing a short transient honour very dear ; but the fact was, he was gaining the greatest things he could aspire to at a small price. It is said that he was one thousand three hundred ducats in debt before he got any public employment. When he had the superintendence of the Appian Road he laid out a great deal of his own money ; and when

Ædile, he not only exhibited three hundred and fifty pairs of gladiators, but in the other diversions of the theatre, in processions and public tables, he far outshone the most ambitious who had gone before him. These things attached the people to him so strongly that every one sought for new honours and employments to recompense his generosity."

Cæsar, who was now thirty-five years of age, had enjoyed no opportunity of distinguishing himself in a military capacity; while the more fortunate Pompey, who was only six years older, was spreading his name and the terror of the Roman arms throughout the East. A favourable occasion seemed to present itself in Egypt. Alexander, the King, who had been honoured with the name of friend and ally of the Roman people, was ejected from Alexandria by the citizens. The popular feeling at Rome was against the Alexandrians, and Cæsar thought he had interest enough, through the Tribunes and the democratical party, to get appointed to an extraordinary command in Egypt. But the opposite faction was strongly united against him, and he failed in his attempt.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS EMPLOYMENTS.

The following year he was more successful. By a judicious application of money among the poorer voters, and of personal influence among all classes, he obtained the Pontificatus Maximus, or wardenship of the ecclesiastical college of Pontifices, a place no doubt of considerable emolument, to which an official residence in the Sacra Via was also attached. This union of civil and religious functions in the same person, at least in the higher and more profitable places, was a part of the old Roman polity, which, among other consequences, prevented the existence of a hierarchy with a distinct and opposing interest.

At the time of the important debate on the conspiracy of Catiline (B.C. 63), Cæsar was Prætor Designatus (prætor elect for the following year), and accordingly spoke in his place in the senate. He was the only person who ventured to oppose the proposition for putting the conspirators to death: he recommended their property to be confiscated, and that they should be dispersed through the different municipia of Italy, and kept under a strict surveillance. The speech which Sallust has put into his mouth on this occasion, if the substance of it is genuine, will help us to form some estimate of Cæsar's character and policy at this period. The address is singularly well adapted to flatter the dominant party, as well as to keep up his credit with those who were hostile to the aristocratic interest. His object was to save the lives of the conspirators, under the pretext of inflicting on them a punishment more severe than that of death. But for Cato he might probably have carried his motion.

According to Suetonius, Cæsar persevered in his opposition till his life was actually threatened by the armed Roman Equites, who were introduced into the senate-house under the pretext of protecting the senate during their deliberations. Cicero, who was their Consul, and in the height of his prosperity and arrogance, might, it is said, by a single nod have destroyed this formidable opponent of the order of which he had become the devoted champion, but either his courage failed him, or some motive, perhaps more worthy, led him to check the fury of the Equites.

In the following year, during his prætorship, the opposite faction in the senate, who were bent on crushing Cæsar's rising influence, actually passed a decree (decretum), by which Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos, one of the Tribunes of the plebs, and Cæsar, who strongly supported him in his measures, were declared incapable of continuing in the exercise of their official duties.

Cæsar, however, still went on discharging the judicial functions of his magistracy, till he found that force would be used to compel his submission to this illegal and impolitic act of the senate. The populace were roused by this strange proceeding, and Cæsar apparently might have had their best assistance against his enemies; but prudence for the present induced him to check the zeal of his partisans, and the senate, apparently alarmed by this demonstration, repealed their own decree, and thanked him for his conduct.

An affair which happened during Cæsar's prætorship caused no little scandal at Rome. While the ceremonies in honour of the Bona Dea were performing in the house of Cæsar, the profligate Clodius, putting on a woman's dress, contrived to get admission to these mysterious rites. On the affair being discovered, Cæsar divorced his wife Pompeia, whom he had married after the death of Cornelia, and Clodius, after being brought to a public trial on a charge of impiety, only escaped by bribing the judges, or jury. When called as a witness at the trial Cæsar declared that he knew nothing of what was alleged against Clodius. As this declaration appeared rather strange, the accuser demanded why, if that was the case, he had divorced his wife. "Because," said he, "I would have my wife above suspicion."

From motives of policy Cæsar did not break with Clodius ; he probably feared his influence, and already saw that he could make him a useful tool and a bugbear to Cicero.

CONSUL FOR THE FIRST TIME ; A GOOD STROKE OF POLICY.

The year B.C. 60 was spent by Cæsar in his province of Hispania Ulterior, or Southern Spain, where he speedily restored order, and before his successor came, hurried back to Rome to canvass for the consulship. He had now begun to indulge in dreams of ambition. When he was in Spain, we are told by Plutarch, he bestowed some leisure hours on reading part of the history of Alexander, and was so affected by it, that he sat thoughtful for a long time, and at last burst into tears. As his friends were wondering at the reason he said, "Do you think I have not sufficient cause for concern, when Alexander at my age reigned over so many conquered countries, and I have not one glorious achievement to boast?"

The aristocratical party saw that it was impossible to prevent Cæsar's election : their only chance was to give him a colleague who should be a check upon him. Their choice of Bibulus seems to have been singularly unfortunate. Bibulus was elected with Cæsar in opposition to Lucceius, with whom Cæsar had formed a coalition, on the condition that Lucceius should find the money and that Cæsar should give him the benefit of his influence and recommendation.

The scheme of Cæsar's enemies proved a complete failure. Bibulus, after unavailing efforts to resist the impetuosity of his colleague, shut himself up in his house, and Cæsar, in fact, became sole Consul. In order to stop all public business, Bibulus declared the auguries unfavourable ; and when this would not answer, he declared they would be unfavourable all through the year. This illegal conduct only tended to justify the violent measures of his colleague. The affair, though a serious one for the hitherto dominant faction, furnished matter for the small wits of the day, who used to sign their notes and letters in the consulship of Julius and Cæsar, instead of naming both Consuls in the usual way. Cæsar entered on the first of his consulships in the year B.C. 59, and pursued for exactly fifteen years that marvellous political and military career to which history has since furnished but one, and that an unequal, parallel.

Cæsar had contrived, by a masterly stroke of policy, to render ineffectual all opposition on the part of his opponents. Pompey was dissatisfied because the senate delayed about confirming all his measures in the Mithridatic war, and during his command in Asia. Crassus, who was the richest man in the State, and second only to Pompey in influence with the senatorial faction, was not on good terms with Pompey. If Cæsar gained over only one of these rivals, he made the other his enemy ; he determined therefore to secure them both.

He began by courting Pompey, and succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between him and Crassus. It was agreed that there should be a general understanding among the three as to the course of policy : that all Pompey's measures should be confirmed, and that Cæsar should have the consulship. To cement their alliance more closely, Cæsar gave Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage, though she had been promised to M. Brutus. Cæsar also took a new wife on the occasion, Calpurnia, the daughter of Piso, whom he nominated one of the Consuls for the ensuing year. This union of Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar is often called by modern writers the first triumvirate. The effect of it was to destroy the credit of Pompey, throw disunion among the aristocrats, and put the whole power of the State in the hands of one vigorous and clear-sighted man.

It is unnecessary to detail minutely the acts of Cæsar's consulship, which rather belong to a history of Rome. From the letters of Cicero, which are contemporary evidence, we perceive that the senate at last found they had got a master whom it was useless to resist : Cato alone held out, but he stood by himself.

One of the most important measures of Cæsar's consulship was an agrarian law for the division of some public lands in Campania among the poorer citizens, which was carried by intimidation. Pompey and Crassus, who had given in to all Cæsar's measures, accepted a place in the commission for dividing these lands. Clodius, the enemy of Cicero, was, through Cæsar's influence and the help of Pompey, adopted into a plebeian family, and thus made capable of holding the office of Tribune ; an event which Cicero had long dreaded, and fondly flattered himself that he could prevent by a temporising policy. Clodius, the next year, was elected a Tribune, and drove Cicero into exile.

GOVERNOR OF GALLIA CISALPINA, AND GALLIA TRANSALPINA.

The Roman Consuls, on going out of office, received the government of a province for one year. Cæsar's opponents unwisely made another and a last effort against him, which only resulted in putting them in a still more humiliating position ;

they proposed to give him the superintendence of the roads and forests. Vatinius, one of his creatures, forthwith procured a law to be passed, by which he obtained for Cæsar the province of Gallia Cisalpina, or North Italy, and Illyricum, for five years: and the senate, fearing the people might grant still more, not only confirmed the measure, but, making a merit of necessity, added the province of Gallia Transalpina.

"From this moment," it has been well said, "the history of Rome presents a striking parallel to the condition of the French Republic during Bonaparte's first campaigns in Italy. In both cases we see a weak republican administration in the capital involved in continual broils, which the rival factions are more interested in fostering than in securing the tranquillity and peace of the empire. In both cases we find a province of the distracted Republic occupied by a general with unlimited power,—the uncontrolled mastery of a territory which, in extent and importance, is equal to a mighty kingdom; a man of superior understanding, desperate resolves, and, if circumstances rendered it necessary, of dreadful cruelty,—a man who, under the show of democratical opinions, behaved like a despot, governed a province at his pleasure, and established an absolute control over his soldiers by leading them to victory, bloodshed, and pillage."

The Gallie provinces, at this time subject to Rome were Gallia Citerior, or Cisalpine Gaul (North Italy); and Gallia Ulterior, or the southern part of Transalpine Gaul, also called emphatically "Provincia" (whence the modern Province), whose capital was Narbo, now Narbonne. The Provincia extended from the Mediterranean to the Cæcœna Mountains, and included what afterwards became Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné. On the north it joined the Allobroges, then lately subjected to Rome. When Cæsar, in his Commentaries, speaks of Gaul, which he divides into Aquitania, Celtica, and Belgica, he means the Gaul which was then independent, and which he conquered, exclusive of the Provincia already subject to Rome.

CÆSAR'S WARS IN GAUL BEGUN.

We now come to the beginning of those wars in Gaul of which Plutarch writes: "The wars Cæsar conducted there, and the many glorious campaigns in which he reduced that country, represent him as another man: we begin here as it were with a new life, and have to follow him in a quite different track. As a warrior and a general, we behold him not in the least inferior to the greatest and most admired commanders the world ever produced. For whether we compare him with the Fabii, the Scipios, the Metelli, with the generals of his own time, or those who flourished a little before him, with Sylla, Marius, the two Luculli, or with Pompey himself, whose fame in every military excellence reached the skies, Cæsar's achievements bear away the palm. One he surpassed in the difficulty of the scene of action, another in the extent of the country he subdued; this in the number and strength of the enemies he overcame, that in the savage manners and treacherous disposition of the people he humanized; one in mildness and clemency to his prisoners, another in bounty and munificence to his troops; and all, in the number of battles that he won and enemies that he killed. For in less than ten years' war in Gaul, he took eight hundred towns by assault, conquered three hundred nations, and fought pitched battles at different times with three millions of men, one million of which he cut in pieces, and made another million prisoners.

"Such, moreover, was the affection of his soldiers, and their attachment to his person, that they who under other commanders were nothing above the common rate of men, became invincible when Cæsar's glory was concerned, and met the most dreadful dangers with a courage that nothing could resist."

In March B.C. 58, while Cæsar was still at Rome, news came that the Helvetians, united with several German tribes, were leaving their country with their wives and children in order to settle in South Gaul, and were directing their march upon Geneva to cross the Rhone at that place.

Cæsar hastened to Geneva, cut the bridge, and raised a wall or entrenchment between the Rhone and the Jura, in order to close the passage against the Helvetians. The Helvetians asked permission to pass through the Roman province on their way to the country of the Santones (Saintogne), as they said, and on Cæsar's refusal they resolved to cross the Jura higher up, into the country of the Sequani (Franche Comté), with whom they entered into negotiations to that effect.

Cæsar foresaw danger to the Roman province if the Helvetians succeeded in settling themselves in Gaul, and he resolved to prevent them at all risks. He left his lieutenant Labienus at Geneva, with the only legion he had in the province, and hastened back to Cisalpine Gaul, where he raised two fresh legions, and summoned three more which had wintered near Aquilia. With these five legions (about 30,000 men) he took the most direct road to Gallia Ulterior, crossing the Alps by Occlum (Exilles, between Susa and Briançon), and marched through the province to the country of the Segusiani, the nearest independent Gaulish people, who lived near the confluence of the Rhone and the Arar (the Saone).

The Helvetians meantime having crossed the country of the Sequani, had reached the Arar, which divided the Sequani from the Ædui, a considerable nation of Celtic Gaul, who extended from the Arar to the Ligeris, and who were friendly to Rome. The Ædui applied to Cæsar for assistance. He watched the motions of the Helvetians, and having learned that three-fourths of their number had crossed the Arar, he marched at night with three legions, and fell upon those who still remained on the eastern bank with the baggage, and killed or dispersed them. These were the Tigurini, who, about fifty years before, having joined the Cimbri, had defeated and killed the Roman Consul L. Cassius.

Cæsar crossed the Arar in pursuit of the Helvetian main body. After a useless conference between Cæsar and old Divico, the Helvetian leader, the Helvetians continued to advance into the country of the Ædui, and Cæsar after them. Cæsar's cavalry, 4000 strong, composed of Gaulish horsemen raised in the Provincia and among the Ædui, had the worst of it in an engagement against 600 Helvetian horsemen.

Cæsar discovered that there was a party hostile to Rome among the Ædui, at the head of which was Dumnorix, a young man of great wealth, influence, and ambition, who secretly favoured the Helvetians, although he actually commanded a body of the auxiliary cavalry under Cæsar. At the same time the provisions which the Ædui had promised to supply to the Roman army were not forthcoming. Cæsar sent for Divitiacus, the brother of Dumnorix, a Druid, who was friendly to Rome, and told him all he knew about his brother's double-dealing. Divitiacus acknowledged his brother's fault, and obtained his pardon. We find afterwards that Dumnorix continued in his heart hostile to the Romans, and at the time of Cæsar's first expedition into Britain, refused to embark with his auxiliaries, left Cæsar's camp, was followed, overtaken, and put to death.

The movements of the Helvetians through the country of the Ædui must have been very slow and circuitous, for we find that Cæsar, after following them for a fortnight, was about eighteen miles from Bibracte (Autun), which is not above eighty miles from the most distant point of the Arar, where they could have crossed.

Cæsar, who had now only two days' provisions left, gave up the pursuit, and took the road to Bibracte, the principal town of the Ædui. The Helvetians, mistaking this movement for a retreat, turned round and followed the Romans. Cæsar halted on a hill, formed his four old legions in three lines half-way up the hill, and placed in their rear higher up the two new legions, as well as the auxiliaries. The baggage he assembled and entrenched on the summit of the hill.

The Helvetians, whom Cæsar on this occasion calls Gauls—for they were in fact a Celtic race—having left all their baggage-waggons and families in one spot, closed their ranks and formed their phalanx, repulsed Cæsar's cavalry, and advanced to attack his first lines. Numbers were vastly in their favour. Cæsar having dismounted, sent away his own and all the other horses, to preclude all hope of flight, and having harangued his men, gave the signal for battle. The legionaries, from their elevated position, threw their javelins with great force upon the advancing Helvetians, and having disordered their phalanx, rushed sword in hand upon them. Owing to the close order of the Helvetian ranks, it happened that, in many instances, the Roman javelins transfixed two shields at once, so that the bearers, being unable to extricate themselves one from the other, were obliged to throw their shields away, and fight unprotected. At last, covered with wounds, the Helvetians retired towards a mountain a mile distant.

The Romans followed them, but were attacked in flank by the Boii and Tulingi, 15,000 strong, who formed the Helvetian rear-guard. Cæsar ordered his third line to face about and repel these new enemies, while the other two were engaged against the Helvetian main body, who had halted and returned to the charge. This double fight lasted from noon till sunset, during which time none of the Helvetians were seen to turn their backs. They withdrew at last, one part to the mountain and the rest to their baggage, where they continued to fight desperately behind their carts during the night, till they were nearly all killed. The other part, to the number of 13,000 individuals, moved off during the night, and marching in a north direction, arrived in the country of the Lingones (Langres). The Romans were unable to follow them, being detained three days on the field of battle in attending to their wounded and burying their dead.

In the Helvetian camp were found written tablets containing the muster of the different tribes which composed the emigration, to the number of 368,000 individuals, of whom 92,000 were fighting men. Caesar says the tablets were written in Greek characters: it has been supposed by some that they were Etruscan letters, somewhat resembling the old Greek, and perhaps introduced into Helvetia by the Rhaeti, or Rasena, an Etruscan people.

After three days, Caesar marched in pursuit of the Helvetians, who threw themselves on his mercy. Caesar demanded their arms, hostages, and the surrender of their slaves and other fugitives who had taken refuge among them; and they were ordered to return home and cultivate their lands. The Boii alone, distinguished for their bravery, were allowed to remain among the Ædui at the request of the latter.

A part of the Helvetian tribes, pagus Verbi-genes, 6,000 in number, having marched off in the midst of the confusion and darkness of the night, and taken the way towards the Rhine and Germany, were pursued by Caesar's orders, brought back and "treated as enemies," which then meant that they were either put to death or sold as slaves. The Helvetians who returned home were mustered by Caesar, and found to be 110,000 individuals, men, women, and children.

Caesar says* that his principal object in sending the Helvetians back was to prevent the Germans beyond the Rhine from occupying their country and becoming formidable neighbours to the Roman provinces. The report of Caesar's victory spread rapidly through all Celtic Gaul, the various tribes of which began to look up to him as their arbiter in their internal differences. The Ædui complained to him that Ariovistus, a powerful King of the Germans, being invited by the Sequani and the Arverni, between whom and the Ædui there was an old rivalry, had crossed the Rhine some time before with 15,000 men, who had afterwards increased to 120,000, had defeated the Ædui and their allies in a great battle, had occupied several provinces of Gaul, exacted hostages of them, and was in fact oppressing the country. The Gauls described the Germans as an athletic, fierce, and formidable people.

Caesar, who during his consulship in the previous year had induced the senate to acknowledge Ariovistus as a King, and friend of Rome, now sent to him requesting an interview, which the German declined. Caesar then required him by message to desist from bringing over the Rhine fresh bodies of Germans, and from molesting the Ædui and their allies, who were neighbours to the Roman province, and to restore their hostages. Ariovistus replied that as he had never dictated to the Romans what use they should make of their victories, he would not be dictated to by them; that the Ædui were his tributaries by force of arms.

Caesar, learning that other Germans, and particularly the Suevi, a powerful nation, were approaching the Rhine to join Ariovistus, determined on attacking him. He occupied Vesontio (Besançon), a strong town of the Sequani, before Ariovistus could seize it.

The fearful reports of the Gauls about the Germans spread alarm in Caesar's camp, especially among the young officers, military Tribunes, prefects, and others, accustomed to the luxuries of Rome, and who had followed Caesar out of personal friendship. Skulking in their tents, they lamented their fate, and were busy making their last wills. The panic spread to the veterans, and Caesar was told that it would be impossible to advance farther; that the roads were impracticable; that no provisions could be collected; and, in short, that the soldiers would not follow him if he raised his camp.

Having assembled the officers, Caesar told them that it was not their business to discuss the measures and orders of their General, ridiculed their fears of the Germans, since the Cimbri and Teutones, the most formidable of that race, had been defeated by the Roman arms, and signified to them that he would raise the camp next morning, and if they refused to follow him, would march forth with the tenth legion alone. This was Caesar's favourite legion.

This harangue had its full effect, and Caesar marched from Vesontio to meet Ariovistus. After a fruitless interview between the two chiefs, which is graphically described by Caesar, Ariovistus arrested and put in chains Valerius Procillus, Caesar's friend and confidential interpreter; and Mettius, who had gone to the German camp to renew the negotiations.

Caesar prepared for battle, but Ariovistus remained in his camp for several days, because, as Caesar was informed by the prisoners, the German matrons had declared that their countrymen would be losers if they fought before the new moon. Accordingly, the Roman general determined to make the attack. The Germans came out and formed for battle in phalanxes by order of nations, the Harudes, Marcomanni, the Tribocci, the Vangiones, the Nemetes, the Sedusii and the Suevi; and they placed their waggons, baggage, and women in a semi-circle behind them, so as to prevent escape.

The signal being given, both armies rushed to the encounter with such rapidity that the Romans had not time to throw their javelins, and at once resorted to their swords. Cæsar, perceiving that the left of the enemy was the weakest, commenced the attack on that point; many of his soldiers went up and, grasping the shields of the enemy, tried to snatch them away. Meanwhile the German right was pressing hard upon the Romans, who were much inferior in numbers, when young Crassus (the son of Licinius), who commanded the cavalry, moved the third or rear line obliquely to the support of the left, and thus recovered the advantage.

The Germans gave way, and fled towards the Rhine, which was fifty miles distant, being pursued by Cæsar's cavalry. Many fell, some swam across the river, others, and Ariovistus among the rest, passed it in boats. Ariovistus' two wives and one daughter were killed in the flight; another daughter was taken. Valerius Proculus and Mettius were both rescued, to the great satisfaction of Cæsar.

Cæsar, having thus terminated the campaign, put his troops in winter quarters among the Sequani, and himself crossed the Alps to Citerior, or Cisalpine Gaul, to hold the usual courts for the administration of justice and the civil business of the province.

THE CAMPAIGN OF B.C. 57.

The campaign of B.C. 57 was against the Belgic Gauls, a powerful race of German origin, who had been long settled in the country between the Rhine and the Sequana (Seine). Alarmed by the advance of the Romans through Celtic Gaul, the Belgæ had during the winter formed a confederacy, and prepared themselves for resistance.

Cæsar, with the usual logic of conquerors, found in these preparations a pretext for attack. He raised two more legions in Cisalpine Gaul, and proceeded at the beginning of summer to his camp in the Sequani. He then advanced with eight legions, and in fifteen days reached the country of the Remi, the first Belgic people on that side. The Remi made their submission, and gave him every information concerning the extent and the strength of the confederacy, which amounted, they said, to 800,000 fighting men.

After crossing the river Axona (Aisne), Cæsar fixed his camp on the right or farthest bank, and fortified it with a rampart twelve feet high and a ditch eighteen feet deep. The Belgæ meantime besieged the town of Bibrax (Bièvre?) belonging to the Remi, eight miles from the Roman camp. Cæsar sent to its relief his light troops, namely, his Numidians, the Cretan archers and the Balearic slingers. The Belgæ, raising the siege, advanced towards Cæsar's camp and made some demonstrations, but Cæsar kept quiet in his entrenchments, and the Belgæ broke up for want of provisions, and resolved to fight each in his own territory.

After subjecting the Suessiones, the Bellovaci, and the Ambiani, Cæsar marched against the Nervii, the most powerful of the Belgic nations. A desperate battle was fought on the banks of the Sabis (Sambre?), in which the Nervii actually surprised the Roman soldiers while in the act of tracing and entrenching their camp, and before they had time to form or put on their helmets. Cæsar's cavalry, auxiliaries, servants, drivers, and followers of the camp all ran away, spreading the report of the defeat of the Romans. Cæsar hurried from legion to legion, encouraging the men, and finally succeeded in establishing order. The tenth legion came to turn the scale. The Nervii fought desperately to the last, and "their uation and name," says Cæsar, "was nearly extinguished on that day." It was reported that out of 60,000 fighting men only 500 remained. The women and children sued for mercy, and Cæsar restored to them their territory and towns.

The Aduatici were the descendants of a body of Cimbri and Teutones, who had set led towards the confluence of the Sabis and the Mosa. While on their march to support the Nervii, they heard of the total defeat of their allies; upon which they retired to a strong natural hold, where they were regularly besieged by Cæsar, who formed a line of circumvallation. When they saw the movable towers and the lattering ram approaching their walls, engines of which the Gauls had no idea, they sued for peace.

Cæsar required them to throw their arms outside of their ramparts. They did so, but concealed one third of them; they then opened their gates and mixed with the Roman soldiers. In the evening Cæsar withdrew his men within his lines, but at midnight the Aduatici came out in arms, and attempted to scale Cæsar's entrenchments. Being repulsed with great loss, their place was entered the next day, and the people were sold as slaves, to the number of 53,000.

Crassus, being detached by Cæsar across the Sequana into Western Gaul, received the submission of the Auleri, Unelli, and Veneti, and other maritime people on the coasts of the ocean; and as the season was growing late, the army went into winter quarters in the country of the Carnutes (about Orleans), Turoñes (Tours), and other parts of central Gaul.

Cæsar set off, according to his custom, for Cisalpine Gaul, where his friends flocked from Rome to congratulate him on his successes. The senate, on receiving from the victorious general the usual official letters, ordered fifteen days of public thanksgiving to the gods, a period never granted before to any other general.

THE CAMPAIGN OF B.C. 56.

Cæsar's third campaign, B.C. 56, was against the Western Gauls. Crassus, while wintering with one legion among the Audes (Anjou), sent Tribunes and other officers to the Veneti (Vannes in Brittany), and other people on the Atlantic coast, to ask for provisions. The Veneti, a powerful commercial seafaring people, who had numerous ships, in which they traded with Britain and other countries, having recovered from the alarm of Cæsar's conquests, arrested the officers of Crassus, and refused to give them up until their own hostages were restored. All the neighbouring maritime tribes made common cause with the Veneti.

Cæsar immediately ordered galleys to be constructed on the Ligeris (Loire), and sent also to collect ships on the coast of the Pictones and Santones (Poitou and Saintogne), who were friends with Rome. He directed the fleet to attack the Veneti by sea, while he marched against them by land. He exclaimed loudly against the breaches of treaties, and the arrest of the Roman officers after the Veneti had made submission and given hostages, while he acknowledges in his "Commentaries" that he was afraid other nations would follow the example:—"Knowing that it is the nature of all men to love liberty and hate servitude."

This was a critical time for the Roman General, but his presence of mind never forsook him in difficulties. He sent Labienus towards the Rhine to watch the Belgians and the Germans, Crassus into Aquitania, gave the command of the fleet to Decimus Brutus, and himself marched against the Veneti, taking several of their towns on the coast.

He soon found, however, that by means of their ships they easily moved from one point to another, and that the only way to conquer them effectually was by sea. The description of the ships of the Veneti, their naval tactics, and their habits and mode of life, is one of Cæsar's most interesting sketches.

A great naval battle, which lasted all day, ended with the destruction of the fleet of the Veneti, to the number of above 200 ships. Cæsar, determining to strike terror into the neighbouring people, put to death all the senators or chief men of the Veneti, and sold the rest as slaves.

The Unelli, in the neighbourhood of Cherbourg, were likewise conquered by Titurius Pibinus; and Crassus defeated the Aquitanians, though with considerable difficulty, and received hostages from various tribes in that region. Cæsar himself marched against the Morini and Menapii, (Boulogne, Calais, etc., and farther to the north and east), but the rainy season setting in, the soldiers could no longer remain under tents, and accordingly, after ravaging the country he placed his troops for the winter among the Aulerci, Lexovii, etc. (Normandy). It would appear that he went, as usual, to pass the winter in North Italy.

THE CAMPAIGN OF B.C. 55; THE INVASION OF BRITAIN.

The following year, B.C. 55, Pompeius and Crassus being Consuls, two German tribes, the Usipetes and the Trenchteri, being harassed by the Suevi, crossed the Rhine near its mouth into the country of the Menapii, between the Mosæ and the Sculdís (Scheldt). Cæsar gives an interesting account of the Suevi, the principal German nation with which the Romans were then acquainted.

Being resolved to check any disposition on the part of the Germans to cross the Rhine, he set off for the army earlier than usual. He found, as he suspected, that several Gaulish nations had an understanding with the Germans. The Usipetes sent to ask permission to settle in Gaul. Cæsar answered that there was no vacant place in Gaul for fresh emigrants, but that if they chose to settle among the Ubii on the banks of the Rhine, who were themselves at war with the Suevi, he would employ his good offices for the purpose.

While negotiations were going forward, Cæsar's Gaulish cavalry, 5,000 strong, was suddenly attacked, near the banks of the Mosæ, by 800 German horsemen, and, as usual, routed. The next day a number of German chiefs and elders came to Cæsar's camp to apologise for the affray. Cæsar arrested them all, and immediately marched against their camp, which, being thus surprised and unprepared, was easily entered, when the Romans made a dreadful carnage of the Germans. The survivors fled as far as the confluence of the Mosæ and the Rhine, where most of them perished. About this action Cato exclaimed loudly against Cæsar in the Roman senate.

The Ubii being annoyed by the Suevi, appealed to Cæsar, and offered him boats to cross the Rhine. Declining this offer, he constructed a bridge, by means of piles driven in the bed of the river. He gives a minute description of the process of building the bridge. It was finished in ten days, when Cæsar marched across, ravaged the country of the Sicambri, and reassured the Ubii by his presence. Hearing that the Suevi had assembled all their forces in the interior of their country, and considering he had done all that the honour and interest of Rome required, he re-crossed the Rhine, after spending eighteen days on German ground.

He next made his first expedition into Britain. Before the arrival of Julius Cæsar in Britain the island was but imperfectly known to the more civilized nations of the ancient world. The people of Carthage and Massilia (called Massalia by the Greeks), or Marseilles, traded for tin with certain islands called by Herodotus Κασσιτερίδες (Cassiterides), "the Tin Islands," which are supposed by some to have been the British Isles, or, at least, Cornwall and the Scilly Isles.

Cæsar is the first writer by whom any authentic particulars respecting the island are given. Stimulated probably by the desire of military renown, and the glory of first carrying the Roman arms into Britain, provoked also, as he tells us, by the aid which had been furnished to his enemies in Gaul, especially to the Veneti (the people of Vannes in Bretagne), and other maritime people of Western Gaul, he determined upon the invasion of the island. As a preliminary step, he summoned to his camp a number of the merchants who traded to the island (who alone of the Gauls had any acquaintance with it), and to them he addressed his inquiries. Their caution, however, or their ignorance, prevented his learning much from them. Failing in this quarter, one of his officers, C. Volusenus, was sent to reconnoitre, but he did not venture to leave his ship and trust himself on shore among the natives. Cæsar, no way deterred by this want of information, collected a fleet, and disposed his forces with a view to the descent.

In the autumn of B.C. 55, Cæsar, embarking with the infantry of two legions (about 8,000 to 10,000 men) at the Portus Itius (somewhere in the Boulogne and Calais country), arrived with part of his fleet, after a passage of about ten hours, on the coast of Britain, and beheld the steep cliffs which skirted the shore covered with armed natives ready to dispute his landing. Judging this to be an unsuitable spot for his purpose, after a delay of several hours to enable the rest of his fleet to come up, he proceeded about seven miles farther, and prepared to disembark on the open and level beach which presented itself to him. The place at which Cæsar first touched was probably near the South Foreland, and he landed somewhere on the flat shore which extends from Walmer Castle towards Sandwich. Some, however, have tried to prove that it was Romney Marsh, or the neighbourhood of Hythe. He did not make good his landing without a severe struggle. The success of the invaders, however hardly earned, and though somewhat incomplete, disposed the natives to submission; but the dispersion in a storm of some vessels, which were bringing over the Roman cavalry, and the damage sustained by the fleet which had conveyed Cæsar, induced them to renew the contest, and to attempt, first, the surprise of one of the legions which had been sent out to forage, and next the attack of the Roman army. They were again beaten, and compelled to sue for peace; and Cæsar, anxious to return, contented himself with requiring an increased number of hostages, whom he commanded to be brought to him on the continent, for which he immediately embarked. Two of the British States sent their hostages: the rest did not.

On his return to the continent, Cæsar chastised the Morini, who had attacked some of his detachments, put his troops into winter quarters in Belgic Gaul, and then repaired to Cisalpine Gaul as usual. In this year Cæsar's government was extended for five years more by a Senatus Consultum.

THE CAMPAIGN OF B.C. 54; THE SECOND INVASION OF BRITAIN.

The next year, 54 B.C., Cæsar, after making an excursion into Illyricum, which formed also part of his government, returned into Gaul, where he had ordered a fleet to assemble at Portus Itius for a second attempt upon Britain. Meantime he visited the Treveri, the most powerful nation in cavalry in all Gaul. A dispute had arisen between Indutiomarus and Cingetorix about the supreme authority. Cæsar, knowing the latter to be well disposed to the Romans, supported his claims.

Immediately after this, Cæsar, embarking again at the Portus Itius, invaded Britain with a much larger force than the previous year. His fleet consisted of 800 vessels of all classes, including some which belonged to private individuals; and the natives who had assembled to oppose his landing, terrified at the magnitude of his armament, retired in alarm from the coast. He landed in the same place as on the former occasion; and setting out about midnight in pursuit of the natives, found them drawn up on the bank of a river (probably the Stour, near Canterbury), to oppose his further progress. His cavalry drove them into the woods in the rear of their position, and one of his legions (the seventh) stormed a stronghold, formed of timber, which had been formerly constructed probably in some domestic war. This stronghold is supposed by Horsley to have been subsequently the Roman station of Durovernum, now Canterbury. Intelligence that his fleet had been damaged by a storm obliged Cæsar to recall his troops from the pursuit of the enemy, and his own return to the coast to ascertain the extent of the damage and take measures for repairing it delayed his operations for some days. Upon his return to his former post he found that the natives had augmented their forces from all parts, and had entrusted the command-in-chief to Cassivellaunus (we use Cæsar's mode of writing the name, perhaps the native form of it was Cass-wallaun, or Caswallon), a prince whose territories were divided from the maritime States by the river Tamesis or Thames, at a part which was eighty Roman, or about seventy-four English, miles from the Kentish coast. This prince had been engaged previously in incessant wars with his neighbours; but the common danger compelled them to forego their disputes, and it is likely that his talents for war pointed him out as the most suitable person for general. But neither his caution and skill, nor the undaunted valour, nor the increased number of the Britons, enabled them to withstand the superior discipline and equipment of the Romans. After some severe but unsuccessful struggles, Cassivellaunus dismissed the greater part of his forces, detaining about 4,000 chariot-

.ers, whose skill in the management of their chariots rendered them very formidable, and retired, as it appears, into his own dominions across the Thames. That river was fordable only in one place in the line of Cæsar's advance; and the natives had planted stakes, sharpened at the point, on the bank and in the bed of the river. All obstacles were however overcome; Cæsar, crossing the river, put the enemy to flight, received the submission of several tribes, and took by storm the town of Cassivellaunus. These disasters, combined with the entire defeat of the princes of Cantium (Kent) in an attack upon the maritime camp, which the Romans had formed to protect their fleet, induced Cassivellaunus to submit. The conqueror demanded hostages, fixed a tribute to be paid by the subject Britons, and returned to Gaul with all his forces and a number of captives.

On his return to the continent he repaired to Samarobriua (Amiens), where he held a council of the Gaulish deputies. On account of the bad harvest and scarcity of provisions he was obliged to disperse his legions in various parts of the country for the winter.

This proved nearly fatal to the Roman arms. Cæsar himself remained in Belgic Gaul to see his legions properly quartered. A fortnight only had elapsed when the Eburones (Tongres), excited by Induciomarus, revolted, and attacked the camp of Titurius Sabinus and L. Cotta, who had one legion and five cohorts with them. Ambiorix, King of the Eburones, alarmed Sabinus by telling him that the whole country was in arms, and that the Germans were coming. Much against Cotta's opinion, Sabinus resolved on retiring towards the next Roman garrison, which was exactly what Ambiorix wanted. The Romans were attacked on their march by numerous forces, surrounded, and all cut to pieces.

Ambiorix, elated with this success, next attacked the camp of Quintus Cicero, brother to the orator, who was stationed with one legion in the country of the Nervii. Quintus made a brave defence. After several days' siege, the Gauls threw combustibles into the camp, and set fire to the huts of the soldiers, which were thatched after the Gaulish fashion. At the same time the Gauls advanced to scale the ramparts. But the legionaries stood firm at their post, and Cæsar, having at last received news, through a Gaulish slave, of the danger of his men, marched with two legions to their relief, defeated the Gauls, and entered Cicero's camp, where he found not one-tenth of the soldiers free from wounds. He praised Cicero, he praised the men, he spoke of the catastrophe of Sabinus and Cotta as a consequence of imprudence and a lesson to other commanders. He then resolved to pass the winter in Gaul, and stationed himself with three legions at Samarobriua. Induciomarus, having attacked Labienus, was defeated and killed.

THE CAMPAIGN OF B.C. 53.

The following year, B.C. 53, which was the sixth of Cæsar's government, symptoms of general disaffection manifested themselves throughout Gaul. The people had been overawed, but not subdued. The harshness and rapacity of the conquerors made the Gauls wish to throw off the yoke; but all their attempts were detached and partial, and they failed, after giving, however, full employment to the Romans. It was a year of desultory though destructive warfare.

Cæsar obtained of Pompey the loan of one legion, and had recruited one legion more in the Cisalpine province. He had now ten legions—sixty thousand men—under his orders, which was considered a large Roman army. He first defeated the Senones, the Nervii, and the Menapii; the Treveri were defeated by Labienus. Cæsar then crossed the Rhine again from the country of the Treveri, having constructed a new bridge a little below the former one. He expected that the Suevi would attack him, but that wary people withdrew inland to the entrance of the great forest called Bacenis (the Hartz?), which lay between their territory and that of the Cherusci, and there waited for Cæsar to advance. But the Roman avoided the snare, and withdrew his army across the Rhine, leaving part of the bridge standing for a future occasion.

The disturbance which occurred at Rome in consequence of the murder of Clodius made Cæsar turn his attention towards that quarter, and he raised troops in every part of the Cisalpine province.

The Transalpine Gauls, exasperated as they were by the execution of Acce and Cæsar's fearful vengeance upon the Eburones, thought the time was now come for making one great effort while Cæsar was engaged in Italy. The Carnutes began by massacring all the Romans whom they found in the town of Genabum (Orleans). Vercingetorix, a young man of one of the first families of the Arverni, was placed at the head of a confederacy of the whole of Celtic Gaul. The Bituriges joined the league, and the Ædui themselves wavered in their allegiance.

THE CAMPAIGN OF B.C. 52.

Cæsar, hearing this news, and seeing that the affairs of Rome had, through Pompey's influence, assumed a quieter aspect, set off in the middle of winter (beginning of B.C. 52) for the province of Ulterior Gaul, repaired to Narbo, which was threatened by the Gauls, and having collected some troops, crossed the Cebenna, and spread alarm through the country of the Arverni, who hastily recalled Vercingetorix to their defence. Having thus effected his object of causing a division, Cæsar moved quickly northwards to the country of the Lingones, from whence he went through the Carnutes, attacked and took Vellaunodunum, Genabum, and Noviodunum.

Vercingetorix, in a great council of the chiefs, advised, as the only means of harassing the Romans, to burn and destroy the whole country around them. This was executed in the country of the Bituriges, the villages and town of which were set on fire, except the town of Avaricum (Bruges), which was garrisoned by the Gauls. Cæsar laid siege to Avaricum, and took it after a most brave defence, when the Roman soldiers killed all old men, women, and children. The next siege was that of Gergovia (near Clermont, in Auvergne), which, after a murderous attempt to storm the place, Cæsar was obliged to raise. The Ædui, till then the firmest ally of Rome, had now thrown off the mask, joined the league, massacred the Romans at Noviodunum (Nevers), and seized the depôts, the baggage, and the treasury, which Cæsar had deposited there.

Cæsar's next movement was to the north, into the country of the Senones, in order to join Labienus and the legions under him. The defection of the Ædui rendered Cæsar's position in the centre of Gaul very difficult. Having effected a junction with Labienus, he directed his march towards the Lingones and the Sequani. Meantime, he was enabled to collect a body of German cavalry from beyond the Rhine, which was of the greatest service to him during the rest of the campaign. Vercingetorix, who followed Cæsar closely, had his cavalry defeated by these new auxiliaries of the Romans, upon which he retired to Alesia (now a village called Saint Reine, and also Alise, near Flavigny and Semur, about ten leagues north-west of Dijon). Cæsar immediately invested the place, and began his lines of circumvallation.

The whole forces of the Gallic confederation, stated at about 300,000, advanced to the relief of Alesia. Cæsar found himself besieged in his own lines, having to fight Vercingetorix from within and the confederates from without. After a desperate battle, in which the Gauls penetrated into the Roman intrenchments, they were at last repulsed by Cæsar, who was well supported by his lieutenant Labienus. The Gaulish confederates, having sustained a tremendous loss, broke up the camp and returned home. Next day Vercingetorix assembled his council in Alesia, and offered to devote himself to save their lives by giving up himself to Cæsar. Alesia surrendered, and Vercingetorix was afterwards taken to Rome. Several years after he walked before the triumphal car of his conqueror, after which he was put to death in prison.

The Ædui and the Arverni now made their submission to Cæsar, who took their hostages and restored their prisoners. After putting his army into winter quarters he stationed himself at Bibracte for the winter. This was the hardest-fought campaign of all the Gallic war.

CÆSAR'S EIGHTH AND LAST CAMPAIGN IN GAUL, B.C. 51.

Cæsar's eighth and last campaign in Gaul—

that of B.C. 51—is related by Hirtius, who has continued his “Commentaries” by writing an eighth, or supplementary book. After the great but unsuccessful exertions of the Gauls in the preceding year, their spirit was broken, but they still made some expiring efforts. Cæsar easily defeated the Carnutes, when his soldiers made an immense booty. He had more trouble with the Bellovaci (Beauvais), a Belgic nation, who at last submitted and gave hostages, all except Comius, the chief of the Atrebatæ, who had once been a friend to Cæsar. He had joined in the general revolt of the preceding year in consequence of his life having been attempted by Labienus, who sent to him Volusenus Quadratus, under pretence of a conference, but in reality with orders to kill him. During the interview a centurion of Volusenus’ escort struck Comius and wounded him on the head, when the Gaulish escort interposed and saved Comius’ life. From that time Comius swore he would never trust himself to a Roman. This disgraceful transaction, not mentioned by Cæsar, is related by Hirtius.

A revolt in Western Gaul was quelled by C. Fabius, who subjected all Armorica. Gutruatus, chief of the Carnutes, who had joined in the revolt, was taken to Cæsar’s camp, whipped with rods till he fainted, and then beheaded. Hirtius says that this inhuman act, repugnant to Cæsar’s nature, was forced upon him by the clamour of his soldiers.

Cæsar next besieged and took Uxellodunum, a stronghold of the Cadurei (Cahors). Here Cæsar’s clemency, which Hirtius repeatedly extols, did not prevent him from sentencing all the men who had shared in the defence of Uxellodunum to have their hands chopped off. Cæsar next entered Aquitania, the people of which gave hostages. From thence he repaired to Narbo, and there he distributed his army in winter quarters. He placed four legions among the Belgæ, under M. Antonius, afterwards the celebrated triumvir, Trebonius, Vatinius, and Q. Tullius Cicero; two among the Ædi; two among the Turones, and two among the Lemovices, near the borders of the Arverni. He then visited the Provincia, held the courts, distributed rewards, and went to winter at Nemetocenna (Arras). During the winter he endeavoured to heal in some measure the wounds which he had inflicted upon the unfortunate countries of Gaul. He tried to conciliate the principal inhabitants by large rewards, treated the people with kindness, established no new taxes, and by rendering the Roman yoke smooth and light, he succeeded in pacifying Gaul, exhausted as it was by so long a struggle.

IN ITALY; CROSSING THE RUBICON.

In the spring of 51 B.C. he set off for Italy, where he was received by all the municipal towns and colonies of his government with great rejoicings. On his return to Belgic Gaul he reviewed his troops, and soon after returned to the north of Italy, where the dissensions between him and the senate had begun which led to the civil war. This was the ninth and last year of Cæsar’s government of the Gauls.

Before the close of his Gallic campaign, Cæsar had probably determined not to divest himself of the command of his army. He feared, and apparently with good reason, that if he were once in the power of his enemies at Rome, his life would be in danger. His connection with Pompey had been dissolved by the death of Julia without any surviving off-spring, and by the growing jealousy and fear with which his success in Gaul and his popularity with his army had filled all the aristocratical party. Cæsar’s object now was to obtain the consulship a second time, and a special enactment had been already passed enabling him to stand for the consulship in his absence. But Pompey, who at last was roused from his lethargy, prevailed upon the senate to require him to give up the command of the army, and come to Rome in person to be a candidate.

Cæsar, who was now at Ravenna, in his province of Gallia Cisalpina, sent Curio to Rome with a letter expressed in strong terms, in which he proposed to give up his army and come to the city if Pompey would also give up the command of the troops which he had. These troops of Pompey comprised two legions, which had been taken from Cæsar, and by a decree of the senate were designed for the Parthian war, but had been illegally put into the hands of Pompey by Marcellus the Consul.

The senate, acting under the influence of Pompey and Metellus Scipio, whose daughter Pompey had married, passed a decree that Cæsar should give up his army by a certain day or be considered an enemy to the State. The Tribunes, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, the friends of Cæsar, attempted to oppose the measure by their intercession, which was perfectly legal; but their opposition was treated with contempt, and thus they gained—what they were probably not sorry to have—a good excuse for hurrying to Cæsar with the news.

Upon receiving the intelligence Cæsar crossed the Rubicon, a small stream which formed the southern limit of his province, and directed his march to the south. Some writers tell how he hesitated on the banks of the Rubicon, and how, at last, after hours of deliberation, he rose up with the exclamation, "Jacta est alea"—"the die is cast!"—and passed the river. The story is such a one as a rhetorician would invent, but it is one also which may have been handed down as a true tradition.

The city was filled with confusion; councils were divided and hesitating; and Pompey, who was the Commander-in-Chief on the side of the senate, was unprovided with troops to oppose the veterans of the Gallic wars. Domitius, who had thrown himself into Corfinium to defend the place, was given up to Cæsar by his soldiers, who joined the invading army. The alarm now became still greater, and it was resolved by the senatorial party to pass into Greece, and for the present to leave Italy at the mercy of Cæsar's legions. Pompey, with a large part of the Senate and his forces, hurried to Brundisium, whence he succeeded in making good his escape to Dyrrachium, in Epirus, though Cæsar had reached the town some days before Pompey had left it.

From Brundisium Cæsar advanced to Rome, where he met with no opposition. The senate was assembled, with due regard to forms, to pass some ordinances, and there was little or nothing to mark the great change that had taken place except Cæsar's possessing himself of the public money, which the other party in their hurry had left behind.

His next movement was into Spain, where Pompey's party was strong, and where Afranius and Petreius were at the head of eight legions. After completely subduing this important province, Cæsar, on his return, took the town of Massilia (Marseilles), the siege of which had been commenced on his march to Spain. This ancient city, the seat of the arts and of polite learning, had professed a wish to maintain a neutral position between the two rival parties and their respective leaders. We might infer from one passage in Strabo, that Marseilles suffered severely either during or immediately after the siege; but another passage seems to imply that the conqueror used his victory with moderation.

CÆSAR ASSUMES THE TITLE OF DICTATOR.

The title of Dictator was assumed by Cæsar on his return to Rome; but he made no further use of the power which it was supposed to confer than to nominate himself and Servilius Consuls for the following year (B.C. 48).

The campaign of the year 48 B.C. completed the destruction of the senatorial party. It is given at length in the third book of the Civil Wars (where, however, there appears to be a considerable lacuna), and comprises the operations of Cæsar and Pompey at Dyrrachium (now Durazzo) and the subsequent defeat of Pompey on the great plain of Pharsalus in Thessaly. Surrounded by nearly two hundred senators, who acted like a controlling council, with an army mainly composed of raw undisciplined recruits, the Commander-in-Chief, whose previous reputation was more due to fortune than to merit, was an unequal match for soldiers hardened by eight years' campaigns, and directed by the energies of one skilful general.

It seems difficult to comprehend the movements of Pompey after the battle. He turned his face to the east, once the scene of his conquests; but he had no friends on whom he could rely, and instead of going to Syria, as he at first intended, he was compelled to change his course, and accordingly he sailed to Pelusium, in the Delta of Egypt. Cæsar, who had pursued him with incredible celerity, arrived a little after Pompey had been treacherously murdered by Achilles, the commander of the troops of the young King Ptolemy, and L. Septimius, a Roman, who had served under Pompey in the war with the pirates. Pompey was fifty-eight years old at the time of his death.

AFTER THE DEATH OF POMPEY.

The events which followed the death of Pompey need only be rapidly glanced at. The disputes in the royal family of Egypt, and the interference of Cæsar, brought on a contest between the Romans and the King's troops, which ended in a new settlement of the kingdom by the Roman general. Here Cæsar formed an intimacy with Cleopatra, then in her twenty-third year.

By her father's will Cleopatra and her elder brother were to be joint sovereigns of Egypt, but they soon disagreed, and Cleopatra was obliged to take refuge in Syria. In B.C. 48, when Julius Cæsar arrived in Egypt, the youthful queen, who probably knew the character of the Dictator, contrived to get herself privately conveyed into his presence, and by her fascinating manners completely gained his favour. Though not remarkable for beauty, according to the testimony of ancient writers, which is confirmed by her medals, she possessed great natural abilities, which had been carefully cultivated. She is said to have spoken with facility several languages, besides her native Greek; a circumstance in itself well calculated to give an artful woman a great ascendancy over all with whom she came in contact. Cæsar decided that Cleopatra should be restored to her equal share of power. This decision giving dissatisfaction to the young prince and his advisers, led to an attack upon Cæsar's quarters under Achilles, the commander of the King's troops. After a blockade of some months Cæsar received reinforcements, and completely defeated the party of the King, who was drowned in the Nile. The sovereign power was now given by Cæsar, in conformity with the meaning of Ptolemy's will, to Cleopatra and her younger brother Ptolemy. On Cæsar's return to Rome, Cleopatra shortly after followed him, and remained there till his assassination (B.C. 44), when she hastily quitted the city and returned to Egypt. With her subsequent history every one is familiar. We may add that she had by Julius Cæsar a son, who was put to death by Octavianus.

Early in the following year, B.C. 47, Cæsar marched into the province of Pontus and entirely defeated Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates, who had exercised great cruelties on the Roman citizens in Asia. He returned to Italy in autumn, by way of Athens. At Brundisium he was met by Cicero, who was glad to make his peace, and had no reason to be dissatisfied with his reception.

On his return to Rome, Cæsar was named Dictator for one year, and Consul for the following year with Lepidus. During the winter he crossed over into Africa, where the party of Pontus had rallied under Scipio, gained a complete victory at the battle of Thapsus, and was again at Rome in the autumn of B.C. 46.

In the year B.C. 45 Cæsar was sole Consul and Dictator for the third time. During the greater part of this year he was absent in Spain, where Cn. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great, had raised a considerable force and was in possession of the southern part of the Peninsula. The great battle of Munda, in which 30,000 men are said to have fallen on the side of Pompey, terminated the campaigns of Cæsar. Pompey was taken after the battle, and his head was carried to Cæsar, who was then at Hispalis (Seville). On his return to Rome Cæsar was created Consul for ten years, and Dictator for life.

THE FATAL IDES OF MARCH.

The universal opinion among the free States of antiquity in favour of tyrannicide caused a life like Cæsar's to be held ever at the dagger's point, and some even of his leading adherents had been accused of plotting his murder. The conspiracy to which he at length fell a victim was concocted by men of all parties in the State—the old nobles, who had been his enemies from the first, and nearly all of whom owed their position or their life to his clemency; his own adherents, some of whom allowed petty disappointments to outweigh all the favours he had heaped upon them, while others were still receiving honours and governments at his hands; and if there were in the number any genuine patriots, the sense of shame and gratitude might have made them hold their hands. "The tradition," it has been well observed, "which represents this medley knot of conspirators as a band of stern vindicators of liberty is so untrue to history that it can only have had its source in the instinctive hatred of the principle of tyranny." The conspirators were about sixty, or, according to some, eighty in number. The prime mover of the plot was C. Cassius Longinus, who had distinguished himself as commander of the Pompeian fleet, and who had submitted to Cæsar soon after the battle of Pharsalia. The semblance of patriotic vengeance was supplied by Marcus Junius Brutus, the son-in-law and panegyrist of Cato.

The fatal deed was done on the Ides of March (March 15th, B.C. 44), a day for which the senate was convened on the eve of Cæsar's departure for the East. Hints of a plot in which so many were engaged could not but get abroad, and some of them reached Cæsar. His wonted magnanimity seems to have mingled with that calm acquiescence in approaching fate which has often characterised the coming end of great men. His Epicurean philosophy, confessing no terrors beyond the grave, was consistent in forbidding life to be marred by the fear of death; and on the very evening preceding his fall he had replied to the question started at table, "What kind of death is the best?" by saying, "That which is least expected." If, however, we may credit the uniform tradition of antiquity, the remnant of Roman superstition in Cæsar's mind was moved by a dreadful dream of his wife Calphurnia, and by the unfavourable auspices which the victims presented in the morning. That was not all, for there were other prodigies which it has greatly exercised the ingenuity of historians and others to attempt to explain.

"The senate," to quote from the Ancient History of Mr. Philip Smith, "was summoned to meet in the Curia of Pompey, a hall adjacent to his theatre; and those of the conspirators who were not already in attendance upon Cæsar were waiting in the portico of that edifice, with daggers concealed beneath their cloaks. They crowded about him as he entered the hall, while Trebonius detained Anthony in conversation at the door. Cæsar took his seat, and Tullius Cimber approached him to present a petition for his brother's pardon. Under the pretence of joining in the supplication, the conspirators grasped Cæsar's hands, and Cimber pulled his toga over his arms. At this signal Casca struck the first blow. It only grazed Cæsar's shoulder, and releasing one of his arms he seized the hilt of Casca's dagger. For a moment he defended himself with his stilus, and wounded one of his assailants. But at the sight of Brutus among his murderers, he exclaimed, "Et tu, Brute!"—"Thou too, Brutus!"—drew his toga over his face, and ceased resistance, while the conspirators fulfilled the oath they had sworn, that each one of them would bathe his dagger in the Dictator's blood. Supported for an instant by the blows struck at him from every side, he staggered a few paces, and fell on a spot which seemed chosen by the very irony of fate:—

"Even at the base of Pompey's statue,
Which all the while ran blood, great Cæsar fell."

THE CHARACTER AND WORKS OF CÆSAR.

Cæsar did not live long enough after acquiring the sovereign power to rebuild the crazy fabric of Roman polity which he had demolished in fact though not in form. But a State which had long been torn in pieces by opposing factions, whose constitutional form served rather to cherish discord than to promote that general unity of interests without which no government can subsist, whose life and property were exposed to constant risk, could find no repose except under the head. A bloody period followed the death of Cæsar, but the fortune of his name and family at last prevailed, and Rome and the world were happier under the worst of his successors than during the latter years of the so-called Republic.

The energy of Cæsar's character, his personal accomplishments and courage, his talents for war, and his capacity for civil affairs, combine to render him one of the most remarkable men the world has ever seen. Though a lover of pleasure and a man of licentious habits, he never neglected what was a matter of business. He began that active career which has immortalized his name when he was forty years of age, a time of life when ordinary men's powers of enterprise are deadened or extinguished.

As a writer and an orator he has received the highest praise from Cicero. His Commentaries, written in a plain, perspicuous style, entirely free from all affectation, place him in the same class with Xenophon and those few individuals who have successfully united the pursuit of letters and philosophy with the business of active life.

His projects were vast and magnificent: he seems to have formed designs far beyond what the ability of one man could execute, or the longest life could expect to see realized. His reform of the Roman calendar, under the direction of Sosigenes, and his intended consolidation of the then almost unmanageable body of Roman law, do credit to his judgment. He established public libraries, and gave to the learned Varro the care of collecting and arranging the books.

Cæsar was far from robust in constitution. He was of a slender make, fair, decidedly delicate, and subject to violent headaches and epileptic fits. He did not, however, make these disorders a pretext for indulging himself; on the contrary, he sought in war a remedy for his infirmities, endeavouring to strengthen his system by long marches, by simple diet, by seldom going under covert. Thus he contended against his epileptic tendency, and fortified himself against its attacks.

Some anecdotes that have been preserved give us an interesting insight into the daily life and habits of this great general. When he slept it was commonly upon a march, either in a chariot or a litter, that rest might be no hindrance to business. In the daytime he visited the castles, cities, and fortified camps, with a servant at his side, whom he employed on such occasions to write for him, and with a soldier behind who carried his sword.

He was a good horseman in his early years, and brought that exercise to such perfection by practice, that he could sit on a horse at full speed with his hands behind him. Of his indifference with respect to diet, the following proof is given. Happening to sup one evening with a friend, there was sweet ointment poured on the asparagus instead of oil. Cæsar ate of it freely, notwithstanding, and afterwards rebuked those at table for expressing their dislike of it. "It was enough," said he, "to forbear eating, if it was disagreeable to you. He who finds fault with any rusticity is a rustic himself."

The three books of the Civil War were written by Cæsar, but the single books on the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars are generally attributed to another hand, though it is not at all unlikely that Cæsar left the materials behind him. He wrote a number of other things, the publication of which Augustus suppressed.

PARENTAGE AND EARLY YOUTH.

THE most typical man of the "spacious times of Great Elizabeth," who exhibited in himself most of the varied characteristics which distinguished the great men of that remarkable period, is certainly Walter Raleigh. Soldier, mariner, courtier, scholar, historian, poet, and orator, author of a universal history, and founder of our colonial empire beyond the Atlantic, he represented worthily the military spirit which defied successfully the then colossal power of Spain, emulated the adventurous spirit of the Drakes and Frobishers, was a royal favourite even in the presence of Essex and Leicester, and a poct of repute in the age which produced Shakspeare and Spenser. Handsome in person, he united to the courage of a Paladin the graces of manner and speech which made him the leading figure of the most brilliant court ever known in England; and when misfortune came, his prison was illuminated with light from antiquity, and his spirit was cheered and ennobled by fellowship with the heroism of the past.

In the parish of East Budleigh, about four miles from Exmouth, Devonshire, and near the sea-coast, is a picturesque and solitary farmhouse still known as Hayes Barton. It has gable and portico, a thatched roof, mullioned windows, and a heavy arched door thickly studded with nails. At Hayes Barton, in 1552, when as yet the youthful Edward the Sixth reigned in England, was born the second son of Walter Raleigh—or Raleigh, Rawleigh, or Rawley, the name being variously spelt in the fashion of the uncertain orthography of the time—a Devonshire gentleman of good family, whose third wife (the mother of the infant to be named Walter in due time) was Catherine, daughter of Sir Philip Champernon, a descendant in the female line of the famous Carewe family, and widow of Otho Gilbert, an esquire of Compton, in Devonshire, by whom she was the mother of Humphrey Gilbert, afterwards so famous as a maritime adventurer, in conjunction with his half-brother, Walter Raleigh. The Raleighs were Protestants, had been so in the days when that faith involved danger, and maintained their principles when the evil days of persecution returned. Walter's mother, described by John Foxe, the martyrologist, as "a woman of noble wit, and of good and godly openness," had the courage to visit and speak words of consolation to a Protestant woman, Agnes Prest, imprisoned for conscience' sake in Exeter Jail, and afterwards burned at the stake. The records of the early boyhood of Walter are scarce. We know that he received his first schooling at Budleigh, and can well imagine that, if not one of the most plodding of the pupils in the little grammar-school, he was one of the most keen-witted, and a leader in boyish adventures of daring. His half-brother, Humphrey Gilbert, thirteen years older, no doubt influenced him, and together they listened to the rumours of gallant achievements by sea and land which reached their secluded home. The wondrous conquest of Mexico by Cortez was still fresh in the minds of men; the voyages of Sir John Hawkins were recent achievements; and young Raleigh, who read eagerly every book—there were not many accessible to him then, but there were broad-sheets and ballads commemorating rare exploits—that came in his way; and he burned with boyish eagerness to cross the seas, do battle with the Spanish power and policy, which were "the very type and embodiment of evil," and discover cities of gold, and magic fountains of perpetual youth.

At the age of sixteen—some biographers think two years earlier—Raleigh was entered as a commoner at Oriel College, Oxford, where he formed a friendship with Philip Sidney, a fellow student. He did not take a degree, but Anthony Wood, the historian of the University, says "he was worthily esteemed a proficient in oratory and philosophy."

SERVICE WITH THE HUGUENOTS.

He left college early in 1569, for the purpose of joining a company of young English gentlemen, who volunteered to assist the French Huguenots, under Condé and Coligni. A relation of Raleigh, by the mother's side, Henry Champernon, led the expedition. De Thou, the French historian, describes them as "a gallant company, nobly mounted and accoutred, having on their colours the motto, Finem det mihi virtus, and many of them rose afterwards to eminence, but the most noted of them all was Walter Raleigh." Young as he was, only seventeen, he was a prominent figure in the gallant troop, and distinguished himself by his courage in the battle of Jarnac (March 13, 1569), in which the Huguenots were defeated. Their leader, Prince Louis of Condé, was taken prisoner, and killed by order of the Duke d'Anjou, his kinsman, who paraded the dead body on an ass through the Catholic lines. On the 3rd of the following October, Raleigh was with the Huguenots, when they were defeated at Montcontour.

Raleigh has left us very little information respecting his six years' military service in France. Oppressed, beaten in many battles, desperate, the Protestant soldiers became nearly as ferocious as their enemies; and the young Englishmen, who shared their fortunes, perhaps also shared their ruthless spirit. Raleigh, after his return, did not probably think it necessary to talk much about the exploits achieved in hot blood; for, as with sagacious caution he remarks in his History of the World, "Whosoever, in writing a modern history, shall follow truth too near the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth." One incident is recorded which shows the character of the stern partisans with whom he was associated. In Languedoc, a Huguenot party discovered a hiding-place of Catholics, a cavern to which a number of refugees (the Huguenots being just then dominant in that part of the country) had fled, with provisions, plate, and jewellery. The Huguenot soldiers fired bundles of brushwood and straw at the entrance of the cave, and the Catholics, unable to endure the suffocating smoke, came out and surrendered themselves and all their property. Whether their lives were spared we know not; but probably their captain, having obtained possession of the rich spoil, was mercifully inclined.

In 1575, at the age of twenty-three, Raleigh returned to England, and entered his name as a student at the Middle Temple. We have no record of his life for the next two or three years; but we may suppose that the handsome and accomplished young Templar, who had seen service abroad, and who possessed such rare gifts of conversation and fascination of manner, was a welcome addition to the society of youthful scholars and men of fashion who made the Temple Gardens and Hall, and the adjacent taverns, their chosen meeting-places. His sympathy with the Protestant cause, and his dislike of Spain, feelings strengthened by his early education, were not diminished, and in 1578 he went as a volunteer in an English expedition under Sir John Norris, to the aid of the Prince of Orange, who had united the northern and southern provinces of Holland in a determined endeavour to shake off the Spanish yoke. He was present at the defeat of the Spaniards on Lammas Day, in that year, and then appears to have returned to England.

PROJECTED DISCOVERY OF A NORTH-WEST PASSAGE.

Raleigh's half-brother, Humphrey Gilbert, who had served in the Irish wars, and been knighted for his courage and ability, was at this time in London, and earnestly studying the possibility of discovering a north-west passage to China and India. Walter sympathized with the project, but his practical mind grafted on it other objects to be attained—the weakening of the Spanish power in the Western Continent and the foundation of British colonies. The result was the publication of “A Discourse on the Discovery of a New Passage to Cathay and the East Indies,” ostensibly to show the possibility of a north-west passage, but really to suggest an expedition, far more likely to receive general support. The “Discourse” was signed by Gilbert, but it is not difficult to discern the hand of Raleigh in the composition. Many Spanish, French, and Portuguese ships were employed in the fisheries off the coast of Newfoundland; and on reaching the “banks,” it was customary for the crews to take to their boats, or go on shore to cure the fish, leaving only a few hands on board. The “Discourse” proposed to make a dash at the unprotected vessels, take possession of them, return to Europe, and sell them, for the purpose of providing funds for fitting out a fleet, to be employed in attacking the Spanish possessions in America, and grouping them together as the “United Indies,” a splendid addition indeed to the English domains, could the project be realized. That it savoured considerably of piracy was no valid objection in the estimation of the navigators and adventurers of those days; and the exploits of Hawkins, Drake, and others are only divided by a very line, almost undistinguishable line, from the adventures of the buccaners. Gilbert and Raleigh shrewdly conjectured that the open announcement of the project would induce very active measures on the part of Spain against England for infringement of a treaty of peace then existing, and therefore it was probably suggested to Elizabeth that she should affect indignation, describe the writers of the “Discourse” as pirates and agents of the Prince of Orange, and some persons might even undergo a short imprisonment, so as to save the Government from the imputation of faithlessness. Thinking apparently that the Queen might entertain scruples, the writer added, “I hold it as lawful and Christian policy to prevent a mischief betimes, as to revenge it too late, especially seeing that God Himself is a party in the common quarrel now afoot.” This communication is preserved in the State Paper Office. There is a touch of Raleigh's elevated style in the concluding sentence, in which promptitude is urged: “If your Majesty like to do it at all, then would I wish your Highness to consider that delay doth oftentimes prevent the performance of good things, for the wings of man's life are plumed with the feathers of death.”

Elizabeth evidently privately approved of the enterprise, although she might not think it politic openly to patronize it; for she sanctioned the engagement in it of two of her relatives, Henry and Francis, sons of Sir Francis Knollys. Sir Humphrey Gilbert was the commander, and selected for his officers Walter Raleigh and his brother George, and Denny, one of their Devonshire cousins. By the end of the summer of 1570, a fleet of eleven ships, with five hundred mariners and soldiers, was collected on the Devonshire coast, a force evidently much too large for the proposed search for a north-west passage. Indeed, very little concealment of the real purpose of the expedition seems to have been attempted. While preparing for the voyage, discord broke out among the chiefs. The Knollyses were arrogant and overbearing, paying little respect to the nominal leader; and the crews, composed chiefly of reckless and profligate adventurers, brawled and rioted in the streets of Plymouth, the disturbances leading to murder. The Lord Lieutenant of the county, the Earl of Bedford, demanded that the murderers should be delivered over to the civil power, but Henry Knollys, to whose ship they belonged, set the authorities at defiance. The quarrels between Gilbert and the Knollyses, who persuaded Denny to take their side, reached such a height, that the former appealed to the Mayor of Plymouth, who decided in his favour, the result being that the Knollyses and Denny sailed away with four ships on a piratical expedition on their own account. The Queen approved of Gilbert's conduct; and on the 19th November, the expedition, with seven ships and three hundred and fifty men, sailed from Plymouth.

The idea of capturing the fishing vessels off Newfoundland appears to have been abandoned, perhaps was expressly forbidden by the Queen; and the West Indies were the destination of the fleet. In the following spring, a Spanish fleet was encountered, and a sharp action ensued. The adventurers were beaten with great loss, one of the best officers, Captain Miles Morgan (whom Henry Knollys had threatened to hang at the yard-arm when at Plymouth), being among the killed. Gilbert and Raleigh, thus discomfited, returned to England. Their designs were not abandoned, but only postponed until a more favourable opportunity.

SERVICE IN THE IRISH WARS.

The energetic mind of Raleigh could not rust inactively. A new field was offered for enterprise. In February, 1580, he obtained the captaincy of a troop of a hundred men, and started for Ireland. An insurrection, headed by the Earl of Desmond, and encouraged, it was suspected, by agents of Philip, the Spanish king, had broken out in Munster, and assistance from England was urgently demanded. Men were enlisted and despatched in haste; but so little provision was made, that when Raleigh reached Cork, the Irish authorities refused to pay his men, whom he was obliged to satisfy from his private means, probably not very abundant after the losses incurred by the failure of Gilbert's expedition. In August, he was associated with Sir Warham St. Leger, provost-marshal of Munster, for the trial of James Desmond, brother of the Earl, who was executed as a traitor. The insurgent Irish were little better than savages, and their barbarities in warfare were appalling. Then, as in later times, Ireland was almost the despair of English politicians. There was an ineradicable animosity between the conquered and the conquerors; and the descendants of the English settlers who had become allied by marriage with the Irish race, were, as it has been said, "more Irish than the Irish themselves." Raleigh speaks of Ireland as "that lost land, that commonwealth of common woe;" and the only method of government English statesmen and soldiers could conceive possible was the most stringent coercion, and extermination by slaughter of the disaffected. Raleigh and other officers showed little mercy to those who fell into their hands. The chief command was held by Sir William Pelham, a man of small ability either as statesman or soldier; and soon nearly the whole island was in a state of insurrection. Pelham was superseded by Lord Arthur Grey of Walton, a man of the sternest Puritan type, rigid in doctrine, uncompromising in his hatred of Papistry, and merciless to his opponents. His private secretary, the poet Edmund Spenser (with that peculiar if somewhat abject gift of perceiving all virtues in patrons, which was the moral weakness of that age of genius) describes Grey as "a most gentle, affable, loving, and temperate lord." If so in England, he certainly changed his nature when he crossed St. George's Channel. He soon discerned the military qualities of Raleigh, and employed him in various services where resolution and activity were demanded. On one of these occasions he was sent to take possession of the castle and lands of Lord Barry, of Barry Court, Cork. The rebels formed an ambush on the road, and it was only by the desperate valour of Raleigh that his little band was saved. He was unhorsed, and for a time, armed only with a pistol, kept twenty of the enemy at bay.

We now approach the most painful incident connected with Raleigh's Irish career. The Fort del Oro, on the shore of Smerwick Bay, Kerry, was garrisoned by six or seven hundred Spaniards and Italians, who had come across the sea to aid the insurgents. Lord Grey determined to attempt the capture of the fort, and arranged with Admiral Winter for a joint attack by land and sea. The garrison was twice summoned to surrender, but the Italian commander, San Giuseppa, replied "they were there by command of the Pope, who had taken Ireland from his (Grey's) heretical mistress, and given it to the king of Spain." Irritated by the answer, Grey gave orders for a vigorous bombardment by land and sea, which was so effective that a white flag was shown from the fort, and a messenger was sent to the English commander to tell him that the garrison found they had been deceived, and would yield the fort and return to their own country. Grey replied that they must yield without conditions, and surrender themselves as prisoners, to be disposed of as he thought fit. On the following morning San Giuseppa and his principal officers came bare-headed to the English camp, and were permitted to return with the understanding that they would receive honourable treatment on the formal surrender of the fort, which was to take place on the following day. Early in the morning, sailors from the fleet were landed, and a band of soldiers commanded by Raleigh and another captain, Macworth, entered the fort; and then followed a terrible scene of massacre. The surprised and unarmed soldiers of the garrison, defenceless, in the belief that they would be honourably treated as prisoners of war, were ruthlessly slaughtered, only a few of the officers being spared, in order that the murderers might be enriched by the sums paid for their ransom. There is no evidence that Raleigh shared in this disgraceful spoil; but it is impossible to acquit him of the guilt, not to be palliated by the plea of obeying orders, of being the chief agent in the commission of the ruthless deed. Spenser justified it on the ground that "the short way was the only way to dispose of them;" and Grey calmly reported to the government at home, "I put in certain bands, who straightway fell to execution: there were six hundred slain." Queen Elizabeth replied with equal callousness, thanking him for "the enterprise performed by you, so greatly to our liking."

Shortly afterwards the government of Munster was entrusted by commission to Raleigh, in conjunction with Sir W. Morgan and another. He established his head-quarter first at Lismore, and afterwards at Cork, near which he engaged in a sharp action with a band of rebels, and had his horse shot under him. He displayed remarkable valour, but would have been killed had it not been for the courage of his servant, Nicholas Wright, a Yorkshireman, who rescued him at the risk of his own life.

AT ELIZABETH'S COURT.

In December, 1581, he returned to England, whither his reputation had preceded him. It is said that Lord Grey returned at the same time, and that differences which had arisen between them were discussed at the Council board, in the presence of the Queen, and that Raleigh maintained his views with such eloquence and grace of manner, that he got the Queen's ear "in a trice." It is now known, however, that Grey did not return at the same time, and Raleigh's sudden rise into Court favour was due to other causes. Neither need we place much reliance on the often-told story of Raleigh's throwing down his richly embroidered cloak for the Queen to step on when crossing a muddy path. That Raleigh, or, indeed, any of the young gentlemen about the Court, and ambitious of royal favour, would have done as much or more in that age of fantastic gallantry and obsequious loyalty, is likely enough, but the anecdote rests on a very slight foundation of authority.

We need not, indeed, look far for a reason besides the value of his services in Ireland, why Raleigh should be well received at Court. He was, indeed, remotely connected with Elizabeth's family; for her relative, Lord Hunston, was also related to Raleigh. Mrs. Catherine Ashley, the governess, intimate friend, and confidant of Elizabeth when a girl, was his mother's sister-in-law, and aunt of Sir Humphrey Gilbert; and among his other relatives were Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, husband of Mary Sidney, Lord Howard, of Effingham, and other noblemen and gentlemen holding high offices at Court. It must be admitted, too, that he was eminently qualified by person, attainments, and taste for splendour, to occupy an exalted position in the distinguished group which surrounded Elizabeth at Greenwich or Whitehall. Tall and strikingly handsome, his form, developed by manly exercises, was at once strong and graceful; and his facile and winning speech, his vast store of information, never ostentatiously displayed, but always ready when occasion demanded, his quick wit, and readiness in all the arts of adroit and poetic flattery then so fashionable and so acceptable to the Queen, marked him as a candidate for special favour; and soon the whispers of the courtly circle intimated that possibly a powerful rival to the impetuous Essex and the ambitious Dudley would be found in the person of the gallant young adventurer, who already outstripped all competitors in splendour of dress and gallantry of manner. Miss Strickland, in her biography of Queen Elizabeth, says, "So varied, so brilliant, were the talents of Raleigh, as soldier, seaman, statesman, poet, philosopher, and wit, that it would have been wonderful if a woman so peculiarly susceptible as Elizabeth had not felt the power of his fascinations." The Queen was at this time forty-nine years of age, and Raleigh was thirty.

On his part, Raleigh was not slow to avail himself of the advantages of the favourable position he had attained. His ambitious spirit was restrained by few scruples of modesty in asking for gifts. He was determined to rise in the world, and saw that wealth and influence were means of helping him towards that end. We may well believe that his ultimate aims were large and not sordid, and that his ambition was to be associated with great achievements; indeed, the whole tenor of his life justifies us in assuming so much. The doctrine that the end justifies the means was at that time widely accepted, and certainly Raleigh was not disposed to repudiate it in cases where no flagrant departure from principles of morality was involved.

Elizabeth, proud and sensitive, was annoyed when her partiality was noticed, and took occasion to speak abruptly, almost rudely, to those whom really she most favoured. Raleigh knew her humour, received the "snub" with profound deference, but continued to ask for gifts and promotion, and the Queen continued to confer them. "If," says a contemporary writer, "anything was to be given away, he lost no time in soliciting it of the Queen, to the infinite displeasure of his jealous compeers. Elizabeth herself sometimes was impatient." "When will you cease to be a beggar, Raleigh?" she once said. "When, Madam, you cease to be a benefactress," was the ready reply. Sometimes, indeed, he presumed on her favour, as on one occasion, when the Queen going to Croydon, he took possession of the apartments prepared for Sir Christopher Hatton, the Vice-Chamberlain, who complained to Elizabeth that he could not therefore attend on her as his office required. The Queen was angry, and wrote to Sir Christopher, saying she would "rather see Raleigh hanged than equal him with Hatton, or that the world should think she did." That a man so shrewd and experienced as Raleigh would have ventured so far, had he not been encouraged by Elizabeth herself, is not probable; and an anecdote often told appears to be authentic. Raleigh wrote with a diamond on a pane of glass, taking care that she should see him, in the Queen's apartments, "Fain would I rise, but that I fear to fall;" to which she added, "If thy heart fail thee, do not climb at all." Instigated by the jealousy of the courtiers, Tarleton, the jester, in a play performed at Court, ventured to point at Raleigh when saying the words, "See! the knave commands the Queen;" for which piece of audacity he was disgraced and punished.

He received another military appointment in Ireland; but the Queen, because "he is for so many considerations by us licensed to stay here," permitted the duties to be performed by deputy, and he was allowed to appoint lieutenants, who were to be "obeyed as he himself would be." His appointment was very distasteful to Lord Grey, who wrote to Walsingham, "As to Captain Raleigh, I neither like his carriage nor his company, and therefore, other than by direction and commandment, and what his rights require, he is not to expect from my hands." Three months afterwards Grey ceased to be Lord Deputy of Ireland, probably by Raleigh's influence.

On one occasion Raleigh got into trouble by engaging in a quarrel, within the Court precincts, with Sir Thomas Perrot, a fiery young man, who probably resented some little display of arrogance on the part of the favourite. The Lords of the Council sent them both to the Fleet prison, where they remained for six days, and then were released, on entering into bonds to keep the peace.

This escapade did not hinder honour and emoluments being showered upon him. He was made captain of the guard, seneschal of the county of Cornwall, and lord warden of the stannaries, and received a grant of twelve thousand acres of the forfeited estates in Ireland of the Earl of Desmond, and a lucrative patent, or monopoly, for licensing keepers of taverns and rectifying wines throughout the kingdom. Afterwards the estate of Anthony Babington, executed for conspiracy, was conferred on him. At all joustings, pageants, and royal progresses Raleigh accompanied the Queen.

"Music and poetry were her delight,
Therefore she had Italian masques by night,
Sweet speeches, comedies, and pleasing strains."

That she permitted Raleigh to address her in the fantastic style of romantic love-making then a fashion among Court gallants and their lady loves, can scarcely be doubted. It was well understood that the Queen and Sir Walter were the "Belphæbe" and "Timon" of Spenser's immortal Faerie Queen. Timon is wounded in battle, and lies in sore plight on the ground, where he is found by Belphebe and her damsels, who take him to "their dwelling in a pleasant glade." "And what could he do," asks the poet, "but love so fair a lady that his life release?" Afterwards Belphebe discovers that there is another lady, "Amoret," better loved than herself, and who this Amoret is we shall presently see.

SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT'S VOYAGE.

The pleasures and splendour of Court life did not induce Raleigh to forget his favourite scheme of establishing colonies in North America. Early in 1683, Sir Humphrey Gilbert determined to make another attempt to avail himself of the patent obtained five years before; and Raleigh was now in a position to assist him materially, by contributing two thousand pounds towards the equipment of a vessel. The Queen was graciously pleased to approve of the expedition, and sent Gilbert, as a mark of her favour, a golden anchor, to be worn at his heart,—"the only contribution," remarks a modern writer, "of the great princess to an expedition intended to transplant the arts of England to the waste regions of the new world." The expedition started from Plymouth on the 11th of June; but two days after sailing, the vessel Raleigh had equipped, and which bore his name, returned to port, the reason given being that an infectious fever had broken out among the crew. Gilbert either did not know of this excuse, or did not believe it, for on arriving at Newfoundland, he wrote, "On the 13th, the bark Raleigh ran from me, in fair and clear weather, having a large wind. I pray you to solicit my brother Raleigh to make them an example to all knaves." He reached Newfoundland with five ships, and then sailed southwards. Two of the vessels were wrecked, and Gilbert himself perished. He was a man of true heroic cast of mind; and when last seen by those on board the other ships, who were unable to render aid, sitting calmly with a Bible in his hand, he was heard to say to his men, "Be of good heart, my friends; we are as near heaven by sea as by land." The following night the lights of the ship suddenly disappeared. Longfellow has written a striking poem on the subject.

THE FIRST EXPEDITION TO VIRGINIA.

Raleigh was not discouraged by the fate of his half-brother; but when the remaining ships arrived in England with the sad news, he obtained another charter, incorporating himself, Adrian Gilbert, and John Davys as "The College of the Fellowship for the Discovery of the North-West Passage." But colonization, rather than discovery, was his principal object; and in a memorial to the Queen and Council he set forth the advantages to be obtained by establishing settlements on the American continent. The result was that in 1584 he obtained a new charter. Raleigh did not go with the expedition—one writer observes that his presence was too necessary at Court; but his two captains, Amadis and Barlowe, reached the American coast, and took possession, in the name of the Queen, of a considerable tract of country on the Roanoke, a large river flowing into what is now known as Albemarle Sound, in North Carolina. They returned in September, bringing with them skins of buffalo and deer, and a bracelet of large pearls, with two natives of the country they had discovered. Raleigh obtained permission to name the territory Virginia, in honour of the "virgin Queen," and he had a new seal cut, with the legend, Walteri Raleigh, militis Domini et Gubernatoris Virginiae. The Queen conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and encouraged him to send out another expedition. By the end of the following March (1585), a fleet of seven ships, well provided, and taking a hundred settlers, left Plymouth. The command of the expedition was entrusted to his cousin, a Cornish gentleman, Sir Richard Grenville, afterwards (1591) so famous for his heroic death in the sea-night, in which he held at bay for fifteen hours fifteen large Spanish ships, an unparalleled exploit, commemorated by Tennyson in a ballad founded on the account of the fight written by Raleigh and Jan Huygen van Linschoten, a Dutch navigator in the Portuguese service. The governor of the new colony was to be Ralph Lane, with Philip Amadis as deputy; and Harriot, a clever mathematician, who had been tutor to Raleigh, accompanied the expedition for the purpose of making accurate surveys. Grants of land, of not less than a hundred acres to each emigrant, were made, and at first matters promised well; but dissensions occurred, and the Indians, at first described as gentle and friendly, "loving and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the golden age," afterwards attacked the settlers. At the height of the trouble of the little community, there appeared, off the mouth of the Roanoke, the fleet of Sir Francis Drake, returning from sacking St. Domingo, Cartagena, and other places on the Spanish main. Drake offered to supply the settlers with provisions; but they implored to be taken back to England, and he was induced to receive them on board his vessels. Very shortly afterwards, Sir Richard Grenville arrived with supplies which Raleigh had thoughtfully provided, and was disappointed to find the place deserted. He left fifteen men, well supplied for two years, to form the nucleus of another colony; and in May, 1587, a hundred and fifty emigrants sailed from Plymouth, under the leadership of Captain John White, who, with twelve others, constituted the incorporation of "Governors and Assistants of the city of Raleigh, in Virginia." The fifteen men left by Grenville had perished—massacred, perhaps, by the Indians; and White's party endured great hardships. The leader returned to England for supplies, but it was difficult to forward them, as, in consequence of the threatening aspect of Spain, ships were forbidden to leave English ports. Raleigh, however, had influence enough to obtain permission for three vessels to take out supplies and new colonists. They were attacked on the way, and compelled to return.

We anticipate events by saying that, between 1587 and 1602, Raleigh fitted out, at his own charge, five Virginian expeditions, for the purpose of relieving, and if need be rescuing, the settlers,—unsuccessfully, it may be added, for the whites were massacred by the Indians; and, in the words of one of his biographers, "Virginia only lost his care and labour when he had himself lost his liberty." At one time he leased his patent to a company of merchants, but they were unsuccessful; and in a letter to Sir Robert Cecil, just before his own fortunes failed, he said, "I shall yet live to see it [Virginia] an English nation." It is estimated that he expended £40,000, an immense fortune in those days, in his various attempts to colonize Virginia.

Raleigh retained the favour of Elizabeth, and took an active part in parliamentary business (representing Devonshire in Parliament), and in many naval enterprises and privateering expeditions. In 1588, being then a member of the Council of War, and commander of the forces in Cornwall, of which county he was lieutenant-general, he furnished a ship and men to the fleet assembled to repel the Armada, for which he was rewarded by an augmentation of his patent on wines, and the right to levy tonnage and poundage on them. In 1589, he accompanied the expedition of Drake and Norris to Lisbon, and on his return made a visit to Ireland, where he associated in intimate friendship with Edmund Spenser, whom he had known when previously in that country, and who commemorated Raleigh's return from Lisbon in the well-known poem, "Colin Clout's come home again." In 1592, he sailed with fifteen ships to intercept the Spanish fleet, but was recalled by the Queen.

MARRIAGE, AND DISGRACE AT COURT.

The hitherto unclouded fortunes of Sir Walter were about this time doomed to experience a reverse. We have mentioned in Spenser's poetry an allusion to "Amoret," and by that name was intended Elizabeth Throgmorton, or Throckmorton, daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, who had been ambassador to France. The young lady was one of the Queen's maids of honour; and her beauty—she was tall, with fine features and large blue eyes—attracted the attention of Raleigh. An illicit amour was the result, followed in 1593 by marriage. When the Queen became aware of what had occurred, she gave way to an ungovernable fit of rage. Not only had Sir Walter presumed to discover somebody whom he thought more attractive than herself—an offence for which she could scarcely inflict a legal punishment—but he, a gentleman of the Court, had dared to marry without royal permission; and for that offence he and his wife were committed to the Tower, and several of his offices were taken from him. It is lamentable that a man of Raleigh's greatness should have condescended to the ignoble course he then pursued to obtain forgiveness. He knew well the weakness of Elizabeth, and proffered the most abject flattery. In a letter to Cecil, which it was arranged should be shown to the Queen, he complained that he endured intense agonies by being deprived of the opportunity of seeing her, whom he had been "wont to behold riding like Alexander, hunting like Diana, walking like Venus—the gentle wind blowing her fair hair about her pure cheeks like a nymph; sometimes sitting in the shade like a goddess, sometimes playing on the lute like Orpheus." This fulsome adulation so far influenced the Queen, that after two months she gave him his liberty, but forbade him to approach the Court.

About two years previously, the Queen had conferred on him the castle and manor of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, formerly the property of the bishops of Salisbury, and obtained by the Crown by the strong if not very fair pressure the Queen so well knew how to exert. Thither Sir Walter and his fair and loving wife retired, and for a time he occupied himself with tranquil pursuits, without, however, neglecting his duties in Parliament, where he supported the Crown in its application for subsidies, a loyal course which considerably mollified the arbitrary Queen. Under his management, the Sherborne estate assumed a new aspect. The old castle was repaired, a magnificent mansion erected, and the extensive grounds laid out with exquisite skill and taste.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

Gardens and orchards were planted ; a river was made to wind, with cascades and numerous brooks and rivulets, among luxuriant plantations.

EXPEDITION TO GUIANA.

Raleigh's active mind, however, could not be satisfied with such calm pleasures as garden and rural scenes afford, or with such recreations as writing pastoral and amatory poems. He loved the place, however, and in later life spoke with a warm remembrance of the domestic happiness he had enjoyed there. His brilliant Court life was probably ended, but there remained the broad seas and the mysterious lands of the western continent to be explored. While in the Tower, he had heard of the capture of the Great Carrack, the richest Spanish treasure-ship which ever crossed the ocean. It was brought into Plymouth, and even, after a vast amount of the treasure had been carried away surreptitiously by certain dignified persons who had access, and by the officers and crew who captured it, the sale of the contents realized about half a million of money. He pined for the opportunity of achieving a similar prize ; and his old plans for establishing colonies were more ardently cherished than ever. From boyhood he had been familiar with the history of the Spanish conquests. He had read with avidity every available narrative since published, and had heard, and, to a great extent, believed in, the existence of an El Dorado in the interior of the vast region watered by the Orinoco and the great rivers of Guiana. His imagination was fired by the exciting stories told of palaces with golden roofs, and rivers washing down golden sands. The failure of the Spanish explorers to reach these wonderful regions, in the existence of which they so firmly believed, Raleigh attributed to the want of knowledge and endurance rather than to a mistaken pursuit of a glittering phantom.

Early in 1595 he bade farewell to Sherborne and the pleasures of domestic life, and prepared for a voyage which he hoped would result in a realization of the visions he had indulged in. Some months previously he had sent a ship commanded by an experienced sailor, Captain Whiddon, to Trinidad, to obtain information respecting the entrance to the Orinoco ; but the Spanish governor of the island, Don Antonio de Berio, had himself made an attempt to reach the phantom El Dorado, and not only impeded Whiddon in his inquiries, but seized and imprisoned some of his men.

On the 9th of February, Raleigh, who had made great preparations and been assisted in the necessary expenses by the Lord High Admiral Howard and Sir Robert Cecil, sailed from Plymouth with five vessels, having on board about a hundred soldiers, hardy sailors, and a few gentlemen volunteers. Towards the end of March he reached Trinidad, and with characteristic vigour took by surprise possession of the town of San Josef, and made prisoner the governor, De Berio. Finding him to be a "gentleman of great assuredness and of a great heart," Raleigh treated him with considerable respect ; and on his part, the governor, supposing that Sir Walter's real destination was Virginia, imparted to his captor a great amount of information respecting the attempts to reach the "golden land," and related many marvellous statements made by persons who professed to have visited it and seen some of its wonders. He showed him his own plans for another expedition, and told him he had sent one of his principal officers to Spain to make preparations. Then Raleigh disclosed his own projects, and De Berio saw to his chagrin how he had been deceived ; was, says Raleigh, "struck with a great melancholy and sadness, and used all the arguments he could to dissuade me," representing the dangers and miseries certain to be encountered.

Nothing daunted, but rather animated, for his was one of those brave natures which delight in difficulties, Sir Walter set sail for the mouth of the Orinoco. His ship was too deep in draught for the shallow channels, and boats were employed. In these frail vessels, exposed without shelter to burning sun and torrents of rain, the expedition navigated, for a month, the labyrinth of streams, and at last was rewarded by a sight of the majestic river. It was ascended for about sixty leagues, and then the rapid rise of the waters rendered further progress impossible. No golden city was seen, and no glimpse afforded of the "Amazons," or female warriors, of whom the early Spanish explorers had heard so much, and who gave a name to the great river of South America. Raleigh made friends of some native caciques and chiefs whom he met, and produced a very favourable impression. Another explorer, Leigh, nine years afterwards, met with a chief who came to him from a long distance to inquire about Raleigh, who was well remembered.

On Sir Walter's return, he published a finely written account of "The Discovery of the Large Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana," in which he expressed his assurance "that the sun covereth not so much riches in any part of the world."

Hume and some others have characterized the narrative as "full of the grossest and most palpable lies." Raleigh appears to have believed implicitly in the stories of golden cities, and amazonian warriors, and even of the savage people who had "eyes in their shoulders and mouths in their breasts."

A map of the regions visited, prepared by Raleigh himself, and signed by him, is preserved in the archives of Salamanca; and he brought home some pieces of quartz, which were assayed in the mint of London, and found to contain gold. He thus describes the beauty of the country over the great fells of the Caroni, or Caroli:—

"I never saw a more beautiful country, nor more lovely prospects; hills so raised, here and there, over the valleys; the rivers winding into divers branches, the plains adjoining all fair green grass, without bushes or stubble; the ground of hard sand, easy to march on, either for horse or foot; the deer crossing on every path; the birds towards evening singing on every tree with a thousand several tunes; cranes and herons, of white, crimson, and carnation, perching on the river-side; the air fresh with a gentle easterly wind; and every stone that we stooped to take up promising either gold or silver, by its complexion."

It is scarcely to be wondered at that Raleigh, with whom the idea of colonization and extension of the empire was a passion, cherished the idea of leading a large army sufficient to conquer the country, and establish commercial companies which would develop a trade by which London would far surpass in wealth the proud city of Seville itself.

His report of the results of his expedition, and perhaps a little of the adroit flattery in which he was so great an adept—such as relating how some of the native chiefs had been struck with admiration when he showed them a portrait of Elizabeth—restored him to Court favour. He was reinstated in his position as Captain of the Guard, and was besides appointed to the lucrative governorship of Jersey; and we are told in the "Sidney Papers" that he rode abroad with the Queen, and frequented the privy chamber "as boldly as he was wont to do before."

THE CADIZ AND AZORES EXPEDITIONS.

In June, 1596, an expedition was sent to attack Cadiz. Lord Howard of Effingham, the admiral who had struck such a brave blow at the great Armada, commanded the fleet; and the forces to be employed on land were under the leadership of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, who was then the prime favourite of the Queen. Raleigh was selected with Sir George Carew and other officers of experience to form a council, to whose consideration Essex (whose tendency to rashness was mistrusted) was directed to submit all important operations. The fleet got within the harbour, notwithstanding a vigorous fire from the forts and fifteen Spanish men-of-war, three of which were captured. Essex then landed part of his forces, and the city capitulated, the inhabitants paying a heavy ransom (about four millions sterling) for their lives. The fortifications were razed, and the greater part of the houses burned. In the action Raleigh received a wound in the leg. On his return, he wrote a very animated account of the capture of the city.

Essex and Raleigh were rivals, and on the side of the former especially there was great animosity; but Raleigh generously bore testimony to the great merits of his leader. In a letter to Cecil, written immediately after the action, and still existing in the British Museum, he said, "The Earl has behaved himself both valiantly and advisedly in the highest degree, without pride and without cruelty, and hath gotten great honour and much love of all."

A year afterwards, June, 1597, Essex was appointed to the command of another expedition, in which also Raleigh took part, with the rank of rear-admiral. The fleet sailed from Plymouth, but was driven back by a storm, and it did not make a successful start until August 17. The destination was the Azores, and three Spanish ships were captured, and the islands Fayal, Graciosa and Flores taken possession of. Fayal was taken by a division of the squadron commanded by Raleigh, and his brilliant conduct on that occasion aroused a spirit of jealousy on the part of Essex, who, after his appointment as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in 1599, wrote to the Queen in terms of strong hostility to Raleigh.

We need not enter into the details of the fall of Essex, and the rash resistance he made to the Queen's authority, for which he was convicted of high treason and beheaded. Raleigh certainly showed no friendship towards him, and has been accused of writing a letter to Cecil, urging the execution of his former friend and associate. The letter, however, may bear a more favourable construction, as only advising the policy of reducing Essex to such a condition that he should be unable further to disturb the State. In his official capacity as Captain of the Guard, Raleigh was present at the execution of the brave, but too reckless, Earl. It is certainly not to his credit that he took sums of money from several gentlemen who were implicated in Essex's outbreak, to use his influence with the Queen on their behalf, and that he succeeded in obtaining pardons for them. Such traffic was not thought disgraceful at the time; and in morals Raleigh was not superior to his less brilliant contemporaries.

WORK IN PARLIAMENT.

About this time he took an active part in parliamentary work, especially in advocating the freedom of capital and labour, anticipating some of the most valuable doctrines of modern political economy. He earnestly opposed the restrictions on cultivation and the compulsory production of certain crops, which were so highly approved by Bacon and other great authorities. "I do not like," he said, "this conspiring of men to misuse or use their grounds at our wills; but rather wish to let every man use his ground for that which it is most fit, and therein follow his own discretion." He also strongly advocated the policy of setting free the trade in corn. "The Hollanders," he urged, "who never sow corn, have by their industry such plenty that they can serve other nations; and it is the best policy to set tillage at liberty, and leave every man free, which is the desire of a true Englishman."

In the popular mind the fame of Raleigh is associated with the introduction of tobacco and the potato plant; but it is well to remember that he was not only the first Englishman who promoted colonization and foresaw the greatness of the English race on American soil, but he was also the earliest English free trader.

DEATH OF ELIZABETH.

On the 24th of March, 1603, the great Queen Elizabeth died at Richmond Palace, and with her faded the star of Raleigh's fortunes. Her passing admiration of the handsome figure and gallant bearing of the man, her womanish weakness which led her to accept flatteries from him and indulge in fantastic gallantries, had long since been forgotten; but to the last the great-hearted and energetic queen appreciated his talents, acquirements, and courage, and no doubt sympathized with the largeness of his political views and ambition. She had rewarded him with honours and emoluments; and, remembering the servile adulation he had stooped to, it is rather painful to read Raleigh's estimate of his royal mistress. He might have remembered that, if he knew more of her womanly weaknesses than others, she was in her public capacity a sagacious, energetic, and courageous sovereign, who maintained, as it had scarcely ever been maintained before, the reputation of England. After her death he said, "that, however, she seemed a great and good mistress to him in the eyes of the world, yet she was unjust and tyrannous enough to him to lay many of her oppressions on him, besides seizing on the best part of everything he took at sea for herself; that she took a whole cabinet of great pearls for herself, which he had captured in a Spanish ship, without giving him so much as one pearl."

There is a lamentable alloy of meanness in the composition of some great men; and Raleigh was an instance. He stooped to petty acts to obtain influence and wealth, even if he spent his riches magnificently; and had little scruple in neglecting or even vilifying those who had befriended him most. His strangely united cold, economical reasoning with the glow of a vigorous and exalted imagination; ambitions alike of scraping up wealth and of risking it, and life too, in splendid enterprises. His characteristic love of wealth and power, and the selfishness and "worldly wisdom" which that love engenders even in noble natures, caused him to write in "Instructions to his Son and Posterity":—

"Believe thy father in this, and print it in thy thought, that what virtue soever thou hast, be it never so manifold, if thou be poor withal, thou and thy qualities shall be despised. Besides, poverty is oftentimes sent as a curse of God; it is a shame amongst men, an imprisonment of the mind, a vexation of every worthy spirit; thou shalt neither help thyself nor others; thou shalt drown thee in all thy virtues, having no means to shun them; thou shalt be a burden and an eyesore to thy friends; every man will fear thy company; thou shalt be driven basely to beg and depend on others, to flatter unworthy men, to make dishonest shifts; and, to conclude, poverty provokes a man to do infamous and detested deeds. Let not vanity therefore, or persuasion, draw thee to that waste of worldly miseries. If thou be rich, it will give thee pleasure and health; keep thy mind and body free, save thee from many perils, relieve thee in thy elder years, relieve the poor and thy honest friends, and give means to thy posterity to live and defend themselves and thine own fame."

CHARGED WITH CONSPIRACY.

Raleigh was one of the leading public men who met at Whitehall for the purpose of proclaiming James of Scotland successor to Elizabeth, and he assented to a strongly expressed opinion that James's power of appointing his countrymen to places of trust and emolument in his English dominion ought to be subjected to some limitation. Indeed, Aubrey, the gossiping chronicler of historical small-beer, asserts that Sir Walter boldly proposed to establish a republic, and said at the meeting, "Let us keep the staff in our own hand, and set up a commonwealth, and not remain subject to a mean and beggarly nation." There is a ring of Raleigh's courage, but very little of his sagacity and caution, in these words; and as Aubrey's statement is unsupported by any more competent authority, we may safely reject it. It is, however, quite possible that similar stories were carefully transmitted to the new king; for Cecil and others, long jealous of Raleigh, hitherto supported by the Queen's friendship, lost no opportunity of discrediting him. Sir Walter tried his old method of ingratiating, flattery, but it was far less effective with James than with Elizabeth. The meanness and conceit of the Scotch king prepared him to dislike the brilliant scholar, adventurer, and courtier. He received with delight, and magnificently rewarded (at the cost of others), the abject adulation of the mean creatures who thronged his Court; but in Raleigh he felt the presence of a master-mind, and was shrewd enough to suspect that considerable contempt was mingled with the flattering words. Raleigh no doubt smiled cynically when writing as he did to James, "I took it as a great comfort to behold your Majesty; always learning some good, and bettering my knowledge by hearing your Majesty discourse."

Cecil, eager to be among the first to welcome James, met him at York, on the progress to London, and lost no time in disparaging Sir Walter, who, as an early mark of royal disfavour, was deprived of the distinguished and lucrative office of Captain of the Guard, to make room for the appointment of a Scotch favourite.

Raleigh soon saw that, in presence of the opposition of Cecil and others, and the swarm of northern place-hunters, he had little chance at home of repairing his fortune, seriously impaired by the money he had expended on the various expeditions and the loss of office; and he applied to the king to countenance an attack on the Spanish possessions in America, offering to raise two thousand men, at his own cost, for the purpose. James, however, was not to be interested in the design; and then Raleigh published a tract, remarkable for statesmanship, foresight, and vigour of illustration, on the policy of continuing the protection of England to the United Provinces of Holland; but this project, too, received no encouragement from the king.

James had been only about three months on the throne when two conspiracies were said to be discovered. One, known as the "Bye Plot," in which Raleigh was not implicated, was to seize the person of the king, carry him to the Tower, and there imprison him until he should swear to reconstruct his ministry, and grant a full toleration of religion. The second, or "Main Plot," originated with Lord Cobham, whose brother-in-law, George Brooke, was deeply concerned in the other project. Cobham applied, through the Spanish ambassador, to the King of Spain for money; and the proposition was to depose James by force of arms, and put on the throne his cousin, Lady Arabella Stuart, daughter of the brother of James's father, Lord Darnley, and equally descended from the royal line of England. Raleigh was an intimate friend of Cobham, and that intimacy was ground enough for Cecil and others to assert that he was concerned in the scheme.

The allegation was that Cobham intended to go to the King of Spain and the Archduke of Austria, and having obtained money for the purpose of bribing public men in England, then to meet Raleigh at Jersey, of which the latter was governor, and concert the means of action. On the 27th of July, 1603, Cobham and Raleigh were arrested and committed to the Tower, where, it is said, the latter attempted to commit suicide. There is some support for this statement in the fact that in a letter from Raleigh to his wife, written at the time, he said, "I cannot live to think how I shall be derided, to think of the expectations of my enemies, the scorn I shall receive, the cruel words of lawyers, the infamous taunts and despites, to be made a wonder and a spectacle. I know," he added, "that it is forbidden to destroy ourselves; but that it is forbidden in this sort, that we destroy not ourselves despairing of God's mercy." He counselled his wife to marry again, "to avoid poverty."

As the plague was raging in London, the trial took place at Winchester in the following September. The indictment against Sir Walter was that "he, with other persons, had conspired to kill the king, to raise a rebellion, with intent to change religion and subvert the government, and for that purpose to encourage and incite the king's enemies to invade the realm." It seems strange to us that anybody should suspect Raleigh, always a consistent Protestant, of a staunch Protestant stock, and always exhibiting an intense hatred of Spain and Spanish influence, of a design to establish Catholicism, and receive aid for that purpose from the King of Spain. But the desire was to ruin him, and there was little scruple as to the means employed. Not only had he been deprived of his office of Captain of the Guard, but of the profitable licensing monopolies he had enjoyed; and now it seemed that nothing short of his death would satisfy his enemies. With the mass of the nation Raleigh had never been popular. His aristocratic, somewhat arrogant bearing offended them, and the lower classes were unable to comprehend his political theories, his scholarship, or his enlarged views on the questions of the time. That he had been so long the first of Court favourites was perhaps one reason why the mob should feel a pleasure in his downfall; but it was also thought that he had been an enemy to Essex, who was very popular. On his way to Winchester, the coach in which he rode was followed by a yelling mob, who threw missiles (tobacco-pipes among others) at the vehicle.

CONVICTION AND SENTENCE.

The trial lasted from eight in the morning till eleven at night. Lord Chief Justice Popham, a judge notorious for his private vice and venality, presided; and that great lawyer, but unscrupulous man, Sir Edward Coke, the Attorney-General, conducted the prosecution with coarse vindictiveness. Cobham, a weak and timid man, influenced apparently by a hope of saving himself, made a confession implicating Raleigh, but afterwards fully and solemnly retracted his accusation. Sir Walter admitted that Cobham had, on the part of the Spanish ambassador, offered him a sum of money or a pension, if he would use his endeavours to promote a peace between the two crowns; but he wrote a letter to the Lords of the Council, emphatically denying that he was aware of any connexion of this offer with a treasonable design.

Michael Hicks, writing to the Earl of Shrewsbury, says, "Raleigh, at the trial, carried himself so temperate in all his answers, and answered so wisely and readily to all objections, as it wrought both admiration in his hearers for his good parts, and pity towards his person. His answers were interlaced with arguments out of divinity, humanity, civil law, and common law." Coke was unjust enough to refer to the Bye Plot, in respect of which no imputation whatever rested on Raleigh; but, said Coke, "It will be seen that all these treasons, though they consist of several parts, closed in together, like Samson's foxes, which were joined in their tails, though their heads were separated." He proceeded to abuse Raleigh as "the most notorious traitor ever called to the bar," a "damnable atheist," a "spider of hell," and used other epithets of equal coarseness. Raleigh demanded that Cobham, whose so-called confession was relied on against him, should be produced and confronted with him, and that other witnesses, if any, should be produced; but Popham told him that he was being tried by common law, according to which one witness was sufficient, and that the accusation of confidants, or the confession of others, was full proof. Sir Walter protested against the ruling; but Coke vehemently endeavoured to silence him, and violently said, "I will have the last word for the king!" "Nay," answered Raleigh, with spirit, "I will have the last word for my life." Even Cecil felt that Coke was going too far, and told him he was too harsh. In his reply to the charges, Sir Walter spoke of Cobham as "a poor, silly, base, dishonourable soul;" and for himself, he said, "I was not so bare of sense but that I saw that, if ever the State was strong and able to defend itself, it was now." To Elizabeth he referred, with a fine, courtly, and epigrammatic turn of words, as "a lady whom Time surprised," and of James he spoke as "an active king, a lawful successor to the Crown." "I am not," he said, "such a madman as to make myself, in this time, a Robin Hood, a Wat Tyler, or a Jack Cade."

The jury reluctantly returned a verdict of guilty; and on being asked why judgment should not be recorded, Raleigh replied that he was innocent, that he submitted himself to the king's mercy, and recommended to his Majesty's compassion his wife and son of tender years. In a vituperative speech, in which the accusation of being an atheist was repeated, and the accused was promised "an eternity of hell torments," Popham proceeded to pass the terrible sentence of death by mutilation and disembowelling, the then doom of traitors. Raleigh requested the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Devonshire, and Lord Cecil (who, although one of his greatest opponents, was not of a sanguinary disposition, and might be supposed to have some respect for the abilities and character of the illustrious prisoner) to intercede with the king, that his death might be honourable, and not ignominious. Raleigh then followed the sheriff out of Court, "with admirable erection," says Sir Thomas Overbury, who was present, "but yet in such a sort as became a man condemned."

In the gallery of the Court sat the lady whose name had been so frequently mentioned in connection with the "plot," Lady Arabella Stuart; and when sentence had been passed, the Earl of Nottingham, formerly Lord Howard of Effingham, who accompanied her, stood up and said, "the lady, then present, protested on her salvation that she never dealt in any of these things."

Intelligence of the result of the trial was brought to the King by Roger Ashton, and one of the Scotch hangers-on of the Court. One of them affirmed that never any man spoke so well in times past, nor would do so in the world to come, as Raleigh had spoken on his trial; and the other said, that when he first saw Sir Walter he was so led with the common hatred, that he would have gone a hundred miles to see him hanged, but ere he parted he would have gone a thousand miles to save his life. "In one word," he added, "never was a man so hated and so popular in so short a time."

The general public shared the revulsion of feeling, and Sir Walter, a few days earlier disliked, became a popular hero. The King, shrinking perhaps from permitting the sentence to be carried out, and satisfied with the confiscation of the estate and the Virginia patent, decided to spare the life of Raleigh, and not only his, but the lives of the other accused; but could not deny himself the pleasure of a little preliminary cruelty. He sent the Bishop of Winchester to prepare Raleigh for execution, and the scaffold was erected at Winchester; Cobham, Lord Grey, and others were led out as if to the block, and Raleigh was brought out to witness their execution, with the full assurance that his own death would follow. Then the sheriff announced that his Majesty had been graciously pleased "in his princely clemency to spare their lives."

Raleigh had prepared himself for death with the resolution and resignation of a great mind. He wrote to his wife, "God is my witness that it was for you and yours that I sued for life; but it is true that I disclaimed myself for begging it; for know, dear wife, that your son is the son of a true man, and one who, in his own respect, despiseth death and all his misshapen and ugly forms. May the everlasting and omnipotent God, who is goodness itself, keep thee and thine, have mercy on me, and teach me to forgive my persecutors, and send us to meet in His glorious kingdom." Such was the language of the "damnable atheist" of Coke and Popham.

IN THE TOWER.

He was taken to the Tower, and then followed another instance of the meanness of the King. Several years before, Raleigh had executed a conveyance of his Sherborne estate to his son; but the sharp eyes of the infamous and greedy Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, discovered a technical flaw in the deed. He exercised a powerful and mysterious influence over James, possessing, it was believed, the key to some secret disclosure of which the King dreaded; and he asked that the estate might be given to him. Lady Raleigh threw herself at the King's feet, and implored that she and her children should not be reduced to poverty, in addition to being deprived of the companionship and support of her dear husband. James could only mutter, "I mun hae it for Carr;" and Lady Raleigh quitted the ignoble presence a broken-hearted woman.

In the Tower Raleigh appears to have been allowed considerable freedom and the use of books. He had for fellow-prisoners, with whom communication was permitted, Henry Percy, the Earl of Northumberland, who had been an earnest promoter of science and learning; Hoskins, the scholar, wit, and critic; and Daniel, friend and literary corrector of Ben Jonson; and among his visitors were Harriot, the mathematician, whom he had sent to Virginia, and Dr. Burkett, a great Greek and Hebrew scholar and commentator.

Anne of Denmark, queen of James, was a staunch friend of Raleigh; and her son, the accomplished and amiable Henry, Prince of Wales, whose premature death at the age of eighteen caused general sorrow, was one of his most ardent admirers. It is supposed that it was with a view to his instruction that Raleigh began to write the famous "History of the World." The Queen, we are told, "regarded him with pity and interest, and he owed most of his indulgence to her intercession, through which, though a prisoner in the Tower circle, he retained not only his actual property, but the income of £200 per annum as governor of Jersey."

When Prince Henry was dying, in 1612, a general impression was entertained that he was the victim of foul play, and suspicion even pointed at the King. Raleigh, among other means of amusement in the Tower, had erected a small laboratory, where he experimented in chemistry and pharmacy. He had supplied the Queen with an effective remedy for ague, and she, believing in his skill, asked him to send something which might benefit the Prince. He sent a preparation, with the assurance that "it would cure all maladies excepting poison." The Prince took it, and rallied wonderfully for a short time, but again sank, and on the 5th of November, 1612, breathed his last. The failure of the remedy, and Raleigh's words, convinced the Queen that her dear son had indeed been poisoned. Nearly a hundred years afterwards, William the Third was kept alive for several hours by the administration of what the newspapers of the day described as "Sir Walter Raleigh's cordial," which was a strong spirituous compound.

The intercession of the Queen, her brother the King of Denmark, and the Prince of Wales, had been unavailing to obtain the release of Raleigh. James has himself left it on record that he withheld a pardon in order more readily to hold Raleigh in subjection. The captive was not so immersed in literary and chemical labours as to forget the supposed riches of Guiana; and in 1611, when he had been eight years imprisoned, he made an offer to the King, which seems to have been conditionally accepted, that a ship commanded by Captain Keymis should be despatched to Guiana; and if Keymis should fail to bring back half a ton at least of "that slate gold ore, whereof I have given a sample," he (Raleigh) would bear all the expenses of the expedition; but, if that quantity were brought home, he should have a pardon and his liberty." Why this extraordinary proposition was not carried into effect is unknown. Raleigh had contrived in some manner to maintain a communication with Guiana, and even to have some of the natives of the place brought to this country.

SECOND EXPEDITION TO GUIANA.

After he had been thirteen years in the Tower he was released, but without a formal pardon; and he was permitted to arrange for a new expedition. He informed the Government that he intended to open a gold mine; but in the commission given him the place is not mentioned, for fear of the Spaniards preparing an opposition. He afterwards complained that the Government communicated his intentions to Spain, and so thwarted him. It cannot be doubted that buccancering adventures were also privately a part of his scheme; for neither Raleigh nor any other of the maritime adventurers of those days saw any harm in such exploits.

In the following year, 1617, a fleet of thirteen vessels was collected, Raleigh's own ship, the Destiny, having been built under his special direction. The expedition reached the coast of Guiana in the middle of November; but, being unwell, Raleigh did not himself ascend the Orinoco. He sent Captain Keymis, with two hundred and fifty men. After a month, they reached St. Thomas, a small Spanish town, which they captured after a sharp fight, in which Raleigh's son and the Spanish governor were killed. Keymis could not discover the gold mine, and returned to Trinidad, where Raleigh awaited him. The unfortunate captain was received with reproaches, which had such an effect on him that he committed suicide.

EXECUTION.

Raleigh returned to Plymouth in July, 1618, and found that a royal proclamation had been issued, no doubt at the instance of the Spanish ambassador, Gondomar; and he was placed under arrest. He was subjected to most inquisitorial proceedings, and even his private letters to his wife were intercepted and read. James was then desirous to please Spain, for there was a negotiation pending for the marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta; and Raleigh was to be sacrificed. The Government was complaisant enough to revive the old sentence, and on the 29th of October, 1618, the memorable Englishman, unquestionably the foremost man in achievement of that great age, was beheaded in Palace Yard, Westminster, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

He encountered death with a cheerful dignity of deportment. On the scaffold he made a long speech, concluding by saying, "I entreat you all to join with me in prayer that the great God of heaven, whom I have grievously offended—being a man full of all vanity, having been a seafaring man, a soldier, and a courtier, and in the temptations of the least of these there is enough to overthrow a great mind and a good man—that God, I say, would forgive me, and cast away my sins from me, and that He would receive me into everlasting life. I die in the faith professed by the Church of England, and I hope to be saved, and to have my sins washed away by the precious blood of our Saviour Christ. So I take my leave of you all, making my peace with God." The executioner asked forgiveness. Raleigh freely gave it, and then asked to feel the axe. "It is," he said, "a sharp and fair medicine, and can cure all diseases." He knelt and prayed, and then gave the signal by extending his hands. The executioner was unnerved, and struck feebly. "Strike sharper," said Raleigh, and the blow followed, and the head fell to the ground. It was shown to the people, and "a general shudder followed."

His body—the head was long preserved in the family—was buried in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, where, in 1845, a tablet was erected with this inscription: "Within the chancel of this church was interred the body of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, on the day he was beheaded in Old Palace Yard, Westminster, October 29, 1618. Reader, should you reflect on his errors, remember his many virtues, and that he was mortal."

A memorial window is now in course of erection in the church, and Americans have contributed largely to the fund.

LITERARY PRODUCTIONS.

Had not Raleigh achieved fame as a maritime adventurer and soldier, he would still occupy a conspicuous place in England's Pantheon. His "History of the World" extends from the creation of man, as recorded in the Hebrew Scriptures, to the end of the second Macedonian war. The five books, written with great force, elegance, and sustained dignity, exhibit a vast amount of rare scholarship and curious speculations and designations. He projected a second and a third part, but, he writes in the Introduction, "Besides many other discouragements persuading my silence, it has pleased God to take that glorious Prince [Henry, Prince of Wales] out of the world, to whom were devoted. . . O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hast dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised. Thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Ilic jacet."

Aubrey, however, gives a reason for the non-appearance of the final portion of the work, which may partly explain the phrase, "many other discouragements." He says in a manuscript preserved in the Ashmolean Museum of Oxford, "His books sold very slowly at first, and the bookseller (Walter Bane) complained of it, and told him he should be a loser by it, which put Sir Walter into a passion, and he said that since the world did not understand it, they should not have the second part, which he took and threw into the fire, and burnt before his face." The "History" was published in 1614, while the author was a prisoner in the Tower.

Oliver Cromwell wrote to his son Richard, "Recreate yourself with Sir Walter Raleigh's 'History;' it is a body of history, and will add much more to your understanding than fragments of stones." The elder Disraeli says, "He who seeks for power of intellect and grandeur of soul must study profoundly Raleigh's 'History of the World.'"

Only a few poems and the account of the first voyage to Guiana were printed in the author's lifetime. Of the works published after his death, and bearing his name, some few are of doubtful authenticity; but we may accept with confidence, as genuine productions and remarkable evidences of the scope and versatility of Raleigh's talents, the following list of tracts and larger works:—

Political.—"Maxims of State"—"The Cabinet Council"—"The Prorogation of Parliament"—"On a Match between Lady Elizabeth and the Prince of Piedmont"—"On a Marriage between Prince Henry and a Daughter of Saxony"—"A Discourse touching a War with Spain"—"Observations on the Navy and Sea Service"—"On the Seat of Government"—"Spanish Alarm."

Practical and Economical.—"A Discourse on the character of Ships' Anchors, Compasses, etc."—"Observations touching Trade and Commerce"—"Cause of the Magnificence and Opulence of Cities"—"The Art of War at Sea" (1625).

Moral and Miscellaneous.—"A Discourse on War in General"—"The Sceptic"—"Instructions to his Son and Posterity"—"A Treatise on the Soul"—"Poems."

Dugald Stewart refers with admiration to some of Raleigh's metaphysical speculations, and to the "coincidence of thought with the soundest logical conclusions of the eighteenth century." To Milton is due the publication of the "Maxims of State" and "Cabinet Council."

His poetry was graceful and elegant, tinged with the affectation of the day; but less so than the verses of many of his contemporaries.

We conclude with the magnificent eulogium by Edmund Burke: "Sir Walter Raleigh, the most extraordinary genius of his own, or perhaps any other time; a penetrating statesman, an accomplished courtier, a deep scholar, a fine writer, a fine soldier, and one of the ablest seamen in the world. The vast genius that pierced so far, and ran through so many things, was of a fiery and eccentric kind, which led him into daring expeditions and uncommon projects, which, not being understood by a timid Prince, and envied and hated by the rivals he had in so many ways of life, ruined him at last."

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

ORIGIN OF THE WASHINGTON FAMILY.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, "first in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," was descended from John Washington, who emigrated from England to Virginia about 1657. His parents were Augustine Washington, and a second wife, Mary Ball; and the future hero was born in a parish called by the family name in Westmoreland County, Va., on February 22nd, 1732. The place is non-existent, but a recording stone, with inscription, marks the locality.

John Washington, the great-grandfather of the subject of our memoir, was descended from the Washington family of Little Brington, Northamptonshire, whose coat-of-arms, containing as it does three stars and stripes, or bars, with the bird surmounting the shield, no doubt gave rise to the idea of the celebrated "Stars and Stripes." *

Let us now proceed to Brington, — Great Brington, — where, close to Lord Spencer's park,

* The heraldic description of the Washington crest is as follows:—Argent—two bars gules, in chief three mullets of the second, crest a raven with wings endorsed proper, issuing out of a ducal coronet—or."

is the church wherein we shall find the interesting monuments we seek ; and if we advance into the chancel, we shall find under our feet a slab. Stoop and read the inscription, which is as follows :—

“ Here lieth the bodi of Lavrence Washington, sonne and heire of Robert Washington of Soolgrave, in the countie of Northampton, Esquier, who married Margaret, the eldest daughter of William Buller of Tees in the Countie of Sussex, Esquier, who had issue by her 8 sonns and 9 daughters, which Lavrence Decessed the 13 of December A.Dni. 1616.

“ Those that by chance or choyce of this hast sight,
Know life to death resigns as day to night ;
But as the sonne's returne revives the day,
So Christ shall us though turnde to dust and clay.”

Beneath are the arms of the husband and wife deeply engraved in the stone. There are graves of other Washingtons in the church, but the foregoing is undoubtedly that of the ancestor of the great President of the United States.

We can then trace the family by Sir William, Lawrence's eldest son, who wedded George Villiers' (Buckingham's) sister. The second son was John, the others respectively Robert and Lawrence. Robert quite drops out of the record, but John (or Sir John) and his brother Lawrence, being implicated in the troubles of the period (1656) between Royalists and Roundheads, and being strictly loyal to the Sovereign's side, emigrated to Virginia, as did many other Royalists. This John Washington was an elderly man at the time of his emigration with his son, or sons. Mr. Simpkinson suggests that it was this son John who wedded Anne Pope, and warred with the Indians—deeds which have been attributed to Sir John. But Americans say George Washington was descended from John, not a titled Washington. This would appear to support Mr. Simpkinson's theory.

But we have now established the fact that the ancestors of the famous George emigrated to America. Augustine Washington died in 1743, when his second son George was twelve years old, leaving a large landed property to his family. To the eldest son he bequeathed the estate afterwards known as Mount Vernon, in honour of the Admiral Vernon under whom Lawrence served in the expedition against Carthagena. George, it is recorded, received an offer to serve as midshipman with the Admiral, but yielded to his mother's wishes and remained at home.

The education of those days did not extend very far. The rudiments of English were the subjects usually taught, but George Washington added land-surveying and book keeping to this course of study, the latter a particularly useful accomplishment in a country like America at that time. He grew rapidly, and became very tall ; his strength developed, but his moral qualities kept pace with his physical advance ; for at the age of thirteen we read that young George wrote out for his own use one hundred and ten maxims of civility and good behaviour. He afterwards paid some attention to French, but never got far beyond the rudiments of the language. His physical endurance was very great ; he was a fearless rider, and he early acquired a character for justice, veracity, and a high sense of honour among his companions. He passed a great deal of his time with his brother at Mount Vernon, and also employed himself in surveying the extensive territory of Lord Fairfax, who owned great estates in the Virginia valley, of which his cousin William Fairfax (whose daughter Lawrence Washington had married) was agent. George was paid a doubleloon per diem, and frequently camped out for weeks at a time in the woods, in peril of Indians and more savage squatters, for the majority of the former were then disposed to be friendly. He was afterwards appointed public surveyor.

His life in the woods was an arduous one, but the spirit and determination which had impelled the youth to mount and ride to death a half-wild horse never previously backed, now stood him in good stead.* He kept a journal at this time, and his description of a night passed in his cabin is not unattractive. He says :—

“ Worked hard till night, and then returned. After supper we were lighted into a room, and I not being so good a woodman as the rest, stripped myself very orderly and went into bed, as they call it, when, to my surprise, I found it to be nothing but a little straw matted together, without sheet or anything else, but only one threadbare blanket, with double its weight of vermin.”

George had always been a great favourite of Lawrence's, and was naturally a great deal with him ; and so three years passed—the summers

* The anecdote runs thus :—His mother had a beautiful pair of greys which had never been saddled, and the animal would allow no one to mount him. But one morning George, then about thirteen, watched his opportunity and leaped upon its back. The colt plunged and reared, and, at last despairing of dislodging its rider, darted away at full speed. When almost exhausted with its terrible race, George still urged the animal, which at last burst a blood-vessel and fell dead. His mother, when he told her, said, “ My son, I forgive you because you have the courage to tell the truth at once. Had you skulked away I should have despised you.”

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

spent in surveying for Lord Fairfax, and the winters at Mount Vernon.

So far as the foundation of his fortune depended upon himself, George Washington's was partly laid by the knowledge he picked up in this work, his meetings with the Indians, and his acquaintance with their manners and customs,—a knowledge which afterwards stood him in good stead. Lord Fairfax, an eccentric nobleman, who had built a large house which he called Greenway Court, befriended the lad. Many distinguished individuals were entertained by the noble host, but George was always most cordially received.

The tide of emigration was then setting in fast and rising over the Alleghanies. The English colonists, coarse and cruel, soon began to endeavour to exterminate the Indians. Desperadoes went killing and outraging the natives, till the latter rose, and terrible reprisals were made. The French also claimed dominion, and, in addition to the Indians, the French nation was ready to take up arms against the English. The settlement of Virginia began to make military preparations, for neither the French nor the English nation would give way. The British came across the mountains from the east coast; the French, descending from Canada, constructed a chain of forts on the Ohio, to intercept the projects of the English Ohio Company, in which Captain Lawrence Washington took a great interest.

Before going farther it will be as well to explain briefly the circumstances which led to the outbreak of war, or rather series of wars, which cost England and France so dear, in the loss of their possessions in North America.

After the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle the boundaries between the English and French colonies had been left undecided. The most desirable territory lay west of the Alleghany Mountains, including the valley of the Ohio—a territory of immense extent and of great productive power, with fine hunting and fishing grounds. The French claimed, by right of discovery by Padre Marquette and Juliot, who had sailed down the Mississippi, the right over that river and all its tributaries—the Ohio being one. This, of course, would give them an immense territory, and one practically illimitable.

To this the British replied that by their treaty with the Indians the latter had relinquished to them all title to the land west of the mountains even to the Mississippi, "which had been conquered by their forefathers." "These were the shadowy foundations," says Washington Irving, "of claims which the two nations were determined to maintain to the uttermost."

We may now resume. The Ohio Company was formed in 1749, to secure a participation in the trade with the Indians; but the French were in the field before the Company, headed by Hanbury, a London merchant, could obtain its charter. The French warned the Indians not to trade with the British; but the natives became suspicious, and Governor Hamilton of Pennsylvania, on receipt of a letter from the French pioneers, determined to make friends with the Indians, who, after an interview, sent back the French ambassadors and declared for the English. The French then determined to make a counter demonstration, which they did. They advanced their vessels upon Lake Ontario, and upon the upper waters of the Ohio.

The British Colonies also aroused themselves, and the hum of war preparation was heard by all who cared to listen. The time had arrived when the question of boundaries must be measured by the sword, and possession would be claimed at the point of the bayonet.

The province of Virginia was at once divided into districts when it was apparent that a war with France was imminent. George Washington was appointed to one district, with the rank of Major; but as his elder brother was soon afterwards taken ill, and ordered to the West Indies, it was arranged that George should accompany him. They sailed for Barbadoes in September 1751, and after a voyage which lasted five weeks, reached their destination in safety. They had not been long in the island when George was attacked by small-pox, from which he recovered, but slightly marked; and subsequently his brother, finding no benefit from the change, determined to remove to Bermuda, and George Washington was commissioned to fetch his sister-in-law to her husband. But in consequence of the rapid increase of Lawrence Washington's malady, the suggested removal could not be carried out. He returned to Virginia, in the summer of 1752, and shortly afterwards died, at the age of thirty-four, leaving a large fortune to an only daughter, who did not long survive. When this child died, George found himself master of Mount Vernon, and subsequently added to it by purchases.

But the time for George Washington to move was now at hand. From this period (1753) he resumed his appointment as adjutant, and the Governor of Virginia was instructed by the Ministry to build forts near the Ohio, and cannon, with ammunition, were sent out from England, the Governor meanwhile determining to communicate with the French Commandant, and demand his authority for acting as he was doing, and his designs. It was a difficult and dangerous mission to undertake, and the individual who could perform it must combine tact and ability with a knowledge of the manners of the Indian tribes.

The desiderata were supposed, and with justice, to be existent in Major George Washington, who, though only twenty-one, was at once entrusted with this very delicate mission. He first made known to the Indians the object of his expedition, and then boldly advanced to the French posts, with a small Indian escort, to demand an answer to his despatches.

The distance to the French station was one hundred and twenty miles. At Venango certain attempts were made to impede his allies, but Captain Joncaire received Washington with civility, and directed him to the Commandant, M. de Saint-Pierre. The attentions of the French included a very excellent supper, and considerable potations. The latter service Washington deputed to his lieutenant, and keeping his own head cool, listened to and noted all the information he could collect from the French bon-vivants, respecting their plans, forces, and general intentions. In this diplomatic encounter, George Washington certainly came off victorious. The Indians, however, were plied with liquor, and Washington had some difficulty to get them out of Joncaire's clutches.

After three days' delay, on the 7th December, 1753, he succeeded in continuing his journey, and, accompanied by a wily Frenchman named La Force, and three soldiers, he pursued his way. After terrible privations and enormous toil, through forests and morasses, in frost and snow, he reached the French head-quarters. Here he was properly received; and while the Commandant was considering his reply, Washington, with his usual perceptions fully alive, went about taking notes of the Fort, counting the canoes and cannon, and, in fact, impressing all the surroundings upon his mind. He subsequently drew a plan of the fort and sent it to the British Government.

The reply of the French Commandant was to the effect that he could not retire, and that the Marquis Duquesne, Governor of Canada, was the person to whom the letter of the Governor of Virginia should have been addressed. Washington then took his leave, and, satisfied that mischief was brewing, he returned by water to Venango; and thence on foot, after numerous perils, including being made a target of by a treacherous Indian, whose intentions, however praiseworthy from his own point of view, were not carried out, Washington reached Williamsburg again, and delivered the reply to Dinwiddie.

The French designs being apparent, preparations for war were hurried on. Two hundred men were raised. Washington was put in command, and a position upon the Ohio determined upon. Difficulties as to money arose with the other colonies, which were unwilling to move, but at length £10,000 were grudgingly voted, and another hundred men levied. Washington, with native modesty, declined the chief command, and so Colonel Joshua Fry was put in charge, with Washington under him, ranking as Lieutenant-Colonel.

Recruiting went on at Alexandria but slowly, but at length, in April 1754, Washington found himself at the head of 150 men, and marched to Will's Creek. Another party, under Captain Trent, were busy erecting a fort on the Ohio; but the French brought down an overwhelming force from Venango, and compelled the working party to retreat. The French then established themselves in the Fort, which they completed, and called it, after the Governor of Canada, Fort Duquesne, a name destined be known in the future all over two continents.

Ensign Ward, who had surrendered himself, brought the news to Will's Creek, where Washington was now in a critical position. Sending messengers for aid, he occupied his men, advancing into the wilderness, and making a road. After a few days he heard that the French were approaching, and, hastening to a place called Great Meadows, "a charming place for an encounter," as he expresses it in his journal, Washington entrenched his small detachment and waited. But a messenger from his Indian allies informed him that the enemy was approaching their position, so Washington took forty men, and hurried off to assist the Indian "Half-King." A skirmish ensued. The French were defeated, their commander Jumville was slain, and twenty-two prisoners were taken. Washington's loss was one killed and three wounded.

This first success elated our hero, then but just twenty-two; and he wrote in high spirits to his brother, making the subsequently disputed remark about the "charm" in the "sound of the whistling of bullets," which called forth Horace Walpole's strictures on him, as a "brave braggart." Washington himself urged that if he did use such a term, he was very young at the time.

The death of Colonel Fry occurring about this time, Washington succeeded to the chief command, and, foreseeing the action of the French when they heard of the defeat of their men, he busied himself at Great Meadows in constructing a fort in a very hurried manner, which he happily termed Fort Necessity. Here his force was augmented to 400 by Captain Mackay and his men, besides a number of Indian families; thus a great demand was made upon his scanty supplies. But internal dissension arose. Captain Mackay held a royal commission, and considered it placed him in seniority to Colonel Washington, a colonial officer. Mackay declined politely to obey orders from Washington; and so, to cut the Gordian knot, the latter moved out and advanced to the Monongahela River, leaving Mackay and his company at the Fort.

Washington soon heard of the French advance, and requested Mackay to unite with him. Mackay consented, but eventually it was agreed to retire again to Fort Necessity, and prepare for the inevitable collision with the enemy of such superior force. The position had been well chosen. The fort commanded the approaches, and had easy access to the creek. Here the English colonists made every preparation to receive the French troops with all suitable attention.

On the 3rd July, the enemy's force, consisting of 900 men, approached, and at 11 a.m. opened fire, but without effect. After a desultory engagement, which lasted all day, the French commander proposed a capitulation, and sent written articles into the fort. The difficulty of rendering them intelligible was not diminished by the circumstance that they were read, under a pouring rain, by a flickering candle. Vanbraam, the interpreter, endeavoured to explain their purport, but indifferently. At length, however, the conditions were determined on, and the garrison marched out with the honours of war. The baggage was destroyed to prevent the Indians getting possession of it, and so the small army returned defeated, but not dishonoured.

Here ended Washington's first campaign. He had been commended for his conduct, and, considering his age and inexperience, he had certainly displayed high attainments as a commander. Rigid in discipline, but sharing the hardships and solicitous for the welfare of his soldiers, he had, like Colin Campbell in our day, secured their obedience and won their esteem, amid privations, sufferings, and perils that have, says Sparks, seldom been surpassed.

The Governor of Virginia did not in any way abate his zeal for the object he had in view. He gave orders to fill up the ranks lately reduced; he commanded the troops to cross the Alleghany mountains and drive the French from Fort Duquesne. These bold projects, however, it was found impossible to carry out. To fill up the ranks men must be forthcoming: there were none. To cross snow-covered mountains without transport or supplies, without clothing, ammunition, or money, without tents or sufficient arms, Washington naturally condemned as folly, and the scheme was abandoned. The energetic Dinwiddie, however, employed the winter in enlarging the army, and forming it into independent companies; the effect of which measure was to degrade George Washington to the rank of captain, and put him under the orders of men he had formerly commanded. Of course he could not submit to this arrangement; he accordingly resigned his commission, and retired from the army. Though invited by General Sharpe of Maryland, Commander-in-chief appointed by the Crown, to resume his station and commission, Washington declined to hold what "had neither rank nor emolument annexed to it," for the rule had been made that colonial officers of provincial troops should hold no rank when serving with general and field officers commissioned by the Crown. Washington was also much annoyed by the refusal of Dinwiddie to carry out the terms he had arranged with the French at the capitulation of Fort Necessity. All these circumstances decided our hero to pass the winter in retirement, and he took up his abode at Mount Vernon.

War had now become inevitable between France and England, and both Governments recognized the importance of the struggle. The English Ministers determined to drive the French troops from their positions, and the latter were as equally determined to defend them. General Braddock was sent out with two British regiments in 1755, and, after some delay in transport, commenced his disastrous expedition against Fort Duquesne. The British General fully recognized the value of Colonel Washington, who agreed to serve under him as a volunteer, as a member of the General's household. But he was subsequently nominated aide-de-camp. The utter incapacity of Braddock for such warfare as that in which he was then engaged was evident; and, deaf to the advice of Washington, or only agreeing to his suggestions with scarce disguised ill-humour or contempt, he was led into an ambush, in which his troops only escaped annihilation by the firmness of Washington and his men, who, secreting themselves behind trees, checked the advance of the French and Indian allies, and enabled the defeated British force to withdraw with their wounded commander. Had Washington's advice been taken, and the offer of the Indians, who had volunteered to scout, been accepted, the ambush would have been detected, and the conclusion of the engagement a very different one. In this encounter the bravery of Washington was conspicuous. He attempted to rally the terrified English soldiers, taken by surprise and opposed to savage warriors, but without success. He and a handful of Virginians checked the Indian advance, but two horses were shot under him, and four bullets pierced his clothing. His escape was miraculous. Five hundred British lay dead upon the field, besides those killed in the retreat.

This defeat of Braddock only served to confirm the good impression Washington had previously made. It was reported how his advice had been given and put aside, and his warnings unattended to. Eighty years after, his gold seal, which had been shot away from his dress, was found upon the field. The result of the victory to the French was of course encouraging, and the objects of the English, to capture Nova Scotia, to drive out the French settlers and to capture their Forts at Niagara, were defeated. The Indians were now encouraged to continue the war, and they perpetrated most fearful atrocities. To protect the frontier, Washington was placed in command of 700 men, and for three years he was engaged in this extremely arduous task.

In 1756, Washington visited Boston, and fell in love with the beautiful Miss Mary Phillips (or Philipse). But she was not his destiny any more than was the Lowland maid to whose graces he wrote poetry when surveying in the woods years before. Miss Phillips married Captain Morris, one of Braddock's aides, and Washington, who had meantime returned to Virginia, was not allied to a Royalist family. Mr. Everett, apropos of this attachment, writes: "One cannot but bestow a passing thought on the question what would have been the effect on the march of events if Washington, at twenty-five, had formed an alliance with a family of wealth and influence in New York, which adhered to the Royal cause, and left America as loyalists when the war broke out." It is a curious fact that in the war (in 1776), Washington's head-quarters were established in Captain Morris's house on the Harlem river.

During the years 1756 and 1757 no great events took place; and Washington in March 1758 was prostrated with fever induced by his care and troubles in his laborious command. In the same year an expedition was organized to subdue Fort Duquesne. General Forbes was appointed to the chief command. Virginia raised two regiments of 1,000 men each, and Washington was appointed colonel of one. He arrived at Fort Cumberland, and his men being destitute of regimentals, he dressed them in Indian costume. The British commanders determined to make a new road over the mountains, but Washington objected. He showed that by the existing route the army might reach the Fort in thirty-four days, with plenty of supplies in hand. But the Virginian's advice was disregarded; his suggestion that the Indians should be respected was derided, and so the warriors went home in disgust, and allied themselves with the French. Operations were very slowly conducted, and the Virginians found themselves in want of all necessities for a campaign.

Washington, in his usual decisive way, undertook to represent the state of things, and he repaired to Williamsburg with that object. He was in a great hurry, and could scarcely wait to dine with a gentleman with whom he had crossed the Pamunkey River. At last he consented reluctantly, and that dinner proved a very important occasion in his life.

Amongst the guests that evening at Mr. Chamberlain's house was a young, beautiful, and accomplished widow. She was rich, and connected with the best families in Virginia. Her name was Martha Custis. Upon George Washington she at once made a very decided impression. Her conversation was brilliant and sensible, and in her company the Colonel found time passing rapidly away. His horse was ready at the door, but was countermanded. The man, in such a hurry before dinner, was now content to remain to bask in the smiles of beauty. George Washington was only mortal. He stayed all night, and next morning hurried away to Williamsburg "hit" harder than he had ever been in battle.

Mrs. Custis had a residence near Williamsburg, called the White House, and Washington perceiving that the lady had many suitors, improved the shining hour. He succeeded in his desire. He and the beautiful widow plighted their troth, and the marriage was arranged to take place as soon as the campaign against Duquesne had come to an end. No wonder that Washington was always urging the British to advance! At length, to his great joy, he received orders to proceed to Fort Cumberland, but here July and August were passed in inaction. Had his counsels been followed, the Fort would have been captured then. But Braddock's mistake was repeated, the troops fell into a snare, and though they fought boldly against superior numbers, the expedition was abandoned, and a murderous retreat followed. In November the army was again assembled, and again advanced over the track strewn with skeletons. Washington was in the van, and proceeded with great caution. He drew near the Fort, but found it deserted. The British successes in other directions had drawn off the reinforcements, and the commandant had evacuated the place. When the English army arrived, not an enemy was to be seen. The Fort had been dismantled, and partly destroyed. It was repaired and called Fort Pitt, in honour of the great statesman.

With the termination of this campaign, Washington's military career for the time ended. He had made up his mind to retire should the expedition prove successful, for the great object of the war was accomplished. He had nothing to gain from the British Government, and no prospect of promotion. So he resigned his commission, and retired, after receiving a most handsome address and testimonial of attachment and regard from the officers who had served under him; nor was this alone the provincial opinion, it was shared by the British.

The events of this war greatly influenced Washington's life and character. Though he had achieved no brilliant success, but had been rather identified with unfortunate expeditions, he had proved to himself and to the world his resources, courage, and fortitude. This campaign was, in fact, a preparation for the great military services he was destined afterwards to render.

His marriage with Mrs. Custis took place shortly after his return. It was celebrated on the 6th January, 1759, at her residence. The union, though childless, was a very happy one, and lasted for forty years. Mrs. Washington is described as a model of all domestic virtues, pious and charitable, unostentatious and without vanity, and filling with dignity every station in which she was placed.

WASHINGTON IN PRIVATE LIFE.

We now come to a period during which Washington led a domestic life at Mount Vernon, with his wife and her children. By his marriage he had gained a very large sum of money; so to the management of his very extensive private business, and to the guardianship of his wife's two children, he now devoted himself. He had shortly before his marriage been elected as a representative to the House of Burgesses in Virginia from Frederic County. Washington did not return immediately to Mount Vernon; and when he took his seat in the House, a vote of thanks was proposed to him, in such warm-hearted and eulogistic terms, that he was quite unable to acknowledge it. The Speaker most kindly relieved him by saying, "Sit down, Mr. Washington; your modesty equals your valour, and that surpasses the power of any language that I possess." From this time Washington remained a member of the House for fifteen years, and though he seldom spoke, he always paid great attention to and studied the topic under discussion, so that he was fully master of the subject whenever he arose to address the assembly.

In April 1759, Washington and his bride retired to Mount Vernon, where he occupied himself as a planter. His industry and business habits were on a par with his military prowess. He carried out to the full the maxim that if we want a thing done we should do it ourselves, and to this he strictly adhered in all important cases. But occupied as he was, he by no means neglected social duties. He practised a large and lavish hospitality, and mixed in the best society at Annapolis and in Williamsburg. He had not lost his old taste for athletic amusements. Hunting and shooting he practised with great enjoyment, and protected his wild-fowl from intrusive poachers. On one occasion he caught a man "red-handed," and, disregarding the fowling-piece pointed at him, he rode into the water, seized the canoe, drew it to shore, and disarming the poacher, thrashed him soundly.

But not content with his own concerns and recreations as the means of fully occupying his time, he interested himself in assisting his neighbours in positions of trust, involving much labour and responsibility, as trusts are wont to do. He often acted as arbitrator, and took an active part in parish matters. He was also appointed Commissioner for military accounts, and, in fact, acquitted himself as a true citizen and patriot, in many useful works and improvements.

In this manner passed several happy years. In 1763, peace was signed between England and France, and it was hoped war was at an end. But in May the Indian tribes broke out in what was termed Pontiac's War, and the districts of the Ohio were again the scenes of slaughter and devastation. Though George Washington was not actively employed in this business, his mind was attracted more directly to the political aspect of the hour. He noted the growing discontent in the colonies, the result of the war, and of the conduct of the mother country, which endeavoured to increase its revenues by taxing the people unrepresented in its legislature. In opposing this Washington took a leading part. The suppression of the clandestine trade between the British and Spanish colonies by the English men-of-war gave great offence, and Boston declined to purchase British fabrics—which alone caused a loss to England of £10,000 in one year.

In 1764, George Grenville, then Prime Minister, instituted the Stamp Act; in March 1765 it was passed, and by it "all instruments in writing were to be executed on stamped paper from the agents of the British Government." Meanwhile meetings denouncing the levying of taxes were held in the Colonies. The preparations for enforcing the Act caused tumults in many places; and on the 13th March, 1766, the obnoxious decree was repealed. But the mischief had been done. The Colonies had been insulted, and Washington wrote: Had the Act not been repealed, "the consequences would have been more direful than is generally apprehended both to the mother country and to her Colonies."

We are obliged to pass over many incidents in Washington's domestic career, which had no bearing upon his public services,—the death of Miss Custis, his wife's daughter, and the marriage of her son, occurred respectively in 1773 and 1774. Lord Dunmore had succeeded Lord Botetourt as Governor of Virginia. The latter had at last become a favourite and very conciliatory, as well as an advocate for the repeal of the taxes. Washington undertook a peaceful expedition to the Ohio, to settle the soldiers' claims as Commissioner. But when Lord Dunmore arrived, his conduct irritated the Virginians, and the Boston tea riots having led to the closing of the port by the British, the Colonial House of Burgesses protested, and set apart the 1st June, 1773, as a day of fasting and prayer. This decision led to the dissolution of the House by Lord Dunmore; the result was that deputies were sought from other colonies, and it was recommended that they should meet at Philadelphia in September, "to deliberate upon such measures as the united interests of the colonies might require."

The first Continental Congress was held on 5th September, 1774, and addresses were forwarded to the King and people of Great Britain; the second Congress, to which Washington was also appointed a delegate, met on the 10th May, 1775, when the relations between England and the American Colonies had assumed an aspect no longer doubtful.

Parliament evidently intended to persevere in its demands; and the Congress at Philadelphia determined to prepare for the defence of the country. George Washington was chosen Chairman of all the Committees on Ways and Means. It was resolved to raise ten companies of riflemen, which were to join the army at Boston as soon as possible. From that time the troops were called the Continental Army. The affairs at Lexington and Concord, and the retreat of the British forces, had raised the battle-cry. Washington was looked to to take the command. He had received intelligence of the Lexington fight just as he was setting out for the Second Congress. In a letter to a friend he says: "Unhappy it is to reflect that a brother's sword has been sheathed in a brother's breast, and that the once happy and peaceful plains of America are to be either drenched in blood or inhabited by slaves. Sad alternative! But can a virtuous man hesitate in his choice?"

"On the 15th June the army was regularly adopted by Congress," says Irving, "and Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, rose and nominated Washington for the station of Commander-in-Chief." The appointment was unanimously voted, and Washington modestly accepted the position, declaring that he did not feel equal to it. Four major-generals were appointed,—Ward, Lee, Schuyler, and Putnam; and eight brigadiers. Washington's old friend, Horatio Gates, was adjutant-general. On the 20th June he received his commission, and on the following day he reviewed several militia companies before quitting Philadelphia for the army. Washington was now in the prime of life, "forty-three years old, stately in person, noble in demeanour, calm and dignified in deportment; as he sat his horse with manly grace, his military presence delighted every eye, and wherever he went the air rang with acclamations."

On the 25th June he arrived in New York, where he was received with delight, and where he heard the news of the battle of Bunker's Hill.

WASHINGTON AT CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

The Commander-in-Chief's first question respecting the battle of Bunker's Hill was, "Did the militia stand fire?" and when he was informed how they had behaved, he replied, "The liberties of the country are safe." He was received with addresses of congratulation at New York, Watertown, and at Springfield. On Sunday, the 2nd July, in the afternoon, Washington entered Cambridge, "escorted by a troop of light horse and a cavalcade of citizens." General Lee was with him; and at the house of the President of the College, accommodation was prepared for them; the Provincial Congress provided for servants, etc.; and Washington afterwards moved from the college to his head-quarters in the residence afterwards occupied by Mr. Longfellow, the poet.

On the morning of the 3rd July the troops were drawn up on Cambridge Common, and Washington, with a numerous suite, rode out. Under an ancient elm tree (now fenced round, an object of curiosity to thousands, and bearing a marble slab) Washington took up his position. This historical tree is believed to be a survivor of the "forest primeval." The trunk is six feet in diameter, and the whole tree is full of life. One of its branches has been made into a pulpit for a church close by; and on the granite slab referred to is the following inscription:—

UNDER THIS TREE
WASHINGTON
OF THE AMERICAN ARMY,
JULY 3RD, 1775

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

The people crowded to behold this celebrated man, whose appearance is thus described:—"They saw a man forty-three years old, about six feet two inches in height, of well-proportioned figure, with large hands and feet, and a somewhat florid complexion, a profusion of brown hair brushed back from the forehead, and blue eyes, which were very far apart. His whole appearance was dignified and commanding. He wore a blue coat with buff facings, and buff small-clothes; a rich epaulette on each shoulder, and a cockade in his hat."

He was received with the greatest enthusiasm, but found little order or discipline in the camp. General Gage and the English occupied Bunker's Hill, and the Americans were stationed on Winter and Prospect Hills in the village, and at Roxburg. Washington's first business was to erect defences, to secure his positions, and to prevent the British from reaching the country beyond. He divided the army into three divisions, of two brigades of twelve regiments each. The men from each colony were placed together. General Lee commanded the left wing on the hills, Ward the right, at Roxburg, and Putnam the centre at Cambridge. The enemy then numbered about twelve thousand; the Americans (all told) about sixteen thousand; and had to guard a circle of eight or nine miles, from Mystic River to Dorchester. The Americans were wretchedly equipped—no uniforms, no money, and a very scanty supply of ammunition; in fact, only nine rounds per man could be counted upon.

Washington reported to Congress the difficulties under which he was labouring. He required engineers and proper tools to construct works, and there were no tents. The arrangements for supplies were inconvenient, clothing was insufficient, and he requested that ten thousand hunting shirts might be sent. During the next few months many skirmishes took place, but no important changes in the situation occurred. The whole condition of affairs made the position very trying for George Washington. Great things were expected of him. Congress and the country were awaiting his movements, but he did nothing. The troops had only engaged for a year, and at the expiration of that time they wished to return home. They grumbled at the strict discipline in the name of liberty; and had the enemy had any idea of the lack of ammunition, the colonists might have been beaten within a few weeks. But General Gage, and Howe his successor, had no idea of the straits to which the Americans were reduced. Washington endeavoured to keep the real facts secret even from his officers; and as winter came on, the situation of the "naked army" became deplorable. On the other hand, famine began to prevail in Boston. Washington having cut off all communications from the country, no supplies could be obtained except by sea. As a counter stroke, a raid into Canada was determined upon, but it ended in disaster; and at length the Commander made up his mind to attack the town. But his generals would not consent to his suggestion. They believed the enterprise was too dangerous, and the year passed, a few captures of arms and stores at sea cheering the besiegers.

On the 1st January, 1776, the American army unfolded its new flag of thirteen stripes; but the force had diminished to 10,000 men, almost destitute of arms, ammunition, and uniform. The country knew not Washington's weakness; and in great perplexity he writes: "I have often thought how much happier I should have been if, instead of accepting the command under such circumstances, I had taken my musket on my shoulder and entered the ranks." General Knox had been sent to Teconderoga for cannon and ordnance stores, and at length arrived in February; ten regiments of militia also came in, and, what was even more welcome, a supply of powder.

On Monday, 4th March, Washington opened fire on Boston, or rather on the British works, and soon afterwards the master stroke, the checkmate, was given. Under cover of the bombardment, a train of waggons with entrenching tools, etc., and 2,000 men, were sent to the Dorchester heights, and, under cover of darkness, the fortifications were thrown up to command the town and harbour. When daylight revealed the rapidly constructed forts, General Howe was thunderstruck, and exclaimed: "The rebels have done more in one night than my army would have done in a month!" He felt that he must now either dislodge the Americans or evacuate the town. He determined upon the former alternative; but the stars in their courses fought against the English army: a tremendous storm came on, and churned up such a tempestuous sea that the reinforcements were unable to land from the ships. The attack was delayed; and meanwhile Washington was hard at work on his new batteries, from which the British cannonade could not dislodge him. Brave and well-equipped as the army was, General Howe perceived that nothing would now be gained by fighting. The Americans could batter his vessels, cut off his retreat, and capture the town if they pleased from such a point of vantage. Washington was averse to shed blood or to bombard the town; he sent a message to General Howe, that if he would evacuate without plundering or doing any harm, he would not open fire. The correspondence continued, and General Howe, greatly mortified, sent informal notes to Washington, not being willing to recognise his rank. However, at length, on the 17th March, 1776, the embarkation commenced, and many refugees accompanied the troops. The Americans stood match in hand beside their guns, looking upon the scene below, but never a shot was fired. At two o'clock on the 18th the colonists marched into Boston triumphant. The English fleet withdrew to Halifax. The siege was raised.

On all sides congratulations were showered upon the Commander-in-Chief. He had played a waiting game, and had been successful. "The select men" of Boston sent greeting; the House of Massachusetts presented him with a testimonial. Congress thanked him, and ordered a gold medal to be struck in his honour, in commemoration of his success. Indeed, when we look at the relative resources of the respective armies, and the physical, moral, and material obstacles against which the American General had to contend, we may assign George Washington a high place on the roll of successful chiefs. He had the most difficult position to fill; on all sides demands for action, when action was impossible, except to end in defeat; and he knew defeat at first would imperil his cause entirely. He bore all without flinching, and carried the day, by determination and patience, at last. But a long and distressing campaign had still to be fought. It was perceived that the English troops would attack New York, where Washington arrived on the 13th April, and the mother country made great efforts for the subjugation of the colonies. In May, Washington was obliged to proceed to Philadelphia, and his presence reassured Congress, there sitting. He pointed out that it was impossible to satisfy the demands of England, and that reconciliation was hopeless. It does not appear that he made any attempt to find out whether a peace honourable to the colonial generals could be carried out or not. He submitted that all the strength of America must be put forth in conflict. As, however, Washington was a humane man, as well as a patriot, we may be assured that he acted from conviction at the time. At any rate his views were accepted by Congress. The Assembly offered a bounty of ten dollars, and a force of 13,000 men was dispatched to New York. In addition to this, orders were issued for the construction of fire-ships and small vessels, to harass the English fleet; but even then Washington had his misgivings. He wrote on this occasion to his brother:—"We expect a bloody summer in New York and Canada, and I am sorry to say we are not either in arms or men prepared for it. However, it is to be hoped that if our cause is just, as I most religiously believe, the same Providence which has in many instances appeared for us, will still go on to afford us aid."

The English made great efforts to gain possession of New York. Mr. Sparks says: "A deep plot, originating with Governor Tryon, was defeated by timely and fortunate discovery. His agents were found enlisting men in the American camp, and enticing them with rewards. It was a part of the plot to seize General Washington, and carry him to the enemy." Tryon was working through agents, and is said to have offered, through them, from his position in a man-of-war in the harbour, a bounty of five guineas to each one who would enlist for the King's service. That the British intended to make an effort was evident, for about forty vessels soon arrived, bringing 10,000 troops from Halifax. It was evidently expected that some of the colonists would join the English, for General Howe wrote home to the effect that "there is reason to believe that a numerous body of the inhabitants will join the army from the province of York, the Jerseys, and Connecticut, who only wait for opportunities to give proofs of their loyalty and zeal."

There is no doubt that many hundreds of the population, particularly in Staten Island, were favourable to the British; and now the question was mooted in Congress, and discussed, as to whether the Colonies should not declare themselves independent. This resolution was passed on the 2nd July, 1776; and two days subsequently the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed and adopted. This 4th July is still observed in America, and wherever Americans most do congregate. John Adams declared that, "This will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival." The "succeeding generations" have taken this advice.

Washington was of course delighted at the event, but at the same time his joy was somewhat damped when he considered the tremendous odds against which he and the colonists had to contend. When the Declaration was read, the people were in such haste to cut themselves free from the country to which they owed their existence, that they pulled down a leaden statue of George III., and ran him into bullets to shoot his troops withal. This patriotic action drew down a rebuke from Washington, who thought it savoured of "lawlessness and riot." He therefore trusted that every officer and soldier "would live and act as became a Christian defending the dearest rights and liberties of his country." But the rights and liberties did not apply to public statues of the King.

Admiral Lord Howe was now in command of the British fleet, and his brother Sir William of the troops. Both these gentlemen, from their point of view, regarded the Americans as rebels, and declined to recognise the military rank of Washington. The admiral sent a couple of ships up the Hudson; the Americans sank a boat or two, and did all they could to prevent a further advance of the enemy by water. About this time Clinton received a repulse off Charleston, N. Carolina, and Washington again improved the occasion by announcing the fact in the following terms:—"With such a bright example before us of what can be done by brave men fighting in defence of their country, we shall be loaded with a double share of shame and infamy if we do not acquit ourselves with courage, and manifest a determined resolution to conquer or die." But this heroic declaration did not prevent disaster. The English landed on Long Island, and proceeded to take possession of Brooklyn Heights. Washington appeared out-manned; it seemed as if he had not a chance, and the British troops landed without opposition. After a severe struggle, they fought their way up in the teeth of the fortifications prepared by General Greene. An American writer on this battle pretends to excuse at the English troops for the "caution" in the attack upon these heights. He conveniently forgets that the Americans had displayed much greater caution in entrenching themselves behind what he says himself were "strong outworks." At any rate, the cautious policy prevailed. The Americans were driven from their positions and suffered terribly. Washington is said to have exclaimed, "Oh, good God, what brave fellows I must this day lose!"

The escape of the American forces was now a very improbable event. The English fleet guarded the water in the rear. Victorious English troops were encamped in front. East River flowed between the American troops and the city. Again on this occasion Nature came to the rescue. A dense fog arose on the heights, while the city was perfectly clear. In the darkness caused by the fog, and in the silence of the night, the colonists retreated across the river. Taking advantage of the thick mist, and knowing every inch of the ground, they—

"Folded their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently stole away!"

Long Island was now entirely in possession of the English. Much mortified at the escape,* they were perhaps inclined to take more vigorous measures, and they tried to prevent the escape of the Americans at King's Bridge. Many engagements ensued, and the colonists got disheartened. Desertions were frequent and numerous, and an unofficial attempt was made by Franklin and John Adams to persuade Lord Howe to grant terms. He appeared anxious to arrange matters, but, unfortunately, he was then only authorized to grant a peace if the colonists would return to the British Crown. This was at once declined, and the war went on. The King's troops, simultaneously with the fleet, attacked the town, and a most disastrous retreat was the result. The day was one of fervent heat, and the sufferings of innocent women and children were dreadful. Hunger, thirst, and the attacks of the enemy, all combined to render this retreat one of the most distressing to read of. Washington personally made almost superhuman exertions, and succeeded in saving his men from annihilation. But for the extraordinary inactivity of the English commanders, the whole of the American force must have been swept away.

* Sparks says: "This retreat, in its plan, execution, and success, has been regarded as one of the most remarkable military events in history, and as reflecting

Washington withdrew to Manhattan, but was obliged to abandon the island and establish his head-quarters at White Plains on the mainland. But in October the English forces appeared to attack this encampment also, and an engagement ensued. On the night of the 31st October, Washington again retreated before his persistent foe, and entrenched himself in the difficult hilly district about North Castle. The caution of the English General did not admit of an attack upon such a position. He turned aside and retired; the Americans no doubt thinking he was defeated.

But Howe had his plans marked out. He made for Fort Washington. Its namesake hurried in that direction, and was in time to witness General Howe's attack and capture of the Fort with more than 2,000 of the American army. Washington saw the fall of the stronghold, and his sympathies were so aroused that it is reported "he wept with the tenderness of a child." No doubt this was a great loss, and Washington was greatly annoyed that the fort had been evacuated. He had certainly recommended General Greene to remove the men and stores from Mount Washington, but left the matter to his discretion, as we see by the following extract:—"I am inclined to think that it will not be prudent to hazard the men and stores at Mount Washington.

the highest credit on the talents and skill of the commander. For forty-eight hours Washington did not close his eyes, and rarely dismounted from his horse."

But as you are on the spot I leave it to you to give such orders as to evacuating Mount Washington as you may judge best, so far revoking the orders given to Colonel Morgan to defend it to the last."

General Washington now removed his army over the Hudson, and on November 20th, the British also crossed at night, and Fort Lee was abandoned. The English were descending upon Philadelphia, and the clamour raised against Washington at that time grew very loud. His army was almost destitute. The great contrast between the American and English troops is thus described by Irving:—

"The people of New Jersey beheld the Commander-in-Chief retreating through their country with a handful of men, weary, way-worn, dispirited, without tents, without clothing, many of them bare-footed, exposed to wintry weather, and driven from post to post by a well-clad, triumphant force tricked out in all the glittering bravery of war."

There can be little exaggeration in this, for an English officer has recorded that he never saw such a "set of tattermadallions:."—"There are few coats among them but what are out at elbows, and in a whole regiment there is scarce a pair of breeches. Judge then how they must be pinched by a winter campaign!"

Pinched they were, indeed. Hurried from place to place in rage, on the 2nd December the army reached Trenton. It was here that Washington's brilliant coup de main revived the drooping courage of the people. He had about 3,000 men. He crossed the Delaware, however, and seized all the boats he could find for miles up and down, and broke down the bridges. But aware that ice would soon form, and that the British army would then cross, he determined upon a very bold stroke, and one that was successful. On Christmas night, when he judged that the German auxiliaries would be carousing, he crossed in a snow-storm, and landing nine miles above Trenton, marched in two divisions and attacked the town. Colonel Ruhl was thoroughly surprised, and the men threw down their arms. The British lost, it is said, about twenty or thirty killed; 1,000 prisoners were taken, with the guns and munitions of war. The Americans lost four men.

After this action a sort of panic set in for a short time amongst the British troops. When General Howe heard of the affair he was completely puzzled. "Is it possible," said he, "that three veteran British regiments have laid down their arms to a ragged and undisciplined militia?" Lord Cornwallis rallied the force at Princeton, and got the "rebels" in a trap, as he thought;

but the American general again foiled the foe by making a rapid night march while they slept, and in the morning he suddenly fell upon the rear guard at Princeton, and defeated it, capturing stores, prisoners, and ammunition. Washington now was in rear of his foe, and if Cornwallis advanced, the American would surely fall upon his magazines at Brunswick. Yet Cornwallis compelled Washington to retreat to winter quarters in the hill country, where he was safely and strongly intrenched; but Washington wrote: "The enemy must be ignorant of our numbers and situation, or they would never suffer us to remain unmolested."

About this time the celebrated Polish general Kosciusko offered to serve under Washington, and brought to him a letter from Franklin. The Commander-in-Chief asked the Pole what he wanted. "To fight for American independence," replied Kosciusko. "What can you do?" asked Washington. "Try me," was the laconic answer. He was appointed aide-de-camp, and fought well.

It is impossible within the space at our disposal to follow Washington step by step through the various fortunes of the Revolutionary War. The brilliantly-conceived and well-executed successes of Princeton and Trenton were followed by the disasters of Brandywine,—where the Americans were completely out-manœuvred and defeated,—and the retreat of Germantown, where again victory declared for the British. With these defeats Gates's great success at Saratoga contrasted, but Washington's popularity was rudely shaken. The dreadful winter at Valley Forge, where he was in quarters, might have proved disastrous had not the supineness of the English General left the Americans unmolested in their snowed-up condition, where they could have been easily defeated. Indeed, on many occasions the unwillingness of the British to follow up successes gave the Americans great advantages, of which Washington availed himself to the full; for his was not a brilliant military career, when tried by the popular standard of success.

The American General frequently represented to Congress the deplorable condition of his army, destitute of almost all necessaries, barefooted, and without clothing. The sufferings of the soldiers must have been terrible, and thousands were in hospital, many hundreds because they were half naked. The war might probably have been ended at Valley Forge, had not the English been amusing themselves in their winter quarters in Philadelphia. Washington was preparing for the spring campaign. He was ere long cheered by the news that the French had declared for his side. The result was the English retreated from Philadelphia and made for New York. The engagement at Monmouth Court House was turned from a shameful retreat into a victory for the Americans by Washington's presence of mind. Lee was actually in retreat when the main body, with the Commander-in-Chief, rode up, and checked the British advance. A sharp battle ensued, and the armies encamped at nightfall face to face. But in the morning the English forces were absent. From that time the war languished, and no really substantial blow was struck till the combined French and American forces, with the French fleet, invested Yorktown. By a series of assaults they weakened the garrison, and numbers prevailed. Cornwallis was disappointed that the English fleet did not arrive to rescue him, and on the very day it took its tardy departure from New York he surrendered (October 1781) with his reduced garrison. Meantime the British had invaded the South, and paid a visit to Mount Vernon, where they would have committed havoc had not Washington's steward supplied them with provisions. This act of treating with an enemy, and supplying him with food, aroused Washington's anger. He would have preferred the destruction of his house.

The surrender at Yorktown virtually put an end to the war, although the contest lingered for more than a year. At length a treaty was concluded at Paris, on April 19th, 1783, and the long and disastrous struggle, which had continued for eight years, was brought to an end. There were many things to be settled before the arrangements for peace could be finally made; but at least the preliminaries were settled; and in conveying his thanks to the army, from which he was now shortly to be parted, Washington spoke highly of their services and of the kindly feeling which had always existed between him and those under his command. In his speech he said: "To the various branches of the army the General takes this last and solemn opportunity of professing his invariable attachment and friendship. He wishes more than bare professions were in his power, that he was really able to be useful to them all in future life. He flatters himself, however, that they will do him the justice to believe that whatever could with propriety be attempted by him has been done."

It was not, as we have said, till November that New York was evacuated, for it was found impossible to convey all the people and their effects away before that time. Sir Guy Carleton had given due notice to the American commander. "On the 21st the British troops were drawn in from the oft-disputed post of King's Bridge, and from McGowan's Pass, also from the various posts on Long Island . . . and the afternoon of November 25th was appointed by Sir Guy for the evacuation of the city and the opposite village of Brooklyn."

There was some talk of plundering the place after the departure of the King's troops, but Washington took precautions against any such acts. The Americans moved in at the upper end, while the English were leaving the city at the lower. The contrast in the appearance of the soldiers is thus described by an eye-witness:—

"We had been accustomed for a long time to military display in all the finish and finery of garrison life; the troops just leaving us were as equipped for show, and with their scarlet uniforms and burnished arms made a brilliant display. The troops that marched in, on the contrary, were ill-clad and weather-beaten, and made a forlorn appearance; but then they were our troops, and as I looked at them, and thought upon all they had done and suffered for us, my heart and my eyes were full, and I admired and gloried in them the more because they were weather-beaten and forlorn."

In this manner America became free and independent; and George Washington having led the army to New York, was obliged to proceed to Annapolis to beg leave of Congress to resign his commission. On December 4th, 1783, he met a number of his old companions in arms at the Frances Tavern, where they had assembled to wish him good-bye. He was much affected, and on parting with them concluded his remarks in the following words:—

"With a heart full of love and gratitude I now take leave of you. I most devoutly wish that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy as your former have been glorious and honourable. I cannot come to each of you to take my leave, but shall be obliged if each of you will come and take me by the hand."

When the painful ceremony was over, he hastened away. His progress was a triumph. He was greeted everywhere with acclamations of respect and esteem. He paused in Philadelphia to hand in his accounts, which he had accurately kept. The sum expended by him amounted to £14,500, a ridiculously small sum to charge; but frequently supplemented, we believe, by private advances when public money was not immediately forthcoming. On December 23rd he was present at the Continental Congress at Annapolis, where he resigned his authority in these words:—

"Having now finished the work assigned me, I retire from the great theatre of action, and bidding an affectionate farewell to thy august body, under whose orders I have so long acted, I here offer my commission and take my leave for all the employments of private life."

In reply, the President said: "You retire from the theatre of action with the blessings of your fellow-citizens; but the glory of your virtue will not terminate with your military command, it will continue to animate remotest ages."

WASHINGTON IN RETIREMENT.

For some time after his retirement Washington devoted himself to his former occupations of farming and planting. The estate of Mount Vernon comprised about 8000 acres, and perhaps half of this was under cultivation. He had had this divided into five farms, with a separate staff of labourers and an overseer for each. The method and order with which the business was carried on was surprising. Weekly reports were made and transmitted to the owner when he was absent, including the amount of work done by each man, condition of the stock, etc., etc. The rotation of crops was arranged for years in advance, and he at one time gave up the cultivation of tobacco because the growth of it was injurious to the labourers' health, and exhausting to the soil. A slaveowner from the force of circumstances, he was an advocate for emancipation; and in his will he requested that all he could release should be liberated on the death of his wife. She held a good number in her own right. "To emancipate them before," he remarks, "would, though earnestly wished by me, be attended with such insuperable difficulties, on account of their intermixture by marriage with the dower negroes, as to excite the most painful sensations, if not disagreeable consequences to the latter, while both descriptions are in the occupancy of the same person, it not being in my power, under the tenure by which the dower negroes are held, to manumit them." He made suitable provision for their support after his death, and for their education.

A considerable portion of his time in retirement was occupied by correspondence arising from the war which had just terminated, and many days were given up to the crowd of visitors from Europe and from the American continent who came to see him and his celebrated home at Mount Vernon. He remained at home thus occupied until, in 1784, he crossed the mountains to look after his landed property beyond them, as well as to explore the rivers which rise in the interior of Virginia, with a view to their connection with the Western waters. He made a strict investigation into this, and the result was that he brought forward a project for the organisation of the Potomac Canal and James River Canal Companies. By an unanimous vote of Assembly, fifty shares in the former and one hundred in the latter undertaking were given to Washington, amounting in the aggregate to 40,000 dollars.

This testimony he nobly declined as a personal gift, and eventually he accepted them in trust for institutions devoted to public education.

Washington at first could scarcely realize that he was again a free citizen and released from camp life and military duties. "It was not till very lately," he writes, "I could get the better of my usual custom of ruminating as soon as I waked in the morning on the business of the ensuing day, and my surprise, after revolving many things in my mind, that I was no longer a public man nor had anything to do with public transactions." To Lafayette he wrote: "I am solacing myself with those tranquil enjoyments of which the soldier who is ever in pursuit of fame . . . can have very little conception. I have not only retired from all public employments, but I am retiring within myself, and shall be able to view the solitary walk and tread the paths of private life with heartfelt satisfaction."

These extracts show the adaptability of Washington's character for any situation of life to which he found himself called. He had thrown himself at first into surveying, then turned with vigour to military duties, and again to farming. When duty again called him to the field he took command and worked with all his might in the highest position. Then he quietly exchanged the sword for the reaping-hook and hoe, to cultivate his ground as energetically as he had defended his country. He was plain and unostentatious. His fare was simple. He writes to a friend: "My manner of living is plain, and I do not mean to be put out of it. A glass of wine and a bit of mutton are always ready, and such as will be content to partake of them are always welcome. Those who expect more will be disappointed."

Washington in private life was a model of domestic virtues and exactness. "Kind and benignant in the social circle," writes a visitor to Mount Vernon, "revered and beloved by all around him, agreeably social, without ostentation, delighting in anecdote and adventures, his domestic arrangements harmonious and systematic." A look was equivalent to a command. "He modestly waived all allusions to the events in which he had acted so glorious and conspicuous a part." Many anecdotes are related of his kindness, such as bringing his visitor who had a cold a cup of hot tea to his bedroom; and how, when at :

religious meeting, he relinquished the seat set apart for him to a woman carrying a child, and remained standing himself all the service. He was fond of society and dancing, and humoured a joke. On one occasion, a gentleman joining the ladies very early, it was determined to capture the "deserter." Washington volunteered to lead the attack, and sent a formal summons into the drawing-room. The ladies refused, and the capture was attempted. The ladies opposed Washington's force, and he was beaten in the mêlée, in which he encountered Mrs. Olney. These instances will serve to show that he was by no means an austere or puritanical personage, though he rarely indulged in loud merriment. Although ostensibly in retirement, Washington noted all the appearances of the political horizon; and when a riot broke out in Massachusetts, he was appointed delegate to the Convention at Philadelphia organised to revise the Federal system. The first quorum met on 25th May, and Washington was elected its President. The result of the meetings was the formation of the constitution of the United States, and was forwarded to Congress. The necessary testimonials of ratification by the States having at length been received, the first Wednesday in January 1789 was appointed for the people to choose electors of a president; and on the first Wednesday in February they were to meet and choose the President. The first meeting of the Government was arranged for the first Wednesday in March, at New York.

In consequence of some delays the votes of the electors were not taken until April. It was then found that every vote was in favour of George Washington, and on the 14th he was informed of his position, which he had hoped would not be forced upon him. But he felt obliged to obey his country's call, and "bade adieu to private life and domestic felicity." His progress was an ovation, and continual rejoicings accompanied him to New York, where his reception was a triumph. On the 30th the inauguration took place, and John Adams was Vice-President. The rejoicings were universal and sincere throughout the day, and thus the "First President of the United States" was appointed.

WASHINGTON AS PRESIDENT.

The newly-elected President had not long been appointed when he was prostrated by severe illness. In the summer, while still at New York, a dangerous carbuncle formed in his thigh, which had to be operated upon by Doctor Bard. This was a check upon his usefulness; but in the autumn Washington, in his Presidential capacity, made a lengthened tour through the Eastern States; and, as might have been expected, met with a most enthusiastic reception from all classes. On this occasion he travelled with his own horses and carriage, and in the spring following he went through the Southern States. We must pass rapidly through this portion of his career. The constitution of America was now a settled fact, and Washington, as President, had to set the machinery of State going. To do this he called to his assistance General Knox, as head of the War Department; Mr. Hamilton to the control of the Treasury; and Mr. Jefferson as Secretary of State; Randolph was Attorney-General. These Ministers had no inconsiderable trouble and anxiety, for all foreign affairs were in a very unsettled condition. The feeling existing between England and America was certainly the reverse of cordial, which neither nation tried honestly to subdue. The Americans, or the United States as they then were, put all possible difficulties in the way of British subjects recovering their debts; while England kept impressing American seamen to fight her battles. The relations also between France and America after the French Revolution gave rise to much bitter feeling in the States. Two political parties were formed, the Federalists, Washington at their head, who voted for the maintenance of the constitution; and the Republicans, with Jefferson, who wished to introduce amendments to limit the federal power. Foreign relations were not improved by the debts owing to France and Holland, and by the retention of certain forts in the West by the English, who also declined to send a Minister to New York till 1791,—just eight years after the treaty of 1783,—although an American envoy had been previously despatched to London.

But all these varied complications were eventually cleared up by the tact and administrative powers of George Washington and his Ministers. The insults of France were overlooked; the British discussion was patiently carried on by Mr. Jefferson. Hamilton devoted his mind to the fundings system, and brought the credit of the country to a satisfactory point. The tide of commerce began to flow steadily, and the population rapidly increased, and occupied the great Western land. The Indians there had inflicted loss upon the American arms in 1790 and 1791; but the settlements upon the Ohio having been given up by the English (1794), the tide of emigration was not further checked.

But before the termination of his official duties, Washington began to long for the enjoyments and for the peace of private life. The party disputes we have referred to gave him uneasiness. His Cabinet was divided, as well as the Legislature and the country, upon the question of the Funding System, and the financial arrangements proposed by Hamilton. At length Washington decided in his Treasurer's favour. In 1792, the President prepared his farewell address, but being again unanimously re-elected, he was obliged to serve for another term of four years. Still it is a curious fact, that towards the latter portion of his second term of office, Washington's popularity suffered greatly, particularly in his native State. In 1796 he formed an irrevocable resolution to retire from public life, which he accordingly did, as he then imagined for ever, and for twelve months enjoyed that tranquillity which for eight years had been denied to him.

Scarcely had the year passed ere he was once more called upon by the country. A rupture with France was threatening, and great preparations were made by Congress for the anticipated war. Washington was appointed Lieutenant-General of the armies of the United States. But the war cloud did not break openly, and it is stated that Washington never believed that it would. Still the nation was very indignant at the treatment of their envoys, and the American frigate Constellation actually fought and captured a French frigate of superior metal, in the West Indies. But Washington did not live to see the peace he had anticipated, for the close of the year 1799 saw the end of his valuable life.

THE LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH OF WASHINGTON.

The year 1799 was drawing to a close, and no one was in better health and spirits than George Washington; and though then in his sixty-eighth year, he was in the full enjoyment of all his faculties. On the morning of 12th December, he took his usual ride around his farm, but about one o'clock a snow-storm was succeeded by a cold rain, which, however, did not induce Washington to return home. He continued on horseback, and when he came back, he sat down to dinner without changing his attire, and then it was remarked that the snow was still clinging to his hair. Next day, notwithstanding the snow, though he omitted his ride, he went out to superintend some work, even while complaining of having caught cold. But no anxiety was felt, although his hoarseness that evening excited remark. But he replied, "It is only a cold. Let it go as it came. I never take anything to carry off a cold." The evening passed as usual, reading and answering letters till bedtime.

Between two and three o'clock in the morning he awoke his wife and told her he had an ague fit and felt very unwell; but he would not permit the family to be disturbed, nor would he let his wife leave her bed for fear she should catch cold. At daylight his secretary went for Doctor Craik; Washington meanwhile having been bled by one of his overseers. The doctor speedily arrived, and other physicians came in consultation; but though he was again bled, Washington experienced no relief. About half-past four he requested his wife to fetch two papers from his study. One she destroyed at his desire, the other was kept as his will. "I die hard," he said to the doctor, "but I am not afraid to go. I believed from my first attack that I should not survive it. My breath cannot last long." At six o'clock, the three physicians being around his bed, he said, "I feel myself going. I thank you for your attentions. I pray you take no more trouble about me." About ten o'clock he said with difficulty, "I am just going; have me decently buried, and do not let my body be put into the vault till three days after I am dead." Then, presently, "Do you understand me?" Mr. Lear, to whom he had been speaking, said he did. Washington then replied, "It is well." These were his last words. Between eleven and twelve his breathing became easier. He lay quietly, and withdrew his hand from Mr. Lear's to feel his own pulse. "At that moment his countenance changed, his hand fell from the wrist, and he expired without a struggle." So Washington passed away. Mrs. Washington was seated at the foot of the bed, and learned the melancholy fact from the physician.

On December 18th his remains were deposited in the family vault at Mount Vernon, where they now repose. The news of his death was received with profound grief, not only in America but in England and France, where flags were hoisted half-mast; and Napoleon draped his national colours with black in token of respect. He left no children; but his domestic life was a most happy one—his wife being an excellent woman in every respect, and about his own age. Her son's children were adopted by Washington after their father's death. By his will, and Mrs. Washington's wish, all the slaves were emancipated immediately after his death, she declining to exercise her right of dower.

The character of Washington may be gathered from a perusal of the foregoing pages. We have already described him physically; his moral character was based upon a firm conviction of religious truth, faith in Providence, and reverence for the Christian Church. Gentle and resolute, cautious and persevering, he united many other excellent traits. Merciful in war, and forgiving in peace, he set a grand example by the purity of his life. H. F.

INTRODUCTORY.

IN the history of philosophy there are few names more conspicuous than that of Socrates the Grecian sage; and it would be hardly possible to discover one more worthy of admiration and esteem. We find in Socrates all the qualities of a good man, combined with a force of character, and an originality of speculation as well as of method, and a power of intellectually working on others, generically different from that of any professional teacher, without parallel either among contemporaries or successors. He formed a remarkable contrast to the Sophists, of whom he was the uncompromising antagonist. They had slighted and denied truth. He made truth the end of his existence, and toiled with untiring energy after perfect communion with her. They had deserted truth for money and renown. He had remained constant to her in poverty. They professed to teach everything. He only knew that he knew nothing, and denied that anything could be taught. It is to the career of this famous man that we propose to direct attention in the following pages.

BIRTH, PARENTAGE, AND EARLY LIFE.

Socrates was born at Alopece, a small village of Attica, in the fourth year of the seventy-seventh Olympiad, or about 469 B.C. His parents were far from illustrious, Sophroniscus his father being a statuary of no great note, and Phænareta his mother being a midwife. The mother, however, is represented by Plato as a woman of a bold and generous spirit; and Socrates often took occasion to mention both his parents with respect.

Sophroneiscus brought him up to his own trade, which, on his father's death, he was obliged to continue for subsistence; and as a sculptor he does not appear to have been unsuccessful. He is said to have made statues of the Graces which were allowed a place in the citadel of Athens. But as he was naturally averse to this profession, he only followed it when necessity compelled him, and employed his leisure hours in the study of philosophy. This being observed by Crito a rich philosopher of Athens, Crito took him under his patronage, and entrusted to him the education of his children. At last, having enjoyed opportunities of hearing the lectures of the most eminent philosophers, Socrates entirely abandoned the business of a statuary.

The first masters of Socrates were Anaxagoras and Archelaus. By the last he was much beloved, and Socrates travelled with him to Samos, to Pytho, and other places. He was also the scholar of Damo, whom Plato calls a most pleasing teacher of music, and of all other things that he himself would teach to young men. He heard also the instructions of Prodicus the Sophist. By listening to all these, Socrates became master of every kind of knowledge which the age in which he lived could afford; and with these uncommon endowments he appeared in Athens, under the character of a useful citizen and true philosopher.

A MILITARY CAREER.

In the long and severe struggle between Athens and Sparta, Socrates was called upon by his country to take arms, and he distinguished himself at the siege of Potidea both by his valour and by the hardiness with which he endured fatigue. During the severity of a Thracian winter, whilst others were clad in furs, he wore only his usual clothing, and walked barefooted upon the ice.

A most interesting description of Socrates during the campaign has been given in Plato. "At one time," Alcibiades is made to say—we quote a translation by Shelley,—“we were fellow-soldiers, and had our mess together in the camp before Potidaea. Socrates there overcame not only me, but every one besides, in endurance of toils: when, as happens in a campaign, we were reduced to few provisions, there were no one who could sustain hunger like Socrates; and when we had plenty, he alone seemed to enjoy our military fare. He never drank much willingly; but when he was compelled, he conquered all even in that to which he was least accustomed, and, what is most astonishing, no person ever saw Socrates drunk either then or at any other time. In the depth of winter (and the winters there are excessively rigid) he sustained calmly incredible hardships; and, amongst other things, while the frost was intolerably severe and no one went out of their tents, or if they went out wrapped themselves up carefully and put fleeces under their feet and bound their legs with hairy skins, Socrates went out only with the same cloak on that he usually wore, and walked barefoot on the ice,—more easily, indeed, than those who had sandalled themselves so delicately; so that the soldiers thought he did it to mock their want of fortitude. It would indeed be worth while to commemorate all that this brave man did and endured in that expedition.

“In one instance he was seen early in the morning standing in one place wrapped in meditation; and as he seemed not to be able to unravel the subject of his thoughts, he still continued to stand as if inquiring and discussing within himself; and when noon came, the soldiers observed him, and said to one another, ‘Socrates has been standing there thinking ever since the morning.’ At last some Ionians came to the spot, and having supped, as it was summer, bringing their blankets, they lay down to sleep in the cool: they observed that Socrates continued to stand there the whole night until morning, and that, when the sun rose, he saluted it with a prayer, and departed.

“I ought not to omit what Socrates is in battle; for in that battle in which the generals decreed to me the prize of courage, Socrates alone of all men was the saviour of my life, standing by me when I had fallen and was wounded, and preserving both myself and my arms from the hands of the enemy. On that occasion I entreated the generals to decree the prize as it was most due to him. And this, O Socrates, you cannot deny, that when the generals, wishing to conciliate a person of my rank, desired to give me the prize, you were far more desirous than the generals that this glory should be attributed not to yourself but me.

“But to see Socrates when our army was defeated and scattered in flight at Delium was a spectacle worthy to behold. On that occasion I was among the cavalry, and he on foot heavily armed. After the total rout of our troops, he and Laches retreated together : I came up by chance, and seeing them, bade them be of good cheer for that I would not leave them. As I was on horseback, and therefore less occupied by a regard of my own situation, I could better observe than at Potidæa the beautiful spectacle exhibited by Socrates in this emergency. How superior was he to Laches in presence of mind and courage ! Your representation of him on the stage, O Aristophanes, was not unlike his real self on this occasion ; for he walked and darted his regards around with a majestic composure, looking tranquilly both on his friends and enemies ; so that it was evident to every one, even from afar, that whoever should venture to attack him would encounter a desperate resistance. He and his companions thus departed in safety ; for those who are scattered in flight are pursued and killed, whilst men hesitate to touch those who exhibit such a countenance as that of Socrates even in defeat."

Several years afterwards Socrates voluntarily entered upon a military expedition against the Boeotians, during which, in an unsuccessful engagement at Delium, he retired with great boldness from the field. When so doing he saw Xenophon lying wounded on the ground ; he took him on his shoulders and bore him out of reach of the enemy. Soon afterwards he went out a third time in a military capacity, for the purpose of reducing Amphipolis ; but this proving unsuccessful, he returned to Athens, where he remained till the day of his death.

AS A SENATOR ; COURAGEOUS CONDUCT.

It was not till Socrates was upwards of sixty years of age that he undertook to serve his country in any civil office. At that age he was chosen to represent his own district in the Senate of Five Hundred. In this office, though he at first exposed himself to some degree of ridicule from want of experience in the forms of business, he soon convinced his colleagues that he was superior to them all in wisdom and integrity.

On one occasion we find him braving the clamorous mob. The Athenian Senate was composed of the Five Hundred, who were elected from the ten tribes. During a period of thirty-five or thirty-six days, the members of each tribe in turn had the presidency, and were called Prytanes. Of the fifty Prytanes, ten had the presidency every seven days ; and each day one of these ten enjoyed the highest dignity with the name of Epistates. He laid every thing before the assembly of the people put the question to the vote, examined the vote, and, in fact, managed the whole business of the assembly. This power was enjoyed by him, however, only for a single day, and for that day he had charge of the keys of the citadel and the treasury of the republic.

Socrates filled the post of Epistates on the day when the unjust sentence of condemnation was passed on the Admirals, who, after the engagement of Arginusæ, had neglected to bury the dead. To attend to the burial of the dead was a sacred duty ; and the classical scholar will remember how the Antigone of Sophocles is founded upon the sacredness of this duty. The shades of the unburied were believed to wander restlessly for a whole century on the banks of the Styx. After the Battle of Arginusæ a violent storm came on, and the Admirals were in consequence prevented from obtaining the bodies of the slain. In order to remedy this, they left behind them some inferior officers to attend to the office. The violence of the storm, however, rendered the discharge of their duty impossible. The Admirals were tried. They produced pilots as witnesses to prove that the storm had rendered the burial impracticable ; besides which they fairly argued they had left the inferior officers behind, so that the blame, if any, ought to fall on the latter. Their arguments produced their natural effect on the people, who would instantly have given an acquittal, had the vote been taken. But the accusers contrived to adjourn the assembly on the pretext that it was too dark to count the show of hands. In the meantime the enemies of the Admirals did all in their power to influence the minds of the people. The lamentations and mournful appearance of the kinsmen of the slain, who had been hired for the tragic scene, had a strong influence on the assembly. The votes were to be given on the general question whether the Admirals had erred in not taking up the bodies of the dead ; and if they should be condemned by the majority (so it was decreed by the Senate), they were to be put to death, and their property confiscated.

To condemn all by one vote, however, was contrary to law. The Prytanes, with Socrates at their head, refused to put the illegal question to the vote. The people grew furious, and loudly demanded that those who resisted their pleasure should themselves be brought to trial. The Prytanes wavered, and at last yielded. Socrates alone stood firm and defied the threats of the mob. He stood there to minister justice, and not to administer injustice.

In consequence of this refusal the question could not be put to the vote, and the assembly was again adjourned. The next day a new Epistates and other presidents succeeded, and the Admirals were condemned.

Under the tyranny which shortly followed this event, Socrates never ceased to condemn the cruel and oppressive proceedings of the thirty tyrants; and when his boldness provoked their resentment, he still continued to support with undaunted firmness the rights of his fellow-citizens. The tyrants, probably that they might create some new ground of complaint against Socrates, sent an order to him, with several other persons, to apprehend a wealthy citizen of Salamis: the rest executed the commission, but Socrates refused, saying he would rather himself suffer death than be instrumental in inflicting it unjustly upon another.

AS A PHILOSOPHER.

But whatever character he thus established as a good citizen, it is as a philosopher and moral teacher that he is chiefly renowned, and that by the concurring evidence of all antiquity. That Socrates had himself a proper school, which has been denied, may perhaps be proved from Aristophanes, who ridicules some particulars in it, and calls it his "phrontisterium." Plato mentions the Academy, Lyceum, and a pleasant meadow without the city on the side of the river Ilissus, as places frequented by him and his auditors. Xenophon affirms that he was continually abroad; that in the morning he visited the places of public walking and exercise, when it was full the Forum; and that the rest of the day he sought out the most populous meetings, where he disputed openly for any one to hear that would; and Plutarch relates that he did not only teach when the benches were prepared and himself in the chair, or in stated hours of reading and discourse, or at appointments in walking with his friends, but even when he played, or ate, or drank, or was in the camp or market, or, finally, when he was in prison, making every place a school of instruction. He had no liking for retirement, and his delight lay in the life of the town. Like Dr. Johnson, he did not care at all for the country. "Sir," said the Doctor, "when you have seen one green field you have seen all green fields: Sir, I like to look upon men. Let us walk down Cheap-side." In much the same way did Socrates address Phædrus, who accused him of being unacquainted even with the neighbourhood of Athens. "I am very anxious to learn," said he; "and from fields and trees I can learn nothing. I can only learn from men in the city." Consequently he was always to be found where men were assembled.

"It is certain," says Mr. Grote, "that all the middle and later parts of his life at least were devoted to the self-imposed task of teaching; excluding all other business public or private, and to the neglect of all means of fortune. We can hardly avoid speaking of him as a teacher, though he himself disclaimed the appellation; his practice was to talk or converse. Early in the morning he frequented the public walks, the gymnasia for bodily training, and the schools where youths were receiving instruction; he was to be seen in the market-place at the hour when it was most crowded, among the booths and tables where goods were exposed for sale: his whole day was usually spent in this public manner. He talked with any one, young or old, rich or poor, who sought to address him, and in the hearing of all who stood by: not only he never either asked or received any reward, but he made no distinction of persons, never withheld his conversation from any one, and talked on the same general subjects with all. . . .

"As his conversation was engaging, curious, and instructive to hear, certain persons made it their habit to attend him in public as companions and listeners. These men, a fluctuating body, were commonly known as his disciples and scholars, though neither he nor his personal friends ever employed the terms teacher and disciple to describe the relation between them. Now no other person in Athens, or in any other Grecian city, appears ever to have manifested himself in this perpetual and indiscriminate manner as a public talker for instruction. By the peculiar mode of life which Socrates pursued, not only his conversation reached the minds of a much wider circle, but he became more abundantly known as a person. While acquiring a few friends and admirers, and raising a certain intellectual interest in others, he at the same time provoked a large number of personal enemies. This was probably the reason why he was selected by Aristophanes and the other comic writers to be attacked as a general representative of philosophical and rhetorical teaching."

THE METHOD OF TEACHING OF SOCRATES.

The method of teaching which Socrates chiefly made use of was to propose a series of questions to the person with whom he conversed, in order to lead him to some unforeseen conclusion. He first gained the assent of his respondent to some obvious truths, and then obliged him to admit others from their relation or resemblance to those to which he had already assented. Without making use of any direct argument or persuasion, he chose to lead the person he wished to instruct to deduce the truths of which he wished to convince him, as a necessary consequence from his own concessions, and commonly conducted these conferences with such address as to conceal his design till the respondent had advanced too far to recede.

On some occasions he made use of ironical language, that vain men might be caught in their own replies, and be obliged to confess their ignorance. He never assumed the air of a morose and rigid preceptor, but communicated useful instruction with all the ease and pleasantry of polite conversation.

A TERRIBLE ANTAGONIST.

"Socrates," remarks Mr. Geo. H. Lewis, "must have been a terrible antagonist to all people who believed that they were wise because they could discourse fluently; and these were not few. He always declared that he knew nothing. When a man professed knowledge on any point, especially if admiring crowds gave testimony to that profession, Socrates was sure to step up to him and, professing ignorance, entreat to be taught. Charmed with so humble a listener, the teacher began. Interrogated, he unsuspectingly assented to some very evident proposition; a conclusion from that almost as evident next received his assent: from that moment he was lost. With great power of logic, with much ingenious subtlety, and sometimes with daring sophistication, a web was formed from which he could not extricate himself. His own admissions were proved to lead to monstrous conclusions; these conclusions he repugned, but could not see where the gist of his error lay. The laughter of all the bystanders bespoke his defeat. Before him was his adversary, imperturbably calm, apparently innocent of all attempt at making him ridiculous. Confused but not confuted, he left the spot, indignant with himself, but more indignant with the subtlety of his adversary.

"It was thus that Socrates became mistaken for a Sophist; but he was distinguished from the Sophists by his constant object. Whilst they denied the possibility of truth, he only sought to make truth evident in the ironical, playful, and sometimes quibbling manner in which he destroyed the arguments of opponents. Truth was his object, even in his lightest moments."

THE WISEST MAN OF HIS AGE.

Xenophon represents him as excelling in all kinds of learning. He instances only arithmetic, geometry, and astrology; but Plato mentions natural philosophy; Idomeneus, rhetoric; and Laertius, medicine. Cicero affirms that by the testimony of all the learned and the judgment of all Greece, he was in respect to wisdom, acuteness, politeness, and subtlety, in eloquence, variety, and richness, and in whatever he applied himself to, beyond comparison the first man of his age.

A striking peculiarity in Socrates was his persuasion of a special religious mission. Relying like his countrymen on dreams and oracles, he believed that his mission had been signified to him by those. One oracular intimation in particular he described in his defence as the turning-point in his life. One of his admirers and friends, Chærophon, about the time when he began to have some repute as a wise man, consulted the oracle at Delphi as to whether any man was wiser than Socrates. The priestess answered, "None."

When Socrates heard that Apollo had declared him to be the wisest of men he was greatly puzzled. He knew himself to be wise in nothing, and yet did not dare to think that the words of the god could be false. The course he took to satisfy himself is reported by Plato in the Apology. Socrates is there reported as saying: "I went to one of those who are esteemed to be wise, thinking that here, if anywhere, I should prove the oracle to be wrong, and to be able to say, 'Here is a man who is wiser than I.' After examining this man—there is no need that I should name him, but he was one of the politicians—and conversing with him, I came to the conclusion that this man seemed to many others, and especially to himself, to be wise, but was not so. Upon that I tried to convince him that he thought himself wise but was not. By this means I gave offence to him, and many of the bystanders. When I went away I said to myself, 'I am wiser than this man; for neither of us, it seems, knows anything valuable; but he not knowing fancies he does know; I, as I really do not know, so I do not think I know. I seem, therefore, to be in one small matter wiser than he.

"After this I went to another still wiser than he, and came to the same result; and by this I offended him, too, and many others. I went on in the same manner, perceiving with sorrow and pain that I was making enemies; but it seemed necessary to postpone all other considerations to the service of the god, and therefore to seek for the meaning of the oracle by going to all who appeared to know anything. And, O Athenians the impression produced on me was this : Those of most reputation appeared to me nearly the most deficient of all ; other people of much smaller account seemed much more rational.

"When I had exhausted the politicians, I went to the poets, tragic, dithyrambic, and others, thinking that I should surely find myself less knowing than they. Taking up those of their poems which seemed to me most laboured, I asked them—that at the same time I might learn something from them—what those poems meant. I am ashamed, O Athenians, to say the truth, but I must speak it ; there was scarcely a person present who could not have spoken better concerning their poems than they. I soon discovered that what poets do they accomplish not by wisdom, but by a kind of natural turn, and an enthusiasm like that of prophets and those who utter oracles ; for these, too, speak many fine things, but do not know one particle of what they speak.

"Last of all I resorted to artificers ; for I was conscious that I myself knew, in a manner, nothing at all, but should find them knowing many valuable things. And in this I was not mistaken ; they knew things of which I was ignorant, and were, so far, wiser than I. But they appeared to me to fall into the same error as the poets ; each, because he was skilled in his own art, insisted upon being the wisest of men in other and greater things ; and this mistake of theirs overshadowed what they possessed of wisdom. From this search, O Athenians, the consequences to me have been, on the one hand, many enmities, and of the most formidable kind, which have brought upon me many false imputations ; but, on the other hand, the name and general repute of a wise man."

As to the philosophy of Socrates, we may observe, that having searched into all kinds of science, he first discovered that it was wrong to neglect those things which concern human life for the sake of inquiring into those things which do not ; secondly, that the things men have usually made the objects of their inquiries are above the reach of human understanding, and the source of all the disputes, errors, and superstitions which have prevailed in the world ; and, thirdly, that such divine mysteries cannot be made subservient to the uses of human life. Thus esteeming speculative knowledge so far only as it conduces to practice, he decried in all the sciences what he conceived to be useless, and exchanged speculation for action, and theory for practice. Unfortunately such a method has not always been followed by philosophers.

THE DEMON OF SOCRATES.

That Socrates had an attendant spirit, genius, or demon, which guarded him from dangers, is asserted by Plato and Aristhenes, who were his contemporaries, and repeated by innumerable authors of antiquity ; but what this attendant spirit, genius, or demon was, or what we are to understand by it, neither ancient nor modern writers have in general been able to determine. There is some disagreement concerning the name, and more concerning the nature, of it ; only it is by most writers agreed that the advice it gave him was always dissuasive ; "never impelling," says Cicero, "but often restraining him." It is commonly called his demon, by which title he himself is supposed to have owned it. Plato sometimes calls it his guardian, and Apuleius, his god, because the name of demon, as St. Austin tells us, at last grew odious.

As for the sign or manner in which this genius or demon foretold, and by foretelling warned him against evils to come, nothing certain can be collected about it. Plutarch, who rejects some popular absurdities upon the subject, conjectures first that it might be an apparition ; but at last concludes that it was his observation of some inarticulate, unaccustomed voice or sound, conveyed to him in an extraordinary way, as happens in dreams. Others confine this foreknowledge of evils within the soul of Socrates himself ; and when he said that "his genius advised him," think that he only meant that "his mind foreboded, and so inclined him." But this is inconsistent with the description which Socrates himself gives of a voice and signs from without. Lastly, some conceive it to be one of those spirits that have a particular care of men ; which Maximus, Tyrius, and Apuleius describe in such a manner that they want only the name of a good angel ; and this Lactantius has supplied ; for after proving that God sends angels to guard mankind, he adds, "And Socrates affirmed that there was a demon constantly near him, which had kept him company from a child, and by whose beck and instruction he guided his life."

On this curious subject we may quote Mr. Grote : "Socrates had been accustomed, says the historian, "constantly to hear, even from his childhood, a Divine voice, interfering at moments when he was about to act, in the way of restraint, but never in the way of instigation. Such prohibitory warning was wont to come upon him very frequently, not merely on great, but even on small, occasions, intercepting what he was about to do or say. Though later writers speak of this as the dæmon or genius of Socrates, he himself does not personify it, but treats it merely as a 'divine sign, a prophetic or supernatural voice.'

He was accustomed not only to obey it implicitly, but to speak of it publicly and familiarly to others, so that the fact was well known both to his friends and his enemies. So completely did he march with a consciousness of this bridle in his mouth, that when he felt no check he assumed that the turning which he was about to take was the right one. Though his persuasion on the subject was unquestionably sincere, and his obedience constant, yet he never dwelt upon it himself as anything grand or awful, or entitling him to peculiar deference; but spoke of it often in his usual strain of familiar playfulness. To his friends generally it seem to have constituted one of his titles to reverence, though neither Plato nor Xenophon scruple to talk of it in that jesting way which doubtless they caught from himself. But to his enemies, and to the Athenian public, it appeared in the light of an offensive heresy—an impious innovation on the orthodox creed, and a desertion of the recognised gods of Athens.

"Such was the demon or genius of Socrates as described by himself, and as conceived in the genuine Platonic dialogues—a voice always prohibitory and bearing exclusively upon his own personal conduct. That which Plutarch and other admirers of Socrates conceived as a demon or intermediate being between God and man, was looked upon by the Fathers of the Christian Church as a devil: by Le Clerc as one of the fallen angels; by some other commentators as mere ironical phraseology on the part of Socrates himself. Without presuming to determine the question raised in the former hypotheses, I believe the last to be untrue, and that the conviction of Socrates on the point was quite sincere. A circumstance little attended to, but deserving particular notice, and stated by himself, is that the restraining voice began when he was a child, and continued even down to the end of his life: it had thus become an established persuasion long before his philosophical habits began."

OPPOSITION TO THE SOPHISTS; MAKING ENEMIES.

In the days of Socrates, the Sophists were the great and leading men: the masters of language, as Cicero calls them, who arrogantly pretended to teach everything, and persuaded the youth to resort only to them. With these Socrates carried on perpetual warfare; he attacked them constantly with his usual questions; and, by his skill and subtlety in disputation, exposed their sophistry and refuted their principles. He took all opportunities of proving that they had gained a much greater portion of esteem than they had any right to claim; that they had no knowledge of the things they professed to teach; and that instead of taking money of others for teaching, they should themselves give money to be taught. The Athenians were pleased to see the Sophists thus checked; were brought at last to laugh at them, and, at the instigation of Socrates, withdrew their children from them, and excited them to the study of solid virtue under better masters.

The altercations that Socrates had with the Sophists, therefore, gained him respect and made him popular with the Athenians; but he had a private quarrel with one Anytus, which, after many years continuance, was the cause of his death.

Anytus was an orator by profession, a sordid and avaricious man, who was privately maintained and enriched by leather sellers. He had placed two of his sons under Socrates to be taught; but because they had not acquired such knowledge from him as to enable them to get their living by pleading, he took them away and put them to the trade of leather-selling. Socrates, displeased at this illiberal treatment of the young men, whose ruin he presaged at the same time, reproached and exposed Anytus in his discourses to his scholars.

Anytus, hurt at this, studied all means of revenge, but feared the Athenians, who highly revered Socrates, as well on account of his great wisdom as for the particular opposition which he had made to the Sophists. He therefore consulted with Melitus, a young orator, from whose counsel he began, by making trial in smaller things, to find out how the Athenians would entertain a charge against the life of the philosopher. One of his first steps was to enlist the services of the comic poet, Aristophanes, to ridicule Socrates and his doctrines in his celebrated comedy called "The Clouds."

Socrates, who seldom went to the theatre, except when Euripides, whom he admired, contested with any new tragedian, was present at the acting of "The Clouds," and stood up all the while in the most conspicuous part of the theatre. One who was present asked him if he was not vexed at seeing himself brought up on the stage? "Not at all," answered he; "I am only a host at a public festival, where I provide a large company with entertainment."

A PUBLIC ACCUSATION.

Many years having passed since the first disagreement between Anytus and Socrates, at last Anytus, observing a suitable opportunity, got Melitus to prefer a bill against him to the Senate. It was in the following terms: "Melitus, son of Melitus, a Pythean, accuses Socrates, son of Sophroniscus, an Alopecian. Socrates violates the law, not believing the deities which this city believes, but introducing other new gods. He violates the law likewise in corrupting youths; and the punishment is death."

This bill being preferred upon oath, Crito became bound to the judges for his appearance at the day of trial; till which Socrates employed himself in his usual philosophical exercises, taking not the least trouble to prepare any defence.

When his friend Hermogenes remonstrated with him on the serious consequences of such an omission, he replied, first, that the just and blameless life which he was conscious of having passed was the best of all preparations for defence; next, that having once begun to meditate on what it would be proper for him to say, the divine sign had interposed to forbid him from proceeding.

He went on to say that it was no wonder that the gods should deem it better for him to die now than to live longer. He had hitherto lived in perfect satisfaction, with a consciousness of progressive moral improvement, and with esteem, marked and unabated, from his friends. If his life were prolonged, old age would soon overpower him; he would lose in part his sight, his hearing, or his intelligence; and life, with such abated efficacy and dignity, would be intolerable to him. Whereas if he were condemned now, he should be condemned unjustly, which would be a great disgrace to his judges, but none to him; nay, it would even procure for him increase of sympathy and admiration, and a most willing acknowledgment from every one that he had been both a just man and an improving preceptor.

"These words," remarks Mr. Grote, "spoken before his trial, intimate a state of belief which explains the tenor of the defence, and formed one essential condition of the final result. They prove that Socrates not only cared little for being acquitted, but even thought that the approaching trial was marked out by the gods as the term of his life, and that there were good reasons why he should prefer such a consummation as best for himself. Nor is it wonderful that he should entertain that opinion, when we recollect the entire ascendancy within him of serene, internal conscience and intelligent reflection, built upon an originally fearless temperament, and silencing what Plato calls 'the child within us, who trembles before death'; his great love of colloquial influence, and incapacity of living without it, his old age, now seventy, rendering it impossible that such influence could much longer continue; and the opportunity afforded him by now towering above ordinary men under the like circumstances, to read an impressive lesson, as well as to leave behind him a reputation yet more exalted than that which he had hitherto quired."

THE TRIAL OF SOCRATES; HIS CLOSING SPEECH.

On the day appointed, Anytus, Lyco, and Melitus accused him; and Socrates made his own defence, without procuring an advocate, as was the custom, to plead for him. He did not defend himself in the tone and language of a suppliant or guilty person, but with a freedom, firmness, and spirit belonging to conscious innocence and superior merit. Many of his friends also spoke in his defence; and lastly, Plato, then a young man, endeavoured to plead; but while attempting to apologise for his youth, he was ordered by the Court to sit down. The Court then proceeded to vote; and they found Socrates guilty by two hundred and eighty-one voices.

It was the custom of Athens, as Cicero tells us, when any one was cast, if the fault was not capital, to impose a pecuniary mulct, and the guilty person was asked the highest rate at which he estimated his offence. This was proposed to Socrates, who told the judges that to pay a penalty was to own an offence, and that, instead of being condemned for what he stood accused, he deserved to be maintained at the public charge out of the Prytanæum. This being the greatest honour the Athenians could confer, the answer so exasperated the judges that they condemned him to death by eighty voices more.

The closing speech made by the philosopher after sentence of death had been pronounced, is supposed to be given by Plato with substantial accuracy. It was as follows:—

"It is for the sake of but a short span, O Athenians, that you have incurred the imputation, from those who wish to speak evil of the city, of having put to death Socrates, a wise man (for those inclined to reproach you will say that I am wise, even if I am not). Had you only waited a short while, the thing would have come about without your agency; for you see my years: I am far advanced in life, and near to death. I do not address this to all of you, but to those who have voted for the capital sentence ; and this also I say to the same persons, Perhaps your opinion is that I have been condemned for want of skill in such modes of working on your minds as I might have employed with success, if I had thought it right to employ all means in order to escape from condemnation. Far from it. I have been condemned, and not for want of things to say, but for want of daring and shamelessness ; because I did not choose to say to you what would have been pleasantest to you to hear, weeping and lamenting, and saying and doing other things which I affirm to be unworthy of me, as you are accustomed to see others do. But neither did I then think fit to do or say anything unworthy of a free man ; nor do I now repent of having thus defended myself. I would far rather have made the one defence and die, than have made the other and live.

"Neither in a court of justice nor in war ought we to make it our object that whatever happens we may escape death. In battle it is often evident that a man may save his life by throwing away his arms and imploring mercy of his pursuers ; and in all other dangers there are many other contrivances by which a person may get off with life, if he dare do or say everything.

"The difficulty, O Athenians, is not to escape from death, but from guilt ; for guilt is swifter than death, and runs faster. And now I, being old and slow of foot, have been overtaken by death, the slower of the two ; but my accusers, who are brisk and vehement, by guilt, the swifter. We quit this place ; I having been sentenced by you to death, but they having sentence passed upon them, by truth, of guilt and injustice. I submit to my punishment, and they to theirs.

"But I desire, O men who have condemned me, to prophesy to you what next is to happen. I say, then, that immediately after my death there will come upon you a far severer punishment than that which you have inflicted on me ; for you have done this thinking by it to escape being called to account for your lives. But I affirm that the very reverse will happen to you. There will be many to call you to account whom I have hitherto restrained, and whom you saw not ; and, being younger, they will give you more trouble, and you will be still more provoked ; for if you think by putting men to death to prevent others from reproaching you with living amiss, you are much mistaken. That mode of protecting yourselves is neither very possible nor very noble ; the noblest and easiest, too, is not to cut off other people, but so to order yourselves as to attain the greatest excellence.

"Thus much I beg of you ; when my sons grow up, punish them, O Athenians, by tormenting them as I have tormented you, if they shall seem to study riches or any other ends in preference to virtue. And if they are thought to be something, being really nothing, reproach them, as I have reproached you, for not attending to what they ought and fancying themselves something when they are good for nothing. And if you do this, both I and my sons shall have received what is just at your hands.

"It is now time that we go hence, I to die, you to live ; but which has the better destiny is unknown to all except the God alone."

SOCRATES IN PRISON.

This speech over, Socrates was sent to prison, which, says Seneca, he entered with the same resolution and firmness with which he had opposed the thirty tyrants ; and took away all ignominy from the place, which, adds Seneca, could not be a prison while he was there.

On the day of condemnation it happened that the ship which was employed to carry a customary annual offering to the island of Delos set sail. It was contrary to the law of Athens that during this voyage any capital punishment should be inflicted within the city. This circumstance delayed the execution of the sentence against Socrates for thirty days, during which time he was constantly visited by Crito, Plato, and other friends, with whom he passed the time in his usual manner. He was often solicited by them to escape, which he not only refused but derided ; asking if they knew any place out of Attica whither death would not come.

THE DEATH OF SOCRATES.

The manner of his death is related by Plato, who was an eye-witness of it ; and as there is not perhaps a more affecting picture to be found in antiquity, we shall give it here nearly in his own words. Socrates the day he was to die, had been discoursing to his friends upon the immortality of the soul. This discourse forms the subject of Plato's Phædo. The arguments in that dialogue are most likely Plato's own ; and it is supposed that the dying speech of Cyrus in Xenophon's Cyropædia is a closer copy of the opinions of Socrates.

When he had made an end of speaking, Crito asked him if he had any directions to give concerning his sons or other things in which they could serve him.

"I desire no more of you," said Socrates, "than what I have always told you: if you take care of yourselves, whatsoever you do will be acceptable to me and mine, though you promise nothing; if you neglect yourselves and virtue, you can do nothing acceptable to us though you promise ever so much."

"That," answered Crito, "we will observe; but how will you be buried?"

"As you think good," said he, "if you can catch me, and I do not give you the slip."

Then, with a smile, turning to the company, "I cannot persuade Crito," said he, "that I am that Socrates who was haranguing just now, or anything more than the carcass you will presently behold; and therefore he is taking all this care of my interment. It seems that what I just now explained in a long discourse has made no impression at all upon him, namely, that as soon as I shall have drunk the poison, I shall not remain longer with you, but depart immediately to the seats of the blessed. The things with which I have been endeavouring to comfort you and myself have been said to no purpose. As therefore Crito was bound to the judges for my appearance, so you must now be bound to Crito for my departure; and when he sees my body burned and buried, let him not say that Socrates suffers anything, or is in any way concerned; for know, dear Crito, such a mistake were a wrong to my soul. I tell you that my body is only buried; and let that be done as you shall think fit, or as shall be most agreeable to the laws and customs of the country."

Having said this he rose and retired into an inner room, taking Crito with him, "and leaving us," says Plato, "who like orphans were to be deprived of so dear a father, to discourse upon our own misery." After bathing, came his wife and the other women of the family, with his sons, two of them children, one of them a youth; and when he had given proper directions about his domestic affairs, he dismissed them and returned to his disciples.

It was now near sunset; and on coming out he sat down and did not speak much after that. An officer answered, and approaching him, said, "Socrates, I am persuaded that I shall have no reason to blame you for what I have been accustomed to blame in others, who have been angry with me and loaded me with curses for only doing what the magistrate commands, when I have presented the poison to them. But I know you to be the most generous, the most mild, the best of men, that ever entered this place; and am certain that if you entertain any resentment upon this occasion, it will not be at me, but at the real authors of your misfortune. You know the message I bring; farewell, and endeavour to bear with patience what must be borne."

"And," said Socrates to the officer, who went out weeping, "fare thee well; I will. How civil is this man! I have found him the same all the time of my imprisonment; he would often visit me, sometimes discourse with me, always used me kindly; and now see how generously he weeps for me. But come, Crito, let us do as he bids us; if the poison be ready, let it be brought in; if not, let somebody prepare it."

"The sun is yet upon the mountains, and not set," said Crito. "I myself have seen others drink it later who have even ate and drank freely with their friends after the sign has been given; be not in haste, there is time enough."

"Why, yes," said Socrates, "they who do so think they gain something; but what shall I gain by drinking it late? Nothing but to be laughed at for appearing too desirous of life; pray let it be as I say."

Then Crito sent one of the attendants, who immediately returned, and with him came the man who was to administer the poison, bringing a cup in his hand.

"Prithee, my good friend," said the philosopher to the man with the cup, "as you are well versed in such things, what must I do?"

"Nothing," said the man, "but walk about as soon as you shall have drunk, till you perceive your legs to fail; then sit down."

Then he presented the cup, which Socrates took without the least change of countenance or any emotion whatever, but looking with his usual intrepidity upon the man. He then asked "whether he might spill any of it in libation."

The man answered, "I have only prepared what is sufficient."

"Yet," said Socrates, "I may pray to the gods, and will, that my passage hence may be happy, which I do beseech them to grant;" and that instant swallowed the draught with the greatest ease.

Many of those present, who till then had refrained from tears, when they saw him put the cup to his lips and drink off the poison, could no longer restrain themselves, but burst into tears.

"Friends," said Socrates, observing this, "what mean you? I sent away the women for no other reason but that they might not disturb us with this, for I have heard that we should die with applause; be quiet, then, and behave yourselves like men."

At these words they dried their tears, and endeavoured to compose themselves. When Socrates had walked about awhile, and perceived his limbs to fail, he laid down on his back as the executioner directed; who, in a little while, looking on his feet and pinching them pretty hard, asked him if he perceived it. "No," said Socrates. Then he did the same by his legs; and showing how every part grew successively cold and stiff, he observed that when that chillness reached the heart, he would die.

Not long after, Socrates, removing the garment with which he was covered, said, "I owe a cock to Æsculapius: pay it; neglect it not."

"It shall be done," said Crito; "would you have anything else?"

But Socrates made no reply; and after lying awhile he stretched himself out; when the executioner, uncovering him, found his eyes fixed, and they were closed by Crito.

"This," says Plato, "was the end of the best, the wisest, and the justest of men;" and the account of it by Plato, Cicero confesses he could never read without tears.

AFTER THE DEATH OF SOCRATES; THE ATHENIANS REPENTANT.

Socrates died, according to Plato, when he was more than seventy, 396 B.C. He was buried, with many tears and much solemnity, by his friends, among whom the excessive grief of Plato is noticed by Plutarch; yet as soon as they performed that last service, fearing the cruelty of the thirty tyrants, they stole out of the city, the greater part to Euclid, at Magara, who received them kindly; the rest to other places.

Soon afterwards the Athenians were recalled to a sense of the injustice they had committed against Socrates, and became so exasperated as to insist that the authors of it should be put to death. Melitus accordingly suffered, and Anytus was banished. In further testimony of their penitence, they called home his friends to their former liberty of meeting; they forbade public spectacles of games and wrestling for a time; they caused the statue of Socrates, made in brass by Lyssippus, to be set up in the Pompeium; and a plague ensuing, which they imputed to their unjust act, they made an order that no man should mention Socrates publicly and on the theatre, in order to forget the sooner what they had done.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE · MARRIAGE; · CHARACTER.

In person, Socrates was very homely; he was bald; he had a dark complexion, a flat nose, projecting eyes, and a severe, downcast look. His countenance, indeed, was such that Zopyrus, a physiognomist, pronounced him liable to various passions and given to many vices; and when Alcibiades and others who were present derided this, knowing him to be free from everything of the kind, Socrates justified the skill of Zopyrus, by owning that "he was by nature prone to those vices, but had suppressed his inclination by reason."

The defects of his person were amply compensated by the virtues and accomplishments of his mind. The oracle of Delphi, as we have seen, declared him to be the wisest of all men, for professing only to know that he knew nothing: Apollo, as Cicero observes, conceiving the only wisdom of mankind to consist in not thinking themselves to know those things of which they are ignorant. He was a man of all virtues, and so remarkably frugal that no matter how little he had it was always enough; and when he was amidst a great variety of rich and expensive objects, he would often say to himself, "How many things are here which I do not want."

The witchery of his tongue fascinated those whom his appearance had disgusted; and Alcibiades declared that he was forced to stop his ears and flee away, that he might not sit down beside Socrates, and grow old in listening to his talk.

Socrates had two wives, one of whom was the noted Xantippe, whom Aulus Gellius describes as an arrant scold; and several instances are recorded of her impatience and his long-suffering. One day, before some of his friends, she fell into the usual extravagances of her passion; when he, without answering a word, went abroad with them; but he was no sooner out of the door, than she, running upstairs, threw water down upon his head; upon which, turning to his friends, "Did I not tell you," says he, "that after so much thunder we should have rain?" She appears, however, to have had a great affection for him, and was a faithful wife.

Her husband gave a playful explanation of his choice, by remarking that "those who wish to become skilled in horsemanship select the most spirited horses, and after being able to bridle those, they believe they can bridle all others. Now, as it is my wish to live and converse with men, I married this woman, being firmly convinced that in the event of being able to endure her I should be able to endure all others."

Socrates left nothing behind him in writing; but his illustrious pupils, Xenophon and Plato, have in some measure supplied this defect. The "Memoirs of Socrates," written by Xenophon, afford, however, a much more accurate idea of the opinions of Socrates than the Dialogues of Plato, who everywhere mixes his own conceptions and diction, and those of other philosophers, with the ideas and language of his master. It is related that when Socrates heard Plato recite his Lysis, he said, "How much does this young man make me say which I never conceived!"

Xenophon, who loved him tenderly, thus sums up his character:—

"As to myself, knowing him of a truth to be such a man as I have described; so pious towards the gods, as never to undertake any thing without first consulting them; so just towards men as never to do an injury, even the slightest, to any person, whilst numerous and great were the benefits he conferred on all with whom he had any dealings; so temperate and chaste as not to indulge any appetite or inclination at the expense of whatever was modest and becoming; so prudent as never to err in judging of good and evil, nor wanting the assistance of others to discriminate rightly concerning them; so able to discourse upon and define with the greatest accuracy all points whatsoever, and looking as it were into the minds of men, discover the very moment for reprehending vice or stimulating the love of virtue; experiencing, as I have done, all these excellences in Socrates, I can never cease considering him as the most virtuous and the most happy of all mankind. But if there is any one who is disposed to think otherwise, let him go and compare Socrates with any other, and afterwards let him determine."

Xenophon denies that Socrates ever taught natural philosophy or any mathematical science, and charges with misrepresentation and falsehood those who had ascribed to him dissertations of this kind; probably referring to Plato, in whose works Socrates is introduced as discoursing upon these subjects. The truth appears to be that the distinguishing character of Socrates was that of a moral philosopher.

SOCRATES ON RELIGION.

The doctrine of Socrates concerning God and religion was rather practical than speculative. But he did not neglect to build the structure of religious faith upon the firm foundation of an appeal to natural appearances. He taught that the Supreme Being, though invisible, is clearly seen in His works, which at once demonstrate His existence, and His wise and benevolent providence. Besides the one Supreme Deity, Socrates admitted the existence of beings who possess a middle station between God and man, to whose immediate agency he ascribed the ordinary phenomena of nature, and whom he supposed to be particularly concerned in the management of human affairs. Hence, speaking of the gods who take care of men, he says, "Let it suffice you, whilst you observe their works, to revere and honour the gods; and be persuaded that this is the way in which they make themselves known: for among all the gods who bestow blessings upon men, there are none who, in the distribution of their favours, make themselves visible to mortals." Hence he spoke of thunder, wind, and other agents of nature as servants of God, and encouraged the practice of divination, under the notion that the gods would sometimes discover future events to good men.

Socrates asserted, says Xenophon, that the science of divination was necessary for all such as would govern successfully either cities or private families; for although he thought every one might choose his own way of life, and afterwards by his industry excel therein,—whether in architecture, mechanics, agriculture superintending labour, managing finances, or practising the art of war,—yet even here the gods, he would say, thought proper to reserve to themselves, in all these things the knowledge of that part of them which was of the most importance; since he who was the most careful to cultivate his field could not know of a certainty who should reap the fruit of it.

He therefore esteemed all those as no other than madmen who, excluding the Deity, referred the success of their designs to nothing higher than human prudence. He likewise thought those not much better who had recourse to divination on every occasion, as if a man was to consult the oracle whether he should give the reins of his chariot into the hands of one ignorant or well versed in the art of driving, or place at the helm of his ship a skilful or unskilful pilot.

He also thought it a kind of impiety to importune the gods with our inquiries concerning things of which we may gain the knowledge by number, weight, or measure; it being, as it seemed to him, incumbent on man to make himself acquainted with whatever the gods had placed within his power; as for such things as were beyond his comprehension, for these he ought always to apply to the oracles, the gods being ever willing to communicate knowledge to those whose care had been to render them propitious.

If these opinions concerning the Supreme Being and the subordinate deities be compared, there will be no difficulty in perceiving the grounds upon which Socrates, though an advocate for the existence of one sovereign power, admitted the worship of inferior divinities. Hence he declared it to be the duty of every one, in the performance of religious rites, to follow the customs of his country. At the same time he taught that the merit of all religious offerings depends upon the character of the worshipper, and that the gods take pleasure in the sacrifice of none but the truly pious. "The man," says he, "who honours the gods according to his ability, ought to be cheerful, and hope for the greatest blessings; for from whom may we reasonably entertain higher expectations than from those who are most able to serve us? or how can we secure their kindness but by pleasing them? or how please them better than by obedience?"

"When Socrates prayed," says Xenophon, "his petition was only this, that the gods would give him those things that were good. And this he did forasmuch as they alone knew what was good for man. But he who should ask for gold or silver, or increase of dominion, acted not, in his opinion, more wisely than he who should pray for the opportunity to fight, or game, or anything of the like nature; the consequence whereof being altogether doubtful, might turn, for aught he knew, not a little to his disadvantage."

Concerning the human soul, the opinion of Socrates, according to Xenophon, was that it is allied to the Divine Being, not by a participation of essence, but by a similarity of nature; that man excels all other animals in the faculty of reason; and that the existence of good men will be continued after death in a state in which they will receive the reward of their virtue. Although it appears that on this latter topic Socrates was not wholly free from uncertainty, the consolation which he professed to derive from this source in the immediate prospect of death leaves little room to doubt that he entertained a real belief in and expectation of immortality. The doctrine which Cicero ascribes to Socrates on this head is, that the human soul is a divine principle, which, when it passes out of the body, returns to heaven; and that this passage is most easy to those who have in this life made the greatest progress in virtue.

The system of morality which Socrates made it the business of his life to teach was raised upon the firm basis of religion. The first principles of virtuous conduct, which are common to all mankind, are, according to this philosopher, the laws of God; and the conclusive argument by which he supports this opinion is that no man departs from these principles with impunity. He taught that true felicity is not to be derived from external possessions, but from wisdom, which consists in the knowledge and practice of virtue; that the cultivation of virtuous habits is necessarily attended with pleasure as well as profit; that the honest man alone is happy; and that it is absurd to attempt to separate things which are in nature so closely united as virtue and interest.

Virtue, said Socrates, consists of knowledge. To do right is the only road to happiness; and if every man seeks to be happy, vice can arise only from ignorance or mistake as to the means; hence the proper corrective is an enlarged teaching of the consequences of actions.

"We cannot," says a writer in Chambers' Encyclopædia, "on any fair interpretation of knowledge, regard this as other than a one-sided view. It takes note of one condition of virtue, since there can be no right conduct without understanding the tendency of action, or, at all events, the meaning of rules; but it omits, what is also essential, the state of the emotions or dispositions, which may be directed either to exclusively self-regarding ends, or to ends also involving the good of others. There is an obvious connection between the doctrine and the Socratic analogy of virtue to the professions. The virtue of an artisan is almost exclusively contained in his skill or knowledge; his dispositions can usually, though not always, be depended on, through the pressure of his immediate self-interest. But the practice of Socrates was larger than his theory; for his exhortations were addressed to men's feelings or sentiments as well as to their intellect. His political doctrines were biased by the same analogy of special professions. The legitimate king or governor was he alone who knew how to govern well."

SOCRATES ON THE EVIDENCES OF A BENEFICENT PROVIDENCE.

It is impossible to read without admiration the arguments by which Socrates anticipated writers on Natural Theology, by pointing out the evidences of a beneficent Providence. Listen to Xenophon, whose narrative we give as translated in the "Biographical History of Philosophy" of the late Mr. George Henry Lewes:—

"I will now relate the manner in which I once heard Socrates discoursing with Aristodemus, surnamed the Little, concerning the Deity: for observing that he neither prayed nor sacrificed to the gods, but on the contrary ridiculed and laughed at those who did, he said to him, 'Tell me, Aristodemus, is there any man you admire on account of his merit?' Aristodemus having answered 'Many;'—'Name some of them, I pray you.' 'I admire,' said Aristodemus,

Homer for epic poetry, Melanippides for his dithyrambics, Sophocles for tragedy, Polycletus for statuary, and Zeuxis for painting.'

"But which seems to you most worthy of admiration, Aristodemus;—the artist who forms images void of motion and intelligence, or one who hath the skill to produce animals that are endued not only with activity but understanding?" 'The latter, there can be no doubt,' replied Aristodemus, 'provided the production was not the effect of chance, but of wisdom and contrivance.' 'But since there are many things, some of which we can easily see the use of, while we cannot say of others to what purpose they were produced,—which of these, Aristodemus, do you suppose the work of wisdom?' 'It should seem the most reasonable to affirm it of those whose fitness and utility are so evidently apparent.'

"But it is evidently apparent that He, who at the beginning made man, endued him with senses because they were good for him; eyes to behold whatever was visible, and ears to hear whatever was to be heard; for say, Aristodemus, for what purpose should odours be prepared if the sense of smelling had been denied? or why the distinctions of bitter and sweet, of savoury and unsavoury, unless a palate had been likewise given, conveniently placed to arbitrate between them and declare the difference? . . . Canst thou doubt, Aristodemus, whether a disposition of parts like this should be the work of chance, or of wisdom and contrivance?' 'I have no longer any doubt,' replied Aristodemus; 'and, indeed, the more I consider it, the more evident it appears to me that man must be the masterpiece of some great artificer; carrying along with it infinite marks of the love and favour of Him who hath thus formed it.'

"But farther (unless thou desirest to ask me questions), seeing, Aristodemus, thou thyself art conscious of reason and intelligence, supposest thou there is no intelligence elsewhere? Thou knowest thy body to be a small part of that wide extended earth which thou everywhere beholdest; the moisture contained in it, thou also knowest to be a small portion of that mighty mass of waters whereof seas themselves are but a part; while the rest of the elements contribute out of their abundance to thy formation. It is the soul, then, alone, that intellectual part of us, which is come to thee by some lucky chance, from I know not where? If so be there is indeed no intelligence elsewhere; and we must be forced to confess that this stupendous universe, with all the various bodies contained therein,—equally amazing, whether we consider their magnitude or number, whatever their use, whatever their order,—all have been produced, not by intelligence, but by chance!' 'It is with difficulty that I can suppose otherwise,' returned Aristodemus; 'for I behold none of those gods whom you speak of as making and governing all things; whereas I see the artists when at their work here among us.' 'Neither yet seest thou thy soul, Aristodemus, which, however, most assuredly governs thy body; although it may well seem, by thy manner of talking, that it is chance, and not reason, which governs thee.'

"I do not despise the gods," said Aristodemus; 'on the contrary, I conceive so highly of their excellence as to suppose they stand in no need either of me or my services.' 'Thou mistakest the matter, Aristodemus; the greater magnificence they have shown in their care of thee, so much the more honour and service thou owest them.' 'Be assured,' said Aristodemus, 'if I once could be persuaded the gods take care of man, I should want no monitor to remind me of my duty.' 'And canst thou doubt, Aristodemus, if the gods take care of man? . . .

"As therefore, among men, we make benefit of the affection and gratitude of our neighbour by showing him kindness, and discover his wisdom by consulting him in his distress, do thou in like manner behave towards the gods; and if thou wouldst experience what their wisdom and what their love, render thyself deserving the communication of some of those divine secrets which may not be penetrated by man, and are imparted to those alone who consult, who adore, who obey the Deity. Then shalt thou, my Aristodemus, understand there is a Being whose eye pierceth throughout all nature, and whose ear is open to every sound, extended to all places, extending through all time, and whose bounty and care can know no other bound than those fixed by His own creation.'

"By this discourse, and others of a like nature, Socrates taught his friends that they were not only to forbear whatever was impious, unjust, or unbecoming before man; but even when alone they ought to have a regard to all their actions, since the gods have their eyes continually upon us, and none of our designs can be concealed from them."

LEADING OUTLINES OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF SOCRATES.

We have three authorities for the doctrines of Socrates: Xenophon's Memorabilia; the Dialogues of Plato; and the Strictures of Aristotle. With regard to the first work, too much reliance has been placed upon it as a faithful delineation of the sayings of Socrates. It is too much of an apologetic nature to deserve the title of a just and accurate exposition of the doctrines which it defends; and even if Xenophon had wished to give a full account of the philosophy of Socrates, it is not possible, from all that we know of him, that he would have been able to do so. His talents, such as they were, were all of a practical nature; he does not seem to have had any toleration for philosophy; he clearly did not understand the definition of terms or ideas; and, at any rate, had not originality enough to enable him to appreciate such a thoroughly original character as Socrates.

As to Plato, there can be no doubt that he never meant to pass off as his own the doctrines and speculations which he puts into the mouth of Socrates; but we cannot help feeling that the Socrates whom he represents with such dramatic truth, must have been a real person, and no creature of the imagination, and that Socrates must have been the philosophical as he is the formal basis of all that Plato has done for science. If then we seek to make up for the deficiencies of Plato and Xenophon, as exponents of the doctrines which their master actually promulgated, by turning to the criticisms of Aristotle, we shall find that Plato gives us a much truer conception of what he effected by his scientific labours than we could have derived from Xenophon. Aristotle distinctly tell us that Socrates philosophised about virtue, and made some real discoveries with regard to the first principles of science. Now this is just the philosophical basis which we discern in the Socrates of Plato. We find him always endeavouring to reduce things to their first elements, stripping realities of their pompous garb of words, and striving to arrive at certainty as the standard of truth; and we also find that his philosophy is generally applied to ethics rather than to physics. He seem to have been convinced of the unity of virtue, and to have believed that it was teachable as a matter of science. In fact, with him the scientific and the moral run into one another, for knowledge is the final cause of the will, and good is the final cause of knowledge; hence he who knows what justice is, must needs be just, since no one wittingly departs from that which he knows to be good.

Socrates held it to be his particular vocation to arouse the idea of science in the minds of men. This is clear from the manner in which he is said to have insisted upon the consciousness of ignorance, and also from the use which he made of the Delphic response—Know thyself! "For," says Schleiermacher, in his valuable paper on the "Worth of Socrates as a Philosopher," "if he went about in the service of the god, to justify the celebrated oracle, it is impossible that the utmost point he reached could have been simply to know that he knew nothing; there was a step beyond this which he must have taken, that of knowing what knowledge is. For by what other means could he have been enabled to declare that which others believed themselves to know to be no knowledge, than by a more correct conception of knowledge, and by a more correct method founded upon that conception? And everywhere, when he is explaining the nature of non-science (ἀνπιστημοσύνη), one sees that he sets out from two tests: one, that science is the same in all true thoughts, and consequently must manifest its peculiar form in every such thought; the other, that all science forms one whole. For his proofs always hinge on this assumption—that it is impossible to start from one true thought and to be entangled in a contradiction with any other; and also that knowledge derived from any one point and obtained by correct combination, cannot contradict that which has been deduced in like manner from any other point; and while he exposed such contradictions in the current conceptions of mankind, he strove to rouse those leading ideas in all who were capable of understanding or even of divining his meaning."

In all the isolated particulars which are recorded of Socrates, this one object is everywhere discernible. His antagonistic opposition to the Sophists is one very strong feature of this. They professed to know everything, without having the idea of science, or knowledge of what knowledge is, and as Socrates possessed that idea without the mass of acquirements on which they prided themselves, he was very naturally their opponent; and his contest with them is carried on entirely in this way that he endeavours to nullify the effects of their acquired knowledge by shifting the ground from the objects to the idea of science, and in this way he usually manages to prove their deficiency in the one thing needful to the philosopher.

The irony of Socrates, as it is called, is another remarkable proof of his devotion to his vocation as an awakener of the idea of science. This irony has been well described as the co-existence of the idea of science in him with the want of clear and complete views on any objects of science—in a word as the knowledge of his ignorance. With this is intimately connected the indirect dialogical method which he invariably adopted, and which may be regarded as his mode of extracting scientific truth from the mass of semblances and contradictions by which it was surrounded.

Such are the leading outlines of the philosophy of Socrates so far as they are capable of being established with any certainty. The importance of his doctrines is most clearly perceived when we consider them as they were developed and applied by the various schools which acknowledged him as their founder, and especially as they were carried out by Plato.

THE SUBJECT OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF SOCRATES.

As regards the subject of his philosophy, Socrates effected a signal revolution quite in harmony with the metaphorical saying of Cicero that Socrates brought down philosophy from the heavens to the earth. Systems of philosophy before his day consisted of vast and indefinite speculations on Nature as a whole, blending together Cosmogony, Astronomy, Geometry, Physics, Metaphysics, etc. The careful thought which Socrates had brought to bear on these systems had left on his mind a feeling of unutterable dreariness and unsatisfactoriness to any of the wants of man. It seemed to him that the strivings of man after knowledge would be more profitably directed to the human relationship, as involving man's practical concerns. At every public assembly to which he went, he heard discussed questions respecting the just and unjust, the honourable and the base, the expedient and the hurtful; in addition to which he observed that the opposing disputants were, without being conscious of it, very confused in their ideas as to the meanings of those comprehensive words in which the weightiest interests centered.

Accordingly Socrates was the first to proclaim to the world that "the proper study of mankind is man," and that human nature, human duties, and human happiness constitute a field of really urgent and profitable inquiry. He saw that astronomy had a certain usefulness for navigation and for the reckoning of time, to which extent he would have it known by pilots and watchmen; geometry was of service in its literal sense of land measuring; arithmetic was countenanced in like manner so far as practically useful; but general physics, or the speculations of philosophers from Thales downwards, as to the origin of all things out of water, fire, air, &c., he wholly repudiated.

"Do these inquirers," he asked, "think that they already know human affairs well enough, that they thus begin to meddle with divine? Do they think that they shall be able to excite or calm the winds at pleasure, or have they no other view than to gratify an idle curiosity?" He was of opinion that it was not only unprofitable but impious to attempt to comprehend that field of study. The gods, he thought, managed all those things after their own fashion, and refused to submit them to invariable laws of sequence, such as men might discover by observation, and thought the only means of knowledge permitted was religious sacrifice, and prayer, and the consultation of the oracles. While this was the appointed way in reference to divine things, it was equally appointed that human things should be learned by diligent study and observation.

Socrates was the means of introducing at least one element of logical precision into the handling of questions by insisting on accuracy in definition and classification. His method will be seen in the statement of Xenophon: "Socrates continued incessantly discussing human affairs, investigating—What is piety? What is impiety? What is the honourable and the base? What is the just and the unjust? Men that knew these matters he accounted good and honourable; men that were ignorant of them he assimilated to slaves.

His investigation thus took the form of ascertaining the exact meaning—that is, the definition—of the leading terms in ethics and in politics, the settling, as one writer puts it, of what John Stuart Mill calls the connotation of a general word which determines how to apply it rightly to each individual case.

THE INFLUENCE OF SOCRATES.

"There can be no doubt," says Mr. Grote, "that the individual influence of Socrates permanently enlarged the horizon, improved the method, and multiplied the ascendant mind of the Grecian speculative world, in a manner never since paralleled. Subsequent philosophers may have had a more elaborate doctrine, and a larger number of disciples who imbibed their ideas; but none of them applied the same stimulating method with the same efficacy; none of them struck out of other minds that fire which set light to original thought; none of them either produced in others the pains of intellectual pregnancy, or extracted from others the fresh and unborrowed offspring of a really parturient mind."

INTRODUCTORY.

IN the whole field of literature, no name is more often mentioned than that of Homer, and no books are more frequently quoted than the Iliad and the Odyssey.

The object of the following pages is to tell who Homer is said to have been, to point out how the learned are very far from being agreed as to whether this "prince of poets" had ever any real existence, and to indicate the leading features of the two great poems which bear his name.

For ourselves, we cast in our lot with those who believe in the personality of the poet, and that "Homer" is quite as likely to have been Homer, as a mere name under whose shadow the poems of various unknown writers have been grouped.

"Homer," says the Rev. Mr. Collins, "will still retain his personality for the uncritical reader, however a sceptical criticism may question it. The blind old bard, wandering from land to land, singing his lays of the old heroic times to a throng of admiring listeners, must always continue to be the familiar notion of the author of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Such was the universal creed of the world of readers until a comparatively recent date; and the speculations of modern scholars in this, as in other cases, have been much more successful in shaking the popular belief than in replacing it by any constructive theory of their own which is nearly so credible."

THE PERSONALITY OF HOMER; BIOGRAPHIES OF THE POET.

The belief in the personality of Homer rests directly and naturally on the undeniable facts that a great poem exists which demands the existence of a great author, and that this authorship has been constantly recognised by the consciousness of the Greek people in the person of Homer. The existence of the poet, coming to us as it does through long channels of uncontradicted Greek traditions, should be accepted without reserve as the most obvious and rational way of explaining the existence of the poem.

But the existence of the poet does not rest on tradition alone; the Greeks have special legends and traditions concerning this old minstrel, which, while they differ sufficiently to prove that there existed no authentic written life of the poet, agree in not a few points, enough to indicate a strong root of reality out of which they sprang. "It is easy," remarks Professor Blackie, "to say that these biographies come to us from no authentic voucher, that some of them are manifest forgeries, and that they are no more available for any purpose of substantial history than the stuff of which dreams are made; but when we look more narrowly into the matter, we find that whosoever the person might be who first put them into their present shape, he does not seem to have acted without materials. For the contents of these leaves, when read by a discriminating eye, bear so manifestly the traces of local tradition, not arbitrary forgery, as the boulders on the Iomeranian flats tell of the Scandinavian granite ridges from which they were transported."

There were no fewer than nine biographies of Homer current among the Greeks; but when analysed, they resolve themselves into two varieties,—one of which makes Homer an Æolian Greek, and the other an Ionian. The biography which, in the opinion of such authorities as he whom we have just quoted, contains the greatest amount of truth, is that which bears the name of Herodotus; and we take advantage of Professor Blackie's translation to give here an abstract of this interesting narrative.

THE POET'S BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

The birth of Homer, like that of many another hero of antiquity, was illegitimate. He was the son of Cretheis, the daughter of Melanopus, and was born near Smyrna, on the banks of the River Meles. For this reason his mother called him "Melesigenes," or the child of the river Meles.

At that time there was a schoolmaster at Smyrna called Phemius. This man hired Cretheis to spin the wool which he received from his pupils by way of fees; and he was so struck by her quiet behaviour, that he asked her to become his wife. Whilst pleading his cause, he especially promised to adopt her son, who, he said, being bred and educated by him, would become a man of note, for he saw plainly that he was a boy of good parts and of an excellent understanding. Cretheis yielded. Certainly the lad had striking ability, and, being brought up with great care, he soon surpassed all his compeers; and as years went on, being grown to man's estate, he showed himself not a whit behind Phemius himself in learning.

At last Phemius died, leaving all he had to his adopted son; and soon after he lost his mother also. Thereupon Melesigenes gave himself to the work of teaching, and, acting now entirely for himself, attracted great admiration, not only from the natives of the place, but from strangers at a distance. Smyrna at that time was a great trading place, and much corn was exported there, supplied in great abundance by the rich country in the neighbourhood.

The strangers, when they had leisure, used to come to Melesigenes and listen to his wisdom. Amongst them was a ship-captain, called Mentec, who had sailed thither with corn from Leneadia, a shrewd and well-taught man for the age, who persuaded Melesigenes to abandon teaching and sail with him, promising to treat him well, and representing that whilst he was yet young he should travel and see the world.

SEEING THE WORLD.

The temptation was too great to be resisted. The school was closed, and the young schoolmaster sailed away with Mentec. Wherever the vessel put in, he observed everything carefully, asking many questions.

After a long voyage to the extreme west, they returned from Tyrscnia and Iberia to Ithaca; and there Melesigenes was attacked with a sore malady in his eyes. Mentec, for the sake of cure, left him behind with a dear friend of his own, called Mentor, a native of the island.

Mentec treated him carefully; for he was a man of good substance, and well reported of for justice and for hospitality more than any man in these parts. Here it was that Melesigenes learned the story of Ulysses and his wanderings.

Soon afterwards Mentec came again to Ithaca, and took Melesigenes on board, and for a time he continued to sail with him. At last, however, on arriving at Colophon, the malady in his eyes grew worse, and ended in blindness.

THE PRACTICE OF POETRY.

Having lost his sight, he left Colophon and went to Smyrna, where he began the practice of poetry. But as time went on, being straitened for a livelihood, he determined to go to Cumæ; and, travelling through the plains of the Hermus, he arrived at Neonteichos, a colony of the Cumæans, planted eight years later than the mother city. There, it is said, he stopped at a leather-cutter's shop, and composed these verses, which were, indeed, the first that he ever publicly uttered:—

"Hear the prayer of the hungry, houseless, wandering stranger, Ye who inhabit the town, the large-eyed daughter of Cumæ;
Ye who sit at the roots of the lofty, leafy Sardena;
Ye who drink ambrosian draughts from the godlike-streaming, Silvery-smiling Hermus, of Jove immortal begotten."

When the leather-seller heard these verses he made up his mind to entertain the singer. The poor blind wanderer being brought in, took his seat in the shop and recited some verses in the presence of certain of the inhabitants on the expedition of Amphiarus against Thebes, and also some of his hymns to the gods.

For some time he remained at Neonteichos, making a livelihood by the exercise of his poetic gifts. "And even to this day," says the historian, "the inhabitants of the place delight to show the seat where he sat and recited his verses; they have the utmost reverence for the place, at which also a poplar-tree grows, which they say was planted at the time the minstrel arrived amongst them."

After a few years, Melesigenes, finding himself hard pressed to get a living, determined to proceed to Cumæ. Arrived at Cumæ, he sat down in the seat where the old men were wont to assemble, and there recited his verses, and with his discourse vastly delighted all who heard him.

Seeing that the Cumæans were pleased with his verses, he proposed that if they would maintain him at the public expense, he would make their city famous. Those who heard him were pleased at the request, and bade him go to the Council and place before them his proposal, whereto they promised their help. He followed their advice; and the Council being met, he was taken to the council-hall, where, standing up before the assembly, he spoke to the same effect concerning his entertainment that he had before done among the citizens, and then going out, sat down to await their award.

The Councillors then deliberated what answer to give; and though several of those who had heard him before were willing to grant his request, one is said to have opposed his petition for other reasons, and specially because, said he, if we are to give entertainment to blind minstrels, we shall soon have a great multitude on our shoulders.

From this circumstance he received the name of Homeros; for in the dialect of the Cumæans this word signifies blind, and his old name of Melesigenes fell into disuse. But in the Council the voice of the chief magistrate prevailed that Homer should receive no entertainment, which being announced to the poet, he bewailed himself in verse, and soon after left Cumæ for Phocæa, leaving a curse behind him that no poet should ever arise to sing their praises.

Arriving at Phocæa, he followed the same manner of life, reciting his verses in the public places where the citizens met. At that time there lived at Phocæa a schoolmaster called Thestorides, who was far from being a honest man. Seeing how good the poetry of Homer was, he proposed that he should become his guest, on condition of his making over to him any verses he had made and any others that might follow. To this Homer, constrained by poverty, consented.

Thestorides immediately set to work to copy out all Homer's compositions; and, when this was done, he neglected the bard, and set out for Chios, where he established himself as an original poet. Homer heard of this, and determined to follow him; and after several adventures, he arrived in the island, where a man of substance entertained him hospitably, and asked him to undertake the education of his sons. With this request Homer complied; and while he lived with him, composed the "Kercopecs," the "Battle of the Frogs and Mice," the "Battle of the Starlings," the poem called "The Fieldfares," and other humorous poems, by which he acquired great reputation. Whenever Thestorides heard of the presence of Homer in the neighbourhood, we are told he made off.

AT CHIOS; TRAVELLING FARTHER; DEATH OF HOMER.

On the coast being thus left clear, Homer requested his kind entertainer to take him to Chios, the chief city of the island; and establishing himself there, he opened a school and taught poetry. The Chiotese esteemed him for an uncommonly clever man, and regarded him with much admiration. The poet prospered among them, gathered substance, and married a wife, by whom he had two daughters. And now applying himself with all his might to poetry, he showed his gratitude to all his benefactors by celebrating them in his verses, specially Mentor, who had tended him so kindly in Ithaca when suffering from the evil in his eyes. "This man, therefore, he put into the Odyssey, making him the companion of Ulysses, and a man so just and faithful, that the Ithacan king, when he went to Troy, left him in charge of his house and family."

From the art of poetry, which he now practised largely, Homer got for himself a name throughout all Ionia, and even as far as Hellas. He was now advised to make a journey to Greece, and the notion pleased him exceedingly. With the intention of proceeding to Hellas, he crossed to Samos, and there he spent a whole winter, and made some small gains, going about to the houses of the wealthy and singing his verses.

When the winter was past, Homer began to carry out his purpose of going to Athens; and, embarking in a ship with certain Samians, he came to the island of Ios, and hove to, not in the harbour of the town, but in a bay on the strand. At this place a sickness fell on him, and, disembarking from the vessel, he slept on land by the shore. And whilst they were detained here some time by contrary winds, many of the inhabitants of the town came to speak with Homer, and were filled with wonder at the abundance of his wisdom and the richness of his discourse.

After this the sickness of the poet increased so much that he died thereof on the island. After his death, he was buried near the shore by the sailors and citizens, who had been so delighted with his utterances. And the people of Ios, many years afterwards, when poetry began to decline, wrote this couplet on his tomb:—

"This green sod doth cover the sacred head of the minstrel, Godlike Homer, who sang the praise of kings and of heroes."

PROFESSOR BLACKIE ON THE LIFE OF HOMER.

"We may hesitate," says Professor Blackie, "to use the strong language of Welcker when he says, 'That old life that bears the name of Herodotus, is for us invaluable;' but if, on the other hand, we fling it hastily aside under the impression that it was put together out of nothing by some cobwebby grammarian at Alexandria in the first or second century, we shall err greatly, for we have positive information, that as early as the time of Cambyses, that is, 525 B.C., one Theagenes of Rhegium began to put the local traditions about Homer into a literary shape; and he knows little about the tenacity of local memory in such matters, who can believe that, in the face of the whole tradition of the colleges of minstrels in Chios and Ios, brought down directly from Homer, any mere literary vamped in Magna Grecia then, or in Hellenized Egypt three centuries after, could coolly sit down and impose an altogether baseless biography of their great historical poet on the Greek people. On the contrary, those who perpetrate literary forgeries, just because they know what Plato says, that a lie is naturally hateful both to men and gods, always take care, as Macpherson did, when he palmed his Ossianic epic on the British public, to have as much of the old bleached bones of reality about the production that a great mass of influential people shall be favourably disposed to accept it as authentic. The only difficulty, therefore, in such cases will be to decide how much of the solid old fact is recognisable in the midst of this luxuriant growth of agreeable fictions."

PROBABLE FACTS.

It appears, then, to be not at all an unreasonable conclusion, from the study of the traditions and biographies which have been so long current, that the following facts rest upon a sufficiently firm foundation:—

That such a poet existed;

That he was a native of the coast of Asia Minor, between the Propontis and the Hermus, occupied by Æolian and Ionian settlers from Greece;

That he followed the profession of a wandering minstrel; and—

That the different cities on the coast of Asia,—Smyrna, Chios, Cumæ, Colophon, etc.,—mentioned in the biographies, if not the actual scenes of the actions to which they are attached in the legends, were certainly the principal stage on which Homer acted, and the atmosphere which he breathed.

"The date of Herodotus, with a free margin of some half a century," remarks Professor Blackie, "seems on the whole that date which agrees best both with the great majority of the authorities and with the nature of the case. The Roman writers place the poet about a century and a half before the foundation of Rome; and if we take the high-road of the register of the Spartan Kings, by the help of which we get the year 1100 B.C. for the Trojan War, and allow after this, according to the general tradition of the Greeks, some fifty or sixty years at least for the Æolic and Ionic migrations, with which the legends of the old Greek families came into Asia Minor, and further add to this another half century to give the colonies time to settle, and to attain that measure of outward prosperity which is necessary for the growth of the highest poetry, we shall have reached the year 900, when the wicked Ahab and the Phœnician Jezebel were misruling Israel: which tallies with the date of Herodotus, if we take it for the period of the poet's full and perfect manhood and the zenith of his poetic powers." The recent discoveries of Dr. Schliemann have given conjectures regarding the date of the Trojan war and the date of Homer a new interest; but it is questionable whether through the Schliemann excavations we are any nearer the solution of the problem than before.

A DISPUTED BIRTHPLACE; PERSONAL ALLUSIONS.

The uncertainty of Homer's birthplace, and the disputes to which it gave rise in after times, were the subject of an epigram whose pungency passed for truth:—

"Seven rival towns contend for Homer dead, Through which the living Homer begged his bread."

But it has been very properly pointed out that begging is not in the original lines at all; and a wandering minstrel was no dishonoured guest, wherever he appeared, in days much later than those of Homer.

The names of the seven cities which contended for the honour of having given birth to Homer, became a matter of popular quotation. They are mentioned in the commonplace book of Aulus Gellius, a Roman grammarian, who flourished in the second century, thus:—

"Seven great cities contend for the birth of great Homer: Smyrna, Salamis, Ios, and Rhodes, Colophon, Argos, and Athens."

One of the few passages in which any personal allusion to himself has been traced or fancied in Homer's verse, is a scene in the Odyssey, where the blind harper Demodocus is introduced as singing his lays in the halls of King Alcinous:—

"Whom the Muses loved, and gave him good and ill—
Ill, that of light she did his eyes deprive;
Good, that sweet minstrelries divine at will
She lent him, and a voice men's ears to thrill."

So in the same poem the only other bard who appears is also blind, Phœmius, who is compelled to exercise his art for the diversion of the dissolute suitors of Penelope.

ONE HOMER OR TWO?

According to some, the Iliad and the Odyssey are the works of two separate hands. On this point we quite agree with Mr. Froude, who remarks that after all it matters little who wrote the poems. Each is so magnificent, that to have written both could scarcely have increased the greatness of the man who had written one; and if there were two Homers, the earth is richer by one more divinely-gifted man than we had known. After all it is perhaps more easy to believe that the differences which we seem to detect between the Iliad and the Odyssey arise from Homer's own choice of the material which best suited two works so different, than that nature was so largely prodigal as to have created in one age and in one people two such men; for whether one or two, the authors of the Iliad and the Odyssey stand alone with Shakespeare far away above mankind.

THE LANGUAGE OF HOMER.

The Ionic dialect employed by Homer is a highly cultivated shoot of the old Hellenic stock, which was, in the poet's hands, so perfect for the highest poetical purposes, that it remained the model for the epic style during the whole period of the poetical literature of the Greeks.

The Ionic is the very variety of Greek which was used at a later date by Herodotus, the father of history, and Hippocrates, the first and greatest of Greek physicians.

CHIEF POEMS; THE ILIAD.

The principal poems ascribed to Homer are the Iliad and the Odyssey. Among the minor, and evidently of different origin, are the so-called Homeric hymns and the Batrachomyomachia.

The Iliad comprises a period of about fifty days of the tenth year of the Trojan war, and narrates the death of Achilles and its consequences as far as the death of Hector. Achilles is enraged because Briseis, who had been allotted to him, has been taken away and given to Agamemnon; and, angered with all the Greeks, he no longer takes part in the battle with the Trojans. But the misfortunes of his comrades touch his heart, and he at length permits his friend Patroclus to borrow his armour and go to battle at the head of his myrmidons. Patroclus is slain by Hector.

This event is the central and turning point of the whole epic. The progress towards it is very gradual and artistic. The cause of the anger is told first. Then, while Achilles is lying in his tent, several scenes of battle are described, which afford an opportunity for introducing the principal heroes of the Greeks, and especially for bringing Diomedes into prominence. The fruitlessness of their efforts and valour heightens their desire for the aid of Achilles. This furnishes the opportunity for introducing and praising the hero.

At last he comes. He has suppressed his anger against the Greeks, and turned it against the Trojans, who have killed his friend. He turns the fortune of war, and avenges the death of Patroclus by slaying Hector. This portion of the poem has a rapid movement.

But Hector's death does not end the Iliad. His body is given up to the Trojans and interred, and Achilles' wrath is turned to pity for Priam, the aged father of the dead hero; and the poem is thus brought to a peaceful conclusion.

SUMMARY OF THE ILIAD.

The manner in which the subject of the Iliad is worked out will appear from the following summary given by Mr. D. B. Monro in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. In it Mr. Monro distinguishes (1) the plot, i.e., the story of the quarrel; (2) the main course of the war, which forms a sort of underplot; and (3) subordinate episodes:—

- I. Quarrel of Achilles with Agamemnon and the Greek army—Agamemnon, having been compelled to give up his prize, Chryseis, takes Briseis from Achilles—Thereupon Achilles appeals to his mother Thetis, who obtains from Zeus a promise that he will give victory to the Trojans until the Greeks pay due homage to her son—Meanwhile Achilles takes no part in the war.

- II. Agamemnon is persuaded by a dream sent from Zeus to take the field with all his forces. His attempt to test the temper of the army nearly leads to their return. Catalogue of the army.
- III. Trojan muster—Trojan catalogue. Meeting of the armies—Paris challenges Menelaus—Truce made. "Teichoscopy"—Helen pointing out to Priam the Greek leaders. The duel—Paris is saved by Aphrodite.
- IV. Truce broken by Pandarus. Advance of the armies—Battle.
- V. Aristeia of Diomedes—His combat with Aphrodite.
- VI. Meeting with Glaucus.
- 1-311. Visit of Hector to the city, and offering of a peplos to Athena.
- 312-529. Visit of Hector to Paris—to Andromache.
- VII. Return of Hector and Paris to the field. Duel of Ajax and Hector. Truce for burial of dead. The Greeks build a wall round their camp. Battle—The Trojans encamp on the field.
- VIII. Agamemnon sends an embassy by night, offering Achilles restitution and full amends—Achilles refuses.
- X. Doloneia—Night expedition of Odysseus and Diomedes.
- XI. Aristeia of Agamemnon—He is wounded—Wounding of Diomedes and Odysseus. Achilles sends Antilochus to inquire about Machaon.
- XII. Storming of the wall—The Trojans reach the ships.
- XIII. Zeus ceases to watch the field—Poseidon secretly comes to the aid of the Greeks.
- XIV. Sleep of Zeus by the contrivance of Hera.
- XV. Zeus awakened—Restores the advantage to the Trojans—Ajax alone defends the ships.
- XVI. Achilles is persuaded to allow Patroclus to take the field. Patroclus drives back the Trojans—Kills Sarpedon, and is himself killed by Hector.
- XVII. Battle for the body of Patroclus—Aristeia of Menelaus.
- XVIII. News of the death of Patroclus is brought to Achilles—Thetis comes with the Nerouids—Promises to obtain new armour for him from Hephestus. The shield of Achilles described.
- XIX. Reconciliation of Achilles—His grief and desire to avenge Patroclus.
- XX. The gods come down to the plain—Combat of Achilles with Aeneas and Hector, who escapes.
- XXI. The Scamander is choked with slain—Rises against Achilles, who is slain by Hephestus.
- XXII. Hector alone stands against Achilles—His flight round the wall—He is slain.
- XXIII. Burial of Patroclus—Funeral Games. Priam ransoms the body of Hector—His burial.

THE ODYSSEY.

The Odyssey describes the return of Ulysses (Odysseus) to his island home. It is a story of forty days ; but within this short period is compressed a mass of events. It is composed of four main divisions. In the first, Ulysses dwells with Calypso on the Isle of Ogygia, far from his home, where the suitors of his wife Penelope threaten the ruin of his fortune. Telemachus, his son, now on the threshold of manhood, resolves to oppose their designs; and, counselled by Minerva, undertakes a journey to Pylos and Sparta to seek his father.

In the second part, Ulysses leaves Ogygia, arrives in the land of the Phæacians, to whom he narrates his adventures, and goes to Ithaca.

The third part details the plan of vengeance which Ulysses and his son resolved upon in the house of a faithful servant, the shepherd Eumæus, and which is executed in the fourth and last division.

The Odyssey, like the Iliad, is centered in one person and one event—Ulysses, and his return and vengeance. Its action, however, is more complicated through Telemachus's journey.

OTHER POEMS.

Homer is credited with other works besides the Iliad and the Odyssey; but the fact of his authorship has never been clearly made out. If we are to trust Aristotle, he was the father of comic narrative poetry as well as epic. The poem called "Margites" attributed to him, contained the travels and adventures of a wealthy and peevish coxcomb; but slight fragments of this only have been preserved; enough to show that the humour was somewhat more gross than one would expect from the poet of the Odyssey, though redeemed, no doubt, by satire of a higher kind.

THE TRANSMISSION OF THE ILIAD AND THE ODYSSEY; POWERS OF MEMORY.

That poems of such great length should have been preserved in days when writing, even if invented, was in its infancy, has often excited surprise. The Iliad alone contains between fifteen and sixteen thousand lines. "That they were publicly recited," says the Rev. Mr. Collins, "at great national festivals in all parts of Greece is undoubted. Professional minstrels, or rhapsodists, as they were called, chanted certain selected portions which suited their own taste or that of their audience—often such as contained the exploits of some national hero. They followed, possibly, in this the example of the great bard himself; just as certain of our own popular writers have lately taken to read to an admiring public some favorite scenes and chapters from their own works."

As to the powers of memory which would be called into play by the task of recitation, it would hardly be looked upon in those days with surprise. Long recitations were customary. When Odysseus himself recites at a breath (Odyssey IX.-XII.) no fewer than 2241 lines, it is nowhere pointed out that this was in any way either an effort for the speaker or for the listeners. It has been well remarked that modern recollection has very likely been weakened by habitual reliance on the great labour-saving appliances of manuscript and print. Yet Macaulay, when occupied with the engrossing pursuit of an historian, a province wholly foreign, happened to find, on a casual opportunity, that he could repeat one-half of Paradise Lost; and among the men of his generation there were a few, though a very few, whose capacity of recollection, rivalled or approached even that of Macaulay. Indeed, the aggregate contents of various memories at the present day must far exceed the whole mass of the poems.

LITERARY HISTORY.

Suppose we admit the personality of the poet, and his claim to be the author of both the Iliad and Odyssey, it does not follow that either poem was framed originally as a whole, or recited as a whole, on every occasion. Most likely the song grew as Homer sung, and the poet would probably add from time to time to the original lay.

It may be fairly granted also that future minstrels who sang the great poet's lays after his death, would interweave with them here and there something of their own, more or less successful in its imitation of the original. Such explanation of the repetitions and incongruities which are found in the Iliad seems at least as reasonable as the supposition that its twenty-four Books are the work of various hands, "stitched together"—such is one explanation of the term "rhapsody"—in after times, and having a common origin only in this, that all sung of the "wondrous tale of Troy."

Lycurgus is said to have brought the collected poems from Asia to Sparta; Solon, at Athens, to have first obliged the minstrels to recite the several portions in due order, so as to preserve the continuity of the narrative. Pisistratus, the great Athenian ruler, has the reputation of having first reduced the whole into a collected shape, and of having thus far settled the "text" of Homer, employing in this work the most eminent men of letters of his day. There is a legend of a Homeric "Septuagint;" of seventy learned scribes em-played in the great work, as in the Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures.

From the time when the Iliad and Odyssey were reduced to writing, their popularity rather increased than waned. They were the storehouses of Greek history, genealogy, and antiquity, the models and standards of literary taste. To be unacquainted with these masterpieces was to be wholly without culture and education; and owing to their continual and public recital, this want was, perhaps, less prevalent amongst the Greeks than amongst ourselves. The young Alcibiades, when receiving the usual education of a Greek gentleman, is said to have struck his tutor one day in a burst of righteous indignation for having made the confession—certainly inexcusable in his vocation—that he did not possess a copy of the great poet. Alexander the Great carried always with him the copy which had been corrected by his master, Aristotle, preserved in a jewelled casket taken amongst the spoils of Darius.

No pains were spared in the caligraphy or costliness in the mountings of favourite manuscripts of the Homeric poems. They continued to be regarded with almost a superstitious reverence even during the middle ages of Christendom. Men's future destinies were discovered, by a sort of rude divination, in verses selected at hap-hazard. Fantastical writers saw in the two poems nothing more nor less than allegorical versions of Hebrew history; and grave physicians recommended as an infallible cure for a quartan ague, the placing every night a copy of the Fourth Book of the Iliad under the patient's head. Modern speculations have gone quite as far in another direction. In the eyes of some ingenious theorists, this siege of Troy is but "a repetition of the daily siege of the east by the solar powers that every evening are robbed of their brightest treasure in the west; and the Homeric heroes and their exploits all represent, allegorically, in one form or another, the great conflict between Light and Darkness."

VIEWS ON THE CONTENTS OF THE ILIAD AND THE ODYSSEY.

Two views are held by modern scholars on the nature of the contents of the Iliad and the Odyssey. One is that the destruction of Troy (Ilium) was an actual historical event, which took place either before the Æolian migration, or in connection with it. The first to give a scientific basis to this view was Völcker.

The other makes the narrative of the Iliad not that of the legendary destruction of a certain town, but the recollection of the deeds of the Actæans, who were descendants of Pelops, Agamemnon, and Achilles, from whom they conquered a new territory.

Professor Blackie, a strenuous advocate of the traditional theory, in his "Homer and the Iliad," expresses his belief that "there was a kingdom of Priam, wealthy and powerful, on the coast of the Dardanelles; that there was a great naval expedition undertaken against this Asiatic dynasty by the combined forces of the European Greeks and some of the Asiatic islanders, under the leadership of the King of Mycenæ; that there was a real Achilles, chief of a warlike clan in the Thessalian Phthiotis, and a real quarrel between him and the General-in-chief of the Hellenic armament; that this quarrel brought about the most disastrous results to the Greek host in the first place, and had nearly caused the failure of the expedition; but that afterwards, a reconciliation having been effected, a series of brilliant achievements followed, which issued soon after in the capture of the great Asiatic capital."

Bishop Thirlwall, in his "History of Greece," rejects all belief in the detailed narrative of the Iliad and the Odyssey, while he affirms that "the incidents cursorily noticed in these poems were exhibited in full mythical garb in other epics."

Mr. Grote says in regard to the Trojan war, that as the possibility of it cannot be denied, so neither can the reality of it be affirmed. He supposes that the Iliad consisted originally of a comparatively small poem on the exploits of Achilles, which he calls the Achilloid, and that the other portions of the Iliad were not included in the first plan of it. He sums up the controversy with a statement which probably all critics of the Homeric poems are ready to accept: "For, in truth, our means of knowledge are so limited, that no man can produce arguments sufficiently cogent to contend against opposing preconceptions. . . . We have nothing to teach us the history of these poems except the poems themselves. Not only do we possess no collateral information respecting them or their author, but we have no one to describe to us the age in which they originated; our knowledge respecting contemporary Homeric society is collected exclusively from the Homeric compositions themselves. We are ignorant whether any other, or what other, poems preceded them, or divided with them the public favour; nor have we anything better than conjecture to determine either the circumstances under which they were brought before the hearers, or the conditions which a bard of that day was required to satisfy."

Max Müller says that "it would be mere waste of time to construct out of such elements a systematic history, only to be destroyed again sooner or later by some Niebuhr, Grote, or Lewis." The theory, in his "Lecture on the Science of Language," to which we have already alluded, that the siege of Troy is a repetition of the daily siege of the east by the solar powers, has found an exhaustive commentary in the "Mythology of the Aryan Nations," by G. W. Cox.

While the Trojan war is thus divested of all historical character, Mr. Gladstone reiterates in his "Juventus Mundi" what he said in his "Treatise on Homer and the Homeric Age," namely, that the Iliad and the Odyssey are emphatically historical poems; and in his "Homer's place in History," he thinks there is room for the presumption that the capture of Troy occurred in the 14th century B.C.

The exact position occupied by Mr. Gladstone among the critics of Homer has been thus stated by himself in an article on "Homer's place in History" in the Contemporary Review:—"I am, he says, "among those who have contended—

"(1) That the poems of Homer were in the highest sense historical, as a record of 'manners and characters, feelings and tastes, races and countries, principles and institutions.'

"(2) That there was a solid nucleus of fact in his account of the Trojan War.

"(3) That there were no adequate data for assigning to him, or to the Troica, a place in chronology.

"(4) That his chronology was to be found in his genealogies, which were usually careful and consistent, and which therefore served to establish a relative series of persons and events, within his proper sphere, but did not supply links of definite connection with the general course of human affairs outside of that sphere in time or place.

"(5) That there was no extravagance in supposing he might have lived within a half century after the War, though he was certainly not an eye-witness of it.

"(6) That there was very strong reason to believe that he lived before the Dorian conquest of the Peloponnesos."

Wolf, a celebrated German scholar, took an extremely sceptical view regarding the productions of Homer. According to him, the Iliad and Odyssey were no proper epic poems in the sense which the Æneid and Paradise Lost are epics, but only skilful compilations of popular ballads, originally separate, and of whose separate existence this sharp-eyed critic could easily bring forward convincing proof.

On its first appearance, the Wolfian theory carried everything before it in Germany, and the startling doctrine which the great critic promulgated, that the Homeric poems were a congeries of originally independent lays, gathered together and moulded into a unity in the time of Pisistratus (about B.C. 560), was received with favour not only among scholars, such as Heyne and Niebuhr, but also in the general circles of literature, where Herder hailed it as opening up new and important aspects of popular poetry, and the Schlegels followed in the same vein. The easy and rapid acceptance of the theory seems to us, even in these changeable days, difficult to understand. A number of predisposing causes, however, contributed to this result—partly the spirit of the century itself, which gloried in paradox, partly the remarkable evidence, which had been appearing everywhere with more or less conclusiveness, as to the extraordinary vitality of popular poetry, even under its most anonymous and uncertified character, and that, too, as if to exemplify the Wolfian theory, without the aid of literary appliances to preserve it. The Ossianic controversy, in particular, had opened up large vistas of vague possibility in this direction, and in a fortunate hour, by a most dexterous handling of the evidence and a masterly marshalling of the phenomena, Wolf was able to forge the thunderbolt that shattered, in the view of Germany, the unity of the Homeric poems.

The war so grandly begun by Wolf was continued by Godfrey Hermann and William Müller, who carried on a vigorous polemic more especially against the unity of the Iliad.

A reaction, however, arose, and a school of critics sprang up of a more conservative character, who were able, by a more thorough survey of the historical conditions of the case, to reconquer many of the apparently lost positions. Among these may be named especially Ottfried Müller, Welcker, and Gregor W. Nitzsch, the last of whom, by his voluminous and weighty works, has dealt very powerful blows at the Wolfians, so that he may well be called "Malleus Wolfianorum."

Of late years, however, notwithstanding the powerful reaction of a century, Germany has gone back largely to the Wolfian camp.

THE MATERIALS AND STYLE OF HOMER'S POETRY.

The materials of Homer's poetry are essentially national; and if not strictly historical in every detail of decoration, grew, like all ballad poetry, out of the real life of the people, and rest at least upon a solid historical substratum.

Homer is probably the most characteristic of all poets. Traits personal to himself inhere in his whole work, and perpetually reappear upon the surface. Sir Walter Scott has admirably described the fine style of Swift as the style which puts the right words in the right places. No more just sentence could have been written on the style of Homer. But the merit thus described is essentially general. Homer has also the special quality that all he produces carries the maker's mark. But the maker's mark, when too prominent, constitutes what is called mannerism. With Homer the maker's mark never obtrudes the maker, or places him between the reader and the theme. It never interferes with the aim and matter of the poem. Only it is there, ready when wanted. If we look for it, we find it. We then discover that in him what we call style, while he has the simplest of all styles, is also, setting aside the class of mannerists, perhaps the most peculiar to this individual. It would be hardly possible to quote five lines from him which must not at once, by internal evidence, be recognized as his. Even in the smallest shred of the painting, the painter's touch is seen. So that though imitated often, in form and material, the imitations of him are known by their touch and effect, not by their likeness.

"The qualities," remarks Mr. Gladstone, "that mark Greek letters in general are pre-eminently found in Homer: such as force, purpose, measure, fitness, directness, clearness, and completeness. To these he adds a richness and variety, a comprehensive universality, which is given only to the highest genius. The force which marks a full and healthy development in mind and body is in Homer, as in the Greeks generally, not thrown idly about, but addressed to an aim. The thought is in strict proportion to the subject, and the language is fitted exactly to the thought. It goes to its end by the straightest road. The clearness of Homer is unrivalled in literature. The passages in which his meaning is open to the smallest shade of doubt, either as to thought or language, might perhaps be counted on the fingers. Such a clearness could hardly survive the advent of philosophy. It was the privilege of the childhood of the race, a true though an Herculean childhood. Lastly, the assertion may create greater surprise in some, but it is true, that Homer's forms of expression are in a very high degree complete, as a statue shaped and polished to the finger-nail was in the Roman proverb complete, not merely in their main outlines, but in refined and subtle detail. The whole of these eminently Greek qualities may be summed up in one phrase—poetic truth."

CARDINAL QUALITIES; A BLEMISH.

The cardinal qualities of the style of Homer have been pointed out by Mr. Matthew Arnold. "The translator of Homer," he says, "should above all be penetrated by a sense of four qualities of his author—that he is eminently rapid; that he is eminently plain and direct, both in the evolution of his thought and in the expression of it, that is, both in his syntax and his words; that he is eminently plain and direct in the substance of his thought, that is, in his matter and ideas; and finally, that he is eminently noble."

The peculiar rapidity of Homer is due in great measure to his use of the hexameter verse. It is characteristic of early literature that the evolution of the thought, that is, the grammatical form of the sentence, is guided by the structure of the verse and the correspondence which consequently obtains between the rhythm and the grammar—the thought being given out in lengths, as it were.

It is the remark of Aristotle that Homer, though not in form a dramatist, is the most dramatic of all Greek writers, for except in his exordium of a few lines, he never speaks in his own person, but at once introduces his characters speaking; and they always speak consistently with the occasion and with themselves.

One blemish to be laid to the charge of Homer is the predominance of the lashing and slashing element, and the bulky accumulation of battle pieces. No doubt the rare old minstrel has shown his usual quickness of eye and freshness of observation in the curious variety of detail which he gives to the bitter passages by which the spirit of the wounded hero makes its exit from the body; but no variety in point of detail can compensate to a modern reader for the wearisome influence of a long succession of battle-pieces, in which the rhetoric which accompanies the blow only tends to show more distinctly the ferocity of the man who inflicts it. But modern feelings and modern notions must not be allowed to affect our judgment of Homer's merit as a poet.

MATERIALS FOR HISTORY.

There remains to us in Homer's verse materials, richer perhaps than existed for any period of the ancient world,—richer than even for the brilliant days of Pericles or of the Cæsars, to construct a history, not of the times of which the poet sang, but of the men among whom he lived; how they acted; how they thought, talked, and felt; what they made of the earth and of their place in it; their private life and their public life : men and women, masters and servants, rich and poor, we have them all delineated in the marvellous verse of a poet who, be he what he may, was in this respect the greatest which the world has ever seen. In extent the information is little enough ; but in the same sense as it has been said that an hour at an Athenian supper-feast would teach us more Grecian life and character than all Aristophanes, Homer's pictures of life and manners are so living, so distinct, so palpable, that a whole prose encyclopædia of disconnected facts gives us nothing like them.

It is not for the Greeks alone that Homer possesses an important historical value ; but for all nations he forms an important record of the earliest stages of human society, second only to the Books of Moses, and perhaps some of the very oldest of the Vedas. The first germs of almost all the other arts and sciences afterwards cultivated by the Greeks and Romans are to be met with in Homer. In this view he was to the Greeks themselves an encyclopædia of their national culture ; and as embodying the leading features of their polytheistic faith, he is also constantly referred to by their great writers with all the deference due to an inspired voice.

In Homer, we find faithfully described the manners and sentiments, the state of religion and of knowledge, the organisation of society, and the arts of peace and war among the ancient Greeks. This is done with native simplicity and vividness. He sets us as in the midst of the most ancient of the nation. We may disbelieve, as in a modern novel, every individual fact ; yet from his poems, as from a good novel, the stranger will imbibe a perfect idea of the state of society. Homer is, in truth, to his reader better than the best book of travels into old Greece.

Not only so, but by reason of the unbounded popularity of his poems with his countrymen, their influence over the Greek mind may be compared to the combined effect produced in England by the Bible and by Shakspeare. In discovering the mind of Homer, as to its intellectual and moral tone, we get discernment not into one Greek only, but into all the Greeks, of whom he is emphatically a noble type. In this respect the substance of what he tells us is often of less importance to us than the manner in which he tells it.

The weakest point of the Greeks, their absurd religion, has its interest and instruction in its eminently childish simplicity. We see in this people what may be called the childish mind magnified, both as to intensity and duration ; and through them we can trace step by step the wonderful changes of religious thought from Homer to Pindar, and to Plato or Aristotle ; but to be familiar first with Homer is the basis of this contemplation.

It is to be added that this poet wrote in a stage of the national mind in which divisions of literature were not recognised. Even the distinction of prose and poetry had not yet arisen. He is alternately poet, orator, and historian, theologian, geographer, traveller, jocosé as well as serious, dramatic as well as descriptive. In this half-developed condition, each separate function is less perfectly performed than afterwards ; yet the work as a whole has charms not easily attained by anything less comprehensive.

HOMERIC HEROES.

It is probable that, like most other great painters of human nature, Homer was indebted to previous traditions for the original sketches of his principal heroes. These sketches, however, could have been little more than outlines, which, as worked up into the finished portraits of the Iliad and Odyssey, must rank as his own genuine productions. In every branch of imitative art, this faculty of representing to the life the moral phenomena of our nature in their varied phases of virtue, vice, weakness, or eccentricity, is the highest and rarest attribute of genius, and rarest of all as exercised by Homer through the medium of dramatic action, where the characters are never formally described, but made to develop themselves by their own language and conduct. It is this among his many great qualities which chiefly raises Homer above all other poets of his own class ; nor, with the single exception, perhaps, of the great English dramatist, has any poet ever produced so numerous and spirited a variety of original characters, of different ages, ranks, and sexes. Still more peculiar to himself than their variety is the unity of thought, feeling, and expression, often of minute phraseology, with which they are individually sustained, and yet without an appearance of effort on the part of their author. Each describes himself spontaneously when brought on the scene, just as the automata of Vulcan in the Odyssey, though indebted to the divine artist for the mechanism on which they move, appear to perform their functions by their own unaided powers. This it has been pointed out may be used as an argument in favour of the unity of the Homeric poems. That any two or more poets should simultaneously have conceived such a character as Achilles is next to impossible. Still less credible is it that the different parts of the Iliad, where the hero successively appears as the same sublime ideal being, under the influence of the same combination of virtues, failings, and passions—thinking, speaking, acting, and suffering, according to the same single type of heroic grandeur—can be the production of more than a single mind. Such evidence is, perhaps, even stronger in the case of the less prominent actors, in so far as it is less possible that different artists should simultaneously agree in their portraits of mere subordinate incidental personages, than of heroes whose renown may have rendered their characters a species of public property. Two poets of the Elizabethan age might, without any concert, have harmonised to a great extent in their portrait of Henry V.; but that the correspondence should have extended to the imaginary companions of his youth—the Falstuffs, Pistols, Bardolps, Quickleys—were incredible. But the nicest shades of peculiarity in the inferior actors of the Iliad and Odyssey, are conceived and maintained in the same spirit of distinction as in Achilles or Hector.

THE ILIAD AND THE ODYSSEY COMPARED WITH THE NIEBELUNGEN-LAY.

It has been pointed out by an able writer that the extraordinary excellence of the Iliad and Odyssey as pattern specimens of the popular epos may be most readily seen by comparing them with the Niebelungen-lay of the Germans,—a poem composed in a similar state of society, and so much under the same circumstances that Lachmann actually set himself to analyse it after the Wolfian fashion, and resolve it into what he considered its constituent small songs.

In this Teutonic epos the unprejudiced reader will, along with many quiet beauties, discover an utter want of that equestrian vigour, manfulness, and fire which never remit in the sinewy and bracing course of the Iliad. Homer sometimes seems to take his subject easily,—either sleeps himself, no doubt, or some interpolated Homerid is sleeping in his chair,—but he is never flat, never thin, never weak. Of the Niebelungen-lay, on the other hand, we may say that breadth, dilution and weakness are the characteristics. It is a German Iliad, and a very German Iliad indeed, as Coleridge said of the Messiah of Klopstock,—an Iliad composed by an old German in his easy chair, enveloping his ungirt Muse in a loose-floating atmosphere of tobacco-smoke,—Homer in his slippers.

But besides vigour, the Greek asserts his proud pre-eminence over the German by the healthy hilarity and the rich, sunny luxuriance of his fine Ionic temperament. One feels that these poems were written in a clime where, next to Olympian Jove, the shining Apollo was the great object of local worship.

His variety and many-sidedness have been equally praised: for though it is certainly true that there is for our modern tastes a very considerable superfluity of mere fighting in the Iliad, we must bear in mind that Homer wrote in an age when the soldier was the only hero, and for a people to whom the recital of the military exploits of ancestors was as full of moral significance as the trials of the Apostle Paul are to a modern Christian.

Not less admirable, finally, than his vigour, his sunniness, and his luxuriant variety are the sobriety, sense, and moderation that everywhere regulate and keep within chaste limits the billowy enthusiasm of the old minstrel. Occasionally, perhaps, when a patriotic feeling interferes, there may be discerned a little ludicrous exaggeration, but generally speaking, the poet's thorough naturalness and truth kept him by a safe instinct within the nicest limits of good taste. In the Niebelungen-lay, on the other hand, as in Klopstock's Messiah, there is a plentiful exhibition, in the author's way, of the most appalling exaggeration. The catastrophe of the Odyssey, no doubt, is sufficiently bloody; but this is the divine retributive vengeance of a goddess for a long series of offences of a very gross and wanton description; and besides, it may well be called sober and moderate when contrasted with that gigantic cyclopean architecture of terrors cemented with streaming blood, and wrapt in flames of portentous conflagration, which forms such a grim catastrophe to the grim epos of the Niebelungen.

THE ILIAD COMPARED WITH THE ODYSSEY.

So far as tone and style are concerned, it has been remarked by Mr. Gladstone and other critics, there is no doubt that the pulse so to speak of the Odyssey beats less vehemently than that of the Iliad. It would, however, be strange if it were not so, when we recollect that one is a poem of war and the other of peace; one of the barrack and the other of the palace. It is reasonably believed among those who oppose the Separatists, as they are called, that the just proportion which exists between the subject and the style of each, suggests another proportion, not less just, between subject and style on the one hand, and time of life on the other; that the Iliad represents the life and genius of the poet moving upwards to the zenith, and the Odyssey the same life and genius in the paler track beyond.

An interesting comparison of the two plots has been made by Mr. Gladstone in his deservedly popular "Manual on Homer." "In the plot of the Odyssey," he says, "symmetry is obvious at first sight; in the plot of the Iliad it has to be sought out; and the relevancy and proportion of the parts are only seen in full when we bring into view, together with the highly national character of the poem, the circumstances of the minstrel, itinerant among the courts, festivals, and games of Greece, and naturally led to give alternate prominence to the performances of the respective chiefs with whose names this or that part of the country had a special connection. The plot of the Iliad is in reality a far more subtle, far less imitable work. Each poem hangs upon a man: the Iliad upon the wrath of a man. Each poem is intensely national; but the nationality of the Iliad is exhibited in the struggle with an alien and offending power; that of the Odyssey in the comparison and contrast between Achaian life on the one side, and foreign and partly fabulous scenes, manners, and institutions on the other. The Odyssey is more strange in adventures; but its ordinary tone within the Hellenic zone is calmer and more subdued, and tends less, except when near the crisis, to warm the blood of the reader. There is in each a parallelism between the divine and the human actions. It is but rarely in the Iliad that grandeur and rapid force give way to allow the exhibition of domestic affection: yet this exhibition is as remarkable and unequivocal as the more splendid features of the poem. Conversely in the Odyssey, the family life supplies the tissue upon and into which is woven the action of the poem; yet upon occasion it rises into a grandeur that is extraordinary. The scene of Hector and Andromache equals the Odyssey in tenderness; the slow preparations, moral as well as physical, for the great vengeance on the suitors, in their stern sublimity perhaps may match with anything in the Iliad: so that each poem, from base to summit, has a somewhat similar largeness of range. The Iliad is carefully finished to the end; and if it flags at all, flags in some of the middle parts, while the great issue remains suspended: the last Book of the Odyssey, while it carries a sufficiency of identifying marks, exhibits a manifest decline in force, as if the mind and hand of the master were conscious that their work was done, and coveted their rest.' In these remarks every reader of taste will be found to agree with Mr. Gladstone.

HOMER COMPARED WITH OTHER GREAT LITERARY EPICS.

An interesting comparison has been made of Homer with other great literary epics. Like the French epics, Homeric poetry is indigenous, and is distinguished by this fact, and by the ease of movement and the simplicity which result from it, from poets such as Virgil, Dante, and Milton. It is also distinguished from them by the comparative absence of underlying motive or sentiment. In Virgil's poetry a sense of the greatness of Rome and Italy is the leading motive of a passionate rhetoric, partly veiled by the chosen delicacy of his language. Dante and Milton are still more faithful exponents of the religion and politics of their times. Even the French epics are pervaded by the sentiment of fear and hatred of the Saracens. But in Homer the interest is purely dramatic: there is no strong antipathy of race or religion; the war turns on no political event; the capture of Troy lies outside the range of the Iliad. Even the heroes are not the chief national heroes of Greece. The interest lies wholly, so far as we can see, in the picture of human life and action.

TRANSLATIONS OF HOMER.

The poems of Homer, as a great inheritance for the whole world, have naturally been translated into the principal languages of Europe. The most famous of continental versions are those of Cesarotti and Monti in Italy; Montbel in France; and Voss in Germany.

The best known translations in English are those of Chapman, Pope, and William Cowper.

CHAPMAN'S TRANSLATION.

The great merit of Chapman, as well becomes an English writer contemporary of Shakspeare, are vigour, power, freshness, and originality. He had, besides, an unbounded admiration of his author and was of far too strong, free, and poetic a nature to imagine that the fine dash and flow of a great genius could ever be adequately expressed by the mechanical method of a literal transference. In those days also they had a bold, direct way of looking at things, and an outspoken heartiness and honesty of phrase which is thoroughly Homeric. "In this respect," says Professor Blackie,—who is himself, to our way of thinking, the most admirable of the latter-day translators of Homer,—"Chapman was certainly more favourably situated for rendering Homer into English than those who came after him. No translator is less anxious than Chapman to preserve the mere words of the original. Hence the strong, manly fashion in which he takes the right word as it were by the cuff of the neck, and flings it into the arena to do his bidding."

But every reader who knows his Greek Homer recognises in Chapman innumerable things that are not in the original, and are inclined to apply to his style of translation what Dryden said of Cowley's, "It is not always that a man will have a present made him when he expects the payment of a debt."

Unfortunately Chapman, and, indeed, the Elizabethans generally, with all their power, were considerable mannerists. They had a very rare sort of mannerism to be sure, springing from an excess of power, a very forward fancy, and a very protrusive wit; but this mannerism, like spangles upon a Quaker's robe, or ingenious fancies in a death-bed prayer, may often prove as fatal to poetry and to a good translation as the cheaper mannerism of feebleness and a barren wit. So it was not un seldom with Chapman.

With all his searching fervour and rough grandeur, Chapman is in general far from being a good translator. His vices, that is, almost always his misapplied virtues, are unfortunately most un-Homeric. Of ingenious conceits, quaint fancies, clever allusions, smart plays upon words, the minstrel Homer had as little idea as his heroes had of French sauce to their roasted chine. But such things are constant in Chapman.

"You will not find anywhere in the English language more splendid examples of bombast than in 'Chapman's Homer.' If people do not always say so it is either because they are ignorant, or because Chapman has been dead more than two hundred years; and there is a class of critics who are as prone to extenuate the defects of dead writers as to exaggerate the faults of the living. Besides, Chapman is an Elizabethan, and there is a charm in that word to certain ears powerful to gag all judgment and consecrate any absurdity."—Blackie.

On the subject of Chapman's translation, Mr. James R. Lowell, the American author, writes with considerable enthusiasm. "The Homer of Chapman," he says, "whatever its defects, alone of all English versions has this crowning merit of being, where it is most successful, thoroughly alive. He has made for us the best poem that has yet been Englished out of Homer, and in so far gives us a truer idea of him. Of all translators he is farthest removed from the fault with which he charges others, when he says that our divine master's most ingenious imitating the life of things (which is the soul of a poem) is never respected nor perceived by his interpreters only standing pedantically on the grammar and words, utterly ignorant of the sense and grace of him. His mastery of English is something wonderful, even in an age of masters, when the language was still a mother-tongue, and not a contrivance of pedants and grammarians. He had a reverential sense of 'our divine Homer's depth and gravity, which will not open itself to the curious austerity of belabouring art, but only to the natural and most ingenious soul of our thrice-sacred poeey.' His task was as holy to him as a version of Scripture; he justifies the tears of Achilles by those of Jesus, and the eloquence of his horse by that of Balaam's less noble animal. He does not always keep close to his original, but he sins no more even in this than any of his rivals. He is especially great in his similes. . . . Of all who have attempted Homer, he has the topping merit of being inspired by him."

POPE'S TRANSLATION.

Pope has three great and thorough Homeric excellences,—fervour, rapidity, and sound; and these three virtues are such that we may well allow them to cover a multitude of sins. No translator of any classical work has been so widely read as Pope: and even now, when a great change has come over the literary world, he maintains a high position. This popularity he owes to two circumstances: he had the good sense to choose a thoroughly popular and national measure, and he handled it with consummate mastery.

But the age in which Pope lived was an age which, in its literary fashion, preferred elegance to strength, ornament to simplicity, and art to nature. Of this age Pope was one of the foremost spokesmen; and as such unquestionably had no special vocation to translate Homer.

The great fault of Pope is his determination to be grand,—a determination which achieves its purpose too often by mere pomp of sound and flourish of rhetorical trumpets without regard to the truth of the picture he has to paint. As Arnold says well, he is apt to plant his style formally betwixt himself and his object, whereas the true poetic eye looks at the object simply.

The only other fault of Pope which deserves mention is his well-known delight in glittering antitheses and elegant points of expression. Homer, like every popular poet, has his store of proverbial sayings, expressed by him generally in the rounded form of a single line or couplet; but of the rhetorical figure called antithesis, as used by French wits and literary men, he knows nothing.

COWPER'S TRANSLATION.

The peculiar features of Cowper's translation took their rise in the genius of the poet, the circumstances under which he wrote, and the tendency which ruled him to avoid the faults of his predecessors. His genius was simple, homely, easy, familiar, and thoroughly natural; his circumstances were sad,—he wrote as a relief to his mind during prolonged fits of the most oppressive despondency.

In the work of translation he started with the canon of literalness. "Fidelity," says he, "is of the very essence of translation. The matter found in me, whether the reader like it or not, is found in Homer; and the matter not found in me, how much soever he may admire it, is found only in Mr. Pope. I have omitted nothing, I have invented nothing . . . To those who shall be inclined to tell me that my diction is often plain and inelegant, I reply beforehand that I know it; that it would be absurd were it otherwise; and that Homer himself stands in the same predicament."

"These words," remarks Professor Blackie, "reveal the whole secret of the principle on which Cowper's Iliad was composed, contain the text of all its profound excellences and all its profound defects. The radiant steeds of Chapman, and the rhetorical pyrotechny of Pope were both to disappear. This is his grand virtue. But when the English is to be bald and flat because Homer is the same, there is double weakness here, for which the pretty apology is hardly sufficient,—the weakness of Cowper's mind which was not of the sounding and tramping character of Homer's, and the weakness of Cowper's English language as contrasted with Homer's Ionic Greek; for which, on his naked principle of literalness, he could offer no compensation; but for which both Chapman and Pope amply compensated, sometimes by creating new beauties, at other times by plucking the offence from the forehead of a fault, through the charm of some brilliant or sonorous impropriety."

POPULAR QUALITIES.

There is some tendency in critics from Aristotle downwards to invert the order of attributes in respect to the Homeric poems so as to dwell most on recondite excellences which escape the unaided reader, and which are even to a great extent disputable. But it is given to few minds, as Goethe has remarked, to appreciate fully the mechanism of a long poem; and many feel the beauty of the separate parts who have no sentiment for the aggregate perfection of the whole.

Nor were the Homeric poems originally addressed to minds of the rarer stamp. They are intended for those feelings which the critic has in common with the unlettered mass, not for that enlarged range of vision and peculiar standard which he has acquired to himself. They are of all poems the most absolutely and unreservedly popular: had they been otherwise they could not have lived so long in the mouth of the rhapsodes and the ear and memory of the people; and it was then that their influence was first acquired, never afterwards to be shaken. Their beauties belong to the parts taken separately, which revealed themselves spontaneously to the listening crowd at the festival, far more than to the whole poem taken together, which could hardly be appreciated unless the parts were dwelt upon and allowed to expand in the mind. The most unlettered hearer of these times could readily seize, while the most instructed reader can still recognise, the characteristic excellences of Homer's narrative,—its straightforward, unconscious, unstudied simplicity; its concrete forms of speech and happy alternation of action with dialogue; its vivid pictures of living agents, always clearly and sharply individualised, whether in the commanding proportions of Achilles and Odysseus, in the graceful presence of Helen and Penelope, or in the more humble contrast of Eumæus and Malanthus; and always, moreover, animated by the frankness with which his heroes give utterance to all their transient emotions and even all their infirmities; its constant reference to those coarser veins of feeling and palpable motives which belong to all men in common; its fullness of graphic detail, freshly drawn from the visible and audible world, and though often homely, never tame or trenching upon that limit of satiety to which the Greek mind was so keenly alive; lastly, its perpetual junction of gods and men in the same picture, and familiar appeal to ever-present divine agency, in harmony with the interpretation of nature at that time universal.

It is undoubtedly easier to feel than to describe the impressive influence of Homeric narrative; but the time and circumstances under which that influence was first and most powerfully felt, preclude the possibility of explaining it by comprehensive and elaborate comparisons such as are implied in Aristotle's remarks upon the structure of the poems. The critic who seeks the explanation in the right place will not depart widely from the point of view of those humble auditors to whom the poems were originally addressed, or from the susceptibilities and capacities common to the human bosom in every stage of progressive culture. And though the refinements and delicacies of the poems, as well as their general structure, are a subject of highly interesting criticism, yet it is not to these that Homer owes his widespread and imperishable popularity.

Still less is it true, as the well-known observations of Horace would lead us to believe, that Homer is a teacher of ethical wisdom of high standing. No didactic purpose is to be found in the Iliad and Odyssey. A philosopher may doubtless extract from the incidents and strongly marked characters which they contain much illustrative matter for his exhortations, but the ethical doctrine which he applies must emanate from his own reflections. The Homeric hero manifests virtues or infirmities, fierceness or compassion, with the same straightforward and simple-minded vivacity, unconscious of any ideal standard by which his conduct is to be tried; nor can we trace in the poet any ulterior function beyond that of the inspired organ of the Muse and the eloquent herald of lost adventures out of the darkness of the past.

VARIOUS VIEWS.

"I would by no means," says a critic to whom we have already been much indebted, "conceal from myself the fact that there are always many noble-minded and high-hearted persons living in the world who have no taste for poetry strictly so called, whose own lives, perhaps, are an epic poem and a song of victory in their own sphere, but to whom the cunningly ornate and finely harmonized description of their own unobtrusive heroism or that of their neighbours is a matter of indifference, perhaps of annoyance. I am well aware also that even the special lovers of rhythmical composition in the present age are not all for that reason necessarily the admirers of Homer; on the contrary, the curious elaboration, the imaginative luxuriance, the subtle fancifulness, the high-strained idealism, the far-reaching speculation, the metaphysical self-anatomizing inspection of modern poetry, are elements which, if they once become the habitual food of our higher nature, will withdraw a great many of the more delicately sensitive readers of poetry from the enjoyment of Homer. Those who love to soar in an aerial balloon with Percy Bysshe Shelley, or to wrestle with the darkest social problems of the day under the leadership of the authoress of 'Aurora Leigh,' will not be apt to consider the wrath of a Thessalian captain, or the wanderings of a worldly-wise Ithacan laird among savages and giants three thousand years ago, subjects of very hopeful significance for the lofty Muse by which they love to be inspired. Persons who have been accustomed to ride a winged Pegasus will not readily condescend to mount a common horse, whose highest exploit is to gallop over a green common, where merely mortal kine, sheep, and geese crop vulgar grass, or to leap across a triple-barred gate and a double ditch with only a human hunter on his back.

"But such persons, although they may not be willing, if they are honest, to profess any great admiration for Homer's poetry any more than for Walter Scott's; yet if they have true hearts in their bosoms, and are not merely employed under the name of poetry in faintly nursing a few morbid conceits, will have no difficulty in allowing their eyes to rest curiously, and it may be even lovingly, on the real pictures of healthy and vigorous human life which the Homeric poems present."

GREATNESS ACHIEVED UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

IT is seldom that we find in a single life such a concentration of the truly heroic, so grand and universal, and withal so hearty and cheerful a lesson, as is presented in the career of the Northumbrian pitman, who wrought for shillings while preparing to increase his country's wealth by millions,—who, laboriously mastering the alphabet after he had attained to manhood, was destined to teach the wise men of his century how to use the power whose agency should bring into communication and fellowship the remotest nations of the earth,—who cheerfully sat down to patch the jackets and cobble the shoes of his fellow pitmen, by the light of the engine fire, to earn the pence for the night-school, where he, a grown man, learnt to read, write, and cipher,—the man who was to be the gainer of one of those mighty victories of peace, infinitely grander in their nature than the triumphs of war, inasmuch as they construct and create, spreading blessing and prosperity, where war's triumphs bring but sorrow and desolation. "Some are born great," says Shakespeare's Malvolio, "some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them;" and in the careers of the majority of eminent men, there is a mingling of the three elements; the advantages derived from birth and station and inherited wealth, and not unfrequently the influence of favouritism and patronage, forming very important factors in a successful career by their fostering assistance to ability. Thus even in the career of the great Duke of Wellington, we cannot leave out of view the aristocratic birth and surroundings, which enabled the future hero to spring so lightly and jauntily up the first steps of the ladder of promotion, and made a lieutenant-colonel of him within six years of his entering the army as ensign. The younger Pitt, great as he undoubtedly was as a statesman, and worthy of his high position, to a certain extent had greatness thrust upon him, when, through royal favour, he became Chancellor of the Exchequer in his 23rd, and Prime Minister in his 24th, year; and in the careers of the great Sir Robert Peel, Sir Francis Bacon, the Duke of Marlborough, and a host of other worthies who have left a great name behind them, the influence of favouring circumstances can be traced, and must not be ignored. But in Stephenson's case these are entirely wanting. No soldier in life's battle rose so completely and gloriously from the ranks as did the man to whom we owe the great railway system of the world. No man was more fully entitled to say, with Schiller's ideal German poet, "Selbst erschuf er sich den Werth." What he was worth he owed to himself. If a writer of fiction sat down with the avowed purpose of portraying a man who by indomitable tenacity and perseverance, sterling worth and nobleness, and unassisted genius, triumphed over the most formidable obstacles, and achieved a success colossal in itself, but with its greatness enhanced tenfold by the straightforward honesty, the undeviating rectitude that compelled respect while it extorted admiration, he could hardly, from his unfettered fancy, have evolved so complete a picture as the history of George Stephenson presents in reality. Fact is here, as elsewhere, stranger than fiction.

A HERO FROM THE RANKS.

By the working millions, the life of Stephenson can hardly be read without a glow of honest pride; and from beginning to end it is fraught with encouragement. It is so emphatically a good life, so full of honest, healthy effort, so thorough and real from beginning to end. Integer vixit might appropriately have been taken for the motto of George Stephenson. Whatever his hand found to do, he did with his might. There was a manly modesty about him, a simplicity that had in itself an element of the heroic. Mr. Pease of Darlington, to whom he came to speak about the projected railway from that town to Stockton, was at once taken with his quiet, manly demeanour. There was such an honest, sensible look about him, and he seemed so modest and unpretending. He spoke in the strong Northumbrian dialect of his district, and described himself as "only the engine-wright at Killingworth; that's what he was." A working man laboriously raising himself by sheer hard work, cleverness, and genius, with all his modesty he was yet self-possessed and self-reliant. He had thought out what he asserted, and thoroughly believed in its truth; and when called upon, would give his opinion without fear and without favour. He explained to King Leopold of Belgium, in the palace of Lacken, his views concerning the Belgian coal-fields, with as much coolness as if he had been addressing one of his own companions or friends; using his hat as a model whereon to demonstrate his propositions, and afterwards humorously mentioning to Mr. Sopwith, who was with him, his anxiety that the King should not see the inside of his hat, "which was a shocking bad one." "Robert's good-natured, you see," he said to Lord Howick, who had come to see his son in reference to a scheme in which that nobleman was greatly interested; "and if your Lordship were to get alongside of him, you might talk him over; so you have been quite lucky in meeting with me . . . You may take my word for it, my Lord, it will never answer." Lord Howick was a wealthy county magnate, an influential nobleman; but "a man's a man for a' that!" In a question concerning a railway it was George Stephenson first, and Lord Howick nowhere; and, like an undaunted Briton as he was, the ex-pitman would speak out his mind in his own plain, practical way.

And one other point we would notice before proceeding to give the outline of this great and useful life,—an important point, for it puts in a clear light the magnitude of the difficulties against which our hero had to contend, in comparison with the position of the humblest toiler of the sea or land at the present day. No one, not the poorest of orphan children, now begins to fight the battle of life, without being provided, at the State's cost, if need be, with those weapons of education which Stephenson had to purchase for himself at a cost of much labour and self-denial. Happy indeed would Stephenson have been to procure the intruction now offered to all, and great would have been the saving in years of that valuable life. But in his time national education did not enter into the philosophy of government; and he had to enter upon the task of self-tuition without even the books that modern improvement has brought within the reach of all. How he did it will appear in the story of his life.

BIRTH, SURROUNDINGS, AND EARLY YEARS.

A hundred years ago, there stood close to the little village of Wylam, dependent on the colliery of the same name, a small detached house, an ordinary labourer's cottage of one story. It was known as High Street House, and is still standing,—an object of interest now, for here, in a bare-raftered, clay-floored room, George Stephenson was born, on the 9th June, 1781; just at the time when the truth of Lord Chatham's words, "You cannot conquer America," was beginning to dawn on the English Government, and noble Lords and honourable gentlemen in Parliament were at least inclined to doubt whether the "rebel Washington" might not prove too hard for them after all. The parents, Robert Stephenson, known as Old Bob, and his wife Mabel, with their children, were described by an old Wylam collier, from personal recollection, as "an honest family, but sair hadden doon i' th' world:" in other words, they were very poor,—for Old Bob only earned 12s. a week as fireman at the colliery; and poor Mabel Stephenson, though "a rare canny body," must have had considerable difficulty in keeping house on that very exiguous income; and though George was only the second son, by 1792 the number of children in the collier's little room had increased to six. By the time the family of eight were fed, and very indifferently clothed, the wages were exhausted, and so none of the children went to school. Little George accordingly was dragged up after the rough but not unkindly manner of many poor men's children, getting no book schooling, but passing through the country boy's curriculum of birds'-nesting, straw- and reed-whistle making, errand running, and, in quality of nurse, lugging about the younger children as they successively appeared.

Old Bob seems to have been anything but an unkindly character, though somewhat eccentric in his ways and manners; or, as an old miner quaintly described him, "as queer as Dick's hat-band—went thrice aboot, an wouldn't tie." He told the children stories of Robinson Crusoe and Jack the Giant Killer by way of education, took George for country walks, and awakened in the little lad a love and interest for animals and plants that remained with him throughout his life.

And here, as elsewhere, a "trivial cause" might be found connected with future "great events." In front of the old High Road House ran a tramway, or road, along which the waggons laden with coal were drawn by horses from the pit's mouth to the wharf some miles distant. Railways, or plateways as they were often called, had been in use, under various forms, for a century and a half in the mining districts. It was part of George's duty to keep his younger brethren from being run over by the passing waggons. Wylam road at that time was a mere wooden tramway; but who can tell what influence it had on the mind of the future engineer? When George was eight years old the family removed to Dewley Burn Colliery, where "Old" Bob was again fain to establish his household goods in a single room. Little George's observant nature was here displayed in that "childhood play," in which the poet declares that "much meaning lurketh oft." He amused himself with Bill Thirlwall, a playmate, by modelling a clay engine, with hemlock-stalk steampipe, and little cork corves, or baskets, in imitation of the apparatus at the mine,—a sharp little fellow, evidently observant and imitative, and sure to go through the world with his eyes open.

SMALL BEGINNINGS; STEPHENSON'S EARLY YEARS.

From the lowly agricultural occupation of herding a widow's cows at twopence per day, to the more honourable office of leading the plough horses, and hoeing turnips at double the wage, the boy passed on to work at the colliery, earning a daily sixpence, raised to eightpence when he was appointed to drive the horse that turned the gin,—"a grit growin' lad, wi' bare legs and feet," said an old miner afterwards, who knew him well. He acquired the reputation of a lively fellow, quick and ready, and full of fun and tricks. At first, growing lad though he was, he feared he might be considered too small for the place, and used to hide when the owner came round, lest he should be sent away. Thus he wrought at more than one colliery, until he was promoted to man's wages, 12s. per week, at Throckley Bridge, and declared himself "a made man for life."

Presently he was appointed plugman, or engine-man, to the engine of which Old Bob was fireman; and thus at seventeen he had passed his father in the race of life; for the plugman's position is considered more responsible than that of the fireman, and he was supposed to be able to remedy any slight defect in the machinery without applying to the engineer. George Stephenson soon made himself thoroughly familiar with the construction and working of every part of his engine, which appeared to him a wonderful monument of human skill and ingenuity; and it was characteristic of the man, that whatever knowledge he acquired, he tried to verify it practically. Long afterwards, when there was a debate as to the name to be given to the first railway coach employed in passenger traffic, Stephenson, on being appealed to, suggested, in his strong Northumberland Doric, that it should be called the "Expurrimint," and the "Experiment" accordingly became its name. It was by experiments, patiently conducted and carried out with marvellous perseverance, that he accumulated fact upon fact, laying up in his capacious brain a store of knowledge, to be drawn forth to excellent purpose when the time came. But that time was still in the far future. He was as yet dependent on the good offices of any one whom he could get to read to him out of a stray book or newspaper, by the light of the engine fire. Thus he heard of the great Italian campaigns, in which young General Bonaparte was gathering laurels. Thus also he came to hear of the Egyptian method of hatching eggs by heat, and at once made an attempt, with very partial success, to carry out a similar operation on a number of eggs collected from nests in the neighbourhood. But he found that without a knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic, his opportunities of self-culture would always depend on the good nature of others. So he manfully determined to begin from the beginning, and went to a night-school to learn his letters, afterwards paying an additional weekly penny to include "figuring" in his course of study. The immediate impulse to this educational movement arose from his desire to understand the engines of Watt and Boulton, about which he had heard that books had been written. By mending the shoes of his fellow-workmen he contrived to increase his earnings; and it is characteristic of the thoroughness with which he carried out all he attempted, that he became a very fair shoemaker, and could make a pair of boots as well as patch them.

By this time he had mounted another step of the ladder. Becoming known as a careful and intelligent workman, he was, though not without some jealousy on the part of his fellows, appointed brakesman at the Dolly Pit, undertaking the responsible duty of managing the machinery by which the corves, or baskets containing the coal and the men who worked in the pit, were hauled up and down. The men were then paid every second week; and when the young brakesman's fortnightly wages came to average thirty-five shillings and two pounds, he thought it time to marry. He chose for his partner Fanny Henderson, a servant at a neighbouring farm; and a very comely, amiable wife she was to him. In 1803, his happiness was increased by the birth of a son, who was christened Robert, after "Old Bob," his grandfather.

SELF-CULTURE—STEPHENSON'S EDUCATION.

At this period of his life, George Stephenson appears, from the anecdotes collected from his fellow-workmen by his judicious and appreciative biographer Mr. Smiles, as a hearty, stalwart workman, remarkable for his agility and physical strength, and fond of athletic sports, such as wrestling and tossing the hammer, in which he was an adept; but exceedingly steady, never seen, like too many of his fellows, the worse for "ye!" (ale), and known to be thriving in his small way, and saving money. A man not to be "put upon," moreover, as he proved by a fair standing fight with a pitman named Nelson, the bully of the colliery and the terror of the village. This worthy had taken upon himself to impugn Stephenson's skill as a brakesman, and had threatened violence; in return for which the undaunted "Geordie" had bestowed upon him, at time and place duly appointed, as neat and complete a licking as any man need wish to see given and received. The men shook hands in their hearty north-country fashion, and became afterwards good friends.

Stephenson in later life often regretted his want of early instruction. His active and inquiring mind led him to investigate and "think out" anything that was new to him; and he complained that often, after he had hit upon what he considered a discovery, and after many endeavours to reduce his efforts to a practical result, he found he had been wasting time and pains on a long-exploded fallacy; not entirely wasting them, however; the habit of bringing his theories to the test of actual experiment, proved infinitely valuable to him, and gave to his opinions a solid value, as having stood the test of experience. Among the subjects that engaged his attention during the happy but few years he spent with his wife in his cottage at Willington Quay, near Newcastle, was that of the "perpetual motion;" at one time, like many others who have followed that scientific ignis fatuus, he fancied he had discovered the secret of the perpetuum mobile, only to find himself deceived. A more satisfactory occupation consisted in the modelling of various machines, in which he was indefatigable. And here, by his practical and workmanlike habit of attention to detail; by his custom of taking his models to pieces and putting them together again, and his plain common sense method of proceeding from point to point, making sure of his ground as he went on, he was putting himself through a training that was sure to bring success when the opportunity should come. An accident that occurred at Willington illustrates this pleasantly enough.

One day while he was absent at his work, the chimney of his house caught fire. The zealous neighbours poured such a flood of water down the said chimney in their efforts to extinguish the fire, that the proprietor, on his return, found his house flooded, and his furniture covered with soot. In particular, a clock, one of the most valuable and cherished articles among his household goods, was so choked up, blackened, and disfigured, that there seemed nothing for it but to send it at once to the clockmaker for cleansing and repairs. But Stephenson determined to get a lesson in mechanics out of the incident by repairing the clock himself. He took it to pieces, and put it together again, and set it going with complete success, to the wonder and admiration of the mining community. And this opened a new field of industry and of profit to him; for from that time he was installed by common consent clock-doctor to the village, to the comfortable increase of his modest emoluments. Another of his accomplishments consisted in making good shoe-lasts.

A TIME OF CALAMITY.

But now a great calamity came upon him. After a few years of happy, cheerful union, his wife died of consumption, leaving him alone with his little Robert. The warmth of affection in his genial nature seemed now to concentrate itself on this child, who became as the apple of his eye. To give the boy every possible advantage, and especially that great advantage of education he had himself never enjoyed, became the chief object of his life. To provide the funds for the lad's schooling he afterwards added tailoring to his other methods of getting money, cutting out the pitmen's clothes, and fashioning them much to the satisfaction of the sturdy miners, who highly approved of "Geordie Steevie's cut." Long afterwards, when the daughters of Mr. Pease expressed surprise at his knowledge of the art of embroidery, he explained that he had acquired his skill by sewing the button-holes of the miners' coats. It is pleasant to record that the self-sacrificing affection of the father was fully acknowledged and reciprocated by the son. Robert Stephenson, with his father's example before his eyes, became emphatically "a chip of the old block;" making the best of the opportunities afforded him, imparting the knowledge he gained at school to the delighted father of an evening, and afterwards acquiring the art of shorthand, to take down the lectures he heard at Edinburgh, that he might afterwards copy them out evening by evening for his father's delectation when he returned home after the session. In the sequel he became hardly less eminent than George Stephenson himself, and the Menai Tubular Bridge, and other great engineering works, remain to tell of a great career nobly run.

But all this was in the future. Robert was still a little child when the bereaved father, consigning him to the care of a trustworthy woman for a time, went off from the Killingworth Colliery, where he had been employed as brakeman for some time when his misfortune befel him, to look after a Boulton and Watt engine in a spinning factory near Montrose; for his fame as a skilful engineman had by this time become well-known. He returned after an absence of nearly a year, during which he had saved nearly £30 from his wages, to find his parents in poverty and debt, his father having lost his eyesight through a jet of steam carelessly turned on by a fellow-workman. He at once paid the old man's debts, established the couple in a cottage, and provided for their support for the remainder of their lives.

The war weighed heavily on the nation during the years 1807 and 1808, crippling industry in various directions, increasing taxes, and imposing a heavy burden on the country in the shape of greatly augmented forces for the army and navy. George Stephenson had good reason to deplore Lord Castlereagh's war policy, for he was drawn for the militia, and it cost him nearly the whole of his savings to procure a substitute. Emigration presented itself to his mind as the best course in the depressed state of his affairs. His sister Anne actually went away to the United States with her husband. She died more than half a century afterwards, in 1860, at Pittsburgh. It is said that only the want of means prevented her brother George from following. Fortunately, however, for his country, and perhaps for himself and his future fame, he stayed; and after the stormy period—during which, as he afterwards acknowledged, his heart once almost failed him—the sun began to shine upon him once more.

FIRST ESSAYS IN ENGINEERING.

He had been known as a clock-doctor; he was now to establish his reputation as an engine-doctor. At the Killingworth High Pit there was a certain engine, of the atmospheric "Newcomen" kind, that entirely failed in its duty of pumping out the water from the mine. All the engineers of the neighbourhood had tried their hands on this ungovernable engine, as well as Crowther of the Ouseburn; but they were all "clean beat." Ralph Dodds, the head viewer, applied to Stephenson, who undertook to cure the engine—stipulating, however, that he should choose his own men for the work. The "drowned out" viewer promised to make a man of him for life (a very unnecessary office in the case of Stephenson the self-made) if he succeeded. Stephenson set to work, took the engine completely to pieces, cured the defects his sagacity had detected, and received for his pains a great deal of credit and ten pounds, the largest sum he had ever gained in a lump. Crowther of the Ouseburn and his colleagues stared and wondered; and George Stephenson had established his reputation as an engineer. "He was called upon," says Mr. Smiles, "to prescribe remedies for all the old wheezy and ineffective pumping machines in the neighbourhood. Ralph Dodds also was as good as his word, so far as regarded the furthering of George Stephenson's interests. He made him engineman instead of brakesman at High Pit, with increased wages; and soon the frugal workman had £100 saved up in guineas. And when, in 1812, the engine-wright at the Killingworth Colliery was killed by an accident, Dodds spoke so warmly in his favour to the gentlemen who leased the various pits,—Lord Strathmore, Sir Thomas Liddell, and Mr. Stuart Wortley,—that he was appointed engine-wright, at a salary of £100 a year.

JEALOUSIES; HISTORY OF THE "GEORDIE" LAMP.

He was now, so far as worldly circumstances were concerned, at the height of his ambition, with a handsome cottage wherein to dwell with his promising boy, a stout little galloway on which to ride from pit to pit on his journeys of inspection, and a salary that amply sufficed for his frugal wants. But even the modest success he had achieved—gained as it was by sheer hard work, energy, and perseverance—was not won without exciting a considerable amount of envy and malevolence. Many of the regular engineers, uneasy at his success with the wheezy machines they had failed to cure, assailed him with the accusation of empiricism generally cast by regular practitioners at outsiders who have been guilty of achieving good results in a profession, without entering by the usual door, and mounting by the accredited gradations. He was a mere quack this Killingworth brakesman, they said, and his practice was unsound and deceptive. That George Stephenson had little theoretical knowledge when he began engineering there is no doubt; and he often arrived at conclusions by what scientific reasoners would call utterly irregular and insufficient premises. But he had studied the practical part of his calling with a devotion and a perseverance as rare as they were admirable; and his rugged sagacity and ready inventiveness often hit on a remedy where the regular professors were at fault. He was now about to enter on a phase of his career where the opposition and enmity of accredited men in office against the outsider, the "impertinent brakesman," was to be shown in a far more decided and malevolent way. But he met his opponents as undauntedly as he had encountered Nelson the pitman at his first and last combat with physical weapons. The occasion for the display of professional enmity was connected with the celebrated "safety-lamp" controversy. For years the deplorable accidents occurring from time to time through the explosions of the terrible fire-damp in mines, and involving the sacrifice of a number of lives annually, had awakened sorrow and pity in the public, and serious attention, with the hope of discovering a remedy, among scientific men. George Stephenson's great heart was filled with sorrow for the miners whose lives were so often sacrificed, and for the widows and children left destitute,—in one accident in 1812, ninety men and boys perished,—and for some years he was occupied with experiments towards the construction of a safety-lamp that should obviate these terrible calamities, to which the Killingworth Colliery, with its 160 miles of gallery space, was especially liable. Of what stuff he was made he proved on that memorable day in 1814, when an affrighted pitman rushed into his cottage declaring that the deepest main of the colliery was on fire! He at once rushed to the pit's mouth, caused himself to be lowered, and as the corve touched the ground, leaped out, calling upon six men to follow him, and they would put out the fire. His intrepidity acted like magic upon the affrighted miners. Order and discipline took the place of confusion and dismay. Tools and bricks and mortar were at hand, and, under Stephenson's direction, a wall was at once built that, by excluding the atmospheric air, soon put an end to the danger, and saved the pit and many of its occupants. "The sooner you start the better," said a workman to the heroic engine-wright a few days afterwards, when Stephenson observed that he thought something might be done to prevent these awful explosions, "for the price of coal-mining now is men's lives." This naturally stimulated Stephenson's zeal and industry. He continued his experiments, conducting them in his own homely, independent way, much against scientific rules sometimes, but always intelligently, with a practical bearing upon the end in view. At last, in October 1815, the difficulty was solved. He had, after various trials, constructed a lamp which would give light without setting fire to the inflammable gas of the mine.

The manner in which he put the efficacy of his invention to the test was nothing less than heroic; and had this advantage over warlike courage, that it was displayed in the attempt to preserve human lives, not to destroy them. Lamp in hand, Stephenson marched forward alone, as resolutely as ever a soldier marched at the head of a forlorn hope, into the recesses of the mine, where the foul air had been accumulated by artificial means. He was alone, for his companions awaited at a safe distance and with palpitating hearts the issue of the experiment, well knowing that the failure of the lamp would mean the death of the heroic inventor who staked his life on the issue. Advancing to the place of danger, and entering within the foul air, his lighted lamp in hand, Stephenson held it firmly out in the full current of the blower (the opening through which the deadly gas was rushing), and within a few inches of its mouth. The result was triumphantly successful. The great volume of gas at last extinguished the lamp, but did not burst into flame.

Thus was the principle of Stephenson's invention vindicated. But his practical sense saw various defects in his lamp, and set about remedying them. He succeeded at last in producing a thoroughly workable safety-lamp, which was introduced into the Killingworth pit; and for more than half-a-century the "Geordie lamp" has remained a favourite with the miners. But the subject of safety in mines had been taken up in other and more influential quarters. Upon the invitation of a committee of gentlemen, Sir Humphrey Davy, then in the zenith of his fame, visited the Newcastle collieries, made the requisite notes; and in November, 1814, a month after Stephenson's lamp had triumphantly passed the ordeal, Sir Humphrey read a paper before the Royal Society, proposing the lamp, which, as the Davy lamp, has found general acceptance. The two inventors had worked quite independently, each being indeed ignorant of the other's action; but the credit of priority is undoubtedly due to Stephenson. Shortly after, at the persuasion of some friends, he explained the principle of his lamp to a company at the Newcastle Scientific Institute; and when Sir Humphrey Davy arrived soon after to explain his own lamp, "Why, it's the same as Stephenson's," was the criticism of the shrewd north-country audience.

Of course there was a controversy as to priority, relative merit, etc., in which the favourite of the scientific world had it all his own way. "The men of science could not forgive Stephenson for being a self-taught man; and long after the controversy was ended they continued to sneer at him. "It will hereafter be scarcely believed," writes pragmatical Doctor Paris in his "Life of Sir Humphrey Davy," "that an invention so eminently scientific, and which could never have been derived but from the sterling treasury of science, should have been claimed on behalf of an engine-wright of Killingworth, of the name of Stephenson—a person not even possessing a knowledge of the elements of chemistry." The references to the "sterling treasury of science," and "the engine-wright of Killingworth," are delicious. Stephenson was not a bookman, or a man of early culture; he told the assistant at his experiments to "wise on the hydrogen," when he wanted the hydrogen gas turned on; therefore, argued Doctor Thomas Diafoirus,—we beg pardon, Doctor Paris,—Stephenson could not possibly have inventive faculty or brains.

The friends of the engine-wright showed their appreciation of him in a very practical way. When a sum of £2,000 was voted to Sir Humphrey Davy for his invention of the safety-lamp (a writer on the subject has well observed that if it had been for the invention of a safety-lamp there would have been nothing to complain of), Stephenson's friends got up a subscription for a testimonial to him; Lord Ravensworth (formerly Sir Thomas Liddell), one of the Killingworth proprietors, heading the list with a hundred guineas. The sum collected amounted to £1000; and the miners of the colliery emphatically put on record their view of the value of their engine-wright's achievement by starting a separate collection among themselves, and presenting him with a silver watch. They still stick to the "Geordie lamp."

THE LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE.

Another subject had occupied the attention of George Stephenson during the time of the lamp controversy. He had been pondering upon the subject of railroads, and the practicability of substituting travelling or locomotive steam engines for horse power upon them. Railroads, first with wooden afterwards with iron rails, had been in use for a couple of centuries. Since Stephenson's childhood, iron rails had been substituted for wood on the Wylam Colliery line that passed in front of the old High Street House. Benjamin Outram, the father of the celebrated General, had introduced some improvements generally copied in later "Outram roads," or "tramroads," and the question had already arisen as to the substitution of steam for horse power on the iron ways. There has been much controversy on the question, "Who invented the locomotive engine?" The friends of various candidates naturally endeavour to give as much as possible of the credit each to his client. The truth appears to have been put in a very manly and straightforward way by Robert Stephenson, in a speech at a scientific dinner at Newcastle, when he declared that this, like most of the great triumphs of science, had been gained by successive discoveries, various inventors contributing each his quota to the great general result. To trace the progress of the locomotive engine towards the state of practical usefulness, we should have to record the labours of poor Solomon Caux, looked upon as a madman, and driven almost mad by disappointment and chagrin because he was a man in advance of his age; of Savory, who went very near to discover the real principle of the locomotive; of James Watt, in whose scheme the construction of locomotive engines had a part, although he never had leisure to work it out; of the Frenchman Cugnot, who proposed to apply it to the traction of artillery; of Murdoch, one of the best of Boulton and Watt's workmen; and Symington, who actually constructed, the first an engine, the second a steam carriage, to travel on common roads; but Murdoch, who seems to have approached nearest among the earlier inventors to making a practical success of the engine, was dissuaded and almost warned off from prosecuting his experiments by the firm he served. "I wish William (Murdoch) could be brought to do as we do," writes Watt to Boulton, "to mind the business in hand, and let such as Symington and Sadler waste their time in hunting shadows." The fact was, the great Soho firm had its time fully occupied with building stationary engines, and looked upon time and energy devoted to experiments as probably wasted. Symington is best known in connection with marine engines; the Charlotte Dundas, on the Forth and Clyde Canal, may be considered the first practical steamboat; she was set to work in 1801. Poor Symington was the most unfortunate of men, and died in poverty in 1831.

LABOURS OF RICHARD TREVETHICK.

By far the most important page in the early history of the locomotive was contributed by the Cornish man, Richard Trevethick, who constructed an engine that actually ran on a plate-way, or railway, at Merthyr Tydvil in Wales. He also constructed a "steam carriage," to run on common roads, and tried it with success in 1803, at Camborne, in which town he was building engines, in partnership with a Mr. Vivian. A second and improved steam carriage was afterwards run by Vivian from Camborne to Plymouth, a distance quite sufficient practically to test its capabilities; and the inventor resolved to bring it to London for exhibition. It was sent by sea from Plymouth, arrived safely at its destination, and excited considerable interest and wonder on being exhibited in some fields near the present Bethlehem Hospital. Then, after being favourably criticised by Sir Humphrey Davy and other eminent scientific men, it was to be exhibited for money on a piece of ground, strangely enough now occupied by the terminus of the London and North-Western Railway, in the Euston Road. The steam carriage was made to run on an elliptical tramroad laid down in the enclosure. The first day everything went well; and the crowd who had assembled to see the new phenomenon went away well pleased. On the next morning a still greater throng had assembled; then suddenly it was announced that the exhibition was not to be continued. Trevethick had taken some whim into his head, and at once removed his steam carriage. Of his inventive genius there is no doubt; but unfortunately for himself he had not the persistent energy that leads to success. His teeming brain was fertile in schemes; and in every one of these there were elements of success; for his mind was far too original to be content with the ordinary and prescribed methods. "Nihil quod tetigit non ornavit" might be said of him as an engineer as of Goldsmith as a writer; he improved everything he touched; but he did not wait until any separate undertaking had been fairly worked out, and had arrived at the profitable stage, before he began working at another. To use a homely phrase, he had too many irons in the fire at once. He withdrew his steam carriage just as it was about to yield him a golden harvest; and set about the construction of a locomotive engine, a subject to which general attention had been attracted by recent events.

The traveller by the railway from London to Brighton may observe on the right-hand side of the road, for some distance between Croydon and Mersham, the traces of an old level road, running parallel to that on which he is progressing. This is the old Wandsworth and Merstham tramway, laid down some years before for the conveyance of stone, lime, and other weighty materials, from central Surrey to Wandsworth Creek. Waggoners were drawn on it by horses and donkeys. The results obtained by the iron tramway in decreasing the draught, and the consequent increase of the weight a single horse was enabled to draw, had excited general astonishment, and set Trevethick thinking about the substitution of an iron horse for one of flesh and blood. The high-pressure engine he constructed was marvellously ingenious, and appeared to solve the problem. Trevethick's works at Camborne prospered exceedingly; and it is recorded that in 1806 he had no fewer than nine engines ordered in one month, and seemed sure of making a fortune. But Camborne and Cornwall seemed to him too narrow a platform for his abilities. He came to London, "the Patent Office drawing him as the loadstone does the needle;" and the records of that Office attest the various ideas that thronged his restless and capacious mind. One patent he took out was for constructing docks, ships, etc., and propelling vessels; another, which has been since brought into practical form by later inventors, was for constructing ships of iron plates instead of using timber, with hollow metal tubes for masts, bowsprit, etc. A tunnel under the Thames, and a patent for a new method of stowing cargoes, also figured among the projects originated by him, and destined to be worked out by others. Suddenly a prospect of fortune opened in an entirely new direction. Trevethick received an order on a very large scale for pumping engines, to clear the Peruvian mines of water; and after constructing some very large and ingenious machines for the Peruvian Government, Trevethick himself set sail for the New World to superintend the carrying out of his scheme;—the arrival of "Don Ricardo Trevethick, eminent professor of mechanics, machinery, and mineralogy," being duly heralded in the Government Gazette, at Lima, where the great engineer was received with distinguished honours. At first all went well; but the civil war, which ended in the enfranchisement of Peru, brought ruin to Trevethick, who was obliged some years afterwards to make his way, literally as a fugitive, and almost in rags, towards Panama. By a strange chance, while he was waiting at Cartagena, on the Gulf of Darien, for a ship in which he might get back to Europe, he encountered Robert Stevenson, who had been for some time in America, in the employ of the Columbian Mining Company, and who readily lent his unfortunate brother engineer the money to pay his passage home; for poor Trevethick was reduced almost to his last coin, and used afterwards to declare with a bitter smile that a pair of silver spurs constituted all the metal he brought home with him of all he had raised from that Peru which was to have been his El Dorado.

He was not, however, like that apocryphal husband of Mrs. Pilchin in Dickens's tale, who "broke his heart trying to pump water out of the Peruvian mines." When Robert Stephenson met him, he was as hopeful and as full of projects as ever, talking of a new company he intended to organize so soon as he got back to England. Efforts were made to procure some Government recognition of the improvements he had made in the high-pressure steam engine and boiler, but they led to nothing; and at length, in 1832, Trevethick died, so utterly poor that the workmen of the firm who last employed him had to subscribe to pay for his funeral: a great inventor, but without the patience to carry one of his numerous and admirable ideas to a practical conclusion, and consequently leaving what he invented to be profitably worked out by others. He had learned to labour, but could not wait.

EARLY LOCOMOTIVES BY VARIOUS MAKERS. ~

But the experiments of Trevethick had not failed to excite the attention and interest of intelligent and practical men; and among those who had seen the steam carriage in London, and had been greatly impressed by its performance, was Mr. Christopher Blackett, the owner of the Wylam Colliery; whose tramroad, now furnished with iron rails, extended for some miles from the pit's mouth to the place where the coals were shipped. He was fortunate in having as his overseer in the Wylam Colliery Mr. William Hedley, with whom he held conferences on the possibility of constructing an engine for drawing the coal waggons along the iron way; and the question became urgent, when in 1812, on account of the increased price of horse-fodder, due partly to the war, it was seriously contemplated to stop the working of the colliery for a time, from the expense of bringing the coal to the wharf. Already the year before, Mr. Blenkinsop of the Middleton Colliery, near Leeds, had constructed an engine for drawing coal waggons. This machine worked by means of a toothed wheel on a rack rail, and answered its purpose tolerably well. Mr. Hedley, however, made the important discovery by experiment, that a smooth rail would offer sufficient friction to enable the wheels of an engine to advance upon it, if the weight of the engine was made proportionate to the load it had to drag; and that the rack rail and toothed wheels were therefore unnecessary. It had been always thought that engine wheels on a smooth surface would "surge" or slip round without advancing. Mr. Hedley was soon able to report so favourably to Mr. Blackett in London concerning the working of the engine, that the latter wrote a congratulatory letter, expressing his satisfaction that "the iron horse had taken to the collar so kindly." "Puffing Billy," as the first Wylam engine was called, soon became one of the lions of the district. Of course it met with a certain amount of opposition, part of which proceeded from the workmen themselves, ever jealous of the introduction of machinery; and Mr. Blackett was obliged to compromise with a determined opposition, by undertaking to stop the engine when any horses came in sight on the Wylam road. Many also were inclined to sneer at the experiments, and had much to say on the absurdity of taking up with "new-fangled notions," and the loss of time, temper, and money usually consequent on such a course. But "Puffing Billy" snorted gaily along the Wylam tramroad, impervious to hostile criticism, and deserves, with his constructor, honourable mention in the history of the invention of the locomotive engine.

Another engine was constructed about this time by the Chapmans of Newcastle; but they did not understand the principle of the smooth rail. Consequently they tried to overcome the anticipated surging by means of a chain stretched along the road; and their engine worked so clumsily that it was pronounced a failure, and soon put aside.

STEPHENSON'S ENGINES AT KILLINGWORTH.

Stephenson had seen the Wylam engine at work; and soon afterwards he had an opportunity of inspecting one of Blenkinsop's engines, which was sent to the Coxlodge Colliery in 1813. With that capacity for taking trouble over anything that interested him, which was one of his most valuable characteristics, he at once began to "experiment" upon the "travelling engine," as he called it; convinced even then that in time it would supersede the horse in working power. Lord Ravensworth, who had a high opinion of the engine-wright's sagacity, advanced money for the building of an engine, which was appropriately called "My Lord," and which was a great practical success; for it drew after it, at the rate of four miles an hour, a weight of thirty tons. Several other engines were made for the Killingworth Colliery, each exhibiting various improvements on its predecessors. The adoption of the steamblast in the chimney, which enabled the force of the steam to be kept up, and very greatly increased the power of the engine, was of enormous importance, as it rendered the engine economical, giving it the advantage over horse power in the matter of saving expense. This has accordingly been claimed as the turning-point in the invention of the locomotive engine; and the same position has accordingly been claimed for George Stephenson with regard to the locomotive that Watt occupies in relation to the condensing engine. On this point, however, there is some doubt. The son of Mr. William Hedley, in conversation with the writer of this sketch, was accustomed vehemently to uphold the claim of his father as the constructor of engines embodying the steamblast as a principle. That the second engine was a great improvement on the first, and that Stephenson's engines ran for many years upon the railroad at Killingworth, is undoubted. They combined, in a remarkable degree, simplicity of construction with practical efficiency in working.

One point Stephenson always maintained with especial decision, the importance of the railroad in conjunction with the engine. He had no opinion of engines upon common roads, considering a great part of the advantage in the application of the engine to lie in the decrease of friction consequent on the wheel travelling on a smooth rail. By a happy illustration he designated the rail and the wheel as "man and wife," and declared they should not be put asunder. While many of the scientific men of his age were in doubt on the point, he had already made up his mind; and having formed his opinion on sufficient grounds, he adhered to it. With him, if a thing was once true it was always true. His employers at Killingworth were proud of him, and of the reputation he was making; and when Mr. Loch, a wealthy iron-founder of Newcastle, found the money to take out a patent for improved rails, and stipulated that Stephenson should attend at the iron-works two days weekly, they consented, as they did also when the Hatton Coal Company proposed to employ Stephenson to superintend the laying down of a line for them, similar to that of the Killingworth Company.

In 1820 he married again. His second wife was a Miss Hindmarsh, a farmer's daughter at Black Callerton. They lived very happily together; and young Robert Stephenson also had reason to be well satisfied with the course his father had taken; for his stepmother contrived to gain his complete esteem and affection.

RAILWAYS PROJECTED BY PRACTICAL MEN; STEPHENSON AND MR. PEASE.

And now the time had come when the abilities of the engine-wright were to exhibit themselves in a wider field. For nearly twenty years there had been a desire on the part of certain practical and far-seeing men to see some of the large industrial towns brought into communication by means of railways. Foremost among these was the eminent member of the Society of Friends, Edward Pease, of Darlington; another was William James, of West Bromwich, of whom it has been said that if he did not discover the locomotive, he did the next best thing in discovering George Stephenson. In 1803 he had started the idea of a railroad between Manchester and Liverpool, and had been looked upon as a madman for his pains. He had seen Trevethick, who had no doubt stimulated his zeal in the cause. He was at first decidedly in advance of his time; and after losing much money, was obliged to give up his projects till they should be better appreciated, and to revert to his profession of land-surveying. Edward Pease, a man of large means, was able to start a company for constructing a railroad between Stockton and Darlington. The idea at first was simply to facilitate goods and especially coal traffic between the two towns; passenger traffic by railway was not considered as likely to assume any appreciable proportions. The transport of coal was the idea on which the chief calculations were based in what was called "the Quaker's line." Three times the Bill was introduced before it was passed. The first time it was wrecked through the influence of the Duke of Cleveland, who violently opposed it, in finding that the proposed line would pass near one of his fox covers. The dissolution of Parliament after the death of George III. caused the loss of another session. At length, in 1821, the Bill for constructing the Stockton and Darlington railroad was obtained.

Then it was that energetic Mr. Pease was one day waited upon by two visitors in reference to the new undertaking. One of them was Mr. Wood, the viewer at Killingworth, who came as spokesman, and to introduce the other, a quiet, sensible, modest man, "only the engine-wright at Killingworth," George Stephenson. Mr. Pease soon saw that this quiet engine-wright had invaluable information to give concerning engines and railways. He strongly dissuaded Mr. Pease from carrying out the intention of having the line worked by horse-power, declaring that a locomotive was worth fifty horses. "Come over to Killingworth, sir, and see what my engines can do," said Stephenson; "seeing is believing." The result of the interview was the bringing of Stephenson's name before the other Directors by Mr. Pease; and an official letter was despatched by a messenger to George Stephenson, Esquire, engineer. No such official personage was known at that place; and the envoy was about to carry home his letter in despair, when it was discovered that "Geordie, the engine-wright," was the man wanted, and Stephenson's modest cottage was pointed out.

The idea of horse-power for working the railway having been abandoned, stationary engines were next proposed; but Stephenson stood manfully by his first assertion, declaring the locomotive, and the locomotive only, to be suited to the purpose. Mr. Pease came over to Killingworth, saw what one of Stephenson's engines could do, and became a convert. At the request of the Directors, Stephenson surveyed the proposed line, pointing out where considerable savings might be effected by a change in the proposed route. He was appointed engineer of the line at a salary of £300 a year; and persuaded Mr. Pease to have a clause inserted in the amended Act for the railway, authorizing the working of the railway by locomotive engines, and for passenger traffic as well as goods. During the survey, Stephenson made friends with all the farming people on the line of route, who gladly welcomed him into their houses, where he asked leave to cook the bit of raw bacon which, with a hunch of bread, he carried in his pocket for his dinner. His hearty good humour, and genuine, kindly nature, made him welcome everywhere. He had his anxieties, too, though his honest pride was gratified by the new position in which he found himself. Various of the local papers were bitterly sarcastic on the new scheme, ridiculing the idea of railway passenger traffic as utterly absurd, and poking very heavy fun at the "roaring steam-engine." But Stephenson never doubted the ultimate success of his plans. He had bestowed too much thought and care upon them for years to be frightened by squibs, and persevered manfully.

On one occasion, when, with his son Robert and his friend John Dixon, he had gone the length of ordering a bottle of wine after dinner, to drink success to the railway, then in an advanced state of construction, he burst out in remarkable words of prophecy, recorded at the time by Dixon. They prove how far his sagacity looked ahead, and how clearly he saw the revolution that was coming in the practice of travelling. "Now, lads," he said to his companions, "I venture to tell you that I think you will see the day when railways will supersede almost all other methods of conveyance in this country—when mail coaches will go by railway, and railroads will become the great highways for the king and all his subjects. The time is coming when it will be cheaper for a working man to travel on a railway than to walk on foot. I know there are great and almost insurmountable difficulties to be encountered; but what I have said will come to pass as sure as you now hear me. I only wish I may live to see the day, though that I can scarcely hope for, as I know how slow all human progress is, and with what difficulty I have been able to get the locomotive introduced thus far, notwithstanding my more than ten years' successful experiment at Killingworth." And here we may notice the special feature of Stephenson's merits in connection with the establishment of the railway system. The others, Trevethick, Hedley, Blenkinsop, and many men of genius besides, made improvements of various kinds in the engines. He alone saw the immense importance of the subject, the whole scope of the mighty change he was working to effect.

STEPHENSON'S FIRST RAILWAY WORK.

The plain, simple honesty of Stephenson was shown when the question arose whether cast iron or wrought iron rails were to be used. Stephenson strongly recommended wrought iron as more durable, while cast iron rails would not bear the weight of the engines, and would be constantly requiring repair, as he knew by experience at Killingworth, though he plainly declared that this advice was £500 out of his pocket; for he was interested in a patent for cast iron rails, taken out, with Mr. Loch, in 1816. Loch, indeed, was very angry on the occasion, declaring that Stephenson ought to have recommended the cast iron rails, in the interests of the partnership; but that was not "Geordie's" way of looking at things. The Stockton and Darlington Railway was at length opened with considerable ceremony, a long procession of waggons being formed into a train on the railway, preceded by a man on horseback carrying a flag, whereon was inscribed the motto, "Periculum privata utilitas publica;" and then came George Stephenson himself, driving Number One engine, appropriately named the "Locomotion." The long train, crowded with passengers, weighed ninety tons; yet Stephenson, after sending the banner-bearer out of the way, drove it up to a speed of fifteen miles an hour. The opening was a triumphant success; and a few days after, the first passenger carriage, Stephenson's "Experiment," a vehicle like a caravan, was put upon the line,—constituting for a time the whole passenger rolling stock of the first public railway in England.

Some time before, Stephenson had conceived the idea of setting up a factory for the construction of locomotive engines. He had a capital of £1000, chiefly made up from the present the coal-miners had made him for the "Geordie lamp." Mr. Pease, who by this time had unbounded confidence in him, advanced £500; and Mr. John Richardson did the same. From those small beginnings originated the great factory in Forth Street, for some years the one establishment which turned out thoroughly efficient workpeople. Stephenson showed a preference for those who, like himself, hailed from Northumberland. "He could engineer matter very well," he said, "but his greatest difficulty was to engineer men."

MANCHESTER AND LIVERPOOL RAILWAY.

The Stockton and Darlington line, with the opposition it encountered, was a very small matter in comparison to the larger enterprise now taken in hand, and the organized resistance offered to it; the foremost enemies being among the richest and most influential men in the land. For the project of a railway between Manchester and Liverpool was again mooted, and the thousand and one interests that declared themselves injuriously affected were up in arms. Mr. James, the surveyor, who early enlisted the help of Stephenson, was subjected, with his assistants, to such various kinds of violence, that one would have thought they were a company of spies come to survey the weak points of the land with a view to a hostile incursion, rather than peaceable men of science anxious to bestow a great and signal benefit upon their country. The Earls of Derby and Wilton were furious when it was proposed that the line should pass through their estates, and organised gangs of keepers, clothoppers, miners, and other enlightened persons, to waylay, harass, beat, and utterly put to the rout the surveyors and their assistants. Bradshaw, the canal agent of the Earl of Bridgewater, who saw in the proposed iron road a powerful rival to the Bridgewater canal, on which the cotton was carried from Liverpool to Manchester, often taking weeks upon weeks to arrive at its destination, came loyally to the assistance of Lords Derby and Wilton with his canal men and bargees, and threatened Stephenson with a ducking at their hands. Never was the survey of a line of country made under greater difficulties; no wonder it was somewhat imperfect; the marvel was how it was completed at all. "The Canal Companies," wrote Mr. James, "are alive to their danger: I have been the object of their persecution and hate; they would immolate me if they could; but if I can die the death of Samson, by pulling away the pillars, I am content to die with these Philistines. Be assured, my dear sir, that not a moment shall be lost, nor shall my attention for a day be diverted from this concern, which increases in importance every hour, as well as in the certainty of ultimate success."

And as the survey was brought to a close, and the time drew near for seeking the necessary powers from Parliament for the new railway, all the opposing forces were set to work with tongue and pen, in the hope of creating an invincible prejudice against the scheme and crushing it at once. From the Quarterly Review downwards, which attacked the idea in all the moods and tenses of vituperation, the Tory press set up a howl, and shouted "Anathema!" The most terrible consequences, agricultural, pastoral, social, and moral, would result from this iniquitous and unnatural means of progression. Horses would first deteriorate, then diminish in number, and finally become extinct in England,—for what would be left them to do? The sparks from the passing engine would assuredly multiply conflagrations. Houses would be set on fire, the country would be lighted up by flaming corn- and hay-ricks; but this latter calamity would be less felt from, because hay would be no longer required when there were no horses left to eat it. Clouds of smoke would pollute the air, even to the breeding of pestilence, and the suffocation of His Majesty's lieges. As for inn-keepers, stage-coachmen, carriage-builders, and all who depended directly or indirectly upon the road for a living, their occupation would be utterly and entirely gone. The only consolation the reviewer saw, afar off, amid this dismal prospect, was in the fact that the railways themselves would never answer, and that the locomotive engines would quickly belie their name by coming to a dead stop. "To speak plain English," says a Quarterly Reviewer, "the steam carriage may delude for a time, but must end in the mortification of those concerned." And when in 1825 the day came when the Bill for the Liverpool and Manchester Railway was to go into committee in the House of Commons, there was a tremendous forensic body, in all the importance and dignity of silk gowns and awful wigs, ready to fight tooth and nail to turn it out utterly.

OBSTRUCTION; SUCCESS; THE "ROCKET."

Now Stephenson was a man who could work far better than he could speak. To him it was easier to turn to and overcome an engineering difficulty than to explain in good set terms how he would deal with it. Except among his friends, or when warmed by enthusiasm, he was diffident in manner and slow of speech. A pretty time he had of it in the committee room among the gentlemen of the long robe. Sydney Smith said once, in humorous anger against an offender, that he deserved to be "preached to death by wild curates." Stephenson seemed to run some risk of a similar fate, namely, of being questioned to death by wild lawyers. "I was not long in the witness box," he says, "before I wished for a hole to creep out at; I could not find words to satisfy either the Committee or myself. I was subjected to the cross-examination of eight or ten barristers, purpose'y as far as possible to bewilder me. Some member of the Committee asked if I were a foreigner, and another hinted that I was mad. But I put up with every rebuff, and went on with my plans, determined not to be put down." It was this determination that carried him through, in the fire of an opposition of which this was but the commencement, though the cross-examination lasted three days. To the sapient question, whether if a cow got on to the line, in the way of an engine travelling at nine or ten miles an hour, it would not be a very awkward circumstance, he replied, with a twinkle in his eye, "Yes, varry awkward indeed for the cow!" The Bill was thrown out; but on the subsequent session a new route having been marked out to avoid encroaching on the domains of Lords Derby and Sefton, the Bill was passed through Parliament, at a cost of £27,000. Stephenson was appointed resident engineer to the company at £1,000 a year, though Mr. Rennie the chief engineer objected, having stipulated that he should have the appointing of the resident officer. A terribly difficult problem awaited Stephenson directly he began his new duties; he undertook to carry the railroad across Chat Moss, a shaking bog, all pulp from the top to the depth of thirty-four feet, with quicksands, etc., below this. The highest engineering authorities declared that no one but a madman would contend with the tremendous difficulties here presented. But Stephenson persevered, declaring himself certain of success, while the Directors stood aghast at the enormous amount of material swallowed by the insatiable bog, and even the assistants began to look alarmed. He succeeded, and constructed the road across the moor at an expense of only £28,000; whereas Mr. Giles, a scientific engineer, who had criticised his efforts in a very adverse sense, had estimated the cost at £270,000.

It was now that he recalled his son Robert from America, to assist in his harassing and arduous labours. His greatest anxiety arose from an opposition that had sprung up, much fostered by Rennie and Telford, against the use of locomotives on the line. But the Stephensons pleaded so earnestly for a fair trial of the system, which they felt convinced was the only one certain of success, that it was at last determined to institute a great competition of locomotives at Rainhill, with a view of ascertaining whether a really practical engine could be constructed. The trial excited intense interest. Four "racers" were entered for the contest: the "Novelty," by Braithwaite and Ericsson; the "Sanspareil," by Timothy Hackworth; the "Perseverance," by Burstall; and the "Rocket," by Stephenson. Everyone knows the issue of that famous competition—how the little "Rocket" bore away the palm from her competitors, and won the prize of £500, besides demonstrating once and for all that economy and efficiency were combined in the use of the locomotive. The brave engine was rather badly treated afterwards, and, like Dibdin's high-mettled racer, set to the unworthy task of hauling sand and gravel. It always showed itself a capital little working engine; and when in the service of Mr. Thompson, the lessee of the Earl of Carlisle's coal and lime works, on one occasion accomplished four miles in four and a half minutes, nearly sixty miles an hour. Stephenson bought it back, for old acquaintance' sake; and at length it found a fitting home in the Museum of Patents, at Kensington. It had fulfilled all the conditions laid down by the Company. They were considered very hard at the time; and Mr. P. Ewart, of Liverpool, who afterwards became Government Inspector of Steam-packets, declared "that only a parcel of charlatans could ever have issued such a set of conditions; that it had been proved to be impossible to make a locomotive engine go at ten miles an hour; but if it ever were done, he would undertake to eat a stewed engine wheel for his breakfast." That gentleman ought to have died of indigestion.

IMPROVED ENGINES; LONDON AND BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY.

Stephenson was not the man to rest content with a great success. He constructed other engines, each exhibiting an improvement on its predecessors, the "Planet," the "Samson," and others. The landed proprietors continued their obstruction to the extension of the railway system; but gradually this obstruction took the form of excessive demands for compensation rather than unmitigated opposition. The great landlords were not unwilling to consent to having the value of their estates greatly augmented, and the rents obtainable for farms considerably heightened, by the increased facilities offered by railways for the transfer of produce. Indeed, some country magnates were found patronising a rival line between Manchester and Liverpool, on condition that it should pass through their property; but they demanded enormous compensation for the grievance of having their property thus improved; and the possession of the land put them in a position to extort, in some cases, from six to ten times the marketable value of the ground required by the railway companies. Where the companies were not ready to buy off the opposition of the territorial magnates at exorbitant rates, every device was put in action to get their Bills thrown out in Parliament. In the case of the London and Birmingham Railway, one of the lines set on foot at this period, under the superintendence of Stephenson, the landowners of Hertfordshire and Bucks organized themselves into a complete phalanx, convened public meetings to prove that railways were unnecessary,—one eloquent gentleman declared them to be directly opposed to the Spirit of the Constitution,—and resorted to the old device of physical force against the surveyors, who were reduced to prowling about with dark lanterns and do their work at night, and to surround themselves with a protective force of strong armed supporters, where actual violence was apprehended. When it was proposed to extend the railway system beyond the manufacturing centres, the country gentlemen were more angry than ever. These newfangled and revolutionary roads would subvert the British constitution and disturb the foxes. Bold Colonel Sibthorp was especially emphatic in denunciation of the infernal railways, and declared that he would as soon meet a highwayman or a burglar as a surveyor. In various instances also great and unnecessary expense was incurred through the opposition of the dissatisfied. Even in some towns the inhabitants, stirred up by the local press, and impressed by dismal forebodings uttered at public meetings, arrayed themselves on the side of the opponents of progress. Thus the stipulation of the inhabitants of Northampton that the Birmingham Railway should not come near their town entailed the necessity of making the celebrated Kilby tunnel, over which one contractor broke his heart, and which was ultimately completed by Robert Stephenson at an expense of £350,000. Maidstone also insisted on being left untouched by the Dover Railway, though afterwards it clamoured for a branch; and the Watford tunnel was constructed that the precincts of the parks of Lords Clarendon and Essex might not be profaned by the neighbourhood of the levelling railway. The annals of the House of Lords form a curious and instructive record of panic, of obstructive tendencies, grandfatherly legislation, and in some cases of amusingly extensive selfishness, thinly covered by an assumption of anxiety for the protection of the public against the wiles of dangerous promoters of chimerical schemes. One influential nobleman "doubted whether an impetus to manufactures would be advantageous to the country." A sapient Member of Parliament publicly expressed a benevolent wish that the concoctors of every such (railway) scheme, with their solicitors and engineers, were at rest in Paradise. When flat opposition proved vain, and it became very certain that railroads would be constructed, the feudal resistance of the reactionists notwithstanding, a new feeling was manifest, showing itself in a laudable desire to make the railway interest pay for its whistle. The sum of £100,000 for a gravel pit paid to one person of more influence than conscience; £10,000 disbursed to another for consequential damages to a piece of land that became far more valuable through the formation of a railway; large sums paid to landowners as a compensation for omitting to build accommodation bridges which the landlords were entitled to demand,—in one instance a proprietor demanded five bridges, and ultimately found he could do without a single one, accepting a sum of money as an alternative in each case,—these were the amenities that strewed the path of the Stephensons and their compeers in the early days of railway enterprise. Added to this, Robert Stephenson had to walk over the whole of the ground between London and Birmingham more than twenty times, in his endeavours to complete his work of laying out the line in the face of the thousand and one obstructions. No wonder that by the time of its completion in 1838, the line had cost £500,000 instead of the £250,000, the original estimate.

But the success of this great railway, 112 miles in length, and constructed under such conditions of exceptional expense, that the Bill for its passage through Parliament alone cost £72,850, was such as to return a good dividend to the shareholders the very next year after its opening; for in that first year the receipts for passenger traffic alone amounted to above £608,500.

Thus George Stephenson had been closely identified with the Stockton and Darlington Railway, the Liverpool and Manchester (at the opening of which the great Duke of Wellington was present, and poor Mr. Huskisson, the ex-President of the Board of Trade, unfortunately lost his life, being run over by the "Rocket"), and the London and Birmingham line. The soundness of his views, and the sagacity of his calculations, had by this time been abundantly vindicated; and not only were the railways themselves successful, but it was found that various interests which it had been feared would suffer deeply were more flourishing than ever. Coal-owners and coal-consumers were benefited alike; horses, instead of being a drug in the market, increased in price. The value of land was increased, and farms near railways let for higher prices; and while the coaching and inn-keeping interests had certainly suffered, there had arisen entirely new industries connected with the new roads, which found employment for ten men where they threw one out of work.

NEW SCHEMES; STEPHENSON'S SAGACITY.

Stephenson's ideas expanded as the success of railways became more and more established; and he desired to see the capitals of England and Scotland brought into communication by the iron road, and to extend the benefits of his invention to each part of the United Kingdom. He accordingly made surveys between Newcastle and Edinburgh, and took an active interest in the new projects as they were successively brought forward. But in the interval between 1838 and 1844 there was a lull in railway enterprise. The manufacturers, coal-owners, and iron-masters had obtained the lines they immediately required; and the general public had not yet taken up railways as an investment. And when, in 1844, the desire for speculation in railways awoke almost suddenly and developed with astonishing rapidity, Stephenson had retired from the active exercise of his profession, gradually transferring to Robert, the son for whom he had done so much, and who had so fully repaid his fatherly care and nurture, the offices he held as consulting engineer, etc., on various lines. It is infinitely pleasant to see how harmoniously the famous father and the eminent son worked together, and how naturally the younger man gradually took the burden from the honoured parent whose great life-work was almost finished. Robert Stephenson's handsome office in Great George Street, Westminster, became one of the great centres of railway activity. His father frequently came to the office, but did not always quite know what to do with himself. His spirit was as vigorous as ever, and even some of the spirit of boyish fun that had prompted his athletic efforts in earlier days remained with him. It is known that quite late in life he would invite his friend Mr. Bidder to a friendly wrestling match in a room of the office; and a bill for £2 10s. for the repair of broken chairs, jocularly sent to him by his son Robert, testifies with what energy the primitive pastime must have been carried on. He was regarded with the greatest affection and with a respect that amounted to veneration by Robert Stephenson, who attributed all his own success in life to the grand old man of whom he was intensely proud. "It was his thorough training," he once said emphatically to Mr. Smiles, "his example, and his character that made me the man I am."

One great characteristic about George Stephenson was the entire simplicity and manliness of his character. On the one hand there was no ostentatious or aggressive humility about him; he was no "Josiah Bounderby of Coketown," bragging of his humble origin, to excite wonder, and gain praise for his material success; on the other hand there was no upstart pride, no weak endeavour to conceal the fact that he was emphatically a working-man, and self-educated. In his earlier days he was always noticeable as a man thoroughly to be depended on, and sure to rise in the world. When prosperity came, and with it the necessity of taking his place among men who had begun life at a far higher level than he had started from, he came among them with quiet, modest self-possession, commanding respect as one of nature's noblemen. His power of conversation was marvellous. His observation, his strong common sense, and an intelligent interest in a great variety of objects, from birds'-nests upwards, gave a charm to his talk; and often a dry, humorous saying of his would envelope a world of meaning. Thus he declared he distrusted competitive examinations because they would lead to an unlimited power of cram—adding, “Let me give you one piece of advice: Never to judge of your goose by its stuffing!” Actively benevolent he was, with a hand always open to help the poor. A brother-in-law of his first wife died, leaving a large family unprovided for. The poor orphans had nothing but the workhouse before them; but, as a north-country admirer forcibly expressed it, “George struck in fayther for them.” On one of his visits to Newcastle, after shaking hands with Mr. Brandling, an old friend, he shook hands also with a still older friend, Anthony Wigham, his coachman. In the latter part of his life he was involved in a controversy, in which his strong good sense again appeared conspicuous. A new school arose, that of the fast engineers, who frequently aspired rather to originality than to practical usefulness; but Stephenson steadily held to his own principles, and declared that every engineering work should be made to pay. Thus he persistently advocated the narrow gauge, the space of 4 ft. 8½ in. between the rails, in opposition to Brunel's more ambitious broad gauge, as displayed at considerable cost to the shareholders in the Great Western Railway. Again, anxious as he was for the legitimate development of railways in his native country, he would never give the sanction of his name or countenance to any scheme he did not consider sound. During the time of the great railway excitement of 1845 and 1846, large and influential deputations were continually coming to him, begging him to accept the position of consulting engineer to new lines, and ready to pay any amount for the use of his influence; but he firmly refused; he would not give the countenance of his name to a popular delusion.

THE RAILWAY MANIA; HONESTY OF STEPHENSON; CONCLUSION.

In 1845 and 1846 a perfect fever of speculation in railways broke out. It was known as the railway mania, and displayed itself in an insane tendency to put forward the wildest projects for new companies. Gambling in railway shares was carried on to an extent that revived recollections of the South Sea Bubble of the previous century. Men of straw became possessors of large amounts of railway stock, which they hastened to dispose of at a premium, buying more and pushing it on in the same way. All classes, from dukes downward, seemed bitten with the idea of gaining sudden fortunes. “Never a sharper need now despair, and every rogue has a chance,” wrote Thackeray. Stephenson's name on the prospectus of any of these lines would have been invaluable in raising the price of the shares. He was often importuned to allow it to be used, and might have made a colossal fortune by acquiescence. But he steadily refused, declaring that he looked upon railroads as private speculations, and that if they could not be made to pay he would have nothing to do with them. In his beautiful country house at Tipton, about a mile from Chesterfield, he passed his last years, occasionally visiting London, to visit friends, or “to see what there was just going on;” Newcastle, and the scenes of his old colliery life. Killingworth and its neighbourhood were also dear to him; and into many a cottage whose occupants he had known in the old times would he enter, with his cheery greeting of “Well, and how's all here to-day?” In 1847, the year before his death, he was invited not for the first time to Drayton Manor, the seat of Sir Robert Peel. He was to be present at the opening of the Trent Valley Railway, the first sod of which had been cut by Sir Robert two years before, but which Stephenson himself had projected and planned many years earlier. In the same year he invented a new self-acting break; and in the same year he told the story of his life at a meeting of the Leeds Mechanics Institute. On the 12th August, 1848, after a short illness, he died, in the 67th year of his age, leaving behind him a name second to none, in that class of distinguished men who, rising from the ranks, attain to eminence and fame by dint of sheer genius, force of character, and hard work.

THE GREAT CONTROVERSY.

THE life of Thomas à Becket is the history of a great feud, a memorable tragedy, and the most remarkable transactions, political and ecclesiastical, of the reign of Henry II. And though seven centuries have passed since the actors were removed and the wonderful story was told, controversy has not yet closed over the memorials of the extraordinary prelate. There are no facts in dispute, no records still to examine, no new evidence to weigh and sift; all indeed, possible to do, has been done to complete and interpret the simple and coincident narratives of the chroniclers. From this it might be supposed that the life of Becket had long ago passed from the exciting sphere of disputation to the tranquil region of meditative inquiry. But it is not so: his character, his sanctity, his ambition, his imperious and latterly frantic zeal, and the superstition which clouded and wrecked his subtle and dauntless spirit, are all and more still subjects of controversy.

An explanation of this may be conveniently given here. For upwards of three centuries after his death, Becket was adored as a martyr and saint, scarcely lower than St. Peter himself in the hierarchy of heaven. Indeed, his shrine in those ages was the most remunerative piece of property the Church had in England. Pilgrims of all degrees and from all parts flocked in great multitudes to Canterbury with their richest gifts and pious savings. Louis of France placed a splendid jewel on the shrine, and Henry II. crawled with bare and bleeding feet to the spot on which his old antagonist fell. There were, however, ecclesiastics and scholars who found it difficult to reconcile passages in Becket's life with what they believed should be the conduct of a saint on earth. Roger, Archbishop of York, broadly declared that Becket had perished like Pharaoh in his pride; and fifty years after the murder the question was gravely discussed in the University of Paris, whether Becket was in heaven or hell. Upon investigation it was discovered that the miracles reported to have taken place at his birth and death had been invented to fortify his claims to canonization; and as the accounts of the miracles filled two large volumes, it may be inferred that the recorders were remarkably ingenious and diligent. Suspicions were further increased when the most sceptical of the brethren began to frame indictments against the saint; in these he was accused of counterfeiting conversion to gain the archbishopric, of impiety in using the thunders of the Church to serve his own purposes, of rebellion, duplicity, perjury, contumacy, and a number of other offences, in the aggregate a terrific charge. As may be imagined, so great a scandal excited the jealousy of the Church and the curiosity of the lay congregations, and immense efforts were made, on the one side to disprove the heretical accusations, and on the other to refute the testimony of the Church as a tissue of falsehoods. The doctrines of the Reformation, which were gaining ground in England, turned the scale, and strange as it may be, towards the middle of the sixteenth century Becket was actually cited to appear in court, there to be tried and condemned as a traitor. Henry VIII. had no great faith in saints, and the superlative holiness of St. Thomas was in particular highly offensive. There was a solemn State trial of the defunct Primate,—one of those great parodies of justice which Henry designed to promote his desires; and that there might be nothing wanting to mortify and incense the Romish Church, St. Thomas was struck ignominiously from the calendar, his bones were burned, his ashes cast into the highway, and the obloquy which enflamed bigotry and debased zeal had collected and invented was flung upon his memory. Three hundred years of unmerited contumely followed; his name became a by-word of reproach, a symbol of hypocrisy and imposture, a synonym of impious malignity. So ran the current down almost to our own age; and then, flowing into a wide sea of thought, imperceptibly lost its virulence.

Thus through seven centuries the conflict of opinion multiplied and renewed the materials for controversy; and these were so interwoven with ecclesiastical disputes and political problems that with each succeeding age arose new and more luxuriant growths of propositions and conjectures. The origin of the feud was forgotten in the disputations of learned canonists and jurists; and it is to the biographers of our own time we are indebted for the results of investigations pursued through vast accumulations of hypothetical matter. And these results, though still subject to the criticism of party spirit, redeem the character of Becket from obloquy, and, in the words of Lord Chancellor Campbell, satisfy reflective minds that he was "one of the most distinguished men of any race this island has produced."

One word more before we proceed. It is obvious that Becket's life should be considered as part of his own age, the twelfth century; indeed as crucified, as it were, in a time of dark and debasing superstition, in which schism and impiety rent the Church, and crime polluted its sacred places. The England of that day, as Macaulay observes, was "in a state more miserable than the state in which the most degraded nations of the East now are." Usurpation and rebellion and a merciless feudalism had almost extinguished every spark of faith, honour, and freedom. Hence, to understand properly the nature of the transactions in which Becket was concerned, it is necessary to keep in the mind's eye the dark traditions of his age while we throw together the materials for this addition to biography.

BECKET'S YOUTH.

The story told of Becket's early days glows in a rich ecclesiastical setting like some old-world legend painted on a church window. It is beautiful and mysterious, and harmonises perfectly with mediæval notions of a saintly birth. Charming fable colours the years of infancy and boyhood. Miracles were wrought and marvellous things seen in visions, and in those other ways in which, as Plautus observes, the gods make fools of men.

Nor were the pious and ingenious authors of so much fiction at a loss to invent an appropriate legend concerning the boy's parents. Gilbert Becket, according to the story, made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, where he was captured and enslaved by the Saracens. His master Amirald had a lovely daughter, a susceptible maid, in whose eyes the fair stranger found favour. She assisted him to escape, and subsequently followed him. Gilbert, after a series of romantic adventures, arrives home and begins business, becoming in due time portreve or high-sheriff, and an opulent merchant in the city of London. The lady meanwhile is travelling slowly through many strange countries. The only words of English she knows are "Becket" and "London," and these she has constantly on her lips while threading her way through vast forests, and encountering all the various perils of her romantic journey. At length she accomplishes her object, and Gilbert, still heart-whole, is so struck by such an instance of heroic attachment, that his scruples as a pious Churchman vanish. She is immediately baptized by the name of Matilda, and after that ceremony the pair are married by six bishops, their lordships being in those days gregarious and accommodating.

Of this beautiful story only one part is true, namely, the marriage of Gilbert and Matilda Becket; the fruit of which was Thomas, born, it is supposed, in 1118. On the day of his birth his father's house was nearly destroyed by fire, without, however, it would appear, interrupting the performance of the miracle-workers. Fires in the city were at that time so frequently occurring that rapid changes of fortune were constantly taking place. Gilbert Becket was among the sufferers, and so considerable were his losses that he soon became impoverished, and we hear of him no more as a merchant or magistrate. His house, however, continued to be the resort of clerics and gentlemen, in whose esteem Gilbert stood high as a person of studious habits and irreproachable character.

Matilda appears to have been an excellent woman, such another mother, indeed, as those to whom so many distinguished men owe the first start in a great career. It was her practice at certain seasons, presumably in better days, to weigh the infant Thomas, placing in the opposite scale bread, meat, linen, and money, which were afterwards distributed among the poor. Thomas thrived through a somewhat uneventful boyhood, until he attracted the notice of Richier de Aquila, a Norman soldier of large fortune. The knight took a fancy to the bright, dark-eyed, sturdy youth, and taught him the accomplishments of the age. Fond of sports and the exciting exercises of chivalry, Thomas soon longed to follow his splendid patron to the wars. But in those times a successful career could best be pursued through the portals of the Church, and accordingly he was sent at the age of ten to Merton Priory, where he was educated, and where probably he received the first instructions in that ecclesiastical law which he as Primate afterwards expounded with tragic results.

It is related that on one of his visits Gilbert Becket prostrated himself reverently before his son Thomas. "What art thou doing?" said the prior. "Dost thou fall down at the feet of thy son?" "I know, sir, what I am doing!" replied Gilbert, "for this boy shall be great in the sight of the Lord." Taken with a large pinch of salt, this story shows the drift of his father's wishes—that he should be trained for one of the higher offices of the Church; and the exceptional intelligence he displayed, the quickness of his parts, and the uniform excellence of his conduct, certainly favoured the high hopes his father and his patron entertained.

But about a year before he reached his majority he left the priory and spent some little time in Paris, prosecuting his studies. On his return to London he entered the service of a relation, one Osbern Witdeniers, with whom he remained three years, keeping accounts and acquiring business habits. Towards the close of this apprenticeship two visitors arrived from Boulogne at his father's house, through whose influence he was introduced to the notice of Theobald, then Archbishop of Canterbury. From that time, probably 1144, his good fortune was assured. He rose rapidly in the Primate's favour, and preferment placed him in a position to complete his ecclesiastical studies without assistance.

At Bologna and Auxerre, under the celebrated Gratian, he studied civil and canon law, and it is supposed devoted attention to a series of maxims on Church polity, the spirit of which denied to the secular authority the right of jurisdiction over the clergy. If this be so, the foundation was laid then for the resistance he in after years made, when Henry II. demanded that clerical offenders should be handed over for punishment to the secular arm. Becket, at all events, acquired at Bologna an exact knowledge of Church laws, and on his return to England was marked out for promotion and preferment by the Archbishop.

AT THE COURT OF CANTERBURY.

The court of Canterbury at the time of which we write was the centre of learning in England, and one of the great seats of ecclesiastical power in Christendom. The See had been made famous by two illustrious Churchmen, drawn from the seminary of Bec, to rivet the Norman system on the Saxon Church. Lanfranc and Anselm had been the potential figures in the great Norman college, and as English Primates they stood in the first rank of accomplished theologians, and profound metaphysicians. Perhaps, in the whole history of the Church, no two men united so many high qualities, and yet separately were more the antipodes of each other in personality. Lanfranc was renowned for his austerities and imperious defence of the rights of the Church. Anselm was the type of gentleness and wisdom united in a spirit capable of infinite endurance. Yet his passive courage and serene imperturbability were as unyielding in devotion to the Church as were the iron will and austere spirit of Lanfranc.

While these great men lived the Church suffered no spoliation at the hands of the Conqueror or his successors. William and his son Rufus were restrained by Lanfranc, and Anselm vindicated the rights of his order in an almost interminable dispute with the first Henry. The next Primate, however, possessed neither Lanfranc's strong will nor Anselm's unconquerable spirit. Yet Theobald personally was an affectionate and loyal son of the Church, and clung tenaciously to the privileges of the clergy. What he lacked himself he endeavoured to supply by attracting to his court men of distinction and promise, to whom the defence of the Church might be entrusted, should the Crown encroach upon her rights. In Becket he had discovered the qualities of an able Churchman and an astute minister, another Lanfranc in strength of will, a daring and lofty spirit, inflexible in purpose and unconquerable in resistance.

Becket's advance in the Archbishop's favour was rapid. Preferment was literally heaped upon him; this included fat livings in London and Oxford, and prebendary stalls in the cathedrals of St. Paul's and Lincoln. His appointment at the court was of a confidential nature. He was employed on the most important missions, and in negotiating weighty business between great personages. His skill and grasp of detail, and his exact knowledge, ensured the success of his diplomacy abroad, and his accomplishments, high spirit, and profuse liberality won him flattering tributes at home. He was at that time an unusually tall man, of a most dignified presence. His eyes were large, dark, and brilliant, and in repose they are said to have charmed by their infinite sweetness. The singular acuteness of his physical senses has been remarked by all his biographers. The slightest footfall he instantly detected, and his sense of smell seemed unerring. In the prominent and slightly aquiline nose, massive forehead, full chin, and finely-curved lips, the power of a strong, self-reliant mind was boldly writ. He conversed with great vivacity, drawing tale and jest from a large store and a most luxuriant fancy. He had then begun to indulge a taste for rich dress and the costly appointments of a favoured courtier; and ere long was noted for his splendour and munificence.

The glimpses we have of his life at the Archbishop's court are not always sunny or fair. Sometimes a shadow falls cold and dark on the gay colour and bright scene. The jealousy of the clerics and suffragans was easily excited, and the favour shown to Becket, who was neither a priest nor a noble, could scarcely be viewed with equanimity by the less favoured followers. Through the influence of Roger, afterwards Archbishop of York, he was dismissed twice, and as often reinstated when the triumph of his enemies seemed complete. On these occasions he had a staunch friend in Walter, Bishop of Rochester, a prelate of a noble and generous character, and as proud of Becket's success, as Roger was envious and antagonistic. What the charges were upon which the Archbishop had acted in dismissing Becket we must leave to conjecture, but it is obvious they were of a superficial nature; exaggerations, probably, of some indiscretions of temper, to which undue weight was attached by the jealous and vindictive suffragan.

At all events, Becket lost nothing, and was soon higher than ever in the Primate's favour; in proof of which he was sent to Rome on several delicate and weighty missions. A dispute had arisen between the two bishops—Canterbury and York—respecting legatine powers. Theobald, as Primate of all England and the Pope's legate, claimed precedence over the See of York. On the other hand, the Archbishop of that province refused to acknowledge Theobald's claims, and styling himself Primate of England, set up pretensions of the loftiest character. The fine shade of distinction in the titles of the two prelates we can scarcely appreciate now, but in the age in which they lived a hair's-breadth was as good as a mile where ecclesiastical dignity was concerned. The rivals submitted their claims and pretensions to Rome, and Theobald's case was so successfully represented by Becket that the Pope confirmed the legatine authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and thus for a time at least settled the dispute.

But it was a success which drew upon Becket the displeasure of the defeated Prelate, and embittered the inimical feeling fostered by the Archbishop's successor, Roger. The seeds indeed were sown then of a struggle for supremacy between Roger and Becket which began soon after the latter's consecration, and ended only with his life.

There was another and weightier matter in which Becket's diplomacy achieved a great triumph. King Stephen, in order to secure the succession, had determined that his son Eustace should be crowned King during his own lifetime. This, however, was contrary to a convention he had at a critical juncture concluded at Winchester, by which he acknowledged the right of Prince Henry to succeed to the Crown; he himself, as the reader is aware, having but an indifferent title to reign. Becket was sent by Theobald to Rome to denounce the breach of faith Stephen contemplated, and in particular to vindicate the claims of Prince Henry; and so effectual were his representations that the proposed coronation of Eustace was forbidden by the Pope, and the succession secured without further dispute to Henry. "The subtle prudence and cleverness," says a chronicler, "of Thomas, cleric of London," were more than a match for Stephen's emissaries. It is true that Becket had a good case; the Prince was the grandson of Henry I., and as such was de jure King of England; but Stephen was de facto Sovereign, and had paid the Pope handsomely for ratifying his claim to the throne. His usurpation had been in a manner condoned by the majority of his subjects, and he had held his own against the most formidable of Henry's partisans. Moreover the Pope's advisers foresaw in the accession of Henry the rise of a Prince whose family had always been inimical to the lofty assumptions of the Church. It is better, said one of the cardinals, to hold a ram by the horns than try to grasp a lion's tail,—in short, it was argued that Stephen and his son Eustace would be more easily managed and more useful to the Holy See, than the young Plantagenet Henry and his haughty race. Thus the question of right was subordinated to that of expediency, and nothing short of the most consummate diplomacy could possibly have accomplished the object of Becket's mission.

His reputation as an able negotiator was now established, and he enjoyed the favour and confidence of Henry's adherents. Theobald distinguished him by the most gratifying marks of favour; he shared the Primate's counsels and secrets, was his companion, friend, adviser, and eventually his successor. The death of Eustace finally disposed of the succession question. Stephen soon after died, and on the 17th of December, 1154, Henry II. was crowned King of England. In the same year Becket was ordained deacon, and advanced to the Archdeaconry of Canterbury, the highest dignity after the bishoprics and abbacies. In the following year he became Lord Chancellor of the Kingdom.

THE CHANCELLOR BECKET.

It is scarcely necessary to explain how Becket's promotion arose. The King, though then a very young man, was well aware of the part Thomas had taken to secure his succession, and Theobald had presented his favourite as worthy of a high place near His Majesty's person. The Primate moreover knew that Henry had inherited little respect for the clergy, and might, if not judiciously restrained, do serious injury to the Church. The need, therefore, of stationing an able Churchman at his elbow was very great, and Becket might be trusted implicitly. On the other hand the King had need of an astute and energetic minister to frame and execute the remedial measures necessary to restore peace and prosperity to the distracted country. Becket had already demonstrated how great his abilities were, and had given the highest proofs of his attachment to the Prince's interests. His elevation, therefore, to the Chancellorship was regarded with satisfaction by the ecclesiastical as well as the secular authority.

The office of Chancellor in that age was practically that of the Executive in all the departments of the government. The Chancellor administered the revenues of all vacant bishoprics and abbacies. He had the custody of the great seal, and he was at liberty to seal his own documents with its reverse. Without summons he was entitled to attend the King's councils, and all the royal grants passed through his hands. The Chapel Royal was in his care. Becket was also entrusted with the principal administration of his master's continental dominions. The high judicial functions of the Chancellorship in our own time were not, however, included in the duties of the office in the twelfth century, but apart from those its dignities and splendour were almost regal.

The first acts of the new government inspired the nation with hopes of a speedy deliverance from the misery and anarchy Stephen's misrule had produced. The foreign mercenaries were dismissed and sent out of the kingdom. They had sacked, burned, plundered, and violated with devilish ferocity, until, as a chronicler relates, "a whole day's journey might the traveller ride, and not find a man left in a town nor a land in tillage." The castles and fortresses in which the oppressors and robbers had their dens were demolished, and a clean sweep was made of the main elements of disorder. The debased coin of Stephen's mintage was cried down, and new money struck of the right value and standard. Charters were granted by which citizens claimed their freedom and privileges independent of any superior but the King. And these charters were the ground-work of the liberty we now enjoy.

To the Chancellor's prompting and executive energy these concessions and beneficial measures were no doubt largely due. Henry was very of his time in France. There he had a wider dominion than even the King of France, and exercised an independent authority. But the cares of state were distasteful to him. He was impatient, violent, and often headstrong, and though a bold and resolute Prince, lacked the higher qualities of a wise and magnanimous Sovereign. That he himself initiated the beneficent legislation of his reign is highly improbable; it bears the imprint of a more sagacious mind—that indeed of a far-searching and liberal statesman. Becket was the responsible administrator, and the policy he pursued effectually sapped the feudal system, and aroused the people to a sense of their own great power. There had been but three orders in the nation, namely, the king, the barons, and the clergy, and each had struggled and fought and intrigued for supremacy; now a fourth order arose, formed of the merchant class; and, claiming a share in the administration, succeeded eventually in unriveting the despotism under which every spark of liberty had well-nigh been extinguished.

The dignities of office Becket supported with a munificence more regal than clerical. He had an immense revenue, and maintained a sumptuous establishment. The hospitality he dispensed was princely. "The costliness of his furniture," says FitzStephen, "the luxury of his banquets, and the general splendour of his state, were the theme of contemporary wonder and admiration." The highest honours were placed at his disposal; his titles and dignities were increased according to his fancy. He was Lord Warden of the Tower, and of the castles of Ely and Berkhamstead. Knights and the sons of nobles swelled his retinue, and when he crossed over to France he had an escort of six ships.

With his Sovereign Becket lived on the easiest and most intimate terms. Henry would sometimes enter the Chancellor's dining-hall or horseback, and leaping to the dais, indulge a gay mood in a familiar and hearty revel. Probably every reader knows the story of the frolic in the city. Henry and Becket were riding together one cold winter's day, some distance in advance of the escort, when the king spied a poor old man barely clad and shivering. "Poor old fellow!" said Henry; "do you see how cold he looks. It would be a famous alms to give him a thick warm cloak!" "A very proper thought, and a royal one too," replied Becket. "Very well," said the King, "you shall give this great alms; and turning to the unsuspecting Chancellor, laid hold of his splendid cloak of scarlet and grey. When the escort came up they found the King and the Chancellor struggling over the cloak; Henry at last secured it, and threw it to the old man.

That Becket shared his master's pleasures seems likely enough. He had a gay humour, bright fancy, and an inexhaustible store of anecdotes; he was in the highest sense companionable; but there is no evidence to prove that he was either dissipated or licentious: indeed, the stories told in his purgation show that he was pure and temperate, and subjected himself to the severest discipline. Two biographers, differing widely in many other respects, agree as regards this point. "He has been impeached unjustly," says Canon Robertson, and Canon Morris testifies to the same effect. The latter gives the names of Becket's flagellators, a prior and a priest who are said to have applied the switch with pious severity. It appears, however, that the Chancellor was suspected of an intrigue now and then, in which one of the fair dames of the court was concerned.

As the story goes, he was once in attendance on the King at Stafford, when the suspicions of his host Vivien were aroused by the attentions which he fancied were paid to the Chancellor by a lady. Her name was Anice de Stafford, and she was one of the court beauties whose reputation had suffered in consequence of their intimacy with the King. Anice was lovely, and perhaps a trifle forward, and Vivien was not above acting the spy. Long after the household was at rest he secretly entered Becket's chamber with a lantern. The room seemed empty, but on peering round it he saw his guest asleep on the floor, partially undressed. There are many similar stories, and others, of traps laid for the Chancellor at court, but they all point in the one direction—his vindication.

In the coarse and voluptuous pleasures of the court it is improbable that Becket ever indulged. He could scarcely, however, avoid the scenes of the King's carousals, for these were wherever Henry was. But in the exercises of the chase and of chivalry he found congenial enjoyments. He was an accomplished chess-player and an ardent lover of the sports and pastimes of the age. He had magnificent tastes and a lofty ambition; he enjoyed courtly favour and homage; but in his ambition there was nothing sordid or vulgar, and in his tastes there were no taints of vice or intemperance.

His political abilities were of the highest service to the King, who trusted Becket implicitly, and at that time loved him. The administration at home and abroad was successful, and Henry was now one of the most powerful princes in Europe. By the adroitness of Becket, the marriage was arranged of Louis' infant daughter to the English heir-apparent, a marriage which subsequently cost the French King a princely appanage. Becket's mission on that occasion produced an extraordinary effect; it was more like a royal progress or a conqueror's triumphal march than the movements of an embassy. "He was preceded," said FitzStephen, "on his entrance to every considerable town, by an incredible number of choristers or singing boys, who struck up some triumphal chant. These were followed by several waggons containing his plate, wardrobe, and bedding, and the utensils of his chapel and kitchen, not forgetting stores of ale to be distributed to the populace. Sumpter horses, with led chargers, hounds, falcons, and monkeys, also figured in the procession, with a crowd of knights, squires, and clerks; and last of all rode the Chancellor himself." The magnificence of the train so far surpassed what the French had before seen, that they expressed unbounded wonder, and conceived the most extravagant notions of the greatness of the English King, whose Chancellor travelled with the pomp of a Sovereign Prince. And that was precisely the effect which Becket had aimed to produce. It flattered his master's pride, and mortified the vanity of the French King. The latter was jealous of Henry's growing ascendancy, and Henry, as grand senechal of France, gloried in a pageantry which diverted to himself the admiration due to the nominal Lord Paramount. In our own day the pomp of pageantry would make a mission to an European state ridiculous, and defeat its object; but in Eastern countries—in India, for example—ceremonious splendour and barbaric pomp are still features of high State policy. In the twelfth century spectacular effects and gorgeous trappings were diplomatic instruments, and as such were used by Becket. No man ever despised the toys of State more than he did—that is, as objects of ambition; but he found them useful as means to an end, and valued them accordingly.

As a successful negotiator the Chancellor had no equal at that time. Though he had over-matched Louis, he won and retained the friendship of that Prince. Louis admired the political genius and unswerving fidelity of the ambassador, he enjoyed the society of the gay and brilliant Churchman, and esteemed the courtly scholar and gallant English gentleman. The intimacy, as subsequent events proved, was of the highest importance to Becket.

The versatility of the Chancellor's character was soon after displayed in another field. At the siege of Toulouse he appeared at the head of four knights of his own household and a large body of gens d'armes, whom he levied and maintained at his own expense. His personal prowess and courage were shown in many a gallant struggle, and he seems to have fought with all the spirit and address of an accomplished soldier. On one occasion he unhorsed and made prisoner a famous French knight, Engelram de Trie, and on another secured the person of a notorious robber, Guy de Laval. All accounts agree that Becket distinguished himself, and it is asserted that he offered advice to the King which pointed to a speedy termination of the war. He advised an immediate assault, and the capture of the King of France, who had thrown himself into Toulouse. But Henry hesitated, and from a sense of feudal duty finally rejected Becket's proposal. The King's scruples were certainly honourable. As a French Prince, Louis was his feudal superior, his suzerain; but as King of England Henry owed no duty to Louis, and in the interests of his kingdom was bound to terminate the war with all due diligence. This, probably, was the view Becket entertained; he was an Englishman, and the English Chancellor, and wished to spare his country the misery and cost of protracted hostilities. At all events, the advice he proffered was sound in a military sense, and no general would be justified in rejecting it, where a similar opportunity offered of ending a war.

Becket's own part at the siege might with more reason be treated adversely. There was an obvious impropriety in a Churchman of his rank marching and fighting in the harness of a warrior, and it shocks one's notions of religious consistency that an Archdeacon of Canterbury should have engaged in single combat with knights and robbers, and fought like a trooper in a mêlée. But on the other hand, militant ecclesiastics were common enough in that age, and Becket, though a deacon, was not a priest. He had not yet been ordained to officiate at the altar or perform any of the higher sacerdotal functions. In other words, his militancy violated no vow, or law of the Church, and it was sanctioned by the usage of the period. At the same time it would be affectation to deny that the example reflected discredit upon the Church, and that Becket had fought with more regard for martial reputation than religious propriety.

There was a visible deterioration in his character about this time. Money was needed to carry on the war, and Becket co-operated with the King in several very disgraceful transactions. Vacant bishoprics and abbacies were practically sold to the highest bidders, who returned a part of the revenues as purchase-money. In one instance, however, a distinguished ecclesiastic exposed the nature of the bargain offered by Becket. "The Lord Chancellor," says Gilbert Foliot in a letter, "requests me to undertake the charge of the bishopric of London, and with part of the income to maintain myself and my household as its Bishop, and to reserve the rest for my lord the King, to be spent as the Spirit of God shall prompt him." Gilbert declined to be a party to the transaction, and the vacant See was administered by the clerics of Becket's household, he confiscating the revenue to the King's treasury. As may be imagined, the expostulations of the clergy were warm and loud. The war itself was bad enough, but that the Church should be robbed to pay the cost was shameful. Not even the Conqueror, or the covetous Rufus, had despoiled the Church,—that is the Norman Church, though both monarchs had plundered the Saxon prelates. Expostulation however failed,—the energetic Chancellor was bent upon prosecuting the war, and subordinated all scruples to that object.

Among other expedients to raise money a tax was imposed upon the clergy, imposed too by one of themselves, by the Archdeacon who had been placed near the King's person to protect the Church from injury and outrage. The indignation of the clergy boiled over. Even the mild and amiable Theobald wrote a remonstrance on his death-bed. "My brother, the Archdeacon," he wrote to the King, "has imposed a most unjust tax," and begs His Majesty to remove it. Henry refused. The Church, he thought, had grown too fat, and would be all the better for cupping. Reproaches were hurled at Becket, but with little effect—the tax was gathered and the war prosecuted.

Much may be said in defence of Becket's conduct in this instance. Though a "brother" of the Church, he was the Lord Chancellor of England, and the minister to whom the King looked for supplies; and these Becket drew from the order which was better able than any other to bear taxation. The clergy were in possession of nearly all the best properties in England, and their revenues were immense. Had Becket exempted the Church, it would have been necessary to impose heavier burdens upon the poorer orders, and thus thrown the expense of the war upon those who were least able to bear it. It is true that the Church claimed an immunity from taxation, but it was under ecclesiastical laws framed by Churchmen to save their own pockets. And no law can be good or binding which exempts one class at the expense of another. Becket moreover served an imperious and unscrupulous master, and it is more than probable that Henry had himself ordered that subsidies should be drawn from the clergy. He had no reverence for the Church,—indeed, he regarded the hierarchy in that age much in the same light as an ultra-Radical regards wealthy bishops in this, as encumbrances or needless ornaments in the State. His will was law, and if opposed, his passionate temper was such that he broke out in paroxysms of rage. This being so, was it worth Becket's while to incur Henry's displeasure and bursts of anger by refusing to tax the clergy? It was not. The tax was not unjust; it spared the poor man, and enabled Becket to discharge his duty to the King.

The clergy, however, considered it an act of aggression, and reviled Becket accordingly. Nor were they mollified when he on several occasions used his influence in their behalf. Henry's favourite mode of punishing bishops was burning or pulling down their houses, and it was only by diverting his attention, and at the risk of his displeasure, that Becket succeeded in saving the houses of two great prelates. That he was antagonistic to the Church at this time is very improbable—indeed many acts of his wholly in its favour might be cited. He induced Henry to fill up the vacant sees and other rich livings instead of keeping them open, and confiscating the revenues; and through his influence Gilbert Foliot was unconditionally translated to the Bishopric of London. He gave vast sums to the offertories, and was a munificent patron of monastic charities; in short he made all the reparation in his power for those simoniacal acts to which he had recourse in co-operating with the King. Yet there are writers who would have us believe that Becket was either inimical to the Church or pretended to be so in order to ingratiate himself still more in the royal favour. Their inferences, however, have been drawn unfairly, to harmonise with their own views of Becket's conduct.

THOMAS, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

The King and Becket were in France in the spring of 1161, when the death of Theobald was announced. No steps were taken to appoint a successor, and the See remained vacant for upwards of a year. This excited some surprise, as it was felt that Henry had the new Primate at his elbow.

One morning Becket sat conversing with a guest, the Prior of Leicester. "What do you mean by wearing a cloak with such sleeves as these?" said the Prior; "you look more like a falconer than a cleric. Yet cleric you are, in person one, in office many, Archdeacon of Canterbury, Dean of Hastings, Canon of this place and of that, and as the current report goes at court, Archbishop to be." Certainly Becket, in his rich Norman habit, plumed cap, jewelled dagger, and shoes pointed in the extreme of fashion, looked much more the gay courtier than the cleric. "I know," he replied, "these poor priests in England, any one of whom I had rather see promoted to the archbishopric than myself: for I know my lord the King so intimately that I am sure I should have to choose between his favour and that of Almighty God if I myself were to be appointed." If this story be true Becket understood what was passing in the King's mind at that time, namely, the advancement of one able and willing to help him in a design he entertained of restricting the encroachments of the Church upon the royal authority.

It was not, however, until the Chancellor was preparing to return to England, and there check the incursions of the Welsh, that the King's intentions were made known. As the story runs, Henry drew Becket aside and said, "You have not yet had all my instructions. It is my will that you should be Archbishop of Canterbury." Becket smiled as he turned, drawing the King's attention to his splendid dress. "What a religious man, what a saint you wish to place in that holy bishopric, and over so famous an order! I am certain that if by God's disposal it were so to happen, the love and favour you now bear towards me would speedily turn into the bitterest hatred. I know that you would require many things, in Church matters, which I could never bear quietly, and so the envious would take occasion to provoke an endless strife between us." Henry, however, impetuous and determined, would hear of no objections. Calling to Justiciary Richard de Luci, he exclaimed: "Richard, if I lay dead on my bier would you not strive that my eldest son Henry should be crowned king?" "My lord, I would with all my might!" he replied. "Then I wish you to take as much pains," replied the King, "for the promotion of the Chancellor to the See of Canterbury."

These stories, however, can scarcely be relied upon, Becket's biographers agreeing that they are too good to be true; but it is clear that Becket was reluctant to accept the archbishopric, and only consented at the urgent and repeated solicitations of the Pope's legate cardinal, Henry of Pisa. According to the theory of his detractors, Becket schemed for the primacy by exhibiting himself in the character of a worldly and militant ecclesiastic whom Henry would find a ready instrument for his designs; but that theory can only be established by rejecting every scrap of evidence in Becket's favour, and taking for granted everything his enemies said was true. Our own view is that the Chancellor was as sincere as it is possible for a very ambitious man to be, and that he at first refused the archbishopric, foreseeing the feud which subsequently arose.

In May, 1162, the bishops, priors, and monks of Canterbury met by order of the King at Westminster, and elected Becket Archbishop of the See. There was one dissentient voice, that of Gilbert Foliot, who however withdrew his objection. In those days hints were followed up by merciless punishments; Gilbert had the option of voting for Becket or banishment for him.

self, his kindred, and all belonging to him. After the election Becket was ordained priest, and on the following day consecrated Archbishop in the Metropolitan Church. There yet remained one symbol of sacerdotal authority to be conferred, and messengers were sent to the Pope for the pallium, which denotes that the holder has received complete metropolitan power from the See of St. Peter. It is amusing to read that when the messengers arrived at Sens, where the fugitive Pope had his court, the cardinals attempted to levy black mail, on the plea that they were in distress. They had been fleeced by the partisans of the anti-pope, and now fleeced in turn the faithful adherents of Alexander III. Becket's messengers, however, stoutly resisted, and succeeded in carrying off the pall in the teeth of the Cardinal's opposition. The Archbishop was now in the full plenitude of power in the great See of Canterbury.

From the day of consecration, Becket assumed a deportment in every respect the most opposite from the whole tenor of his life. He immediately changed the pomp of secular state and luxurious and magnificent living for a deportment of humility and self-denial. He discarded the splendid retinue of noble and knightly dependents, his costly habiliments and sumptuous fare, his worldly amusements,—all the trappings and accessories of the court and camp, and in a word transformed the scene of his life from that of a great Norman noble to that of an austere and imperious prelate. The change was marvellous, so swift and complete. The gay and brilliant Chancellor turned monk! There was wonder, and curiosity, and doubt, and the boldest of Becket's enemies pronounced his conversion a sham.

Adopting the austere rule of St. Benedict, the new Primate led a life of extraordinary humility for a personage of his rank in the Church. Matins broke in upon every night's rest; and when these were over, "thirteen poor men were daily taken into a private room, where the Archbishop washed and kissed their feet, and then waited on them, serving up to them with his own hands a plentiful meal. They were dismissed about daybreak, each with four pieces of money." It has been remarked that the thirteen poor men might have had their feet washed at a more reasonable hour. No doubt; and it seems to us that it was an unnecessary hardship disturbing their rest at midnight to prepare them for the Archbishop's tub. However, they were sent forth with full stomachs, and no doubt sang the praises of their patron's charity.

At mass, it is said, Becket "shed tears in wonderful abundance;" it was always a short mass, "for fear of distractions and suggestions by evil angels." He wore the habit of the Black Canons of Merton—a cappa, trimmed with lamb's wool, underneath which was the famous hair shirt, a shirt that as long as it held together was one of the most remarkable relics in the possession of the Church. So celebrated indeed was the cilice, that Becket's biographers have been at some pains to find out all about it. It covered the body to the knees, and was washed once every forty days—at all events, it was the duty of one man to wash it,—a duty, however, which could never have been performed properly, if at all, as the shirt, when removed at Becket's death, was literally thick with vermin. This fact is of importance in considering his extraordinary conduct, inasmuch as the misery he endured from this cause must have greatly aggravated the anguish of his spirit in after years.

In the great hall of the palace the Primate dined with his household, a goodly assemblage of ecclesiastics, soldiers, and lay retainers. One day a stranger monk, observing that Becket's fare was more delicate than his own, smiled, eyeing the Primate's plate greedily. "If I am not mistaken, brother," said Becket, "you take your bean with more eagerness than the pheasant before me." This was said with unusual warmth, suggestive of the old spirit of the man, which even then was ready to fire up at a glance. In the Archiepiscopal Chancery suitors had a patient and impartial hearing, and his judgments were given promptly. In one respect he was so unlike the archbishops and bishops of the time that he took no gifts. Suitors marvelled that such a judge should be a man who refused presents!

He inflicted on his body the severest penances which the fanaticism of his age mistook for the means of sanctification, and diverted the prodigal expenditure of his recent hospitalities to as lavish a distribution of alms and charitable dues. His time was entirely occupied between devotional exercises and ecclesiastical duties; and the desire thenceforth to abstract his mind wholly from mere temporal business was formally declared in his resignation of the great seal and the office of Chancellor. This complete change was wrought almost immediately after his consecration. There was no interval of preparation, it was a swift passing from one extreme to the other, and common sense can supply but one interpretation—that it was insincere. Viewed without prejudice, his conversion coincided suspiciously with his translation, and we share with regret the judgment pronounced against him.

But it is obvious that he had some great purpose in view which demanded an instant sacrifice of all temporal enjoyments. His ambition, we believe, had risen superior to the magnificence of State rank and administrative power, for he surrendered absolutely both, retreating from royal favour, office, wealth, luxury, and every field of political activity. His elevation had made it possible to attain to a spiritual ascendancy over peoples and kingdoms as the head of the great See of Rome. In that age the Pope was the intellectual sovereign of the nations, the absolute ruler of a triumphant order. And in the contemplation of an ascendancy so congenial to his own lofty nature, the pomp of place and courtly favour must have shrunk into insignificance in Becket's eyes. We may doubt his sincerity, and regard with suspicion his ostentatious humility; but it is impossible to restrain a feeling of admiration for this great man casting from him the titles and glories of a kingdom and turning his eyes towards a dominion that was universal.

The King was surprised and uneasy when the report reached him of the change. Soon after he received Becket's letter resigning the seal, and in his hot, hasty way declared he had been deceived. It is not known whether Becket had told him that as archbishop he would or would not longer hold office in his service. There are only the stories we have referred to which offer anything like an explanation, and we can scarcely put them in the scale, doubtful as they are, against Henry's reiterated assertion that not a word of warning had been given by Becket until he was seated on the Archbishop's throne. Nor were the reports of the Archbishop's proceedings calculated to allay his uneasiness. For Becket began energetically to reclaim all estates of the Church of Canterbury which had been alienated by his predecessors or were occupied by laymen. In many cases he avoided judicial processes, in favour of a short cut through legal difficulties, simply taking possession of the fiefs and turning out the holders. The farms and lands of the See, he declared, belonged to the Church, and as such it was his duty to reclaim them.

THE BEGINNING OF THE FEUD.

Though no pains were spared by Becket's enemies to place his proceedings in the worst possible light, he met and was received by the King at Southampton in December 1162 on apparently a friendly footing, Henry congratulating his former Chancellor on his accession to the See, and regretting that it had been necessary to resign the great seal. The cordiality, however, could not have been very marked on either side, and it is probable Henry feared that Becket would declare himself antagonistic to his long-cherished design against the Church. And this Becket did in effect by preaching a sermon before the King on the "boundless superiority of ecclesiastical to secular power." Soon after Becket conferred the church of Eynesford upon a cleric named Laurance, who was subsequently expelled by William the Lord of the Manor, whom the Archbishop uncompunctuously excommunicated. William appealed to the King, who wrote to Becket bidding him absolve his subject, a command Becket obeyed after so long a delay that Henry is reported to have exclaimed, "Now he no longer has my favour."

But the first circumstance which led to an open quarrel between the King and Becket was the latter's refusal to admit the right of the secular authority to punish ecclesiastics or persons within the pale of the Church. A priest in Worcestershire having wronged a gentleman's daughter, had proceeded to murder the father, escaping eventually to a sanctuary, where he was degraded and punished according to the forms of the Church. The indignation, however, of the people was so great, that a strong tide of feeling ran against the ecclesiastical authorities for protecting such a wretch from the secular arm. This was now Henry's opportunity to strike a blow at clerical usurpations. He summoned the bishops to a council at Westminster (October, 1163), and addressed them at great length on the disturbance caused by the "wickedness of the clerics, who commit many robberies and murders." Turning to Becket he said, "Therefore, my lord of Canterbury, I demand your consent and that of your brethren, that clerics who are taken in crimes be straightway degraded and given over to my officers to receive corporal punishment without any defence from the Church. And I also demand that one of my officials be present at the degradation to prevent the culprit's escape."

The bishops withdrew from the presence for consultation. Several were disposed to give the consent demanded, but Becket stoutly resisted and told all those who counselled compliance that they were bewitched. Returning to the presence Becket said he would consent to the King's demand saving their order, a reservation which the impetuous Henry took as an insult, and dismissed the council in a passion. On the following morning he sent a demand for the restoration of the forts and honours which Becket had held and received during his chancellorship, and subsequently summoned him to Northampton. So numerous were the retinues of King and Primate, that the conference was held in a field. There Henry reproached Becket with ingratitude. "Were you not," he asked, "the son of one of my rustics?" "Of a truth," replied Becket, "I am not sprung from royal ancestors, as neither was blessed Peter the prince of the apostles, to whom the Lord designed to give the kingdom of heaven, and the principality of the whole Church." "True," said the King, "but Peter died for his Lord." "And I, too," replied Becket, "will die for my Lord when the time shall come." The conference was a failure. Nor were the expostulations of the bishops more successful. Becket firmly refused to give up the reservation. In dread of the King's anger the leading bishops, among whom were Roger of York, Gilbert Foliot, and Hilary, a vain and blundering prelate whom Becket had rebuked on one occasion, determined to side with the King and isolate the Primate. The latter's friends begged and prayed that he would yield, and eventually persuaded him to see the King at Woodstock, where he so far complied with Henry's demands that the dispute seemed at an end.

THE COUNCIL OF CLARENDON.

Henry, however, considered that the reservation should be given up in public, and accordingly summoned a council, which met at the royal palace of Clarendon. There was a great assembly of nobles and all the dignitaries of Church and State, the King being there in person. Formally the Primate was asked to assent to the observance of the ancient customs of the State. Becket, in reply, said he knew not to what "customs" they required his assent. Whereupon the King ordered what are now known as the Statutes of Clarendon to be drawn up and read on the following day. Either the law Officers of the Crown were more expeditious in that age than they are now, or the statutes had already been compiled, condensed, and framed in a handy form, for on the second day they were read before the King and Parliament. By the most important of these statutes it was enacted:—"That all clerks accused of crimes should in the first instance come before the King's courts, and if there convicted, should forfeit the protection of the Church; that in each suit, to which a clerk was a party, it should be left to the royal justices to determine whether the matter properly fell under civil or ecclesiastical jurisdiction; that no priest should quit the realm nor carry an appeal from any spiritual tribunal beyond the Archbishop's court without the royal permission." There was a string of other clauses, to which, however, we need not refer.

Becket for some time insisted upon the privileges of the Church, maintaining that no greater punishment could be inflicted on a clerical culprit than degradation. No man, he urged, ought to be twice punished for the same offence, as clerks would be if in addition to degradation they had to undergo the sentence of the secular court. Bodily and spiritual penalties, he pleaded, could not in ecclesiastical law be visited upon the same person, and he insisted on the "profanity of binding behind the back hands which had consecrated the Saviour's body." The great dignity of his presence and grave remonstrance made so profound an impression on the convocation, that it was just possible the statutes might have been rejected notwithstanding the King's authority. A conclave of bishops was held, and while they were deliberating, a crowd of armed knights appeared, threatening death to all who opposed the King's will. Becket then assented to the articles.

On the third day of the Parliament the King required that Becket should append his seal as Primate to the statutes. He was determined that the Archbishop should have not a loop-hole of escape. But to the astonishment of all, Becket refused, and retired from the assembly openly condemning his own conduct for assenting on the previous day. Henry violently dismissed the meeting, and bitterly denounced the Primate. The latter performed self-imposed penances, even suspending himself from the exercise of the archiepiscopal office until he had been granted absolution for his assent to the articles. And from these he begged the Pope to withhold his ratification. Alexander, the reigning Pontiff, rejected the most obnoxious, and espoused Becket's cause. He sent Henry's messengers home with a reprimand, and granted the Primate full absolution.

The King's resentment was now directed against Becket, and he allowed his passion to hurry him into many acts of unjustifiable violence. Hitherto he had appeared to assert no more than those reasonable prerogatives of the crown which were necessary for the due execution of the laws; now, however, he began a course of petty persecution—iniquitous in itself and unworthy of his own honour. He deprived Becket of estates which he had formerly bestowed upon him; harassed him with vexatious suits in the royal courts for the recovery of fictitious debts which it was pretended he had incurred in his chancellorship; and employed all the artifice and skill he could command to accomplish his ruin. The Primate showed a dignified firmness in striking and advantageous contrast to the extraordinary conduct of the King. He gave what was demanded, adding the message, "Tell the King that money shall never form a subject of contention between my Sovereign and myself."

The King's case itself was so good that had he been content to rest on its merits, it is scarcely probable that the Archbishop could have sustained an effective opposition. Henry, however, was bent upon making Becket feel the full effects of his resentment, and opportunities were not wanting. In October, 1164, the Archbishop was summoned to answer before a council at Northampton for an alleged act of injustice to John Marshall, an officer of the royal exchequer. This person, it appears, had brought before the Archbishop's court a claim to part of an estate which was held as belonging to the See of Canterbury. Finding that the evidence was against him, Marshall availed himself of a provision in the new law which enabled suitors, by swearing that they had failed to obtain justice, to remove their cases into the King's court. Marshall, however, instead of swearing on the gospels or the holy relics of saints, pulled a song-book from his pocket, upon which he was sworn, song and prayer-books being bound pretty much alike in those days.

When the council met at Northampton, the sheriff of Canterbury and four knights appeared for the Archbishop, who was sick. The invalidity of Marshall's oath was proved, and other evidence given against the appellant. A declaration was also made that the Archbishop was too ill to appear in person. But the King declared that he would listen to no excuses, and that Becket's absence was a contempt of the royal court. He even ordered the knights into custody. A peremptory summons was then sent to Becket, and after some necessary delay he attended.

This council was one of the most remarkable ever held in Henry's reign. All the great dignitaries of State, the bishops and nobles, abbots and knights, were there,—all summoned that they might be witnesses to the disgrace of the Archbishop. He appeared in full pontifical habits, carrying his archiepiscopal cross. Of all in the assembly he was the most unmoved, bearing himself with a lofty dignity which for a time commanded respect. He was then accused of contempt in not appearing personally before the King. No other charge was preferred, the original question sinking out of sight. His plea of sickness was not admitted, and it was adjudged that he was "at the King's mercy." There was really no trial, and the judgment had been determined upon beforehand. A fine of five hundred pounds of silver was inflicted, and Becket rose to leave the council.

EXILE.

The Archbishop now requested permission to leave the kingdom, which was refused. Rumours of impending dangers reached his ears, and it was even reported that a conspiracy had been formed to take his life. It was now evident that flight was the only resource. Accordingly some preparations were hurriedly made, and with a few of his most trusty followers Becket secretly retired from the court, and succeeding in reaching Sandwich in safety, there embarked, and crossed the Channel to Flanders. The adventures of the party we have no space to deal with, nor are they necessary links for our purpose; hardship, danger, miraculous incident, colour the narratives of the journey until Becket arrives at the court of the King of France. Louis received him with every mark of distinction, not only in remembrance of a former friendly intercourse, but as an ally in the game of political hostility in which he was engaged with Henry. Proceeding afterwards to Sens, Becket was embraced by the fugitive Pope as a brother in exile, and a devoted champion of the cause of ecclesiastical supremacy. Taking up his residence at the Abbey of Pontigny, the latter then began to prepare himself for the execution of a design he had formed to punish and humiliate the impenitent Henry.

Though he had been forbidden by the Pope to use his powers, Becket had no thoughts of relinquishing his designs; on the contrary, he increased his austerities, that he might be more fitted to fulminate the Church decrees when the term of his suspension had expired. Accordingly, he rejected the food and clothing suited to his rank for the meanest of conventual fare, eating herbs and coarse victuals, and clothing himself in a rough and comfortless Cistercian dress. During the day he laboured in the fields, sparing himself no toil or hardship. At night he mortified his flesh with his nails and scourges, and it was only when his strength was utterly exhausted that he sank to rest on the cold flags of his cell.

On the 3rd June, 1166, the church at Vezelay, was crowded to overflowing; the vast assembly seemed in expectation of some extraordinary incident. In the course of the service Becket ascended the pulpit, and with scarcely a preliminary address, proceeded to excommunicate all his personal enemies, after which he condemned the Statutes of Clarendon, absolved the Bishops who had sworn to maintain these statutes, and by one all-grasping anathema placed the province of Canterbury under an interdict. He had intended excommunicating Henry, who as it happened was reported ill, and in consequence escaped with a warning. This, however, only galled the more the King's temper, which burst in violent denunciations of Becket and all who sheltered him. He threatened to seize the possessions in England of the French Benedictines if they allowed Becket an asylum in their Abbey of Pontigny, and thus the latter was forced to seek a retreat at Sens, where he remained the guest of the King of France nearly four years. In the meanwhile orders were sent to England to watch the ports and prevent the landing of persons who might be employed by Becket to publish the interdict, and it was decreed that the bearer of such an instrument if a clerk should lose his eyes and be otherwise mutilated, and if a layman should be hanged.

CLOSING THE BREACH.

An appeal was made to annul the sentence Becket had pronounced, the appellants pleading that they had published a protest in strict accordance with ecclesiastical law. This, however, was disproved, and the Primate's proceedings were confirmed, although reluctantly and after some delay. Alexander deplored Becket's haste, and entreated him to make all possible concessions,—“to dissemble, if necessary, for the present.” The truth is that the Pope had not yet reached the ark of safety, and the excommunications and interdict were dreadfully embarrassing. Henry's envoys had almost threatened to leave the Papal court in open hostility if the obnoxious bulls were enforced, and the King, who knew where to thrust with the most effect, declared he would confiscate St. Peter's pence in his dominions if his officers were not absolved and the interdict cancelled. The Pope professed his willingness to settle all disputes to the satisfaction of everybody, and appointed two cardinal legates to give effect to his professions.

They met, however, with more than their match when they represented to Becket the necessity of lowering his pretensions. He would make no concession, he would listen to no compromise; it was for the honour and glory of God that he asserted the rights of the Church, and he would not put his soul in peril to please either Pope or King. One of the Cardinals, he said, was a fool whose presence he could scarcely tolerate, Alexander was in great distress; he wrote soothing letters, and appointed other mediators, but all to no purpose. Becket received them and dismissed them, and from his vantage-ground at Sens continued to thunder anathemas at the recalcitrant prelates across the Channel.

He had succeeded in introducing the instruments of his vengeance into England, causing dismay in the ranks of the clergy. But the King had forbidden priests and laymen, under dreadful penalties, to observe the interdict, and being supported by the Archbishop of York and several of the leading Bishops, intimidated for a time the rest of the brethren. But it was only for a time; the terrors of excommunication were too great to be subdued by command or threat, and the people began to complain openly that the persecution of the Primate had brought a judgment upon the country. The King himself had not a single chaplain who was not virtually under ban, and however much he might storm, and threaten, the fact remained that his authority was diminishing. About this time he had arranged the terms of a peace with the French King, and it is believed suggested that the latter should be the umpire of his quarrel with Becket. If an accommodation could be arranged, he spoke of taking the cross; and Louis, somewhat weary himself of the dispute, assented, and invited Becket to attend a conference at Montmirail.

This was held on the 6th January, 1169, in the fifth year of Becket's exile. There seemed a fair prospect of reconciliation. Henry had moderated his demands, and Louis had counselled the Primate to make a sacrifice for the sake of peace; indeed it is believed that Becket was not himself unwilling to meet his Sovereign agreeably. But unfortunately, Herbert of Bosham, whose officiousness was irrepressible, contrived to get Becket's ear as the latter was mounting his horse to ride to King Henry's tent. “Remember,” whispered Herbert, “that if you omit the clause ‘saving the honour of God’ you shall surely repent it, as bitterly as you did at Clarendon.” This piece of gratuitous advice revived the recollection of all Becket had suffered, and he rode forth with the clause on his lips.

With a gracious greeting Henry received the Primate, declaring that he would be satisfied if Becket would so behave towards him as the holiest of the Primate's predecessors had done to the meanest of his. Becket replied that he threw himself upon the mercy of his King "saving the honour of God," which was in effect the same as the obnoxious reservation "saving his order," and so Henry understood it. In a passion he broke up the conference and left the field with Louis, without even saluting the Primate. The French King was greatly mortified, and for some time withdrew his favour from Becket, who, however, declaring himself above the favour of kings, consoled himself by fulminating more sentences of excommunication.

It must be admitted that in evading the proffer of reconciliation Becket adopted a scarcely creditable course, and it would be unfair to the King to deny that his moderation in the first instance contrasted favourably with the conduct of his opponent. At the same time there was an insecurity in accepting the King's terms without stipulating that the rights of the Church be conserved; and consequently, before we can reasonably condemn Becket's action, we should be quite sure that Henry's professions were sincere. These subsequently were put to the test by two of the Papal legates, in another attempt to bring about a reconciliation. They had succeeded so far that articles of a mutual compromise were settled and drawn up, both parties consenting. To complete the engagement the customary kiss of peace was required. This Henry refused, on the plea that he had pledged himself upon oath never to give this kiss. Negotiations were again broken off, Becket's distrust of the King increasing. Henry's refusal may have arisen from a scruple to break the letter of his vow, though it seems more likely that he was unwilling to bind himself to fulfil his engagement. At all events there was sufficient in his refusal to justify Becket's apprehensions.

The failure of all efforts to bring about a reconciliation had almost satisfied the Pope and Louis that the case was hopeless. They deplored the fatal obstinacy of the disputants, and were on the point of leaving them to fight the feud out as they chose, when it was suddenly announced that the King and Becket had met and adjusted all differences. It is believed that Henry had acted upon a hint that Becket was more dangerous abroad than he would be in England, but whether that pointed to an ulterior design is a matter of conjecture only. The accommodation, however, seemed complete. There was a tacit agreement that Becket should be free to exercise his authority and maintain the rights of his order without acknowledging or submitting to the Statutes of Clarendon. The King promised that he should be restored to his See with all its dignities and revenues, and Becket on his part engaged to serve the King in all honour and faithfulness. Thus terminated the quarrel, and in the winter of 1170 Becket returned to England and took possession of his See in triumph.

THE TRAGEDY.

It might be supposed that Becket's first duty would have been to deliver a message of peace and good-will. His reception had been magnificent, all Kent rejoicing, and the whole kingdom hailing his return with acclamation. The mood, however, in which he resumed his authority instantly extinguished all hopes of peace. Having provided himself with fulminating powers, he had scarcely landed before he published spiritual censures against the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London and Salisbury, for acts of usurpation and disobedience. Soon after he excommunicated two of the King's officers for oppressing the clergy while he was in exile. With the popular voice in his favour, he determined to punish with a high hand all who had offended him, and in a progress through the See thundered decrees and anathemas without stint. His enemies retaliated by robbing and outraging and violently opposing every attempt he made to reclaim the property of the Church.

His proceedings were represented to Henry as outrageous aggressions. The excommunicated officials raved that their souls were in peril; the hostile prelates demanded protection from the Primate's violence. Every act of his was declared a monstrous injustice, and every sentence he pronounced was represented as a defiance of the King's authority. Henry, who was in Normandy, listened amazed as the exaggerated reports and complaints of his servants were set forth artfully and fraudulently. At length the clamour and reiterated appeals provoked his anger, and stamping passionately on the floor, he exclaimed, "Of all the cowards who eat my bread, is there none to rid me of this low-born priest?" Four knights of the household, William De Tracy, Brito, Hugh de Moreville, and Reginald Fitzurse, instantly withdrew, and bound each other by oath to avenge the King's quarrel. They then secretly left the court, and travelling quickly, succeeded in reaching Canterbury late in December. Their flight, it is believed, excited the King's suspicions, for the Earl Mandeville was ordered to follow and arrest them before they could arrive in England.

There can be no doubt that Becket's conduct was rash and intemperate, but he had received dreadful provocation. Yet it would have been well had he buried the offences of his enemies in oblivion.

On Christmas Day he preached with passionate fervour from the text "Peace on earth, goodwill towards men," closing the sermon with a brief outline of a martyrdom. "There may soon be another," he added, and to the astonishment of all present he proceeded to excommunicate two barons. Raising his voice, he completed the dreadful sentence, "May they be cursed by Jesus Christ, and may their memory be blotted out of the assembly of the saints. And thus may they be extinguished." As the last word fell he dashed to the ground the candle he held.

On the 29th December, Becket had withdrawn from the dining hall to receive messengers from the King. The four knights hastily entered, and demanded the instant retraction of his late measures. His reply was an indignant rebuke for daring to intrude. A violent altercation ensued. "Come ye to murder me?" exclaimed Becket; "I defy you, and will meet you front to front in the battle of the Lord!" Calling for their arms, the knights rushed from the chamber. The gates were at once shut, and the affrighted priests gathered round the Primate, imploring him to seek a place of concealment. But he rejected all entreaties, and as the bell rang for vespers he slowly entered the cathedral. As he approached the altar of St. Benedict the knights returned and violently shook the gates, demanding admittance. The monks hesitated. "Open the gates, I command you!" said Becket; "no one shall be debarred from entering the house of God!" As he spoke the assailants plied their axes and the gates fell with a crash. The monks fled, leaving Becket and his two followers, Grim and FitzStephen, at the altar. The first to enter was Fitzurse, with sword and axe. "Where is the traitor?" he exclaimed, as a crowd of armed men followed through the doors of the cloister. "Where is the Archbishop?" "I am here, — a priest of God, but no traitor!" replied Becket. They demanded with frightful menaces that he should absolve the excommunicated Bishops. He refused, adding that it was beyond his power. Turning to Fitzurse he charged him with ingratitude. Tracy rushing forward strove to drag him from the spot. Becket shook him off, and instantly seizing him by the gorget, hurled him some distance on the pavement. Three knights then threw themselves on the Primate, and a violent struggle followed, Grim expostu-lating vehemently, and Becket standing firm, his back resting on a pillar by the altar. The object of the assassins was to kill him outside the cloister, fearing the consequences of murder near the Virgin's shrine. They struggled desperately to lift him to the shoulders of a renegade monk. At length Fitzurse, stepping back, raised his sword, and striking down Grim's uplifted arm, smote Becket on the head and shoulder. At the next blow the latter fell on his knees, the blood in streams bathing his face and dyeing his white vestment. Claspings his hands and raising his head, he cried aloud, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my soul!" In this posture he received the third blow. Like a butcher felling cattle, Breton poised his heavy axe for one moment. The Primate bowed his head, saying, "I am willing to die," and the axe fell, cleaving his skull, the body falling at the foot of the altar. The murderer then with his steel boot brutally dashed the blood and brains on the pavement.

CONCLUSION.

The murderers immediately fled, leaving the monks free to perform the proper duties. In removing the vestments they drew off the hair shirt, which was literally thick with swarms of vermin, and the body was worn and covered with the marks and bruises of severe discipline. Such extraordinary testimony of sanctity excited wonder and admiration, and the monks declared that the body was that of a saint. The news of the tragedy was received throughout Christendom with horror and execration, and Henry only averted a storm which threatened his life and throne by submission to the will of the Church. The assassins perished near Jerusalem, on a pilgrimage of expiation, and were buried before the gate of the Temple.

It is not without reluctance that we leave this outline of Becket's life. It suggests so many and varied enquiries that we would fain retrace, had space permitted, the course we have pursued. The latter passages are so discordant, so out of all harmony indeed with the earlier and middle parts of his life, that we would gladly return and dwell upon the bright and sunny scenes of his youth and Chancellorship. His ambitious views as Primate seem to have fettered his natural inclinations, and deprived him of resources and influences without which his strong will became the inflexible instrument of one all-dominating aim, ecclesiastical supremacy. And this obviously was the rock upon which his dauntless and incorruptible spirit was wrecked.

APPEARANCES AND REALITIES; THE FALSE AND THE TRUE IN LIFE.

IN times when the language of florid compliment is often found lavished, like the sunlight, on the just and the unjust alike,—when the possession of wealth is made, like charity, to cover a multitude of sins,—when material success is worshipped, and earnestness often sneered at as vulgar—in this nineteenth century, in fact, and in this civilized England—an uneasy doubt may sometimes arise whether a new Diogenes, lighting his lamp at noonday after the example of the old cynic of Athens, might not go a considerable distance, through highways and byways, before finding the Greek philosopher's Ideal Man. False standards of respectability are set up, and unreal distinctions are established. It is not that the captain's choleric word is rank blasphemy in the soldier, for that has always been so—but outward appearances are made to pass as equivalent for realities, and the witty French author who declared, "Nous sommes au siècle des quasi," was not quite wrong in his description of the century of shams, while some of his sarcasm would have applied excellently well to the British dominions. During the last decades the spread of education, increased facilities of travel, bringing men of various ranks into more frequent contact than in the old days of post-chaises and exclusiveness, and, more than all, an improved tone in the public press, have contributed to alter this for the better;—to set up the truth and throw down hypocrisy, and to instal worth and goodness in places of honour, instead of artificial and hollow proprieties. Men are less narrow in their opinions, less apt to jump at conclusions from imperfect data, like the man of whom it was written by the poet two centuries ago, that "Railing and praising were his various themes, And both, to show his judgment, in extremes." Much of this improvement is due to the works of such writers as the late Charles Dickens and William Makepeace Thackeray who laboured hard to make their readers understand the distinction between the shams and the realities of life,—to inculcate the lesson that wealth, and what is called "position," and a place in society, are not necessary to happiness, or any criterion of the solid worth of the possessor. "We were snobs," wrote Thackeray, in reference to his poorer fellow-students at Cambridge, "to refuse to take an honest man's hand because it had a Berlin glove on it;" and in his inimitable "Book of Snobs," that scathing satire on British respectability and wealth-worship, he anatomises and dissects false pretence and the mean admiration of mean things; showing how the coronation robes of George the Magnificent, upon which thousands of pounds had been spent, had come down to form part of the attraction of a waxwork show—"Admission only one shilling," says the merciless satirist; "children and snobs sixpence—go and pay sixpence."

A GREAT AND FEARLESS TEACHER OF STERN TRUTHS.

But long before Thackeray had written a line, and while Charles Dickens was still a boy at school, a powerful voice was raised, to proclaim, with no uncertain sound, what true greatness was, and what kind of men they were to whom the epithet "great" might with its true emphasis be applied—what men they are that may be considered "the highest specimens and the chief benefactors of mankind . . . that keep awake the finer parts of our souls; that give us better aims than power or pleasure, and withstand the total sovereignty of Mammon in this earth . . . the vanguard in the march of mind; the intellectual backwoodsmen, reclaiming from the idle wilderness new territories for the thought and the activity of their happier brethren." These are the men of intellect and genius. But not less vehemently was the same voice raised to demand recognition and honour for those who, with no claim to be considered pioneers, are yet content to be honest labourers in the field of human life, good soldiers serving in the ranks of the army of humanity, zealous servants faithful over a few things; and above all, this voice proclaimed and enforced in every variety of powerful argument the truth embodied in the line of Schiller, "Und ein Gott ist! Ein heiliger Wille lebt,"—that there is no such thing as chance, that "There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we will"—and that in all the various fortunes and changes of the lives of men and of nations, the hand of Divine justice and retribution is to be recognized by him who will diligently and devoutly seek for the truth. With merciless scorn, and not without a certain grim humour, the owner of that voice would drag forth some social pretence, or some favourite fetish of the times, and divest it piece by piece of its covering of falsehood, as a lecturer might unroll a mummy; and by thus despoiling it of its outward veil of respectability, he showed what a poor pitiful thing many a recognized institution was. The voice that made itself heard, and to good purpose, even amid the din and jangle of Vanity Fair, preaching the permanence and ultimate victory of truth and the certain overthrow of even the most ingeniously-constructed and universally-accepted falsehood, was that of Thomas Carlyle,—one of the truest "Worthies," of the noblest gentlemen the world has ever seen. Speaking of those men of genius who have fulfilled their mission, he says: "There is a congruity in their proceedings which one loves to contemplate; he who would write heroic poems should make his whole life like a heroic poem." And he was not one of those ungracious pastors who "reck not their own rede." His whole career, singularly complete and consistent, is a great and glorious instance of a man illustrative in his own life the precepts he inculcates;

and none ever had a better right, when the evening of that long day of persistent and valuable work had at last come, to look back with satisfaction upon the things he had accomplished.

CARLYLE'S CHILDHOOD AND EDUCATION.

Thomas Carlyle, one of the most distinguished among the literary celebrities of the Victorian era, was born in the parish of Middlebie, near Ecclefechan, in the district of Annandale, Dumfriesshire, on the 4th of December, 1795. His father, an honest dour Scotsman, upright and honourable in all his dealings, and of good repute among his neighbours. Carlyle himself, who always spoke of both his parents with great respect, and of his mother with warm affection, describes his sire as "a farmer sort of person." The house in which the future historian and philosopher was born is a plain substantial stone building, like the generality of small farmers' dwellings north of the Tweed. Carlyle more than once visited it during his latter days. The mother of Carlyle appears to have been singularly gentle, and of refined mind; so gentle, indeed, that her gifted son records how he found her precepts of non-resistance exceedingly difficult to carry out among his pugnacious fellow-pupils in the little school to which he was sent. Much of the strictness of the Puritan was mingled in the character of the elder Carlyle with the affection he bore his wife and family. Though, like the majority of his nation, fond of reading, his taste inclined to works of a theological and controversial character; fiction he eschewed altogether, and prohibited it in his family. In spite of his prohibition, however, his little son managed to get hold of the first volume of that lively and interesting, but not very delicate romance, "Roderick Random," by Dr. Tobias Smollett; and in after days Carlyle left on record the delight this work afforded him, and his regret at being unable to procure the second volume. It may be mentioned, as a coincidence, that Charles Dickens, in one of the best of his sketches, in which he gives personal recollections of his childhood, mentions the reading of "Roderick Random" as a memorable event in his childish years; and in reference to other works of the same school which he was in the habit of devouring in his earlier boyhood, wisely remarks: "Whatever harm there was in the books, was not there for me;" as indeed is the case with most books read by a child. To the pure all things are pure.

His first schooling he received in his native village. Thence he went to Annan parish school, about six miles off. His father, as a well-to-do man in his small way, and an elder of the kirk, and his mother as a woman of intellect, both had their little ambition with regard to their son Thomas, whose good abilities they did not fail to discern. Though their family was large—for the historian was one of eight children, all of whom justified the good stock they came of by turning out well—the parents managed to spare enough to give their gifted son a University education. Seventy years ago lads went to the Scottish seats of learning at an early age. Carlyle was only fourteen years old when he entered Edinburgh University.

He certainly did not acquire a very high opinion of that seat of learning as an institution for training the young intellect. In his Sartor Resartus, at a later period, he is evidently alluding to Edinburgh University when he speaks of "the worst of universities hitherto discovered out of England and Spain." Little or nothing, he says, was done by the teachers towards the real enlightenment of the students; but there was an excellent library; and given a sufficient number of books, and unlimited facilities for reading them, Carlyle was the man to educate himself with little or no extraneous assistance. "From the chaos of that library," he says in the Sartor, "I succeeded in fishing up more books, perhaps, than had been known to the very keepers thereof. The foundation of a literary life was hereby laid. I learned, in my own strength, to read fluently in almost all cultivated languages, on almost all sciences and subjects." Again, he observes, with regard evidently to Edinburgh, though the remark ostensibly refers to the Academia of the learned Professor Teufelsdröck: "Had you any, where in Crim Tartary walled in a square enclosure, furnished it with a small ill-chosen library, and then turned loose into it eleven hundred Christian striplings, to tumble about as they listed from three to seven years; certain persons, under the title of professors being stationed at the gates, to declare aloud that it was a university, and exact considerable admission fees; you had, not indeed in mechanical structure, yet in spirit and result, some imperfect resemblance of our High Seminary." And here, at the outset of his career, we notice one of the most valuable of Carlyle's qualities,—one that contributed in a most important degree to his literary success, and which he himself has designated, without any reference to himself, as a characteristic of genius,—the faculty of taking an enormous amount of trouble. No student of his works can fail to be impressed with the vast amount of Carlyle's information, the almost infinite variety of his reading, the splendid perseverance with which he seeks out truth for himself, wading through piles of volumes, if necessary, to verify a fact, and never accepting the testimony of a single witness where two or more can be obtained. By the help of a most powerful and retentive memory, he laid during those years at Edinburgh the foundation of the materials afterwards worked up in the wonderful essays with which he astonished the reading and thinking world.

Already at Annan Carlyle had been noted for excellence in mathematics, a branch of learning to which the master of the school devoted especial attention. At Edinburgh he further developed his ability in this direction. But he never became a classical scholar, in the sense of a man thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the great authors of Greece and Rome. It has been remarked that in his works he seldom used a classical quotation, or illustrated a scene or an event by reference to classical sources. Homer seems the only one among the ancients who rouses him to anything like enthusiasm, and allusions even to this poet are rarely found in his works.

DOUBTS AND DIFFICULTIES; CARLYLE A SCHOOLMASTER AT KIRCALDY.

It had been the wish of his parents that the University course should be a preparation for entering the ministry; but already at college Carlyle appears to have had doubts as to his vocation for the work. The national creed was not altogether his creed. "I was not sure that I believed in the doctrines of my father's kirk," he himself says. And indeed he describes himself as at this time going through a crisis of doubt and striving in religious matters, that reminds us of a passage in the life of the author of "The Pilgrim's Progress," tormented by "phantasms dre," by miserable doubts, and unholy impulses to scoffing. Convinced that he could not be a minister, he turned his attention for a time towards becoming a schoolmaster. For two years he taught mathematics at Annan, and afterwards pursued the same employment in Kircaldy, the "town wi' the street as lang as a Covenanter's grace." He had here one friend, whose acquaintance he had already made as a boy in 1809, before his University days—Edward Irving, who afterwards became first famous, then notorious, as the founder of a peculiar sect, and whose undoubted genius was destined to be miserably wrecked. Carlyle himself, in his Miscellanies, afterwards drew a painful contrast between the appearance of his early friend, when he first saw him radiant with joy and health, the gainer of many prizes, and the centre of many hopes, and his look when the friends met for the last time in London, shortly before Irving's death. "Friendliness still beamed in his eyes," says Carlyle, "but now amid unquiet fire; his face was flaccid, wasted, unsound; hoary as with extreme age; he was trembling over the brink of the grave. Adieu, thou first friend," adds the philosopher, "adieu, while this confused twilight of existence lasts! Might we meet where twilight has become day!"

EDINBURGH; A LITERARY APPRENTICESHIP; GERMAN LITERATURE; TUTORING.

It was partly at the instigation of Irving that Carlyle took up his residence at Kircaldy, where his friend was teaching in a school at the time. Carlyle stuck to the work, which, however, was not at any time congenial to him, for two years, and then proceeded to Edinburgh, leaving behind him in the long town somewhat the reputation of a "Plagiosus Orbilius." The Scottish mothers, not an exaggeratedly soft-hearted race, are said to have been indignant at the unmistakable rigour and severity of his discipline. He then betook himself to Edinburgh, at that time in the height of its fame as the Athens of the north. Jeffery and Lockhart, and the great "wizard of the North," Scott himself at that time the most jovial and genial of men, in the heyday of prosperity and honour, were among the many who, with the brilliant Sydney Smith and the indomitable Brougham, had contributed to the literary glories of the northern capital; and it is perhaps fortunate that Carlyle, on determining to devote himself to writing as the task of his life, should have begun his work there; for he certainly found Caledonia stern and wild a meeter nurse for the rugged poetry that was hidden within him, than the "stony-hearted stepmother"—as De Quincey with bitter reason called London—would probably have been. He was not long in procuring employment for his pen. The "Edinburgh Encyclopedia" was then coming out, under the editorship of Sir David Brewster, who, quickly discovering the ability of the persevering young scholar, employed him to write sixteen articles for the work. The majority of these contributions were biographical notices, including lives of Montaigne, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, the great Earl of Chatham and his son, William Pitt, Montfaucon, Montesquieu, Dr. Moore, and Sir John Moore. The non-biographical articles were on the Netherlands, Newfoundland, Norfolk, Northamptonshire, and Northumberland. They represent the period of the illustrious author's apprenticeship to literature, and give evidence of thoroughness, of careful preparation of his subject, and of the wide and varied range of reading which was, at a later period, to give such peculiar value to his works. "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," was already the maxim of Thomas Carlyle.

It was at this period also that he devoted much time to a pursuit destined to become the foundation on which much of his later success was built—the study of the German language and literature. In England, in 1820, it was hardly known that Germany possessed a literature at all. Coleridge had certainly translated Schiller's Wallenstein, and the unerring eye of Scott had detected the weird and characteristic charm to be found in Bürger's ballads; but, in general, British authors and readers were alike ignorant on the subject; and the miserable Kotzebue, with his flippant stage wit and mawkish sentimentality, the scoffer and sneerer, a man without a spark of generous feeling in his nature, the paid spy of Russia, and the willing tool of the anti-national and reactionary party in Germany, was actually looked upon as a representative writer; while the names of Lessing and Richter were unknown, and even Schiller and Goethe were only vaguely acknowledged to be clever men of an eccentric turn of mind, and very difficult to understand. It was reserved for Carlyle to introduce the great German authors and their works worthily to English readers and thinkers; and if, in after times, he received a full and ungrudging meed of honour and praise from Germany, it was not a whit more than he had rightfully and laboriously earned. A translation of Legendre's "Geometry and Trigonometry," with a prefatory article by himself on "Proportion," formed another of his tasks at this time; and, like all that he undertook, was ably and carefully executed, afterwards receiving the praise of no less an authority than Professor De Morgan, who declared it to be "a thoughtful and ingenious essay; as good a substitute for the fifth book of Euclid as could be given in speech." During these first years of his literary activity the young author earned little; indeed, the £50 received for the Legendre book was looked upon as exceptionally liberal remuneration. But he was laying up a glorious stock of knowledge for future use; he was getting to see more and more clearly the opportunities for usefulness that lay in the distance before him. Above all, he had already taken a high and manly view of the duty and responsibility of every man who aspires to direct the thoughts of his fellow-men. "He was not above writing for bread, doing what he called 'honest journey work,' not of his own seeking; but he would never write down to the popular taste, or utter the thing he did not believe, for the sake of popularity or profit. With him there was no compromise, no shadow of equivocation or faltering. His honest northern spirit rose indignantly against any shuffling or concealment; and many a polite subterfuge with which time-serving orators and writers strove to evade a difficult subject, was by him pronounced in his strong, vehement, earnest energy 'a lie against God's truth.'" Like Chaucer's good parson, "first he wrought and afterwards he taught." That splendid congruity between doctrine and practice which he looked upon as the highest characteristic in the lives of men of genius was nobly exemplified in his own.

An important change now occurred in his career. His friend, Edward Irving, had gone to London, where he had made the acquaintance of the Buller family. A tutor being required for young Charles Buller, the son of the house, Irving took the opportunity of recommending Carlyle, who accepted the trust, and fulfilled it in a manner that earned for him the lasting gratitude of his pupil; whom he prepared for Cambridge in so thorough a manner that Buller, an amiable and accomplished youth, always attributed his success at the University to the unwearied exertions of his instructor. Carlyle himself used afterwards to deplore the early death of Buller, to whom he became affectionately attached, as a calamity; declaring that the young man, had he lived, would have achieved great things. Even after Buller had begun his brief but brilliant Parliamentary career, his old tutor kept up a correspondence with him, watching his career with hopeful interest. It was during this first residence in London that Carlyle's first important book appeared: a work destined to have a great and enduring influence on the study of German classical literature in England—"The Life of Schiller."

THE "LIFE OF SCHILLER."

Carlyle had been introduced to the brilliant circle who worked on the London Magazine, under the editorship of John Scott; a very miscellaneous publication, comprising such diverse elements as the criticisms of Hazlitt, the charming "Elia" essays of Charles Lamb, the learning of Carz, and the flippant pseudo-eclecticism of Janus Weathercock, "light-hearted Janus," as good-natured Charles Lamb called him, until one day that light-hearted gentleman was arrested and lodged in Newgate, accused of a series of the most cynical and fiendish crimes ever laid to the charge of a miserable criminal, and stood revealed in his true colours as Wainewright, the poisoner. To this London Magazine, in 1823 and 1824, Carlyle contributed his life of Schiller. It at once attracted general attention, and was afterwards printed separately in a complete form. Carlyle himself always undervalued it, as indeed he was apt to do where his own productions were concerned. In later years, when a fresh edition of the book appeared, with additional chapters embodying new information on Schiller and his family, he spoke of the work, in the preface, as "this somewhat insignificant book," and declared that he only re-published it because certain booksellers "of the pirate species" were preparing to do so for their own benefit. The work is a thoughtful and scholarly account of the life and productions of a much-tried genius. "Reading maketh a full man," said Bacon, himself one of the "fullest" men the world has produced; and in this work, so lightly esteemed by its author, the thoroughness and the scholarly deliberation of the writer are apparent in every page. The critics of the day, even the best of them, had what Pope calls "the itching to deride, and needs would be upon the laughing side"—hurried work, spiced with flippancy, and too frequently showing a "malignant, dull delight" in scarifying the author, on whose work they professed to pass fair and impartial judgment. Not so Carlyle. Any intending reader of Schiller, or any one who has read that poet's works, will here find a thoroughly sympathizing biographer, one who has read and studied his author completely, who has pursued Schiller's career step by step, watching with eager and appreciative kindliness how that bright genius matured gradually, like generous wine, and how the doubts and perplexities of anxious youth gradually passed away, to be succeeded by a worthy, honoured, and fruitful manhood. Each work of Schiller, from that first chaotic effort, replete with genius and with blunders, The Robbers, to the grandly simple and heroic tragedy of William Tell, is brought before us in due order; the author's intention, the circumstances under which the work was written, the merits and faults of the composition, and its characteristic features, are succinctly and yet graphically stated. In a few pages the reader is furnished with the clue by which he can find his way through the work without danger of missing its meaning. The commentary on Wallenstein, with the sketch of the character of that strange, ambitious adventurer, is in itself enough to ensure permanent vitality to the book. The style, too, is grave, calm, and balanced, without any striving after sensation, or attempt to startle the reader by paradox. And the effect produced by the whole is healthful and pleasing, the lesson set forth from beginning to end being the salutary one that by persistent effort the worst fortune may be conquered, and that true happiness is to be found in the performance of duty. In Schiller, Carlyle found a man after his own heart, a true man, impressed with the dignity of his calling, too self-respecting to truckle to dukes and princes, too plain and simple in his habits to care for wealth, but punctiliously jealous concerning all that could affect his good name, and anxious that each successive work should be his best.

AMENITIES OF LITERATURE; CARLYLE AND HIS CRITICS.

No one could find fault with the "Life of Schiller;" but the case was very different with Carlyle's next German venture, a translation of Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre." This strange piece of biography, in which some of Goethe's own experiences are interwoven, the portraits of the hero's parents especially being drawn from life, startled English notions of propriety not a little, and brought the critics like hornets about the ears of author and translator alike. Jeffrey, of the Edinburgh Review, like Thais in Alexander's feast, "led the way, to light them to their prey;" and De Quincey, like Macedonia's madman, "seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy." Jeffrey's review begins with the fiercest denunciation. He is going to hew down, root and branch, this upas-tree of immorality and error, which he condemns "after the most mature consideration," as "eminently absurd, puerile, incongruous, and affected . . . almost from beginning to end one flagrant offence against every principle of taste, and every rule of composition." There is, however, as much virtue in Jeffrey's almost as in honest Touchstone's if; before he gets to the end of his slaughterous task, the critic has evidently changed his opinion, and finds it difficult to prove his case. "On the whole," he concludes, "we close the book with some feeling of mollification towards its faults, and a disposition to abate, if possible, some part of the censure we were impelled to bestow on it at the beginning." In these days there is a ludicrous effect in a critic allowing, if possible, that there may be some slight merit in a work of Goethe. De Quincey, in the London Magazine, also attacked Goethe savagely, and the translator came in for a share of the castigation. Blackwood, on the other hand, praised the work in a patronising way, and congratulated that "young gentleman," the translator, on his "very promising debut." Maginn's criticism at a later period was the unkindest cut of all, for he roundly complained that Goethe had been transferred "from the Fatherlandish dialect of High Dutch" (whatever that may have meant) "to the Allgemeyne Midlothianish of Auld Reekie."

But Carlyle persevered. Tieck, Hofmann, Richter, and various other writers of the Fatherland, were represented in his "German Romance," published in 1827; and he had ultimately the satisfaction of vindicating the genius of the German writers in the eyes of the British public, and of removing in some measure the prejudice that could see nothing but "mysticism," transcendentalism, and a host of other incomprehensible "isms" in all the productions of Germany.

MARRIAGE; LIFE IN EDINBURGH; RESIDENCE AT CRAIGENPUTTOCH.

In former days Carlyle had been introduced by his friend Edward Irving to a Dr. Welsh, of Haddington, to whose only daughter, Miss Jane Welsh, he had been tutor. Dr. Welsh, a lineal descendant of John Knox, and a man of cultivated mind, had been exceedingly anxious that his only child should be solidly educated; and the little lady having warmly and practically seconded his wishes by beginning the study of the Latin grammar on her own account in secret, the accomplished young schoolmaster had been secured, that the child's cleverness and zeal for learning might not be lost for want of cultivation. Grave, quiet Carlyle found favour alike in the eyes of parents and child; and in 1826, eight years after his first introduction to Miss Welsh, he married her. Never was man more fortunate in the momentous question of his life. Carlyle could not have made a better choice, or have found a helpmate more thoroughly capable of appreciating his genius, and more fitted to aid him with sympathy and counsel, doubling the joys of his career and smoothing away its griefs by faithful companionship; for there were trials to endure before the well-earned success came; and sometimes even Poverty showed his threatening face at the door, though in this case at least the cynical proverb was not verified; for he never caused Love to fly out at the window. For forty years the faithful wife stood by Carlyle's side, enjoying the calm evening with him as she had cheered him at his toil, and borne a share of the burden and heat of the day. The end came at last quite unexpectedly. While her husband was absent in Edinburgh, to the Rectorship of whose University he had been elected the year before, and whither he had gone to deliver an address to the students, Mrs. Carlyle suddenly died, in London, while driving in the park. The depth of grief felt for her loss by the bereaved husband, who sorrowfully declared that all the brightness was gone out of his life, was further exemplified by the epitaph he caused to be inscribed on her grave at Haddington. "For forty years," says the touching record, "she was the true and loving helpmate of her husband, and by act and word unweariedly forwarded him as none else could in all of worth that he did or attempted."

During the first period of their married life, they lived in Edinburgh, where they made many friends, to the great improvement of Carlyle's literary position; for it was impossible to be in his company, and listen to his talk, replete with wisdom and learning, and brightened by a quaint humour whose raciness was increased by his broad Doric dialect, without feeling conscious that this was no ordinary man. But, presently, Carlyle thought it well to withdraw from the bustle and turmoil of the capital, with its society and distractions, to some quiet Patmos, where he might muse in solitude over some grandest labour than the "honest journey work" of German translations, in which he had been lately employed. Such a Patmos, fortunately for him, lay ready to his hand. Mrs. Carlyle had inherited in Dumfriesshire the small estate of Craigenputtoch. It was a lonely place enough. Sydney Smith, in describing his isolated position in his first Lincolnshire living of Foston le Clay, speaks of himself as ten miles distant from a lemon. The occupants of Craigenputtoch were much in the same condition, though Edinburgh was within attainable distance, and Dumfries not much more than fifteen miles off.

For six years Carlyle lived with his wife at Craigenputtoch; and these years were of immense importance in their influence on his subsequent career. The place was but a farm, and the physical outlook was bleak enough; but the moral prospect was better. The possession of this little place at any rate raised the occupants above all fear of actual want; and the husband was relieved from the carking cares inseparable from the necessity of providing for the day that was passing over him. He had leisure to think—to mature his ideas until they became beliefs and convictions—to fill that capacious mind of his with fresh stores of knowledge; to compare, mentally to experimentalise; to allow the material one day to be built up into edifices of knowledge, to become seasoned and thoroughly fit for use.

One great event of this period of his life, an event upon which he frequently looked back with natural gratification, was his pleasant epistolary intercourse with Goethe. The intellectual giant of Germany was living out the late evening of an existence already extending to close upon fourscore years in the classic Weimar, the Athens of the Fatherland. So deeply had he been impressed with what Carlyle had done for the literature of his country, that he had superintended the translation of the Life of Schiller into German, that it might appear with the prestige attached to his great name.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH GOETHE.

A letter from Carlyle to Goethe at this period gives a vivid picture of the life at Craigenputtock, and also of the writer's literary strivings and aspirations. He says to his illustrious correspondent:—

"You inquire with such warm interest respecting our present abode and occupations, that I am obliged to say a few words about both, while there is still room left. Dumfries is a pleasant town, containing about fifteen thousand inhabitants, and to be considered the centre of the trade and judicial system of a district which possesses some importance in the sphere of Scottish activity. Our residence is not in the town itself, but fifteen miles to the north-west of it, among the granite hills, and the black morasses, which stretch westward through Galloway, almost to the Irish Sea. In this wilderness of heath and rock, our estate stands forth a green oasis, a tract of ploughed, partly enclosed and planted ground, where corn ripens and trees afford a shade, although surrounded by sea-mews and rough-wooled sheep. Here, with no small effort, have we built and furnished a neat, substantial dwelling; here, in the absence of a professional or other office, we live to cultivate literature according to our strength, and in our own peculiar way. We wish a joyful growth to the roses and flowers of our garden; we hope for health and peaceful thoughts to further our aims. The roses, indeed, are still in part to be planted, but they blossom already in anticipation. Two ponies which carry us everywhere, and the mountain air, are the best medicines for weak nerves. This daily exercise, to which I am much devoted, is my only recreation; for this nook of ours is the loneliest in Britain, six miles removed from any one likely to visit me. Here Rousseau would have been as happy as on his island of St. Pierre. My town friends, indeed, ascribe my sojourn here to a similar disposition, and forbode me no good result. But I came hither solely with the design to simplify my way of life, and to secure the independence through which I could be enabled to remain true to myself. This bit of earth is our own; here we can live, write, and think, as best pleases ourselves, even though Zoilus himself were to be crowned the monarch of literature. Nor is the solitude of such great importance, for a stage-coach takes us speedily to Edinburgh, which we look upon as our British Weimar. And have I not, too, at this moment, piled upon the table of my little library, a whole cart-load of French, German, American, and English journals and periodicals—whatever may be their worth? Of antiquarian studies, too, there is no lack. From some of our heights I can descry, about a day's journey to the west, the hill where Agricola and his Romans left a camp behind them. At the foot of it I was born, and there both father and mother still live to love me. And so one must let time work.

"But whither am I wandering? Let me confess to you I am uncertain about my future literary activity, and would gladly learn your opinion concerning it; at least pray write to me again and speedily, that I may feel myself united to you.

"The only piece of any importance that I have written since I came here is an 'Essay on Burns.' Perhaps you never heard of him, and yet he is a man of the most decided genius; but born in the lowest ranks of peasant life, and through the entanglements of his peculiar position, was at length mournfully wrecked, so that what he effected is comparatively unimportant. He died in the middle of his career, in the year 1796. We English, especially we Scotch, loved Burns more than any poet that had lived for centuries. I have often been struck by the fact that he was born a few months before Schiller, in the year 1759, and that neither of them ever heard the other's name. They shone like stars in opposite hemispheres, or, if you will, the thick mist of earth intercepted their reciprocal light."

LITERARY ACTIVITY; "SACTOR RESARTUS."

Ralph Waldo Emerson, then a young man, now known in England chiefly by his "Representative Men," a work in which the influence of Carlyle is plainly visible, also made his way, not by letter, but personally, to the wilds of Craigenputtoch. He describes the author of the "Life of Schiller" as tall and gaunt, with a clifflike brow, self-possessed, and holding his extraordinary powers of conversation in easy command; clinging to his northern accent with evident relish; full of lively anecdote, and with a streaming humour that floated everything he looked upon. Thus he dubbed a road leading to the site of an enterprise that had failed "the grave of the last sixpence," called Blackwood "the sand magazine;" and when a genius was praised over much would dryly vaunt the talents of "his pig," and relate how that astute quadruped had, by the mere force of innate ability, circumvented and utterly defeated every attempt of the inferior intellect of his proprietors to keep him within the bounds of his own domicile, &c. &c. sty.

A number of essays, chiefly for the Edinburgh Review, in which the splendid one on Burns stands foremost, formed part of the work achieved by Carlyle during the Craigenputtoch period; and here, as in all his literary activity, the thoroughness of the man, the faculty for taking an immense amount of trouble, is everywhere apparent. No haste, no flippancy, no striving to catch and hold the reader's attention by ingenious devices. The writer goes on, pounding away at his subject, heaping proof on proof, argument on argument, speaking as one who has thought out the subject, and has come to a definite conclusion, which conclusion he has to impart to his readers in the most direct and vigorous way. Thus his style reflects his thought, and is not to be imitated. It reads like the rough, strong language of a man talking to another, to whom he is anxious to make clear, in as few words as may be, some subject on which he himself feels strongly. Thus when he wants to overthrow some deeply-rooted error, he wields his literary axe with the power of a giant dealing "Stroke on stroke,

Like the blows of a lumberer felling an oak."

As he valued other men, for what they had to say and teach, and not for their way of saying it, so it was the matter, and not the manner, about which he busied himself in his own works. A man who feels strongly is nearly sure to express himself strongly; and this was the case with Carlyle, whose rugged, powerful diction was the natural reflex of his strong original mind.

He had now, in the retirement of his Scottish home, prepared a work with which he made a pilgrimage to London, in 1832. He called it "Sartor Resartus." Speaking in the person of a certain Professor Diogenes Teufelsdröck, he put forward the transcendental idea of Fichte, according to which all outward things and created beings, including mankind, are to be considered as garments or clothes, beneath which, mostly unsuspected and unknown, is hidden the "divine idea." Diogenes Teufelsdröck is an honest-hearted worker, with keen aspirations for good, and a no less keen appreciation of the degeneracy of the times, when Mammon is set up as the brazen image before which men are to fall down in worship, and worn-out rags and shreds and patches of exploded fallacies of false respectabilities are put forth as substantial garments, wherein a man may wrap himself from the storm. Teufelsdröck is in fact Carlyle, and his "Life and Opinions" are to a great extent an autobiography of the author of "Sartor," wherein the reader may trace the conflict through which that great spirit passed, before the conviction was attained that, spite of all stumbling and error, there are some traces of the higher, nobler nature in man:—

"There are longings, yearnings, strivings
For the good they comprehend not,
That the feeble hands and helpless,
Groping blindly in the darkness,
Touch God's right hand in that darkness,
And are lifted up and strengthened."

Out of the chaos of doubt and despondency comes forth at length the belief that the one good thing in this world is work; duty to be done without hope of reward or recognition, but for its own sake, and because it is right to do it.

Carlyle sought in vain for a publisher for his "Sartor Resartus," in London. The "tasters" who sat in judgment on manuscripts offered were bewildered by the novelty of style, thought, and diction in the book, and pronounced against it, one after another, and the author carried his manuscript back with him to his northern home.

Carlyle now considered that the time had come for a permanent move southwards. For the larger works he contemplated, access to a good library was an indispensable requisite; and the death of his father severed one of the bonds that had bound him to Scotland. Accordingly, not long after Emerson's visit in 1833, he and his faithful helpmate came to London, and took up their abode in the modest three-storied house in Cheyne Row, in which they remained for the rest of their lives, and which procured for Carlyle the epithet of the philosopher of Chelsea. His abode became in its way as noted as that retreat on the Lake of Geneva, whence for a series of years Voltaire continued to launch his literary arrows at all that for good or evil had held sway over the religious susceptibilities of men. But what a difference between the two men: Voltaire the scoffer, content to pull down; Carlyle, with the old Puritan spirit strong within him, labouring to build up the true; yet wherever he had considered it necessary, ready with unsparing hand to hew down the false.

A GROWING REPUTATION; A ROUGH TONGUE AND A GENTLE HEART.

"Sartor Resartus" could find no publisher in its entire form; but the editor of Fraser's Magazine, seeing farther into the book than those who pronounced it the work of a man of genius gone mad, found room for it; and thus it appeared under the auspices of "Oliver Yorke." The separate instalments excited great interest and attention in America; and it was from across the Atlantic that the popular voice first proclaimed that a prophet had arisen in Israel. The chief source of strength in the work is in the tremendous earnestness of the writer. He thoroughly believes everything he asserts; he carries the reader with him, using various devices of picturesque word-painting, of effective grouping of characters and incidents, of nicknames and strange new-coined words, startling enough to the hearer, some of them, but all replete with common sense and frequently with grim humour. And those who had the wit to read between the lines could see in this rough, vituperative, scolding denouncer of the manners and customs of his time, this scoffer at "respectability that keeps a gig" and carefully whitens the outside of the sepulchre, a gentle kindly nature, a philanthropist with a sharp tongue, a man who while he railed in good set terms at his century, and the great majority of its works, and most of the things that belonged to it, had yet infinite tenderness for everything that was true and honest. He might sarcastically describe the British Empire as inhabited by so and so many millions of people, "mostly fools;" but with these beings, whom he looked upon as ignorant and deluded, he had yet warm sympathy, and was none the less a benevolent teacher for calling a spade a spade, and declaring that every sham was an acted lie. Leigh Hunt understood him, though the two men were as different as two men both anxious to promote the cause of truth against falsehood could well be. "I believe," says Hunt, "that what Mr. Carlyle loves better than his fault-finding, with all its eloquence, is the face of any human creature that looks suffering, and loving, and sincere." The very fierceness of his invective against wrong and fraud springs from his sense of the amount of human suffering they inflict.

"THE FRENCH REVOLUTION;" HISTORY FROM A NEW ASPECT.

A new and grand era in the life of Carlyle opens with the publication, in 1837, of the "History of the French Revolution." And not only a new era in the life of Carlyle, but in the method and style of writing history. How those readers must have been startled who had derived their notions of historic style from the pages of Gibbon and Hume and Robertson! Here was the story of a tremendous cataclysm, a fearful and terrible retribution upon persistent and impenitent wrong-doing, told with splendid eloquence and energy by one whose unwearied industry had mastered every detail of a period of wild excitement and feverish tension, when every day was replete with thick, thronging events, when one woe did tread upon another's heels, and the grief of an hour old did hiss the speaker. With consummate skill the reader is carried along through the wondrous narrative, as though the events were passing before his eyes, while the eloquent commentator at his side seems to explain to him the cause and the meaning and relative importance of each. The very commencement at once arrests the attention, which never wanders afterwards. For Carlyle summons his reader to the death-bed of the miserable debauchee whom the flattery of a servile court, with unconscious but bitter irony, called Louis the Well-beloved. In 1744, the King, then a young man, around whom centred many hopes,—for human nature is hopeful to the last, and even the French in the eighteenth century believed that a just monarch might even yet make his people happy,—had been seized by a malady that threatened to cut short his life. And there were manifestations of grief in Paris, and services held in the churches, and general supplication for the restoration of the Sovereign's health, that seemed to be sincere and heartfelt. And since that day thirty years had gone,—and again Louis is lying sick to death; it is 1774, the year with which Carlyle's narrative opens. "But in how altered circumstances now! Churches resound not with excessive groanings; Paris is stoically calm; sobs interrupt no prayers, for, indeed, none are offered, except priests' litanies, read or chanted at fixed money-rate per hour, which are not liable to interruption. The shepherd of the people has been carried home from little Trianon, heavy of heart, and been put to bed in his own chateau of Versailles; the flock knows it, and heeds it not. At most, in the immeasurable tide of French speech (which ceases not day after day, and only ebbs towards the short hours of night), may this of the royal sickness emerge from time to time as an article of news. Bets are doubtless depending, nay, some people 'express themselves loudly in the streets.' But for the rest, on green field and steeped city, the May sun shines out, the May evening fades, and men ply their useful or useless business, as if no Louis lay in danger."

Thus with the picture of the "father of the people" dying in the midst of a people profoundly indifferent to his fate, the grand prose poem opens. It is an epic this history, with a greater subject than Achilles' wrath or the anger of the fierce Juno; for it treats of nothing less than the vengeance of Heaven upon the wicked. We see all the horrible selfishness, the polished cruelty, the ineradicable bon-ton frivolity. The distant muttering of the storm is heard, the rack is climbing the sky from the horizon; but the feasting and the dancing, and the solemn pretence of government, which in reality is only grinding and extortion, go on day after day and year after year. The poor are starving; there are signs and portents such as were seen in Rome when the wicked ten bare sway of whom Appius Claudius was the worst, and when the "whispers and dark frowns and breaking up of benches and girding up of gowns," gave token of the overthrow that was to come. But the privileged classes are deaf and blind. The spring display at Longchamps is as brilliant as ever, the dresses were never finer nor the silks more bright, nor the variety and splendour of the lackeys' liveries more admirable, as the fashionable world rolls onward through the Bois de Boulogne in its gilt coaches. So rolls and dances the profession," says the historian, "steady of firm assurance as if it rolled on adamant and the foundations of the world, not on mere heraldic parchment, under which smoulders a lake of fire. Dance on, ye foolish ones; ye sought not wisdom, neither have ye found it. Ye and your fathers have sown the wind, ye shall reap the whirlwind. Was it not from of old written: The wages of sin is death?"

Upon this text the whole is written; that as the lives of some men foreshadow certain ends, and will assuredly come to those ends in time, unless something happen, in God's providence or mercy, to arrest their course, so will the lives of nations have at last the consummation towards which their good or evil course has been directed. Carlyle sees the Divine Hand in history from beginning to end. "Be not deceived," he seems to be continually crying, "God is not mocked; for whatever a nation soweth, that shall it reap."

How the scenes of the great drama are unfolded before the reader, each linked with the preceding and the succeeding one, and yet with its own distinct individuality; how in the multitude of characters thronging upon the crowded stage, each one has its individuality fixed by a few masterly touches; how the dauntless Mirabeau, the audacious Danton, the fiery Camille Desmoulins, the loathsome villain Marat, with the poor negative-minded King, "Monsieur Veto," the heroic Charlotte Corday, the cold sinister Robespierre, each and all are indelibly stamped in the memory of the reader! But the highest triumph of the author's genius is won where he has to chronicle and describe the outbursts of the volcano that had so long been smouldering in France beneath the feet of the well-to-do classes; when, for instance, he tells the story of that tremendous day when with "a cry as if the Volscs were coming o'er the wall," the angry people flew to arms, and buried the hopes of despotism beneath the ruins of the Bastille.

A MISFORTUNE BRAVELY BORNE; PUBLIC LECTURING; "HEROES AND HERO-WORSHIP."

One memorable circumstance connected with this splendid literary achievement gives it an additional value, as evincing the indomitable perseverance of the author. The manuscript of the first volume had been completed, with what expenditure of toil and thought those who have perused the completed work can alone imagine, when the author lent the precious volume to his friend John Stuart Mill, who lent it to another friend, Mrs. Taylor, for perusal, before placing it in the printer's hands. The lady seems to have left the volume about, and an uninquiring housemaid, taking it to be a worthless bundle of paper, used it for lighting fires—and Carlyle had not a copy!

His proceeding on the occasion was characteristic. After recovering from the first shock of the news, he determined to clear his mind, as it were, by flooding it with fiction before sitting down once more to the delineation of truth. For weeks, he says, he read nothing but novels, including those of brave Captain Marryat, to whom, by the way, he is a little unjust. Holding up his hands, as it were, in amazement at the absurdity of "Japhet" and "Snarley-yow," he, in his gruff way, dubs Marryat "the man that wrote stories about dogs that had their tails cut off, and about people in search of their father," adding, "It seemed to me that of all the extraordinary dunces that had figured upon this planet, he must certainly bear the palm from every one, save the readers of his books." This is hard measure to mete out to the author of "Peter Simple," "Jacob Faithful," and the "King's Own," in whose works there are many useful and practical hints connected with his own profession, to which he was, in anything but the ironical sense indicated by Carlyle, an "extraordinary ornament." However, the course of novel reading cleared the cobwebs out of the historian's brain, and he sat down manfully and wrote his first volume over again.

It was at this period that Carlyle appeared for a time in the character of a public lecturer, his first series of lectures, "On German Literature," being delivered at Willis's Rooms in 1837; the last, "On Heroes and Hero Worship," at a literary institution in Edward's Street, Portman Square, in 1840. The two intervening series, also delivered in Edward's Street, were on "The History of Literature" and "The Revolutions of Modern Europe." These lectures were looked upon as a literary event in each season during the period of their delivery, and attracted crowded audiences, among whom were many celebrated literary men. The lecturer's first intention was chiefly to read his address to the audience, and accordingly he had provided himself with a number of notes; but in a very short time he found these encumbering and embarrassing him; and, to the great satisfaction of his audience, and, perhaps, equally to his own, he put his notes entirely aside, and spoke to his attentive hearers out of the fulness of his heart and brain. He was himself impressed with the universal interest called forth by his lectures, and by the evident respect with which they were listened to. Browning, Bunsen, Macready, Crabb Robinson of the Times, Leigh Hunt, and a host of other celebrities, literary, diplomatic, artistic, and miscellaneous, sat at the feet of the rugged Scotch Gamaliel, who, with his broad Doric accent, his flashes of humour, his grim earnestness, and his frequently startling and always novel theories, kept them entranced from the first word of his discourse to the last. Bunsen, a man eminently qualified to form an opinion on such a subject, says: "As for Carlyle's lectures, they are very striking, rugged thoughts, not ready made up for any political or religious system; thrown at people's heads, by which most of his audience are sadly startled." Leigh Hunt appears to have been less startled and more delighted than the learned German, for we find him writing in the Examiner: "He again extemporises; he does not read. We doubted, on hearing Monday's lecture, whether he would ever attain in this way the fluency as well as the depth for which he ranks among the celebrated talkers in private; but Friday's discourse relieved us. He strode away like Ulysses himself, and had only to regret, in common with his audience, the limits to which the hour confined him."

The series "On Heroes and Hero-worship," certainly the most startling, was also the most effective of the four series. Carlyle boldly put forth the great men of the world as those appointed by nature and the eternal fitness of things to achieve the great tasks of the world, and to be not only pioneers of society, but leaders of men; and claimed for them an inherent right to respect and obedience, amounting to worship, on the part of the community. "What man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the history of the great men who have worked here," says the lecturer. Though many were inclined to dispute the point, and argue in favour of the results produced by diffused and individual action, there were not two opinions as to the value of the pictures he drew of the lives and characters of various heroes, and of the deep yet sparkling criticism in which the addresses abounded. And it was amid a universal expression of regret that the lecturer, feeling perhaps out of his element in the fierce light that beats upon the throne of the public teacher, declared that he would no more choose this form of making known the lesson he had to speak.

A CONGENIAL SUBJECT; CARLYLE TELLS THE TRUTH ABOUT OLIVER CROMWELL.

In 1845 a very remarkable book proceeded from his pen, a work that would in itself have sufficed to secure his place as a great and original genius among writers, if he had produced nothing else. It was entitled "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, with Elucidations." There is a tradition to the effect that Carlyle's mother, a woman of far more than average capacity, had in his youth imbued him with the idea that the famous Lord Protector of England had not had justice done to him by English historians; and, indeed, there can hardly be anything more grotesquely contradictory than the representations given of him by those whose works were accepted for almost two hundred years as giving a truthful view of Cromwell and his deeds. Smollett, for instance, ascribes to him attributes that can hardly have existed in the same man, declaring his character to have been an amazing conjunction of enthusiasm, hypocrisy, and ambition; and going on to describe him as "cruel and tyrannical from policy, just and temperate from inclination, ridiculous in his reverses, respectable in his conduct,—one of the most amazing conjunctions of villainy and virtue, absurdity and good sense, to be met with in the annals of mankind."

This time-honoured piece of historical injustice Carlyle set himself to undo. With the patient and unremitting industry that gives a solid value to all his works, he investigated every transaction in which the Protector had taken a part, and proved from authentic documentary evidence how persistent calumny had misrepresented and slandered a great man. In the preface to the book, he tells in his outspoken, straightforward way, of the task he has undertaken, and the trouble and pains he has taken to fulfil it worthily. "The authentic utterances of the man Oliver himself," he declares, "I have gathered from far and near; fished them up from the foul Lethæan quagmires where they lay buried. I have washed, or endeavoured to wash, them clean from foreign stupidities,—such a job of buckwashing as I do not long to repeat,—and the world shall now see them in their own shape." No previous work of the author had come upon the public with such an effect of surprise, in the way of shaking to its foundation, and, indeed, utterly overthrowing a structure of accepted notions and preconceived ideas. Nothing could be more different from the "red-nosed Noll" of the cavaliers, the half-mad buffoon of the accredited historians,—though, according to Smollett, this buffoon unaccountably "maintained the distance and dignity of his character in the midst of the coarsest familiarity"—and the great leader of men who now stood revealed to the minds of the astonished readers. Macaulay has told us how the Protector desired young Lely the artist to paint him as he was; characteristically adding that if the limner left out the blotches and wrinkles from his face he would not pay him a shilling. Now at length the unerring justice of time had righted the wrong of many generations, and it was generally felt that the great central character of the most momentous epoch of English history stood revealed to the world in his true character: that in his life and actions recorded by Carlyle, as in his personal presentment by Lely, he at last appeared before posterity as he was. The work accordingly became the object of much controversy and of great and general interest,—a fact evidenced by its rapid and extensive sale, as recorded by the author, with expression of surprise in his preface to the second edition. Beyond the great interest attaching to the subject, and its value as a piece of historical biography, the work has great value for the elucidatory details it contains; and some of the finest word-pictures ever produced by Carlyle are to be found in its pages; among others, the account of the fight at Dunbar, on September 3rd, the famous Protector's "great day," and ultimately that of his death.

That such a work—so happily conceived and so completely executed—should have excited the energies of many imitators was to be expected. Various historical characters, notably the Chancellor Francis Bacon, and Graham of Claverhouse, have been treated in a similar manner, with a view to obtain a reversal of the sentence passed upon them by the opinion of mankind; but in no case with the success achieved by the biographer of Cromwell.

CARLYLE AS A POLITICIAN.

Already before this time he had begun to set forth, in a series of political treatises, his views concerning the political condition and prospects of England. His anticipations were frequently, indeed generally, of a sufficiently gloomy kind. In "Chartism," which had appeared in 1833, and afterwards in the "Latter-day Pamphlets" published some years subsequently to "Past and Present," the burden of the song is everywhere the same; the author has not the slightest faith in the methods taken in his day to cure the evils of society, and looks upon the race of social reformers generally as amiable enthusiasts or conceited pedants, talking a jargon that has no definite meaning, busying themselves with schemes that can effect no permanent cure, and letting things drift towards chaos, while they complacently trot out their various hobbies for the admiration of mankind. The pessimism of the sage of Chelsea increased as the burden of years weighed more heavily upon him; and even his best friends and greatest admirers stood aghast sometimes at the fierceness of his denunciations and the bitterness of his scorn. And yet, in many instances, subsequent experience has proved that, for all the apparent harshness of his strictures, the denouncer of nostrums and crotchets was in the right. Thus he was one of the first to lift up his parable against the absurd and irrational system of criminal-petting that came into vogue shortly before the middle of the century. He describes a visit to a model prison, notices the elaborate arrangements for the comfort and well-being of the felonious denizens, and unequivocally expresses his opinion that a cart-whip flourished over their backs would be a more natural and rational method of procedure than coddling and conciliation. He looks at the West Indian colonies, reduced from productiveness to bankruptcy by the emancipation of the negroes, and his expressed opinion indicates and unhesitatingly declares that whereas it is the Divine command that man should labour for his bread in the sweat of his face, so it is the manifest destiny of "Cuffee" to wield the shovel and the hoe under the superintendence and, if necessary, the stimulating whip of the white man. Some of his papers read like the violent talk of a vehement, passionate man, declaiming against wrongs whose very existence touches him deeply, and against impostors whom his soul loathes. Here and there manifest contradictions are encountered; and it has been frequently objected to his writings on political and social questions, that Carlyle is far more ready at pointing out an evil or an abuse than at suggesting a remedy. But, on the other hand, it may be urged that the pointing out of an error or an abuse and the indication of its probable consequences is in itself a service quite apart from the consideration of the means by which the abuse or the error is to be remedied; and Carlyle did yeoman's service by the scathing ridicule with which he covered unpracticable theories, and the persistency with which he declared that great social wrongs and misfortunes were not to be cured by a formula, or great masses of men made wise and good by an Act of Parliament. Solvitur ambulando cannot be said of a great national question; and a sentiment will not reform a nation, or any amount of talk about "Christian philanthropy and other most amiable-looking but most baseless and, in the end, most baneful and all-bewildering jargon." In the political works of Carlyle, though the manner is often bewildering, the matter is throughout full of strong common sense. If the writer seems to have too little hope of improvement for the country in which he sees so much to lament for, it must be remembered that the very earnestness of his nature inclined him to take a grave view of many matters that prosperous men are too much in the habit of forgetting. One golden truth appears over and over again in these works, insisted upon with necessary and wholesome reiteration,—that improvement must be gradual, that men must be prepared by better education, by training in habits of self-control, and by the practice of industry, before any permanent raising of the masses of the people can be reasonably expected; that every real reform must not only be reasoned out, but worked out, and that nothing is more fallacious than a formula.

With all his tendency to think deeply and despondently on great social questions, and his denunciation of fiction in literature as in actual life, he was not without appreciation for what was really good in that department. We read of him in Forster's "Life of Dickens" as one of the goodly company of literary worthies, including Jerrold, Dyce, and the biographer himself, who met to hear Dickens, on a flying visit from Italy to London, read the proof-sheets of his Christmas book, "The Chimes." A sketch by Maclise, who was one of the party, has immortalized the gathering; and Carlyle is represented, with his thoughtful face, one of the most attentive of the party. He also read Dickens's works as they came out in numbers; and Forster describes the gratification and amusement of the author of "David Copperfield" when, during the time that work was appearing, on his asking Carlyle how he did, the sage of Chelsea replied, in the words of Mrs. Gummidge, that "he was lone and lorn, and everything went contrairy with him."

THE CROWNING WORK, "FRIEDRICH II."

A far more arduous and laborious task than even that of telling the story of the French Revolution was undertaken by Carlyle, when, at past fifty-five years of age, he sat down to write the history of Frederick the Great. This work he evidently intended to be the crowning effort of his life, as Humboldt with his "Cosmos." The subject grew upon him as he proceeded in his work, and no less than fifteen years were devoted to its completion. He fitted up a room in his house, in which he worked, with a complete library of books bearing upon the history of the Prussian King. There were more than two thousand volumes, besides a number of portraits and battle scenes, that helped to keep the hero before the mind of his biographer. There could hardly be a more uninviting mass of literary material than the farrago of memoirs, diaries, correspondence, despatches, and documents innumerable through which the writer had to wade, to get at the truth concerning that wonderful Prussian court, with its strength and its coarseness, its great schemes and its little selfishnesses, of which the picture is given in the "Life of Frederick II." Carlyle himself said that he would hardly have undertaken the task had he known the difficulties it would entail; but having once put his hand to the plough, he was not the man to look back. As a piece of literary and historical biography, it is a marvel of completeness and of patient and resolute work. But the author's best friends doubted whether it might not have been improved by condensation; a huge volume of seven hundred goodly octavo pages has to be got through before the reader comes to the commencement of Frederick's reign. Then, again, do what he would with his hero, the author could not quite represent him as a character after an Englishman's own heart. Deeply and truly as he admired him, as a reality in a century of shams, Carlyle seems to have been almost doubtful here and there about the stern, selfish, cold-hearted man he was describing; and this lurking doubt must have increased the irksomeness of his laborious task. "No satisfaction in it at all; only labour and sorrow. What had I to do with your Frederick?" was his observation to Varnhagen von Ense; and that somewhat satirical personage seems to have echoed the thought with a mental "What, indeed?" And this was already in 1858, and the great task was not finished till seven years later. One exceedingly good thing the author has done in the first volume. He has done justice, and perhaps more than justice, to the memory of that very energetic but rough-mannered king, Frederick William I., the father of Frederick the Great; showing that, whatever that heavy-fisted monarch's mode of procedure may have been, his nature was not, as Macaulay describes in his famous essay, "hard and bad." All the particulars of the quarrel with the Crown Prince, and that miserable family intrigue that almost drove the fiery old autocrat out of his senses, are minutely set forth. On the conduct of the King in persisting inexorably in taking the life of Katte, the accomplice of the Crown Prince in his intended flight, the author is silent, being on the whole exceedingly favourably disposed to the energetic, hard-working king, as decided a reality in his way as his celebrated son. Where many would see cruelty, he sees only inexorable justice; severe in itself, but beneficent in its effects, in the prevention of crime for the future. After telling the story of the wretched stripling, who was done to death on the ramparts of Custrin, wearing, "by order, a brown dress, exactly like the Prince's," a significant hint to the royal prisoner who, according to the literal order of the King, was to have been brought from his prison room to see poor Katte die,—having told all this with the accuracy of a faithful historian, Carlyle proceeds: "Never was such a transaction, before or since, in Modern History, cries the angry reader, cruel like the grinding of human hearts under millstones, like—or, indeed, like the doings of the gods, which are cruel, though not that alone! This is what, after much sorting and sifting, I could get to know about the definite facts of it. Commentary, not likely to be very final at this epoch, the reader himself shall supply at discretion." In the working out of the details, the amount of trouble taken by the author is simply admirable. He travelled to Germany to visit the field of Leuthen, near Breslau; that of Zorndorf, where Frederick beat the Russians on that grim day when quarter was neither given nor asked; Mollwitz, where Frederick fought his first battle, and was absent from the field when victory was announced; Liegnitz, where, after a long interval of disaster, fortune smiled once more upon him; and the various other spots connected with great events in the king's life; visiting the Berlin museum also, with the sole object of seeing the actual uniform worn by Frederick. His hand has not lost its skill in drawing character-portraits of statesmen, generals, and the inhabitants of court and camp generally. We have Wilhelmina, the coarse, kindly, shrewd, warm-hearted sister of Frederick, afterwards Margravine of Bayreuth, drawn to the life; the old king (thus called and thought of though he was only fifty-two when he died); the old Prince of Dessau, hard as steel, but with tears in his eyes, when his dying master, taking leave of him, bids him choose a horse as a keepsake, and corrects his choice when the warrior, in the confusion of his spirits, chooses the worst,—these, with all the chief characters of that queer, clever, and somewhat close-fisted community, form such a gallery of foreign historical portraits as we have not to show elsewhere in England. It is a complete picture of Germany and its government in the last century. But the style is not everywhere satisfactory; indeed, the mannerisms which are already noticeable in the "French Revolution," rendering some parts of that masterly work difficult of comprehension, have here increased, until some portions of the book seem written in a kind of shorthand, like notes jotted down for subsequent elaboration. Sometimes a strangely crabbed passage follows one whose plain Saxon style refreshingly reminds us of the great master's earlier manner, as in the following instance. The scene is the death-bed of Frederick William I. :—

THOMAS CARLYLE.

"He had remembered that it was the season when his servants got their new liveries. They had been ordered to appear this day in full new costume: 'O vanity! O vanity!' said Friedrich Wilhelm at sight of the ornamented plush. 'Pray for me! pray for me! my trust is in the Saviour!' he often said. His pains, his weakness, are great; the cordage of a most tough heart rending itself piece by piece. At one time he called for a mirror, that is certain; rugged, wild man, son of Nature to the last! The mirror was brought; what he said at sight of his face is variously reported: 'Not so worn out as I thought,' is Pöllnitz's account, and the likeliest; though perhaps he said several things 'Ugly face,' 'As good as gone already;' and continued the inspection for some moments. A grim, strange thing."

No style could be more clear than this; but the next paragraph is strangely in contrast. It runs: "No Baresark of them, nor Odin's self, I think, was a bit of truer human stuff; I confess his value to me, in these sad times, is rare and great. Considering the usual Histrionic, Papias-Digester, Truculent-Charlatan, and other species of Kings, alone attainable for the sunk flunky populations of an Era given up to Mammon and the worship of its own belly, what would not such a population give for a Friedrich Wilhelm to guide it on the road back from Orcus a little? 'Would give' I have written; but, alas, it ought to have been 'should give.' What they 'would' give is too painfully plain to me, in spite of ballot-boxes; a steady and tremendous truth from the days of Barabbas downwards and upwards." In these few words we see indicated much of the later creed of Thomas Carlyle. He believed in absolute government by an energetic, practical, and resolute king, as the only kind of rule worth having. He hated the mean worship of mean idols, such as wealth; and he had a profound disbelief in the efficacy of ballot-boxes or reform bills to do away with, or even greatly to mitigate, the evils of the time.

Whatever drawbacks and imperfections may be found in it, "The Life of Friedrich II." is a grand and noble production, and is worthy to close the life-work of a great man.

One of Carlyle's minor works, worthy of mention as having been prompted by affectionate remembrance and the wish to perpetuate the memory of a dead friend, is the "Life of John Sterling." Various conjectures have been expressed as to the reason why Carlyle should have thought it necessary to furnish a new record of a somewhat uneventful life, that had already been chronicled by Archdeacon Hare. It seems he considered Sterling had not been treated with full justice in Hare's biography, and wished his friend to appear to the world in the best light. The service he thus rendered to Sterling has been aptly compared to that rendered by Milton to young Mr. Edward King, whom the poet immortalised in "Lycidas."

CARLYLE LORD RECTOR OF EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY; CONCLUSION.

Soon after the completion of his great work, Carlyle was put in nomination for the honourable office of Lord Rector of the University of Edinburgh, and was elected by a large majority, though his opponent was the Right Honourable Benjamin Disraeli, afterwards Earl of Beaconsfield. In 1866 he travelled northward to receive the honours of inauguration. Many friends present on that day, including Professors Huxley and Tyndall, have borne witness to the enthusiasm which greeted the grand old man who had been a poor student of that university half a century before. It was told how, true to his theory of his little value of titles, he had refused the degree of LL.D. that was offered him; how, before addressing the eager audience of students and strangers, he quietly divested himself of the rectorial robe they had put upon him, and stood up, a plain, homely figure, somewhat bent by age and toil, to utter the thoughts that arose within him.

While he was receiving the meed of well-earned honour, the great misfortune of his life fell on him; for he returned to London to find his wife dead. For him the end was not to be until fourteen more years had elapsed.

At times the strong old spirit flashed up, as when in 1867 he sturdily gave the world his views on the new Reform agitation, of which he entirely disapproved, in an article with the suggestive title, "Shooting Niagara, and after?" In 1870 he spoke out in the columns of the Times on the Franco-Prussian war, denouncing as vigorously as ever what he considered a "sham"—namely, the loudly-expressed sympathy with France, which ended in words. His noble life-work had been very completely finished before the secret longing that had filled his soul for years was accomplished at last, and the merciful summons came for him to that still country where, as he, in fulness of faith and strong belief, had declared, "At last we and our beloved ones shall be together again." It was on the 5th February, 1881, that this grand British worthy died.

INTRODUCTORY.

IF we except the Apostles, no body of human beings ever set so deep a mark on the face of society as the heroes of the Reformation; and if there be any value or meaning in history at all, the lives, the acts, and the characters of such men as they were can be matters of indifference to none of us.

John Calvin was one of the most conspicuous of these eminent Reformers; and it is his career that we propose to trace in the following pages.

As the founder of Calvinism, he possesses a singular interest. His creed has been declared by modern enlightenment to be harsh and unreasonable; but it has had wonderful attractions in past times for some of the greatest men that ever lived.

Though often branded as a creed of intellectual servitude, Calvinism has been able to inspire and sustain the bravest efforts ever made by man to break the yoke of unjust authority. "When all else has failed," says Mr. Froude; "when patriotism has covered its face and human courage has broken down; when intellect has yielded, as Gibbon says, with a smile or a sigh, content to philosophize in the closet and abroad worship with the vulgar; when emotion and sentiment, and tender, imaginative piety have become the handmaids of superstition, and have dreamt themselves into forgetfulness that there is any difference between lies and truth, the slavish form of belief called Calvinism, in one or other of its many forms, has borne ever an inflexible front to illusion and mendacity, and has preferred rather to be ground to powder like flint than to bend before violence or melt under enervating temptation."

The career of the first exponent of such a creed, and the characteristic nature of the doctrines he taught, are surely well worth looking into.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

John Calvin was born on the 10th of July, 1509, at Noyon, in Picardy, where his father, Gerard Calvin, was by trade a cooper. His mother, whose maiden name was Joanne Lefranc, was the daughter of an inn-keeper.

The father was a man of considerable sagacity and prudence; and on this account enjoyed the esteem of the leading men in the district. His wife possessed considerable personal attractions, and added to these the graces of a vivid and earnest piety. Their family consisted of four sons and two daughters: John was the second son.

His parents being of respectable character but in humble circumstances, young Calvin, who had early shown a pious disposition, was taken under the protection of a family of wealth in his native place, and sent by them to the University of Paris to study for the Church. He was entered as a pupil in the College de la Marche, under the regency of Mathwin Cordier, better known, perhaps, by his Latin name of Corderius. It was under this distinguished master that Calvin laid the foundation of his wonderful mastery of the Latin language. Even at this early period of his life, he was distinguished by the extraordinary activity of his mental powers, and the great severity of his manners. His companions, it is said, surnamed him the "Accusative."

At the age of twelve, he obtained from the bishop a benefice in the Cathedral of Noyon, to which, about five years afterwards, was added the care of Monteville. This he, however, exchanged two years afterwards for the care of Pont l'Évêque. All this time he was pursuing his studies, and had not even received priest's orders.

His father now changed his mind as to the destination of his son, and desired him to turn his attention to the law, as the sure road to wealth and honour. This change was not unacceptable to Calvin, who, from his perusal of the Scriptures, — a copy of which was furnished him by Robert Clavetan, who was a fellow-scholar, and likewise a native of Noyon, — had already brought before him many of the errors of the Romish Church. We can hardly say yet that his traditional opinions were unfixed, or that he had embraced with any decision the Protestant opinions that were spreading everywhere; but the seeds of the new faith were now, beyond doubt, sown in his heart.

He accordingly left Paris, and repaired first to Orleans, where he studied under Peter Stella. Speaking of his life at Orleans, Beza says "that he led a life of rigorous temperance and earnest studiousness." After supping moderately, he would spend half the night in study, and devote the morning to meditation on what he had acquired. His undue habits of study seem to have laid thus early the foundation of the ill health which marked his later years.

ADOPTING THE DOCTRINES OF THE REFORMATION.

The doctrines of the Reformation were now beginning to be widely diffused throughout France. Twelve years had elapsed since Luther had published his Theses against indulgences — twelve years of intense excitement and anxious discussion, not in Germany alone, but in almost all the adjacent kingdoms. In France there had not as yet been any open revolt against the Church of Rome; but multitudes were lending a friendly ear to the Reformed doctrines, and a few were in secret rejoicing in having heartily embraced them. To such Calvin united himself when at Orleans.

He now proceeded to Bruges, where Andrew Alciat filled the Chair of Law, and where, also, which was important to Calvin's future character, Milchior Wolmar, the Reformer, taught him the Greek tongue. Here Calvin was confirmed in the doctrines of the Reformation, and began, indeed, to preach them in the villages. Such was his popularity, that he soon found it even oppressive.

"Before a year had elapsed," says he, speaking of his conversion, "all who were desirous of a purer doctrine were in the habit of coming to me, though a novice and a tyro, for the purpose of learning." Beza tells us that he not only fortified the few believers who were in Orleans, but, by his preaching in the neighbourhood, wonderfully advanced the Kingdom of God in many families, among whom he specifies that of the lord of Lignières, who, with his lady, heard with approval the new doctrines.

In taking part in this work, Calvin seems to have gone contrary to his own inclinations, and to have made a sacrifice to an overwhelming sense of duty. "By nature," he says, "somewhat clownish, I always sought the shade and ease, and would have preferred some hiding-place; but this was not permitted, for all my retreats became like public schools." Nor were his addresses marked by any of the enthusiasm which usually belongs to the young reformer. "He taught the truth," says Beza, "not with affected eloquence, but with such depth of knowledge and so much gravity of style, that there was not a man who could hear him without being ravished with admiration."

IN PARIS; PERSECUTION.

His father, however, dying at this time, he returned to Noyon, but, after a short period, went to Paris. Paris at this date had become a centre of the "new learning," under the teaching of Lefevre and Farel, and the influence of the Queen of Navarre, sister of Francis I. Even the Sorbonne had not escaped the infection. There was a growing religious excitement in the University, in the court, and even among the bishops. This, however, was not to last. The King was soon stirred up to take active measures to quell this rising spirit.

Persecution was soon busy among the adherents of the Reformed Faith; many were put to death; and the meetings of the congregations were held secretly, in the midst of dangers and alarms. Calvin preached in these assemblies with zeal and energy; and by way of a plea for toleration, he, in 1532, published, with a commentary, the work of a heathen philosopher—Seneca's treatise De Clementia. This first of his literary works, however, was little noticed, and had nothing of the effect at which he aimed.

The following year, Cop, the Rector of the University of Paris, having occasion to read public discourse on the festival of All Saints' Day, Calvin persuaded him to declare his opinions on the new doctrines. This brought upon them both the indignation of the Sorbonne and Parliament, and they were forced to leave the city. The story is, that Calvin narrowly escaped, having descended from his window by means of his sheets, and fled, under the guise of a vinedresser, a friend of his, in whose clothes he concealed himself.

His lodgings, however, were searched, and his books and papers seized, to the imminent peril of some of his friends, whose letters were found in some of his repositories.

Calvin went, in the character of a fugitive, to several places, and at length to Angoulême, where he got shelter in the house of Louis Du Tallet, a canon of Angoulême, and supported himself some time there by teaching Greek. It was here he composed the greater part of his "Institutes," which were published about two years afterwards.

The Queen of Navarre, sister to Francis I., having shown him some favour on account of his learning and abilities, and, no doubt, also of his sufferings, he returned to Paris, in the year 1534, under her protection.

His object in going back to the capital was to meet Michael Servetus, a Spanish physician, who had begun to vent some novel opinions, and had invited him to a disputation or conference. Servetus, for some unknown reason, failed to keep his appointment; nor did the two meet until after an interval of many years, and in very different circumstances.

Persecution, however, was again threatened, and he quitted France the same year, having first published a work to confute the error of those who held that the soul remained in a state of sleep between death and the resurrection.

In this book he chiefly dwells upon the evidence from Scripture in favour of the belief that the intelligent consciousness of the soul is retained after it leaves the body. Questions of philosophical speculation are passed by, as tending, on such a subject, to gratify only an idle curiosity.

Before quitting France, he stopped for some time at Poitiers. Here many gathered round him, desirous of instruction; and in a grotto near the town he celebrated for the first time the communion in the Evangelical Church of France, using a piece of rock as a table. From this time forward his influence became supreme; and all who had imbibed or become tinged with the Reformed doctrines in France, turned to him for counsel and instruction, attracted not only by his power as a teacher, but still more, perhaps, because they saw in him so full a development of the Christian life according to the Evangelical model.

PUBLICATION OF THE "INSTITUTES."

He retired to Basil in Switzerland, where he published the "Institutes," which he dedicated to Francis I. in an elegant epistle. The design of the "Institutes" was to exhibit a full view of the doctrines of the Reformers; and as no similar work had appeared since the Reformation, and the peculiarities of the Romish Church were attacked in it with great force and vigour, it immediately became highly popular. It soon went through several editions; and has since been translated into all the principal modern languages. Its effect upon the Christian world has been so remarkable as to entitle it to be looked upon as one of those books that have changed the face of society.

Some obscurity overshadows the early history of the "Institutes." It has been disputed whether it first appeared in French or in Latin. The likelihood is that it first was issued in French, for the dedication in that language is dated 1st of August, 1535, whilst the earliest Latin edition appeared in 1536. Of the edition of 1535, however, no copy is known to exist; the first French edition with a date being that of 1540; but this was after several editions in Latin had been published.

The "Institutes," as they originally appeared, consisted of only six chapters, and were intended merely as a brief manual of Christian doctrine. It appeared anonymously, the author having, according to his own statement, no object in view but that of furnishing a statement of the faith of the persecuted Protestants, whom he saw cruelly cut to pieces by impious and perfidious court parasites.

In this work, though produced when the author was only twenty-five years of age, we find a complete outline of that theological system which has since borne his name. In none of the later editions, nor in any of his later works, do we find reason to believe that he ever changed his views on any essential point from what they were at the period of its first publication. Such an instance of maturity of mind and of opinion at so early an age would be remarkable under any circumstances; but in Calvin's case it is rendered peculiarly so by the shortness of the time which had elapsed since he gave himself to theological studies. It may be doubted also if the history of literature presents us with another instance of a book written at so early an age which has exercised such a prodigious influence on the opinions and practices both of contemporaries and of posterity."

The preface addressed to the King of France is often to this day spoken of as one of the most famous prefaces that the world has seen. It is unquestionably a very remarkable performance; but it is wanting in a Christian spirit, and much more likely to have provoked the King than to have converted him.

AT FERRARA.

After the publication of this great work, Calvin went to Italy to visit the Reformers there, and was received with marked distinction by the learned Duchess of Ferrara, daughter of Louis XII.

This duchess was a zealous partizan of the Reformation. She had been a Lutheran, but about this time embraced the opinions with which the name of Calvin began to be associated.

A treaty which was soon after concluded between the Duke and the Pope dispersed the refugees whom religion had attracted to Ferrara, and Calvin repaired for the last time to Noyon, in order to dispose of some property which had fallen to him by the death of his elder brother. As he does not mention in any of his published letters that he at this time visited the graves of his parents and wept over them, one of his biographers takes occasion to expatiate on his want of all natural affection!

AT GENEVA.

It was now Calvin's intention to settle at Basle; but as the direct road through Lorraine was shut up by war, he was obliged to make a circuit by Geneva. On this circumstance the whole of his after history was to turn.

As to the revolutions through which Geneva had passed, we must say a few words. During several centuries the actual princes had been a line of bishops, who acknowledged the Counts of Geneva as their liege-lords. In 1401, the rights of the Counts were transferred to the ducal house of Savoy, which endeavoured also to obtain possession of the temporal authority of the bishops. These became in time the creatures of the Duke of Savoy; and hence it is easy to understand that many of the leading citizens were ready to welcome the Reformation as a help towards shaking off a foreign dominion.

The first reformer of Geneva was William Farel, a native of Dauphiny, born in 1489. He was a man of intense religious zeal ; but it was untempered by discretion or charity. He is described as a little man, with a vulgar face, a narrow forehead, a pale complexion, and two or three tufts of an ill-combed red beard ; but whose fiery eye and expressive mouth announced a more remarkable character than his general appearance seemed to indicate.

The new doctrines were introduced into Geneva, and soon prevailed over all opposition. The Bishop was expelled, the religious houses were suppressed, images and altars were destroyed, and in August 1536, the Reformed Faith and a Republican Government were formally established.

Matters had advanced thus far when Calvin arrived at Geneva in the summer of 1536.

At first, Calvin's object seems to have been to devote himself quietly to studious research, as we have said, and to make his residence, not at Geneva, but at Basle. He was just the man, however, to suit the energetic plans of Farel ; so Farel entreated him, on his arrival at Geneva, to relinquish his design of going farther, and devote himself to work in that city. Calvin at first declined, giving as an excuse his need of securing more time for personal improvement, which could not be obtained were he engaged in ministerial work.

This excuse would not do for Farel ; it seemed to him just a pretext for indolence. " I tell you," he continued, " in answer to this pretence of your studies, in the name of Almighty God, that if you will not devote yourself with us to this work of the Lord, the Lord will curse you as one not seeking Christ so much as himself."

Startled by this plain-speaking, and feeling as if God had laid His hand upon him to detain him, Calvin agreed to remain.

Farel was at this time the most distinguished person in the place ; he was twenty years older than Calvin, who was in the twenty-seventh year of his age ; but their objects were the same, and their learning, virtue, and zeal alike ; and these were now combined for the complete reformation of Geneva, and the diffusion of its principles throughout Europe.

The relation of Farel and Calvin to each other is very remarkable. Thus far the Reformation of Geneva had been the work of Farel. But he felt the ascendancy of his junior's mind ; he at once yielded him the precedence, and through all the after period of their long connection, looked up to him with reverence. Calvin, on the other hand, esteemed his elder colleague for the warmth of his zeal, for his indefatigable labours, for his unshrinking courage, and his power of popular oratory. He was not blind to his faults, but he felt his value.

Calvin was at once appointed teacher of theology in Geneva ; and in the following year, 1537, he accepted the office of minister. He seems at first to have given his services in Geneva gratuitously, for in February 1537, there is an entry in the City Registers to the effect that six crowns had been voted him, " since he has as yet hardly received anything."

In the month of November, a plan of Church government and a confession of faith were laid before the public authorities for their approval. Beza makes Calvin the author of these productions ; but others, with perhaps greater reason, attribute them to Farel. There is little doubt, however, that Calvin was consulted in their composition, and still less that he lent his powerful aid to secure their sanction and approval by the people in the month of July, 1537. The same year the Council of Geneva conferred on Farel the honour of a burgess of the city, in token of their respect and gratitude.

The citizens were summoned in parties of ten each to profess and swear to this condensed statement of Christian doctrine as the confession of their faith. This process is certainly not in accordance with nineteenth century ideas as to the best way of establishing men in the faith ; but it was gone through, Calvin tells us, " with much satisfaction."

A DIFFICULT TASK ; EXPELLED FROM GENEVA.

To be a religious leader in Geneva was not an easy task in those days. The citizens, it is true, had cast off the yoke of Rome, but they were still " but very imperfectly enlightened in Divine knowledge ; they had as yet hardly emerged from the filth of the Papacy."

Till recently they had indulged in an almost unbounded license. They loved dancing and music in the open air. The doors of numerous wine shops lay open, and in rainy weather, or to those whose dancing days were over, offered, in addition to liquor, the stimulus of cards. Numerous holidays released the tradesmen to seek recreation in the most agreeable form. Masquerades and other mummeries were frequent ; and, above all, a wedding was the source of supreme excitement.

All this was now rudely changed. The clergy, in their zeal to effect a moral revolution, frequently overstepped the bounds of discretion, and confounded what was really innocent in the same anathema with what was fundamentally vicious. Cards and dancing, plays and masquerades, were absolutely prohibited. All holidays, except Sunday, were abolished, and that was observed with the strictness of the Jewish Sabbath. Marriage was ordered to be solemnized with as little show as possible. Instead of the joyous fête it had hitherto been, it was converted into a purely religious ceremony, and sanctified by a sermon. If the bride or her companions adorned themselves in a fashion contrary to what was evangelized, they were punished with imprisonment. The citizens were strictly enjoined to attend the sermons, and to be at home by nine o'clock in the evening.

But the popular will was not prepared for the severe discipline of the Reformers; and in a short time the people resisted some innovations on their religious practices, and, under the direction of a faction, met in a public assembly, and expelled Farel and Calvin from the place.

AT STRASBURG.

Calvin repaired to Berne, and then to Strasburg, where he was appointed Professor of Divinity and minister of a French church, into which he introduced his own form of Church government and discipline.

While at Strasburg, Calvin also published a treatise on the Lord's Supper, in which he combated the opinions both of the Roman Catholics and Lutherans, and at the same time explained his own views of that ordinance. Here, too, he published his "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans."

But while his reputation was daily on the increase, he was oppressed by the cares of poverty. His stipend was small, and one attempt at least to obtain an addition to it was unsuccessful. Such were his necessities, that he was obliged to sell his library—the very last resource of every scholar.

Calvin got acquainted with Castellio during his residence at Strasburg, and procured for him the situation of a regent at Geneva; and it was during his stay in this city that, by the advice of his friend Bucer, he married Idellet, the widow of an Anabaptist preacher, just deceased.

It was not in his nature to be romantic, even in love; and here is his list of requisites in a wife: "The only beauty that entices me is that she be chaste, obedient, patient, and that there be hopes that she will be solicitous about my health." In Idellet, to use his own words, Calvin found "the excellent companion of his life," a precious help to him amid his manifold labours and frequent infirmities. She died in 1549, to the deep sorrow of her husband, who never ceased to bewail her loss. It would seem that the lady brought her husband some property; at all events we hear no more of his poverty.

In the meantime, disorder and irreligion prevailed in Geneva. This led Sadolet, the Bishop of Carpentras, to attempt the restoration of the papal supremacy in the district; but his design was completely frustrated by Calvin, who, though exiled from his flock, kept a watchful eye over their interests. He penned such a reply to the letter which the bishop had addressed to the Genevese, as constrained him to desist from all further effort.

Calvin seems to have maintained intercourse with Geneva by writing letters of comfort and advice to the faithful there, who continued to regard him with affection. Whilst he was still in Strasburg, there appeared at Geneva a translation of the Bible into French bearing his name; but it was really only revised and corrected by him from the version of Clivetan.

RECALLED TO GENEVA.

Ere long the way opened up for his return to the post from which he had been driven. In November of the same year, he and Farel were solicited by the Council of Geneva to return to their former charge in that city; in May, 1541, their banishment was revoked; and in September following, Calvin was received into the city amidst the congratulations of his flock, Farel remaining at Neuchâtel, where he was loved and respected.

A house and garden were provided for Calvin by the State. The situation commanded a magnificent view of the Leman Lake and its background of mountains; but to such beauties the Reformer was utterly indifferent. His salary was fixed at fifty dollars, with twelve strikes of corn and two casks of wine. The givers regarded this as a handsome allowance. Calvin was neither greedy nor luxurious, and, in addition to his wife's income, found it sufficient for his wants.

CALVINISM IN PRACTICE.

Calvin entered on his work at Geneva firmly resolved to carry out those reforms which he had originally proposed, and to establish in all its integrity that form of Church policy which he had carefully matured during his residence at Strasburg. He now became the sole directive spirit of the Church at Geneva.

The time had come for realizing that system of a Church which had long possessed his mind, and had already been set forth in the "Institutes." A Church he had defined as existing "wherever the Word of God is sincerely preached and heard, and the sacraments administered according to Christ's ordinance." The jurisdiction of the Church he held to be independent and exclusive in things purely spiritual; but he laid it down as an undoubted Scriptural principle that all men are bound to submit to the established civil government, and that spiritual liberty may very well consist with political servitude.

"We may perhaps," says one writer, "be surprised to find such a doctrine proceeding from the patriarch of puritanism. There was, however, a reserve of the case in which the command of the magistrate should be contrary to the will of God; and although this exception contemplated only a passive refusal of compliance, it appears that Calvin looked on complacently when his followers in France afterwards extended its application to armed resistance or rebellion.

"In the Church were appointed the offices of preacher, doctor, deacon, and lay-elder. The institution of episcopacy was denied; but Calvin did not object to the government of bishops in States differently constituted from his own little republic; and he himself, during his lifetime, exercised a more than episcopal authority in Geneva.

"The government of the Church was vested in a consistory, composed of six ministers and twelve lay-elders. According to the constitution of this body, one of the syndics was to be the president; but Calvin soon contrived to secure the presidency for himself, retained it throughout his life, and offered to bequeath it to his friend Beza. The consistory met weekly, and took cognizance of doctrine and morals. Exclusion from the Lord's Table was the highest punishment which this tribunal could of itself inflict. When spiritual punishments were insufficient, the offenders were handed over to the civil court, and there dealt with in no gentle way."

In addition to all Calvin's labours in regulating the Church, he was employed to draw up a code of civil law; and here the law which he had acquired at Orleans and Bruges was turned to account. The joint object of the civil and the spiritual legislations was to establish a theocracy on the ancient Jewish model.

Calvin's system, however, was more severe than that of Moses. Its punishments were generally heavier; it inflicted death more frequently, and substituted more terrible for milder modes of execution.

All manner of merriment was sternly put down. It was criminal to celebrate any of the abolished festivals, or to offer children for baptism after the names of popish saints. Some young persons were excommunicated for playing a twelfth-night game. Men were imprisoned for reading Amadis de Gaul. Unchastity of every shade was sternly punished. All kinds of blasphemy were visited with heavy penalties; and it was considered a blasphemy to speak against the foreigners who had taken refuge at Geneva for the sake of religion. Parental authority was enforced with great severity. One child was beheaded for striking his parents, and another was condemned to death for a mere attempt to strike his mother, and with difficulty escaped the extreme penalty.

Witchcraft was zealously sought out. Within some sixty years, no fewer than a hundred and fifty were put to death for this crime. Spies or watchmen were established, charged to report to the consistory all breaches of discipline; and it may be easily believed that this institution became subject to great abuses. There was an annual visitation of every house in the city; not a quiet pastoral call, but a solemn inspection of the family by a minister and a lay-elder, with an inquisition into the habits of the members. To this was added, in 1550, a system of catechizing from house to house.

Attendance at sermons was rigidly insisted on. To laugh during a sermon was a matter which drew after it three days' imprisonment, and the necessity of publicly asking pardon. To impugn Calvin's doctrine, or the proceedings of the consistory, endangered life. For such an offence a Ferrarese lady was condemned, in 1569, to beg pardon of God and the magistrate, and to leave the city in twenty-four hours, on pain of being beheaded.

Calvin's promptitude and firmness were now conspicuous: he was the ruling spirit in Geneva; and the Church which he had established there he wished to make the mother and seminary of all the Reformed Churches. His personal labours were increasing: he preached every day for two weeks of each month; he gave three lessons in divinity every week; he assisted at all the deliberations of the consistory and company of pastors; he defended the principles of the Reformation against all who attacked them; he explained those principles both in writing and discourse; and maintained a correspondence with every part of Europe. Geneva, however, was the common centre of all his exertions, and its prosperity peculiarly interested him, though less for its own sake than to make it a fountain for the supply of the world : he established an academy there, the high character of which was long maintained; he made the city a literary mart; and having finished the ecclesiastical regimen, he directed his attention to the improvement of the municipal government of the place.

His hands were indeed full of business. "I have not time," he writes to a friend, "to look out of my house at the blessed sun ; and if things continue thus, I shall forget what sort of appearance it has. When I have settled my usual business, I have so many letters to write, so many questions to answer, that many a night is spent without any offering of sleep being brought to nature."

CONTROVERSIES.

Of the controversies in which Calvin now embarked, one of the most important was that in which he defended his doctrine concerning predestination and election. The first who attacked him on the subject was Pighius, a Romanist, to whom Calvin replied in a work published in 1543. So potent were his reasonings in the estimation of his opponent, that the latter, though owing nothing to the gentleness or courtesy of Calvin, was led to embrace his views.

A more troublesome and protracted dispute on the same subject took place in 1551, when Calvin was called on to defend his views against one Bolsec, originally a Carmelite friar, but now a physician. Bolsec, as was to be expected, was vanquished and banished from Geneva.

CONTROVERSY WITH CASTELLIO.

Another controversy into which Calvin entered with heartiness and zeal was with Sebastian Castellio. Calvin had, as we have already mentioned, made the acquaintance of Castellio at Strasburg. At first a warm friendship sprang up between them, and Calvin exhibited a praiseworthy inclination to be of service to Castellio, whose poverty and learning had excited his sympathy. On his return to Geneva, he invited Castellio to join him there, and procured for him the title of Regent or Tutor in the Gymnasium of the city.

There were few points of resemblance, however, between the characters of the two men ; and the differences in their tastes and views soon became apparent. The learning of Castellio was intensely humanistic ; a classical spirit and a somewhat arbitrary opinionativeness moulded all his studies ; and as soon as he began to apply himself to theology, he came into collision with Calvin. In a letter to Farel written in 1542, we find the Reformer speaking of the freaks of "our friend Sebastian, which may both raise your bile and your laughter at the same time." These freaks consisted in Castellio's ideas of Scripture translation, and his refusal of Calvin's offer to revise the translation which he had made of certain parts of Holy Writ.

Two years later, Castellio wished to enter the ministry, but Calvin dissuaded the council from accepting him on account of some peculiar views which he entertained. These were certain rationalistic opinions as to the authenticity and character of the Song of Solomon, the descent of Christ into hell, and the doctrine of election.

Castellio now removed from Geneva ; but on his return soon afterwards, he publicly attacked the views of Calvin. A violent scene in church followed, very strongly painted in Calvin's letters, and Castellio was forced to leave the city.

The two old friends, now sworn enemies, did not henceforth spare each other. When at a later date an anonymous pamphlet appeared, attacking with keen logic and covert sarcasm the Genevan doctrines, the publication was attributed by both Calvin and Beza to Castellio ; and they replied to him in vigorous language, stigmatising him as a deceiver and vassal of Satan.

One fact in the controversy, not at all to the credit of Calvin, must be recorded. In his old age, Castellio sank into poverty, and was obliged to gather sticks on the banks of the Rhine at Basle by way of supporting himself. Calvin did not hesitate to accuse him of stealing the sticks. "Such polemical truculence," says one writer very truly, "may well make us turn away in disgust and indignation."

Calvin was also involved in a protracted and somewhat vexing dispute with the Lutherans on the subject of the Lord's Supper. This ended in the separation of the Evangelical party into the two great camps of Lutherans and Reformed—the former of whom maintain that in the Eucharist the body and blood of Christ are objectively and consubstantially present, and so are actually partaken of by the communicants ; whilst the latter hold that there is only a virtual presence of the body and blood of Christ, and, consequently, only a spiritual participation thereof through faith.

CONTROVERSY WITH SERVETUS.

The most memorable, however, of all the controversies in which Calvin took part was that into which he was brought in 1553 with his old antagonist Servetus.

Miguel Servet was born at Villanueva, in Aragon, in 1509, the year of Calvin's birth. He studied law at Toulouse, and at the same time paid much attention to theology. The writings of the German Reformer failed to satisfy his craving after novelty; he adopted antitrinitarian opinions, and, not finding himself secure at Toulouse, fled into Germany, where, before completing his twenty-second year, he published a work, "De Trinitatis Erroribus." The heterodoxy of this production was rendered more offensive by the levity of the author's tone.

He soon discovered that his notions were as distasteful to the Protestants of Germany as to the Romanists; and after publishing at Hagman two dialogues, in which he developed his heresies still further, he adopted the name of Villeneuve (in allusion to his birthplace), and became a student of physic at Paris in 1532.

We have already seen that he challenged Calvin to a disputation in 1534, and failed to keep his appointment. Since that time he had travelled in Italy; he had lectured at Paris with great applause, but had quarrelled with the faculty of physicians, and had, in consequence, retired from the capital; and, after various adventures, he had established himself at Vienne in 1540. The originality of his genius and the variety of his acquirements had been displayed in several publications, not without some manifestations of vanity, arrogance, and a diseased love of innovation.

For years Servetus brooded over a work which he called "Restitutio Christianismi." He believed that the Millennium was at hand, and that he was destined to take a leading part in the enlightenment of the world. According to him, the angels in the prophetic part of the Apocalypse were so called only by a metaphor—that men were meant; and that the Michael who was to triumph over the dragon of the Papacy was no other than himself.

In 1546, he submitted his manuscript to Calvin. It was not in the character of either party that the differences between them should be calmly discussed. Calvin broke off the correspondence, referring Servetus to the "Institutes" for any information which he might require; and Servetus in return sent him a copy of that work with bitter manuscript notes.

Calvin took notice of his rejection of correspondence with Servetus in a letter to a common friend. "He expressed in this letter a faint hope that the Spaniard might come to a better mind; and on the same day he wrote of him to Farel as

"He offers to come hither if I will allow him; but I am unwilling to give any pledge; for if he does come, and my authority be of any avail, I will never suffer him to depart alive."

The manuscript which he had forwarded to Geneva was not returned; but Servetus had either retained a duplicate or re-written the whole; and in 1552 it was secretly printed at Vienne. There was no attempt to circulate it there; but copies were sent to various cities at a distance, and one of them fell into the hands of Calvin.

Within a short time Servetus was seized by the Catholic authorities at Vienne, and put on his trial for heresy. It has been maintained that Calvin was the instigator, through a creature of his own of the name of Trie, of the whole transaction; it is certain that he forwarded to the authorities, through Trie, private documents which Servetus had entrusted to him, with a view to the heretic's identification, and as materials for his condemnation. But the history of the affair is very complicated and obscure.

Servetus contrived to supply himself with money; and on the 7th of April, 1553, he made his escape. The process against him was continued in his absence. He was condemned to be burned by a slow fire; and this sentence was executed on his effigy.

THE TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF SERVETUS.

About the middle of July a traveller entered Geneva, and took up his abode at a small inn. Although alone and on foot, he was evidently a man of superior manners. The traveller was Servetus, who had lingered in France since the time of his escape from Vienne, and was now on his way to Naples, where he intended to practise as a physician.

After remaining for some time unmolested, he was about to leave for Zurich, when, at the instigation of Calvin, he was arrested, and lodged in prison on a charge of blasphemy. This charge was based on certain statements in the book called "Restitutio Christianismi," in which he had animadverted in terms of needless offensiveness on the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, and advanced sentiments strongly savouring of Pantheism.

He was altogether a singular opponent whom Calvin had thus pounced down upon. Learned, painstaking, unwearied in research, Servetus was as vehement in the assertion of his conclusions as he was independent in his method of reaching them. The controversies of the age were seldom softened by the amenities of language; and Servetus, standing generally on ground where none cared to associate themselves with him, was as bitter as any in the use of epithets which charged his opponents with wilful perversity and measureless ignorance. With a knowledge of anatomy and physiology which enabled him to anticipate some at least of the discoveries of Harvey, and which gave him a right to share in Harvey's fame, he exhibited in other respects a credulity scarcely inferior to that of the most credulous of his time, and made no small profit by the practice of astrology. When to this we add that the mystical clement was strong in the man, and that he enforced his mysticism with a pertinacity equal to the thoroughness with which he rejected and derided the mysticism of others, we can readily understand the repulsion which his mode of disputation would cause in the minds even of the less bigoted reformers of the day. Having at first felt some liking for him, Œcolampadius soon waxed wroth at the "haughty, daring, and contentions" stranger, while the comparatively gentle Zwingli and Melancthon were gradually alienated from the "troublesome" Spaniard.

The trial of Servetus followed, Calvin appearing as his accuser. The conflict between him and the prisoner at the bar was conducted with much ability on both sides, and at the same time with no small bitterness. In the end, Servetus was condemned to be burned to death, a sentence which was carried into effect at Champel, near Geneva, on the 27th of October, 1553. Farel attended him in his last hours, and accompanied him to the place of execution. He had an interview also with Calvin on the morning of the fatal day, when he begged his forgiveness, but refused to withdraw any of his expressions.

CALVIN'S PART IN THE EXECUTION OF SERVETUS.

"Calvin," remarks Dr. Alexander in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, "has been much censured, not to say vituperated, for his share in this unhappy transaction. In order to aggravate the charge against him, it has been alleged that it was by his invitation that Servetus came to Geneva; that it was by his urgency that the magistrates, over whom his influence was unbounded, condemned Servetus to death; and that it was to gratify a personal pique and through hatred of Servetus that he thus cruelly and relentlessly pursued him.

"Of these allegations not one can be proved, and some are undoubtedly false. It is not true that Calvin induced Servetus to come to Geneva; on the contrary, when Servetus intimated a wish to visit that city if it pleased Calvin that he should do so, Calvin intimated very plainly that it did not please him, and refused to pledge himself for his safety should he come, as he was resolved to persecute him to the death. That Calvin influenced the magistrates to condemn Servetus is true only in the same sense in which any public prosecutor, who pleads before the judge for the condemnation of one against whom he brings a criminal charge, may be said to influence the judge to condemn him. As to the assertion that Calvin's influence with the magistrates was unbounded, that falls to the ground before the fact that at this time he was in a state of antagonism to the dominant party. That Calvin hated the doctrines which he found in Servetus's book there can be no doubt, and that he thought the author of such views as were there advanced deserving of death, if he refused, when reasoned with, to recant, is unhappily true; but that he was actuated by any personal spite or animosity against Servetus himself, there is no evidence; on the contrary, we have his own express declaration, that after Servetus was convicted, he used no urgency that he should be put to death, and at their last interview he told Servetus that he never had avenged private injuries, and assured him that if he would repent it would not be his fault if all the pious did not give him their hands. There is the fact also that Calvin used his endeavour to have the sentence which had been pronounced against Servetus mitigated, death by burning being regarded by him as an "atrocious," for which he sought to substitute death by the sword.

"All that can be justly charged against Calvin in this matter is that he took the initiative in bringing on the trial of Servetus; that, as his accuser, he prosecuted the suit against him with undue severity; and that he approved the sentence which condemned Servetus to death. When, however, it is remembered that the unanimous decision of the Swiss Churches was that Servetus deserved to die; that the general voice of Christendom was in favour of this; that even such a man as Melancthon affirmed the justice of the sentence; that an eminent English divine of the next age should declare the process against him "just and honourable;" and that only a few voices here and there were at the time raised against it, candid and impartial men will be ready to accept the judgment of Coleridge that the death of Servetus was not "Calvin's guilt specially, but the common opprobrium of all European Christendom."

That Calvin should, in the circumstances in which he was now placed, show marks of intolerance towards others, is not surprising; and to seek a palliation of his guilt we need not go back to the time when he belonged to the Church of Rome, nor yet to the notions of civil and religious liberty prevalent in his age. We have only to reflect on the constitution of the human mind, and the constant care necessary to prevent power in any hands from degenerating into tyranny.

Servetus was executed on an extended eminence at some distance from the city, where he was fastened to a stake surrounded by heaps of oak wood and leaves, with his condemned book and the MS. he had sent to Calvin attached to his girdle. His agony was long protracted: with his last breath he uttered a cry to the Saviour for mercy, expressed in words which showed that he persisted in his heresy.

THEOLOGICAL CONTESTS; HARD AT WORK.

The heretical doctrines of Servetus were not extinguished by his death. None of those who embraced them, however, were visited with severe penalties than that of banishment from Geneva. For several years, much of Calvin's time was taken up by the trials of these persons, together with the conferences and controversies arising out of them.

In 1554, the year following Servetus's death, Calvin published a work in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity against the errors of Servetus, and to prove the right of the civil magistrate to punish heresy. Beza the same year published a work on the like subject, in reply to the treatise of Castelli.

A time of troubles followed this triumph. The affair of Servetus gave Calvin's enemies an advantage. Such was his unpopularity, that he was repeatedly insulted in the streets; the Libertine party became audacious in its disorders; the council exercised a censorship on the printing of the Reformer's writings; and the influence of Berne was used against him. A change, however, soon took place in Calvin's favour. A large admission of refugees to the rights of citizenship was carried against all opposition, and greatly strengthened his hands; and an attempt of the Libertines to effect a revolution, ended in the utter ruin of their party. Several of them were captured and executed, and sentence of death was passed on those who had escaped.

The remainder of Calvin's life was undisturbed by political opposition. Theological contests, however, continued to the end.

In spite of all this, Calvin produced a number of works independent of those called forth by the various controversies in which he was engaged. The most numerous of these were of an exegetical character. Not to speak of discourses taken down from his lips by faithful hearers, we have expository comments on nearly all the books of Scripture. These are written partly in Latin and partly in French, and, in the opinion of many, constitute the most valuable of his works. His candour and sincerity as an inquirer into the meaning of Scripture; his judiciousness, penetration, and tact in eliciting his author's meaning; his precision, condensation, and continuity as an expositor; the accuracy of his learning, the closeness of his reasoning, and the elegance of his style, all conspire to confer a high value on his exegetical works, and to make them at once rich sources of Biblical knowledge, and admirable models of Biblical exposition.

During this period Calvin also attended several conferences, which were held with a view to the settlement of religion. At the last of these, the celebrated Diet of Ratisbon, he was one of the representatives of Strasburg.

It was not only in religious matters that Calvin found employment for his restless energies; nothing was indifferent to him that concerned the welfare of the State or the advantage of its citizens. His work, it has been truly said, embraced everything; his advice was taken on every matter great and small that came before the council. He discussed questions of law, police, economy, trade and manufactures, as well as matters of doctrine and Church polity. To him Geneva was indebted for her trade in cloths and velvets, by which her citizens gained so much wealth, and for those sanitary regulations that made the city the admiration of every visitor. In Calvin we see also the founder of the College of Geneva, which still exists, and which has imparted instruction to so many eminent men.

In 1559, the Theological College was established. The funds necessary for the foundation were chiefly supplied by the munificence of Bonniard, "the prisoner of Chillon." It was Calvin's earnest endeavour to supply these institutions with teachers of eminent learning. The rectorship of the College was conferred upon Beza, who, with other members of the Calvinistic party, had lately been obliged to leave Lausanne in consequence of disputes as to predestination.

The Reformer's fame and influence were now at their height. We find him called in as arbiter in the disputes of the English congregation at Frankfort (1555); he corresponds with the King of Poland, and endeavours to guide the Reformation of that country; he influences the change of religion in Scotland by means of Knox; his discipline is adopted by the Church of the Palatinate in 1560; he is in high regard with eminent members of the ruling party in England after the accession of Elizabeth, and at the same time is the very oracle of the Puritans; he directs the great movement which for the time seemed likely to prevail over Romanism in France.

A FRIEND AND BIOGRAPHER.

In 1549, Geneva received within its walls a person who was destined to play a conspicuous part in its history. Theodore de Bèze was born at Vezelay in 1519. He had been known to Calvin at Bourges, and subsequently led the life of a gay, accomplished, dissipated man of the world. A severe illness, however, changed his views, and he had married a woman with whom he had before cohabited. Calvin procured for him a professorship at Lausanne, and directed him in his theological reading. Beza soon became the Reformer's most confidential friend. He seconded him in controversy, and took up opponents whenever Calvin grew tired of them; he succeeded him in no inconsiderable part of his authority both at home and abroad; he edited some of his works, and wrote his life with "more of friendship," it has been said, "than of candour."

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

The strongest constitution could not have endured the incessant and exhausting labour to which Calvin devoted himself; so it was no wonder that his feeble frame soon broke down. Spite, however, of severe suffering and repeated attacks of illness, he manfully held on his way for twenty-eight years, setting fever, asthma, stone, and gout, the fruits for the most part of his sedentary habits and ceaseless activity, all at defiance.

Of all the testimonies to the merits of Calvin at this time, the most unsuspected is that of the canons of Noyon, who, in 1556, publicly returned thanks to God on occasion of his recovery from an illness which it was thought would prove mortal.

The citizens of Noyon, however, it is but fair to add, showed themselves by no means proud of their townsman. They celebrated a false report of his death with public rejoicings; there is, too, a story, not so well supported, that they pulled down the house in which he was born, and hanged a man who ventured to rebuild it.

It was no doubt the state of Calvin's health which prevented him going in 1561 to the famous Conference of Poissy: nothing but his many pains and infirmities, as it appears from his correspondence with Beza, who was sent to the Conference from Geneva, would have prevented his attending an assembly which promised to be of so much consequence, and which was indeed remarkable in this respect, that from that time the followers of Calvin became known as a distinct sect, bearing the name of their leader.

Amidst all his sufferings, however, neither his public functions nor his literary labours ceased; he continued to edify the Church of Geneva by his sermons and his intercourse with the people, and to instruct Europe by his works; and to the last he maintained the same firmness of character which had distinguished him through life.

At last, early in the year 1564, it was clear that his earthly course was rapidly drawing to a close. On the 6th of February he preached for the last time, having with great difficulty found breath enough to carry him through his sermon. After this he was several times carried into the church, but he never again was able to take part in the service. With noble disinterestedness, he now refused to receive his stipend, on the ground that he was no longer able to discharge the duties of his office.

He still worked on, however; and when remonstrated with for such unreasonable toil, he replied, "Would you that the Lord should find me idle when He comes?"

A deep impression seems to have been made on all who visited him on his death-bed. They saw in him the noble spectacle of a great spirit that had done its life-work calmly and trustfully, passing through the gate of suffering into the long-desired and firmly-expected repose of heaven.

The magistrates of Geneva attended on him in his chamber, to take a solemn farewell; he spoke to them at some length, exhorting them to the performance of their duties, and desiring their forgiveness for such wrong as his natural vehemence might have led him to commit.

On his death-bed he took God to witness that he had preached the Gospel purely, and exhorted all about him to walk worthy of the divine goodness: his delicate frame gradually became quite emaciated, and on the 27th of May, 1564, he died, without a struggle, in the fifty-fifth year of his age.

"On that night and the following day," says Beza, "Geneva seemed plunged in universal mourning. The State had to regret the loss of one of its wisest citizens; the Church its pastor; the academy its teacher; whilst private persons felt as if deprived of a common parent and comforter."

In obedience to Calvin's wish, his contemporaries abstained from marking his grave by any memorial. The spot is not now known with certainty.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND CHARACTER.

The person of Calvin was middle-sized and naturally delicate; his habits were frugal and unostentatious; and he was so sparing in food, that for many years he had only one meal in the day. He had a clear understanding, an incredible memory, and a firmness and inflexibility of purpose which no opposition could overcome, no variety of objects defeat, no vicissitude shake. In his principles he was devout and sincere, and the purity of his character in private life was without a stain.

"His grace in preaching," we are told, "was the meanest of all other gifts in him; yet even that was so had in honour and estimation, that a hearer of his being asked wherefore he came not to other men's sermons as well as Calvin's, answered, that if Calvin and St. Paul himself should preach both at one hour, he should leave St. Paul to hear Calvin."

The private character of Calvin was what one might expect from his public reputation. He was inclined to be severe and irritable, but at the same time no one ever lived who was more just and truthful; so long as conscience would permit, he stuck fast by his friends, and never, so far as was possible for frail human nature, took an unfair advantage of his adversaries. Now and again we find him cheerful and even facetious among his intimate associates. "I have been a witness of him for sixteen years," says Beza, "and I think I am fully entitled to say that in this man there was exhibited to all an example of the life and death of the Christian, such as it will not be easy to deprecate, such as it will be difficult to emulate."

CALVIN'S POSITION AND INFLUENCE.

We can hardly sum up this great character in language more just than that of Mr. Thos. H. Dyer in his "Life of John Calvin:"—

"In any circumstances, his wonderful abilities and extensive learning would have made him a shining light among the doctors of the Reformation; a visit to Geneva made him the head of a numerous and powerful sect. Naturally deficient in that courage which forms so prominent a trait in Luther, and which prompted him to beard King and Emperor face-to-face, Calvin arrived at Geneva at a time when the rough and initiatory work of reform had already been accomplished by his bolder friend Farel.

"Some peculiar circumstances in the political condition of that place favoured the views which he seems to have formed very shortly after his arrival. By the extent of its territory, and the number of its population, a small city; by its natural and artificial strength, and by its Swiss alliances, an independent State, secure from the attacks of its powerful neighbours; by its laws and institution a Republic, tending towards an oligarchy; and by the enthusiasm of a new religion which had helped to establish its civil liberties, disposed to bend its neck to the yoke of the Gospel, Geneva offered every facility to a master mind like Calvin's, which had conceived the idea of establishing a theocracy, of which he himself was to be the oracle, the prophet, and the dictator, and from which, as from a common centre, his peculiar opinions were to spread in successive and still expanding circles through the rest of Europe.

"The tact and skill, the fortitude, the consistency of purpose and energy of will which he displayed in carrying out his design, are worthy of all admiration.

"That a man who devoted himself so ardently to the study of divinity, and who laboured with such industry and warmth to defend and propagate the Reformation, should have been influenced solely by the hope of attaining reputation and power, is scarcely credible; whilst, on the other hand, there are parts of his conduct which it would be difficult to refer to purely religious motives. An irritable pride is one of the salient features of his character. This feeling particularly betrayed itself where his literary reputation or his authority as a teacher was concerned; for these were the instruments of his power and influence. . . . Beza admits Calvin's proneness to anger, which, however, is sometimes more correctly characterized by Calvin himself by the name of morosity. And, indeed, not only his conduct, but the tenor of the greater part of his controversial tracts, show that a man may be a profound theologian, and yet not comprehend the true spirit of Christianity.

"Calvin's mode of life was frugal and temperate, and he was untainted with the mean passion of avarice. The last is peculiarly the vice of little minds ; and it may be safely affirmed that no man of enlarged understanding and commanding genius ever loved money for its own sake. Calvin's ambition was of a different kind. He rather sought to leave his name and principles to posterity than a few thousand dollars more or less to his heirs.

"Like all men of truly deep thought, he never leaves his reader at a loss for his meaning. His Latin style is not marked by unnecessary cerbiage, merely for the sake of rounding a period, nor by the affectation of Ciceronian purity, the besetting sin of the writers of that age ; and if it be truly said that the best test of modern Latin is that it should be read with facility and pleasure by a scholar, Calvin's may be pronounced excellent.

"The merits of Calvin as a commentator have been universally recognized, even by those opposed to his peculiar views. His 'Institutes' bear the impress of an independent and comprehensive study of Scripture, from which, aided by the works of the Fathers, and especially of St. Augustine, Calvin built up his system ; which deserves the praise of originality rather for the coherence and symmetry with which it is arranged, and which shows it to be the work of a single mind, than for any novelty in the views which it develops. Probably his best claims to originality with regard to any single part of his doctrines, rests on that of the Lord's Supper."

His writings are very numerous ; but, except his "Christian Institutes," his Commentaries on the Bible, and a few others, they have long been covered with undisturbed dust, though in their day none of his works were without their influence. There have been various collections of his works. In 1552, all his minor pieces, or "Opuscula," were collected and published at Geneva. In 1576, a similar collection was made of his theological tracts ; and the same year Beza published a collection of his letters, with a life of Calvin. We find also in Senebier (Hist. Litt. de Geneve, tom. i.) not only a list of all Calvin's publications, but a catalogue of sermons preached by him, which yet remain in MS. in the public library of Geneva.

WHAT IS CALVINISM ?

The system of religious doctrine and church government maintained by Calvin and his followers now demands our attention. Calvin, as we have seen, published his system in his "Christian Institutes" in the year 1536 ; but it does not appear to have obtained the name of Calvinism, nor its supporters the name of Calvinists, till the Conference of Poissy in 1561.

The Reformer, as we have already said, was not himself present at that assembly, being prevented from attending by his local duties and the ill state of his health ; but we see from his correspondence with Beza, the deputy from Geneva, how deep was his interest in its proceedings, and that nothing was done on the part of the Reformers without his knowledge and advice. In the debate which took place on the Augsburg Confession, the points of difference between the Lutherans and Calvinists were drawn out ; and they were such as that from thenceforth the latter became known as a distinct sect under that denomination.

The tenets of Calvinism respect the doctrines of the Trinity, predestination, or particular election and reprobation, original sin, particular redemption, effectual or irresistible grace in regeneration, justification by faith, and the perseverance of saints ; together also with the government and discipline of the Church, the nature of the eucharist, and the qualification of those entitled to partake of it. The great leading principles of the system, however, are the absolute decrees of God, the spiritual presence of Christ in the eucharist, and the independence of the Church.

Calvinism was, perhaps, like Lutheranism, exemplified first at Strasburg ; where, in the year 1538, Calvin established a French Church on his own plan. But it was at Geneva that the system was seen in all its vigour ; and from thence it spread into France, Germany, Prussia, the United Provinces, England, and Scotland. To this last place it was carried by Knox, the disciple and intimate correspondent of Calvin ; and as within the little territory of Geneva there was neither room nor need for the parochial sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods and general assembly, into which the presbyterial government expands itself in a large community, we shall briefly advert to its leading features in Scotland as it appeared there in the lifetime of Knox. We shall thus indeed see the Church of Scotland in its infancy ; but at the same time—and it is that we have chiefly in view—we shall thus perhaps have the best idea of the matured opinions of the great Reformer.

CALVINISM IN SCOTLAND.

The Confession of Faith, ratified by the Scots Parliament in 1560, declares that by the sin of our first parents, "commonly called original sin, the image of God was utterly defaced in man, and he and his posterity of nature became enemies of God, slaves to Satan, and servants unto sin ; insomuch that death everlasting has had, and shall have, power and dominion over all that have not been, are not, or shall not be, regenerated from above, which regeneration is wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost working in the hearts of the elect of God an assured faith in the promise of God revealed in his Word ; " that " from the eternal and immutable decree of God all our salvation springs and depends ; " " God of mere grace electing us in Christ Jesus His Son before the foundation of the world was laid ; " and that " our faith and the assurance of the same proceeds not from flesh and blood, that is to say from our natural powers within us, but is the inspiration of the Holy Ghost ; " " who sanctifies us and brings us in all verity by His own operation, without whom we should remain for ever enemies to God and ignorant of His Son Christ Jesus ; for of nature we are so dead, so blind, and so perverse, that neither can we feel when we are pricked, see the light when it shines, nor assent to the will of God when it is revealed, unless the Spirit of the Lord Jesus quicken that which is dead, remove the darkness from our minds, and bow our stubborn hearts to the obedience of His blessed will ; " " so that the cause of good works we confess to be not our free will, but the Spirit of the Lord Jesus, who dwelling in our hearts by true faith, brings forth such works as God has prepared for us to walk in ; " and " whoso boast themselves of the merits of their own works, or put their trust in works of supererogation, boast themselves in that which is not, and put their trust in damnable idolatry." It further admits that " we now, in the time of the evangel, have two chief sacraments only," to wit, Baptism and the Lord's Supper ; by the former of which " we are ingrafted in Christ Jesus to be made partakers of His justice, by which our sins are covered and remitted ; " and in the latter it is asserted that there is a real though only spiritual presence of Christ, and " in the Supper rightly used, Christ Jesus is joined with us, that He becomes very nourishment and food of our souls." The marks of a true Church are said to be the true preaching of the Word of God, the right administration of the sacraments, and ecclesiastical discipline rightly administered as the Word of God prescribes. The polity or constitution of the Church, however, is not detailed ; this was done in the " Book of Discipline," drawn up by Knox and his brethren. The highest Church judicatory is the General Assembly, composed of representatives from the others, which are provincial synods, presbyteries, and kirk sessions. The officers of the Church are pastors or ministers, doctors or teachers, and lay elders, to which are to be added lay deacons, for the care of the poor. Among the clergy there is a perfect parity of jurisdiction and authority, and in the Church courts clergy and laity have equal voices. The minister and the elder, indeed, are both presbyters, — the one a preaching presbyter, and the other a ruling presbyter ; indeed, when Bucer expressed his approbation of the episcopal hierarchy of England, Calvin said it was only another papacy. Another principle, recognised alike by Calvin and the Reformers of Scotland, was the education of the people ; which both seem to have regarded as the rock upon which the Reformed Church should be built ; and in Scotland, as was fit, this foundation was as broad as the building, it being meant that, besides the universities of the kingdom, there should be in every district a parish church and a parish school.

In its earlier history, the Church of England, though mediæval and Catholic in its ritual, was Calvinistic in its creed. Puritanism was neither more nor less than an attempt to reduce it altogether to a Calvinistic model. In the reaction which followed this movement, the Church of England, while retaining its original articles, nearly parted with its Calvinistic faith ; and throughout the eighteenth century, its leading divines were conspicuously Arminian or Latitudinarian. With the revival of the Evangelical party, however, in the end of the century, Calvinism revived ; and it still maintains a powerful influence over many minds in the Anglican establishment.

MR. FROUDE ON CALVINISM.

" Calvin's name," says Mr. Froude, " is now associated only with gloom and austerity. It may be true enough that he rarely laughed. He had none of Luther's genial and sunny humour. Could they have exchanged conditions, Luther's temper might have been somewhat grimmer, but he would never have been entirely like Calvin. Nevertheless, for hard times are needed hard men, and intellects which can pierce to the roots where truth and lies part company. It fares ill with the soldiers of religion when the accursed thing is in their camp. And this is to be said of Calvin, that so far as the state of knowledge permitted, no eye could have detected more keenly the unsound spots in the received creed of Europe, and no hand could have been found so resolute to excise, tear out, and destroy what was distinctly seen to be false, so resolute to establish what was true in its place, and make truth to the last fibre of it the rule of practical life.

"Calvinism, as it existed in Geneva, and as it endeavoured to be wherever it took root for a century and a half after him, was not a system of opinion, but an attempt to make the will of God as revealed in the Bible an authoritative guide for social as well as personal direction. Men wonder why the Calvinists, being so doctrinal, yet seem to dwell so much and so emphatically on the Old Testament. It was because in the Old Testament they found, or thought they found, a divine example of national government, a distinct indication of the laws which men were ordered to follow, with visible and immediate punishments attached to disobedience. At Geneva, as for a time in Scotland, moral sins were treated, after the example of the Mosaic law, as crimes to be punished by the magistrates. 'Elsewhere,' said Knox, speaking of Geneva, 'the Word of God is taught as purely, but never anywhere have I seen God obeyed so faithfully.'

"If it was a dream, it was at least a noble one. The Calvinists have been called intolerant. Intolerance of an enemy who is trying to kill you seems to me a pardonable state of mind. It is no easy matter to tolerate lies clearly convicted of being lies under any circumstances; specially it is not easy to tolerate lies which strut about in the name of religion; but there is no reason to suppose that the Calvinists at the beginning would have thought of meddling with the Church if they had been themselves let alone. They would have formed communities apart. Like the Israelites, whom they wished to resemble, they would have withdrawn into the wilderness—the Pilgrim Fathers actually did so withdraw into the wilderness of New England—to worship the God of their fathers, and would have left argument and example to work their natural effect. The Catholics chose to add to their already incredible creed a fresh article, that they were entitled to hang and burn those who differed from them; and in this quarrel, the Calvinists, Bible in hand, appealed to the God of battles. They grew harsher, fiercer, if you please, more fanatical. It was extremely natural that they should. They dwelt, as pious men are apt to dwell in suffering and sorrow on the all-disposing power of Providence. Their burden grew lighter as they considered that God had so determined that they must bear it. But they attracted to their ranks almost every man in Western Europe that "hated a lie." They were crushed down, but they rose again. They were splintered and torn, but no power could bend or melt them. They had many faults; let him that is without sin cast a stone at them. They abhorred, as no body of men ever more abhorred, all conscious mendacity, all impurity, all moral wrong of every kind so far as they could recognize it. Whatever exists at this moment in England and Scotland of conscientious fear of doing evil is the remnant of the convictions which were branded by the Calvinists into the people's hearts. Though they failed to destroy Romanism, though it survives and may survive long as an opinion, they drew its fangs; they forced it to abandon that detestable principle that it was entitled to murder those who dissented from it. Nay, it may be said that by having slamed Romanism out of its practical corruption, the Calvinists enabled it to revive. . .

"The power of Calvinism has waned. The discipline which it once aspired to maintain has fallen slack. The argumentative and logical side of Calvin's mind has created once more a fatal opportunity for a separation between opinion and morality. We have learnt, as we say, to make the best of both worlds,—to take political economy for the rule of our conduct, and to relegate religion into the expression of orthodox doctrines. . . Calvinism was the spirit which rises in revolt against untruth; the spirit which has appeared and reappeared, and in due time will appear again, unless God be a delusion, and man be as the beasts that perish. For it is but the inflashing upon the conscience with overwhelming force of the nature and origin of the laws by which mankind are governed—laws which exist, whether we acknowledge them or whether we deny them, and will have their way, to our weal or woe, according to the attitude in which we please to place ourselves towards them—inherent, like electricity, in the nature of things, not made by us, not to be altered by us, but to be discerned and obeyed by us at our everlasting peril."

THE HOUR AND THE MAN.

AS there are certain epochs in the world's chronicle that stand out distinct and prominent as signalling great changes, and forming land-marks indicating where a new era commences, where we begin a new chapter in the history of the ages; so do we mark at long intervals the appearance of men upon the stage of the world with whom the great changes or movements are identified; men who, by their genius and strength, dominate their century, and produce definite and lasting forms in forces which uncontrolled and unguided would but have called forth a disastrous conflagration, ravaging and destroying the things that existed, but calling forth nothing new to take their place. Such heroes in the world's broad field of battle were pictured by the Greeks of old as demi-gods and kings of men; in later times the Church held them up to the admiration and reverence of posterity as saints; chivalry clothed them with all knightly virtues. But in whatever form they appeared, one characteristic was common to them all,—the courage that amid peril and temptation would stand boldly forth, and in the face of persecution, hatred, and tyranny nobly assert the thing that was right and good, never doubting that truth, by its own greatness, would prevail in the end.

Such a man was the great prophet of the Reformation in Germany; the peasant's son, the man of the people, who dared to stand alone and unprotected in the presence of the Kaiser on whose empire the sun never set, and in the presence of princes and potentates and dignitaries of the Church and State to do battle for the cause of evangelical truth; declaring that, come what would, he could not speak against his conscience, or deny what in the inmost depths of his great heart he felt to be true. "He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men," said the wise king, speaking of the man diligent in his vocation; and the words were fulfilled in Martin Luther. He was eminently zealous in the great task appointed him to do; he wrought with his whole heart, mind, soul, and strength; and it was his great reward to be during his lifetime the champion of the reformed faith in Germany, and to be remembered after his death with love and reverence as unquestionably the greatest man in a century fertile in heroic men. "Better it were that the temple brake in pieces than that Christ should therein remain obscure and hid," was his reply when his enemies would have put him to silence. The secret of his power, and of the hold he obtained on his time and on posterity, lay in his perfect honesty and simplicity.

Whatever the great Reformer did was done openly, in the face of the whole world, without concealment or subterfuge. "No man ever lived," Archdeacon Hare has well observed, "whose whole heart and soul and life have been laid bare as his have been to the eyes of mankind. Open as the sky, bold and fearless as the storm, he gave utterance to all his feelings, all his thoughts. He knew nothing of reserve; and the impression he produced on his hearers and friends was such that they were anxious to treasure up every word that dropped from his lips. No man, therefore, has ever been exposed to so severe a trial; perhaps no man was ever placed in such difficult circumstances, or assailed by such manifold temptations. And how did he come out of the trial? Through the power of faith, under the guardian care of his Heavenly Master, he was enabled to stand through life, and still he stands, and will continue to stand, firmly rooted in the love of all who really know him."

LUTHER'S PARENTAGE AND CHILDHOOD.

It was in the little town of Eisleben, in Saxony, that Martin Luther was born, on the 11th of November, 1483. His father, Hans Luther, was a miner, earning his bread by daily labour. "I am the son of a peasant," said Luther—the words are preserved in his "Table Talk,"—"my father, my grandfather, my great grandfather were all mere peasants." His mother, Greta Lindemann, was a pious, God-fearing woman. It is related by Conrad Schlitseburg that Hans Luther was accustomed to pray, by the side of the babe's cradle, that God would give the child grace to exemplify in his life the meaning of his name, Luther, i.e., Lauter, or pure. His baptismal name Martin was given to him as born on the day of that saint. Mathesius, who mentions the circumstance, adds that Luther maintained the honour of his baptismal name by being all his life a valiant soldier of Christ.

Though Hans Luther was but a labouring man, he seems to have been not without ambition. His great desire was to give Martin an education, with the ultimate view of his studying the law, in those days the readiest road to advancement. Thus Martin was sent to school at Mansfeld, to which place his father removed soon after the boy's birth. In later years Luther was accustomed to complain of severities practised by the schoolmasters of his youth, who seem to have rivalled the "Plagosus Orbilius" of the Roman poet. "Schools," he said, "were in former times mere prisons and hells, and schoolmasters tyrants and floggers, punishing the poor children indiscriminately and unmercifully, and unable to teach them anything good or useful, for the very sufficient reason that they knew nothing themselves."

The scholastic system in Germany four hundred years ago was sufficiently comprehensive to include the education of many children of the poor; and indeed, to the present day it has been able to boast of having given many a scholar to Germany who sprang from the ranks of the peasantry, and, like Chaucer's Clerk of Oxenford, was bound to pray for all charitable souls whose benevolent contributions enabled him to "scholaia." Even at the present time many students at the great Universities of Germany and pupils at the Gymnasias or high schools are received as regular guests at the tables of citizens on certain days in the week, while dinners are provided for a certain number from funds left by charitable donors to the Universities at various times. Even in the old "Thomas-schule" at Leipsic, a famous high school dating from the thirteenth century, the alumni, or foundation scholars, who still sing as choristers in the churches, were accustomed at certain seasons to collect money from the Leipsic citizens wherewith to support themselves till they should matriculate for the University. In the less squeamish fifteenth century there was no disguise at all about the matter. The poor scholars in all the great towns in Germany formed themselves into choirs or bands, and went from door to door, like carol singers at Christmas, singing hymns, appealing to the benevolence of the charitable, and thankfully accepting contributions in money and food. They received the name of "Currend Schüller," or running scholars; and Martin Luther, as a boy, was fain to appeal in this manner to public benevolence. "Despise not those poor lads who cry at your door 'Panem propter Deum!' and sing their song for their daily bread," he once said to a party of friends. "I myself was once one of these screeching boys, and have sought my bread at people's doors, particularly in my beloved town of Eisenach."

Even in his childhood, signs of the strenuous earnestness appeared that afterwards became the leading feature in the great Reformer's character. The poor scholar gained a warm and constant friend in a certain Mistress Ursula Cotta, a devout matron of Eisenach, who, attracted to the boy by the fervour with which he sang, and perhaps pitying the forlorn condition of one who sought knowledge under truly adverse circumstances, received him into her house, gave him a place at her table, and especially gave the lad the opportunity of cultivating his taste for music. He learned to play on several instruments. Here he acquired that love for music as an art which he not only retained to the end of his eventful life, but which strengthened and deepened in him as he became conscious of the important part it might fulfil in humanizing and softening the rude manners of the people, and how psalmody might go hand in hand with religious teaching. "Music is the best solace for a sad and sorrowful mind," said Luther, "through which the heart is refreshed, and settled again in peace. Music is in itself half a discipline and schoolmistress, making people more gentle and meek, more modest and understanding. . . . I have always loved music; he who hath skill in this art, is of a good mind, and apt for all things. We must of necessity maintain music in schools; a schoolmaster ought to have skill in music, otherwise I would not regard him. . . . Music is a fair gift of God, and nearly allied to divinity; I would not for a great matter be destitute of the small skill in music which I have."

It was a rough discipline, that of Luther's school-time. We hear of his being beaten fifteen times in one day; and even his parents, anxious as they undoubtedly were for his welfare, evidently believed that to spare the rod would be to spoil the child. The first object of Hans Luther's ambition, however, seemed likely to be realized. Martin entered the University of Erfurt as a student of law; and Hans Luther looked forward to the time when his son should take a place among the legal luminaries of Saxony.

MARTIN LUTHER AT THE UNIVERSITY.

During his residence at Erfurt a great change began in the young student. In the library of the convent he found a Latin Bible,—several having been purchased by the convent,—the first time the sacred Volume had ever fallen into his hands. His first feeling he himself describes as that of astonishment at the varied contents of the Book, the number of texts, epistles, and gospels contained in it, which he had never heard explained or even mentioned in the homilies and sermons that made up a great part of the services of the day. Mathesius relates how the history of Hannah and Samuel, which he lighted on by accident on opening the book, was read hastily by him with great joy and delight; and how he began to wish from his whole heart that he might some day be the possessor of a copy of the sacred Volume. "Could I have one of these Books," he exclaimed, "I would ask no other treasure."

of Luther. His eager and ardent mind became at once impressed with the enormous discrepancy between the teaching of the monks and priests of his time and the truth as set forth in the Old and New Testament. A restless spirit of enquiry awoke within him; and the study of the law became as distasteful to him as it appeared centuries afterwards to Schiller. But though his inclination led him so strongly to theology, he still pursued his classical studies. Melancthon declares that at Erfurt Luther read most of the works of the Latin authors of antiquity,—Virgil, Cicero, etc. His classical training, in conjunction with his legal studies, had a great effect towards the attainment of the terse, nervous, logical style which in his preaching afterwards astonished Germany. Vehement and frequently even intolerant as he was in his discourses and treatises, Luther never in speech or writing stooped to adopt the ranting and raving style of many of his opponents. He had too well-trained an intellect to mistake vehement assertion for argument, or piled-up superlatives for force.

His talents as a scholar are proved by the early age at which he took his degree. Though not, like Wolsey, a "boy bachelor," in his twenty-first year he was already "Baccalaureus Philosophiæ," and soon afterwards proceeded to take the degree of Master of Arts. During his student life he seems to have dressed and lived much in the fashion of the ordinary German student of the time. We have a record of his marching out of Erfurt, on one occasion, on a visit to his friends, accoutred with sword and dagger; with the latter of which weapons he contrived, awkwardly enough, to wound himself in such a way as necessitated his being carried back to Erfurt on a friend's shoulders. The dagger, falling from its sheath, had pierced an important vein.

DEATH OF ALEXIS; LUTHER ENTERS A CONVENT.

At the beginning of the summer of 1505, an event occurred that gave a new direction to his whole life. He was journeying on the high road with Alexis, a friend, when a thunder-storm arose; and a flash of lightning stretched his young companion a corpse at his feet. The sight of this awfully sudden death, of the comrade at one moment full of life and joyousness, at the next gone "to his account, unhoarseled, disappointed, unanel'd, with all his imperfections on his head," struck the young graduate with horror. A great fear of judgment to come fell upon him; and trembling for himself, he uttered a vow that if preserved he would devote his life to religion in the fashion generally understood and practised in those days. "Help, Saint Anna!" he exclaimed, "and I will forthwith become a monk."

The vow once made, Luther proceeded with characteristic energy to take measures for its fulfilment. A fortnight sufficed him wherein to settle his worldly affairs, to return his Master of Arts gown and ring to the authorities of the University, and to apprise his father of his intention, who received the intelligence with deep sorrow, for he had looked forward to a brilliant legal career for his gifted son. On St. Alexius' day, July 17th, 1505, he entered the portals of the Augustine convent at Erfurt. "I became a monk," he wrote some time afterwards to his father, who seems to have earnestly dissuaded him from the step, "not of my own will, and still less to pamper my body, but because, when I was by the terror and fear of impending death, I vowed a forced and hasty vow."

His superiors themselves seem to have had some doubts of the permanency of a resolution so suddenly and violently taken, and to have attempted, conscientiously enough, to prove the novice's firmness by putting him to hard and degrading tasks. He was sent out to beg for the convent, made to sweep out the cells, to wind up the clock, etc. The constant repetition of the Hours, or prayers to be said at stated times, was also a sore trial to his active mind, which naturally revolted from mere mechanical and perfunctory exercises. But for two years he remained constant, and then was admitted to ordination,—with the very reluctant consent of his father, who, in his straightforward way and fashion, expressed his idea that there was such a thing as filial duty, and that his feelings had been entirely disregarded in this monastic scheme of his son's. At the dinner given on the occasion of Martin's ordination as a priest, honest Hans Luther somewhat startled the company by rising in his place and bluntly asking, "Is it not written in the Word that a man shall honour his father and his mother?" and on being answered in the affirmative, he turned to his son, and with a very expressive look, hoped that "this might not be a snare of the devil." He knew his son's nature well, the plain old miner, and saw how much spiritual pride was mingled in the persistence of the young ecclesiastic in his sudden and rash resolution. "It is a fine thing," Martin Luther himself afterwards said, "to be a new priest, and to celebrate mass for the first time. Blessed was the mother who had borne a priest! A consecrated person, as compared with an ordinary baptised person, appeared like the morning star compared to a flickering candle."

RELIGIOUS STRUGGLES; PEACE THROUGH FAITH.

But whatever his pride in his new dignity may have been, it gave place, after a time, to doubt and despondency, bordering on despair. A great horror of darkness fell upon him; he deemed himself an object of the anger of the Deity, whom he pictured to himself as an offended God, exacting vengeance for human sin. "Ah, dear Doctor," was his despairing cry to Staupitz, a most benevolent and exemplary man, the Superior of the Augustines at Erfurt,—“our Lord God deals with us in such a terrible manner! Who can serve Him if He thus strikes all around Him?” “Thy thoughts are not according to Christ,” was Staupitz’s grave reproof to him; on another occasion, “Christ does not terrify, He consoles.” By various kinds of conventual mortification, by fasting, watching, and prayer, by “afflicting his soul” until his reason almost gave way, he endeavoured to storm heaven, and to conquer peace, and quiet the terrors of conscience. “I,” he says, “who led the life of a harmless monk, and who yet felt painfully within myself the uneasy consciousness of sin, without being able to attain to the idea of the satisfaction I might offer up to God, felt no love, but rather, to say the truth, hatred for this just God, the punisher of sin; I was indignant against Him, and even gave utterance to murmuring, if not to blasphemy.” In Luther’s description of his mental conflict and troubles there is a remarkable likeness to the account we have of the condition of mind in which Bunyan passed that doleful period that preceded the beautiful calm of holiness in which his later years were spent. “I was lying sick in the infirmary,” says Luther; “the most cruel temptations tortured me, and wore out my frame, so that I could scarcely breathe. No man comforted me; all those to whom I represented my piteous condition replied, ‘I know not.’ Then I said to myself: ‘Am I then the only one among you who is to be thus sad in spirit?’ Oh, what spectres, what terrible forms did I constantly behold!” And Pfizer tells us of nights of anguish passed by the unhappy man, kneeling at the foot of the bed in his narrow cell, with streaming eyes and clasped hands beseeching pardon for his sins. The words in which the great author of the “Pilgrim’s Progress” described his sufferings during his period of mental anguish are strikingly similar to those of the monk of Erfurt, especially where Bunyan tells us of that walk during which he sat down on a settle in the public street, and mused over the most fearful state into which his sin had brought him; when the very sun seemed darkened to him, and the stones in the street seemed to shout forth his reprobation. “Methought they all combined to banish me out of the world. I was abhorred of men, and unfit to dwell among them, because I had sinned against the Saviour. Oh how happy now was every creature over I (sic), for they stood fast and kept their station! But I was gone and lost.”

But finally light broke through the darkness. Luther’s study of the Bible helped him at last to the conviction that man must seek salvation, not in the merits of his own works, but in faith in the mercy of God, through the atonement made by Jesus Christ. From that day until the end of his life he made the Bible his sheet-anchor. “I would rather lose my head than abandon the Divine Word,” he said boldly at Worms to the Archbishop of Trèves. “In what concerns the Word of God and the faith, every Christian is as good a judge for himself as the pope can be for him; for each man must live and die according to that faith. The Word of God is the common heritage of the whole Christian world; each member of which is competent to explain it. The passage from St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv.): ‘If anything be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace,’ proves clearly that the minister must follow the disciple, if the latter understand the Word of God better than he himself does.”

Never was the Divine command “Search the Scriptures” fulfilled with a greater accompanying blessing than in the case of Luther. The Bible was to him as a light unto his feet, and a lamp unto his path. It was the anchor of his hope, his strong defence against his enemies. “Das Wort sie sollen lassen stahn, und keinen Dank, dazn haben (“They shall let the Word stand, and no thanks to them for it”) he wrote in his famous hymn. Not one jot nor one tittle of the sacred Book would he abandon. Of his convent days he himself said: “I made myself so well acquainted with the Bible, that I knew the page and place of every text. No other study than that of the Scriptures interested me; I read them zealously and imprinted them on my memory. Many a time one single significant text dwelt in my thoughts for a whole day.”

LUTHER AT WITTENBERG UNIVERSITY.

In Staupitz, Luther found an influential and constant friend. The Superior valued highly the rare talents and the fiery zeal of the young priest, who was now in his twenty-fifth year, with a mind stored with biblical knowledge, his brain disciplined by study, and his heart purified by the fire of suffering through which he had passed. A new University had been founded at Wittenberg, by the Elector of Saxony; and Staupitz recommended Luther for the post of Professor of Philosophy. Hurriedly summoned by the Elector's mandate to this new scene of labour, the young priest set off to Wittenberg with a stock of worldly goods which could not certainly be said to infringe his monastic vow of poverty, consisting as it did of a coarse stuff robe, a small stock of linen, some books of devotion, and but two especial treasures—a Latin and a Greek Bible. His dislike at having to expound Aristotle was relieved when soon after the more congenial office of Professor of Theology was bestowed upon him. Before this he had already been appointed town preacher, again at the instance of Staupitz, who put him forward against the wish of Luther himself; for, distrustful of his own powers, he declared he should not be able to carry on the thing for three months, and that Staupitz was killing him. "Well, my son," the Superior gravely replied, "if you die, it will be in the Lord's service; and how noble is such a sacrifice!"

LUTHER'S PREACHING.

It soon appeared that Staupitz was right, and that Luther had underrated his own talent. Whenever he preached in the royal chapel, in the collegiate church, or in his monastery, he astonished his hearers. A manner strikingly original, a voice full of power, and an eloquence that proclaimed the preacher's heart to be in his work, at once aroused the attention of his hearers; as did the wonderful felicity and fertility of his illustrations, drawn, not from the dry treatises of the old scholastics, but glowing with the living fire of Holy Writ. Never had such sermons been preached in church or chapel at Wittenberg; and Staupitz's judgment was fully vindicated. With the lectures he had to deliver as Professor of Theology in the University Luther took especial pains, passing, it is said, many nights in study, preparing his expositions, which were luminous in style and full of matter. Dr. Pollich, the first rector of the new University, a learned and far seeing man, was, according to Mathesius, the first to discover the extent of the future labours of the brilliant Professor. "That monk," he said, "will confound all the learned doctors, propound a new teaching, and reform the whole Roman Church; for he studies the writings of the prophets and the evangelists. He relies on the Word of Jesus Christ; no one can subvert that, either with philosophy or sophistry."

HE VISITS ROME; STATE OF THE PAPACY.

It is curious to follow the successive stages by which the mind of Luther was prepared for the great work he was to do. His university appointment had brought with it the necessity of cultivating his argumentative and logical talent; his zeal for the reform of abuses was now to be awakened by an entirely new experience; he was to see with his own eyes the corruption that existed in the city that claimed to be the head-quarters of the Christian faith, the metropolis of the Popes. In 1510 he was despatched by Staupitz on a mission to Rome.

The papacy was at that period in the height of its splendour and magnificence, as it had been at the height of its power two centuries before, under Innocent III. The age of Leo X., the great Medicean Pontiff, was a great epoch for the arts and sciences; painting, sculpture, architecture, flourished exceedingly. It was the time of Raphael and Michael Angelo, of Titian and Leonardo da Vinci. The master-pieces of ancient art were being disinterred; the Apollo Belvidere had been discovered at Antium in 1500, the Laocoon in Rome in 1506. Never had the Popes more thoroughly affected the manners and pursued the policy of magnificent temporal princes than in the days of Julius V., the warlike, and Leo X., the sumptuous. Among the great and magnificent projects of the papacy at this time the construction of the Church of St. Peter was the most stupendous, alike in its design and in its unexpected results; for it taxed the resources of Europe, and the price it ultimately cost was—the Reformation. But in Germany, among all ranks and conditions of men, a deep dissatisfaction prevailed concerning Rome, and the position of the Church in general; and this dissatisfaction had been increasing for a century, ever since the important councils of Constance and Basle had ended in disappointment. The princes were convinced that no voluntary reforms would emanate from the Church itself, and said angrily that the arrogance of the hierarchy, the determination of the Churchmen to resist the action of secular courts, the exactions of the cardinals and prelates, the appointment of foreign and non-resident cardinals to offices in various states, all tended to strengthen the papacy at the expense of their territories. The German prelates, moreover, were indignant at the interference with their rights by the Romish Curia ; the working clergy looked with distaste upon the mendicant friars, who, favoured by the Romish chair, usurped influence everywhere among their congregations. The unclerical lives of many ecclesiastics excited the indignation of the pious ; and the superstitions kept alive and fostered among the people by their clerical teachers awakened the disgust of the thoughtful ; and now, added to all these causes, had come the overturning of the edifice of sophistry raised by the schoolmen, who were encountered partly with the weapons of classic antiquity, recovered by the revival of learning, and still more by the potent weapons of the Bible armoury. The imperial cities, too, were annoyed at the various privileges and immunities which placed the clerics above their authority, while they declared that the convents encouraged mendicancy and vagrondage, and the right of sanctuary was abused for the protection of robbers and murderers. Thus, in all classes, from prince to peasant, the Church had its foes ; and the popular literature of the time, especially in Germany, abounded in satire, directed against priests and monks. •

Such was the state of things when Martin Luther, despatched by Staupitz on business connected with the convent, arrived in Italy. The single-minded Saxon was astonished at the sights he beheld, and at the lives led by the Churchmen. Convents, with idols of marble, feasts served up at monastic tables that might have graced kings' palaces, a general laxity of all clerical and moral discipline, not even Friday kept as a day of abstinence,—these were the things he saw, and at Rome matters were worse than elsewhere. On first coming in sight of Rome, he had fallen on his knees, and with an enthusiasm not yet quenched by all the sorry sights he had beheld in upper Italy, had exclaimed : "I greet thee, thou holy Rome ! Yes, truly holy through the blood of the martyrs, which was here shed." But a fortnight's time, to which he limited his residence in the Papal city, sufficed to utterly alter his views as to the sanctity of the metropolis of the Popes. "I have myself heard it said at Rome," he afterward declared, "that it is impossible matters can remain as they are ; things must change or break down." He saw plainly that the priesthood did not believe the religion they taught ; and that a huge imposture was being carried on. "I would not take a hundred thousand florins not to have been at Rome," was his energetic exclamation as recorded by Mathesius. "I should always have had an uneasy doubt whether I was not doing the Pope injustice. As it is, I am quite satisfied on the point ;" and again, "Whoever has been at Rome knows well that things are worse there than can be expressed in words or believed."

LUTHER A DOCTOR OF DIVINITY ; THE NINETY-FIVE THESSES.

Certainly Luther was not, in the worldly sense of the word, an ambitious man ; for again we find him endeavouring to draw back, when in 1512 Staupitz puts him forward for the degree of Doctor of Divinity, to which by his exertions in the university and in the pulpit he had become fully entitled. Staupitz, with a foreboding that troublous times were coming upon the Church, declared that there would be much work to do soon, and that the services of many vigorous young doctors would be needed. His experience was soon still farther enlarged ; for during an absence of Staupitz in the Netherlands, Luther had to fulfil the duties of vicar ; and he entered upon his temporary office with all his usual energy. He visited the various convents, admonishing the inmates to holiness of life and to the study of the Bible. In a letter to his friend Lange, at Erfurt, written in 1516, he half-playfully complains of the multifariousness of his occupations ; he is vicar, "which means as much as eleven priors," and has, besides, his lectures to deliver, to preach to the brotherhood, to be director of studies, pleader, assessor and conservator of ponds, etc., etc. Certain it is that he had unusual facilities for making himself acquainted with various phases of clerical life.

The next year, 1517, is a memorable one in the life of Luther and in the history of Christianity ; for it was then that the first blow was struck in the great conflict against Church abuses and delusions. Leo X. was frequently in embarrassment for money, the building of St. Peter's in itself absorbing vast sums. He had recourse to the old oft-tried expedient, by which the papal coffers had many times been replenished,—the sale of indulgences, in which forgiveness of sins, release from the fires of purgatory, with other advantages, were promised to the purchaser ; the promises increasing in number and in fervour in proportion to the anxiety of the seller to dispose of his wares. The Archbishop Elector Albert of Mayence, commissioned by Leo, caused a sale of indulgences to be preached in Saxony in 1517; and the work was entrusted to a Dominican monk named Tetzel, who conducted it in such a shameless manner that general scandal was excited. In the previous year already Luther had heard of Tetzel as carrying on his traffic in indulgences, and had angrily declared, "I will make a hole in his drum, so God will." But now the zeal with which Tetzel lauded his ecclesiastical ware surpassed all former efforts in that direction. "So bald das Geld im Kasten klingt, Die Seel alsbald in Himmel springt,"—"So soon as the money rattles in the box" (the iron chest in which he stored up the money paid for his pardons), "the soul at once leaps into heaven,"—was the formula with which the shameless Dominican allured his customers, like a mountebank at a fair. At last Luther, who had already preached vehemently against indulgences as a mischievous delusion, on a day that has become historical, the 31st of October, All-hallows Eve of the year 1517, affixed to the door of the "Schloss-Kirche" at Wittenberg ninety-five theses, or propositions, which he undertook to defend against all comers. At the same time he wrote urgent letters to the Archbishop Elector Albert, and to Jerome, Bishop of Brandenburg, pointing out the probable consequences of Tetzel's proceedings in producing scandal and injury to the Church. To the letter to Archbishop Albert Luther received no answer. "I did not know," he afterwards said, "that he, Albert, had bargained with the Pope to keep for himself half the money received for these indulgences, sending the other half to Rome." The Bishop of Brandenburg did deign to reply; but merely to point out to Luther that he was attacking the Church, and had better be silent. Dr. Staupitz, too, a well-meaning but timid man, remonstrated with Luther, as we find recorded in the "Table Talk" of the latter. "What are you about?" said Staupitz; "they will not allow you to do this!" "But suppose they are compelled to allow it," replied the undaunted Dr. Martin. Some of the points insisted upon in the theses are put in a very terse and graphic way, as in the following: "The treasures of the Gospel are the nets with which they fish for men of worth. The treasures of the indulgences are the nets with which they fish for men of wealth." "Why does not the Pope, in his very holy character, empty purgatory at once, where so many souls are suffering? This would be using his power far more worthily, than by delivering souls for money (money thus earned brings misfortune): and, for what, moreover?

For a building." "They preach devices of human folly, who declare that as soon as the money rattles in the box, the soul soars away out of purgatory." "Christians are to be taught that if the Pope knew of the extortions of the preachers of indulgences, he would rather the metropolitan church of St. Peter were burnt to ashes, than see it built with the skin, flesh, and bones of his sheep." "They teach the doctrines of anti-Christ who assert that to deliver a soul from purgatory or to buy an indulgence there is no need of contrition or repentance."

Such was the outspoken fashion in which the apostle of the reformation declared himself ready to do battle for the truth. The trumpet gave no uncertain sound, and many lifted their heads joyfully, and prepared for the battle. The theses were printed and distributed throughout the length and breadth of Germany, everywhere finding an echo in the hearts of the people. Luther himself was astonished at their popularity, and declared that had he known they would be so extensively circulated, he would have prepared them with greater care. The manly outspoken tone of the theses, the strong common sense clothed in plain yet not undignified remonstrance, and the evident marks of religious earnestness in the writer, roused the enthusiasm of all Germany, especially of the educated youth, who thronged to Wittenberg to listen to the man who was not afraid to stand up for the truth against the Pope himself.

Tetzel replied to the theses with a furious, foaming pamphlet, laden with abuse against heretics and heresiarchs, and upholding, in unmeasured terms, the Pope's infallibility and power to pardon sins. This pamphlet, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing, was received with indifference or contempt. Tetzel burnt Luther's theses publicly at Frankfort; whereupon a number of students and others retaliated by making a bonfire of Tetzel's productions, in the great square at Wittenberg. Dr. John Eck, vice-chancellor of Ingolstadt University, also attacked Luther violently, with abuse for argument,—"that person did a vast amount of harm to his own party, while he rendered me an unintentional service," Luther afterwards wrote. On the other hand, Luther's sermons were full of words as fearless as the theses. "My desire, my prayer, and my advice is, that you do not buy these indulgences. Leave it to bad, idle, sleepy Churchmen to buy them; you can dispense with them. They that preach up indulgences make fools of you; they are not looking after your salvation, but after your pence."

MARTIN LUTHER.

LUTHER BEFORE CARDINAL CAJETAN.

The enormous excitement occasioned by the events at Wittenberg at last excited alarm in Rome. Luther was summoned to appear there; but the intervention of the Elector of Saxony, who was favourably inclined towards the Reformer, procured another arrangement. Cardinal Cajetan, a learned Dominican, came to Augsburg as the Pope's nuncio, and before him Luther appeared in his monk's garb, to speak in defence of his doctrines. The haughty cardinal thought to crush the humble monk at once with the weight of his scholastic learning; but found himself confronted by a man of far more erudition than he had expected. "Because he sat there representing the Pope," says Luther, "he insisted that I should submit and agree to all he said; while, on the contrary, all that I said against it was contemned and laughed at, although I quoted the Scriptures. In short, his fatherly love went no further than that I must suffer violence or recant, for he declared he would not dispute with me." Cajetan ordered Luther out of his presence, forbidding him to appear again until ready to make submission.

To maintain an opinion publicly against a cardinal, who was, moreover, a pope's nuncio, was no light matter. Luther's person was not safe in Augsburg; and he fled from the city by night, after inditing an appeal, "Au den besser zu unterrichtenden Pabst," in which he gives Leo X. an account of the circumstances that had brought him in peril. He got safely back to Wittenberg. Cajetan angrily demanded that the Elector should either send Luther a prisoner to Rome, or at least banish him from his dominions; but the Duke, who revered Luther's courage, and approved of his teaching, and who looked upon him also as the chief glory of the University of Wittenberg, replied that his request to have the matter discussed before an impartial tribunal seemed just and reasonable.

ATTEMPT AT COMPROMISE; LUTHER AND MELANCHTHON.

The death of the Emperor Maximilian, "the last of the knights," in January 1519, brought about a change in the affairs of Luther. Frederick the Wise, the Elector of Saxony, and Luther's protector, had been appointed Regent of the Empire until a new emperor should be chosen. Of the two candidates, Charles of Austria and Francis of France, the Pope secretly favoured the latter; for he dreaded the influence of so mighty a potentate as Charles would become if the diadem of Germany were awarded to him. Wishing to gain the good-will of the Elector of Saxony, he accordingly sent him the mark of distinguished papal favour, the Golden Rose. The Pope's chamberlain, Miltiz, a courtly Saxon nobleman, was also despatched to Wittenberg; and by friendly remonstrances to Luther, with whom he thoroughly coincided on the question of the scandalous indulgence traffic, promising that it should be forthwith abolished, obtained from the Reformer a promise, which was loyally kept, that he would drop the controversy on the subject, provided his opponents did the same. At the same time a letter was stipulated for, and despatched from Luther to the Pope, declaring that there had been no intention to attack the privileges of the papal chair.

But there was a man who would not be satisfied with this apparently peaceful turn of affairs, and who longed to gain a triumph for Rome over the heretics of Wittenberg. This was Dr. Eck, of Ingolstadt, who invited Carlstadt and Luther, the Wittenberg theologians, to a disputation in the Pleissenburg, at Leipsic. The invitation was accepted, and the meeting greatly embittered the strife; for here Luther affirmed boldly, in the presence of the Elector, who was an attentive listener to the arguments on both sides, that he did not consider the authority of the Pope, as head of the Church, to have been derived from the Saviour directly, but that this power had been given by human agency in later centuries. "I do not recognise any one as head of the Church militant," he declared, "but Jesus Christ only, on the authority of the holy Scriptures." And when Eck taunted him with a leaning towards the Hussite heresy of a century ago, his undaunted opponent boldly declared that some of the propositions of Huss and the Bohemians were truly Christian and evangelical. He maintained, moreover, that it would be difficult to prove the infallibility of the Church councils.

This public declaration greatly increased the influence of Luther, who was now more regarded at Wittenberg than ever. Now, also, that he had taken a bolder position by denying the infallibility of the Church councils, he began to enter more deeply into the question of the Romish Church, its pretensions and authority. And here he received invaluable aid from a man who had far more classical learning than he himself could boast, who was rightly spoken of as "abyssus eruditionis," the accomplished Greek and Hebrew scholar who had sounded all the depths of learning, and upon whom rested all the hopes of the "humanists," or advocates of education and enlightenment in Germany. This was Philip Melancthon, who had been called to Wittenberg as professor of Greek and Hebrew, and who soon contracted a friendship with Luther, only to be severed by death. The two men thoroughly respected and appreciated each other; and never were two labourers in the same cause better fitted to work together; for they represented, respectively, boldness and policy. Luther, fearless, sometimes even aggressive, and not unfrequently obstinate, displayed the combative spirit that could pull down and overturn; Melancthon, gentle and persuasive, was willing to give up much for the sake of peace, and was more anxious to build up than to cast down. "I am born," Luther once wrote, "to make war upon hordes and devils, and to take the field, and therefore my books are stormy and warlike. I must tear up the roots and stems, hew away thorns and brambles, and fill up the pit-holes; I am the rough pioneer, who has to clear and prepare a way. But Magister Philip wends quietly and soberly onwards, cultivating and planting, sowing and watering the seed joyfully, God having vouchsafed him of His gifts richly." The whole arrangement of the Church and school system in Saxony is due to Melancthon, in whom Protestant theology and education found the true "præceptor Germaniæ."

THE BULL OF EXCOMMUNICATION BURNT BY LUTHER.

Again it was Dr. Eck who hurried on the next scene of the great drama of the Reformation in Germany. Luther and Melancthon had declared that neither the Pope nor the Church Councils could be regarded as infallible. The indefatigable man of Ingolstadt wrote a book, in which he sought to prove the contrary proposition; and with this he hastened to Rome, and gave such an account of the proceedings at Wittenberg that a papal bull was at once issued, denouncing a number of Luther's propositions as heretical, condemning his works to the flames, and pronouncing him excommunicate unless he recanted within sixty days. Eck returned with this potent weapon to Germany, and everywhere published the decree. But only in a few places, such as Mayence, Cologne, and Louvain, was the sentence carried out regarding the books. The general feeling was one of sympathy with Luther, and of indignation against the condemnation passed upon him, absent and unheard. Mathæsius quaintly and graphically describes the order and its results. "But when the people from Louvain and other universities," he says, "the monasteries, and the bishops attacked Luther's work with glowing fire, such fire having been stirred up and blown into a flame by the Pope at Rome, the Spirit of God came upon this second Samson. On the 10th of December, 1520, he again caused a great fire to be made at Wittenberg before the Elster gate, and into it he himself threw the decrees of the Pope, and also the bull of Leo X., saying, 'Because thou, godless book, hast aggrieved or defamed the saint of the Lord, let eternal fire grieve and consume thee.' This step of Luther's, which was accompanied by the greatest possible publicity—for he went out at the head of a solemn procession of students to burn the book of decretals and the papal bull—cut off all hope of reconciliation with the papal See. He had drawn the sword three years before; he now flung away the scabbard.

Two works published at this time, and entitled respectively "To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation," and "Of the Babylonian Captivity and Christian Freedom," embodied the doctrines afterwards elaborated into the Lutheran system. The most important points were the granting of the sacrament in both forms to the laity, the curtailing of the papal power, the abolition of the celibacy of the priesthood, and the general subordination of the Church to the secular magistracy.

THE DIET OF WORMS, 1521.

We now come to the greatest and most important scene in the life of Luther, the time when he appeared most bravely and undauntedly to stand forth and vindicate the position he had taken up, in the face of the princes, spiritual and temporal, of the whole of Germany.

When the young Emperor Charles V. made his progress up the Rhine after his coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle, at the beginning of 1521, Sickingen, Hutter, and other patriotic men urged him to put himself at the head of the great movement then stirring the country to its lowest depths, and to give his powerful countenance to the formation of a National Church of Germany. It was a grand opportunity, but Charles missed it; for he did not understand the people he had been called to govern, and was persuaded to take the side of the Pope in the great question of the day, and to begin his reign, as he completed it, as an avowed enemy and opponent of the Reformation. The first great diet of the reign was held at Worms, in April 1521; and to that city was Luther summoned to appear before the great council. A safe-conduct was sent to him from the Emperor, and several princes guaranteed him a free and unhindered departure from Worms and return to Wittenberg; but some of his friends shook their heads when they thought how a similar document had been given to Huss for his appearance at the Council of Constance a century before, and how it had not prevented his being arrested, tried, and burnt to death. But Luther declared he would go, and confront every danger. "Christ lives!" he exclaimed, "and I will go to Worms to brave the gates of hell and the powers of the air." On his way he stopped at the village of Möhra, near Eisenach; and here, beneath a great tree, he preached to the thousands who thronged to see him a sermon that was remembered in Germany for many a year; for he spoke boldly and clearly, declaring the truth and the priceless value of the Scriptures, and denouncing with a mighty and soul-stirring energy those who sought to make the Word of God of none effect by their traditions.

The first time Luther appeared before the Diet he appeared somewhat bewildered by the novelty of his position, alone, before that brilliant and majestic assembly. There was no denying the gravity of the danger in which he stood, with the whole power of the Emperor and of the Church arrayed against him. "My little monk," said the renowned commander George of Frundsberg, who met him at the door of the council-hall, which Luther was about to enter, "you are going forth on a path, and are about to take up such a position as I and many other leaders have never ventured on in our most serious combats. If the right is on thy side, and thou art sure of thy cause, go forward in God's name, and be of good cheer, God will not forsake thee." Called upon to recant, Luther asked for time for deliberation to enable him to reply with full knowledge of the point at issue. They granted him until the following day.

On his second appearance he was himself again, and the presence of the numerous and brilliant assembly only seemed to give him fresh courage. Unless convicted of error by the testimony of Scripture, recognizing no other guide than the Bible, the Word of God, he declared that he could and would not recant, inasmuch as a man must never act contrary to his conscience. His concluding words were: "My conscience and the Word of God hold me prisoner; therefore I may not and will not recant! Here I stand! I cannot do otherwise; God help me! Amen."

Thus, before the Emperor, and the magnates spiritual and temporal, of Germany, did the undaunted champion stand up to do battle for biblical truth. "The Catholic himself," says Audin, in his "Life of Luther," "if he will for a moment forget the sectary in the man, cannot but contemplate with admiration, in this grand historical scene of the Diet of Worms, that black-robed monk, standing face to face with and bearding the throng of princes and nobles in their steel panoply, their gauntleted hands grasping the massive hilts of their swords; and his heart will swell within him, as he hears the clear, firm voice of the obscure Brother Martin defying all the powers of the earth. That youthful Emperor of Germany, on whose head rest all the interests of Germany, and whom a mere monk stops short at every turn of the conference; those grave priests, Arnsdorf and Justus Jonas, full of love and enthusiasm, pressing close up to their master, and ready to defend him with their arms, if need be, as well as with their learned voices; that populace, in whose eyes the Augustine monk was wonderful, as the latest novelty of the time; that old Frundsberg, who addresses the indigent monk as if he were an armed warrior; that archbishop, his venerable head whitened in the service of God, conspicuous among the steel casques that glitter in the sun's rays; that Velus, eloquent by mere force of logic; those warm, excitable, southern faces, full of restless energy, contrasting with the motionless features of the German spectators,—all this forms a magnificent spectacle."

Every effort to induce him to modify his declaration proved unavailing. On the 25th of April the Archbishop of Treves announced to him that since he had not chosen to listen to the counsels of his Imperial Majesty and the states of the empire, action would be taken against him by the Emperor. Meanwhile, twenty days were accorded to him, under the Imperial safe-conduct, to return to Wittenberg, whence he had come. It seems indeed marvellous, considering the boldness with which Luther had spoken, that he was permitted to depart unmolested from the Diet; but the times were dangerous, and the Emperor himself was half-bewildered by manifestations that indicated a new spirit among the people. The enthusiasm exhibited for Luther, the sympathy and interest with which his words were listened to, not merely by the people but by many among the nobles, rendered any attempt on his personal liberty dangerous and doubtful; and thus, on the 26th of April, he turned his back on the cathedral city that had witnessed his confession of faith, made before the Emperor and in the face of the world, and took the road to Wittenberg. Shortly afterwards the ban of the Empire was pronounced against him and his followers. His works were condemned to the flames; and after the 15th of May, the day on which the safe conduct expired, all were forbidden to give him shelter or assistance, while every one was enjoined to seize the outlaw wherever he should encounter him, and deliver him into the hands of justice, that he might be dealt with according to his deserts. Luther had warned earthly powers and dignities—"Beware," he had publicly cried in the Diet, "lest if you condemn the Divine Word that Word send forth upon you a deluge of ills, and the reign of the noble young Emperor, upon whom, next to God, repose all our hopes, be speedily and sorely troubled. . . . For God confounds the hypocrite in his hypocrisy, and overturns mountains ere they know of their fall." Such plain speaking was not, in Charles's opinion, compatible with the maintenance of his own authority; and he determined, in conjunction with the ecclesiastical powers of Rome, to extirpate the heresy this bold man had proclaimed, at all costs and all hazards.

LUTHER AT THE WARTBURG.

Frederick, the Elector of Saxony, a warm admirer and a constant friend of Luther, was in considerable perplexity on his account. It was dangerous to stand forward openly as the champion of a man under the ban of the empire; while to abandon the Reformer would be to ensure his imprisonment if not his death. Under these difficult circumstances, the wary Prince judged it best to cause Luther to disappear for a time from the eyes of his countrymen; the withdrawal of their leader and champion, he sagaciously judged, would excite indignation among the followers of the Reformer, inflame their zeal, and probably increase their numbers; while the act of outlawry, when the flush of novelty had gone, would probably become a dead letter. Accordingly he adopted a method by which the Reformer was snatched from the enemies who lay in wait for him, while the Elector did not appear as his rescuer. By the order of the Duke Frederick, Luther's carriage was stopped on the road near the castle of Altenstern, not far from Waltershausen, by a party of armed men, led by Captain Hans von Berlepsch and Barkard von Hund, Lord of Altenberg. His younger brother jumped from the carriage in terror, and ran away into the forest. Annsdorf, his other companion, was driven on alone, Luther having been compelled to alight and proceed with his captors, who took from him his robe, and dressed him in a military garb, disguising his features with a false beard. Luther was carried off to one of the Elector's castles, the famous Wartburg, near Eisenach, where he lived in safety and concealment for nearly a year, under the name of "Junker" or "Rerter Georg." At first his friends mourned him as one dead, or condemned to secret and perpetual imprisonment; but soon letters, despatched at intervals to his more intimate friends, and dated, whimsically enough, in reference to the lofty position of the Wartburg: "From the region of the air;" "From the region of birds;" "From the mountain;" "From my Patmos," convinced his adherents that he was not only alive, but active and zealous as ever in the cause. "While our doctor was kept quite secretly at the Wartburg," writes Mathesius, "he was not idle, but pursued daily his studies and his prayers, and devoted himself to the Greek and Hebrew Bibles." Luther himself writes: "In the meantime I intend to translate the New Testament into our mother tongue, as our people wish. Oh that every city had its own translator; so that this book might be in the hands and heart of every one!"

He was in safety; but his spirit pined in enforced retirement, while he mournfully persuaded himself at times that the work he had begun was not prospering, and that though Paul might sow and Apollos water, the blessing of increase had been denied. Bodily ailments and afflictions weighed heavily upon him also; and so unfit did he feel for study and work, that to his disturbed imagination it appeared as if the spirits of evil were visibly present, mocking at him, and hindering his work. Witness that black ink-stain on the wall of his little room in the Wartburg, still pointed out by the attendants as made "when Luther threw his inkpot at the devil, who mocked him for translating the Bible." A bag of walnuts is put into his room; he fancies that the nuts, after jumping about in the sack, come to the side of his bed to "make noises at him." Though continually busy, not only with his Bible translation, but with various controversial works, he fancies he is doing nothing, while, in truth, Germany is inundated with his books. He reproaches himself for not having done more at Worms to testify to the truth. "I am full of trembling," he writes, "and my conscience troubles me, that when at Worms yielding to your advice and that of your friends

I allowed the spirit within me to give way, instead of showing myself as another Elias to those idols. They should experience very different things from me if once again I came in contact with them." To Archbishop Albert of Mayence, who had again taken up the sale of indulgences, he despatched a letter of warning and reproof, not unmingled with threatenings. "My God lives, be assured," he writes, "and He is well able to fight against a Cardinal of Mayence, even if that Cardinal had four emperors at his side. It is His pleasure to break the cedars, and to abase proud hardened Pharaohs. I entreat Your Grace not to tempt the anger of that great God." Part of his letter is positively abusive, as where he writes, "I will treat you as I have treated the Pope, and will show the world what difference there is between a wolf and a bishop." It is due to Archbishop Albert to record that he replied in a temperate spirit, assuring his angry opponent that a remedy had already been applied to the abuses against which Luther wrote.

Here also he deeply considered the question of the monkish and priestly vows of celibacy; and came to the conclusion that monastic engagements, generally entered into without due knowledge or consideration, or under external pressure, should not be held as binding. At the same time he disapproved of the turbulent manner in which many monks and nuns had quitted their convents. "After the example of Cyrus in Herodotus," he writes to Wenceslaus Link, "I would have you give full liberty to those who desire to leave their seclusion;—but by no means compel any to leave it; nor on the other hand force any to stay who wish to go."

TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

It was not until thirteen years afterwards that the first complete edition of Luther's translation of the Bible, begun in the Wartburg, and the result of long years of study, was published. It is the chief work of Luther, and would be enough to immortalize his name had he produced nothing else but this. Apart from its priceless value in spreading the knowledge of the Scriptures throughout Germany, this translation is enormously important in the history of high German literature, which may be said to have its commencement here. The difficulties of the task weighed upon him heavily in his retirement in the Wartburg. "I have taken upon myself a burden beyond my strength," he writes. "Now for the first time I perceive what is meant by a translation, and why no one has until now ventured to put his name to one. It is to be hoped that we may give to our Germany a better version than the Latin one. It is a great work, well worthy that we should all labour at it."

Luther looked upon this Bible translation as the most important of all his achievements, and his zeal not only carried him to the end of his task, but stimulated him to fresh efforts at its completion. After the German version had been published, he at once commenced revising it, with the help of the best coadjutors he could bring together. The learned Melancthon, Justus Jonas, Drs. Krentziger, Bernhard Ziegler, and Forstenius, with some foreign philologists, Jewish rabbis, and others, formed a kind of synod, with Luther as President, for the revising of the text, holding their consultations with the Greek, Chaldee, Hebrew, and Latin versions before them for reference and comparison. The Germans have good reason to hold "Luther's Bible" in honour, for this translation was the life-work of a great and ardent man. Of all his assistants he placed the highest value upon the learned gentle-hearted Melancthon. "No commentator has come nearer to the spirit of the Apostle Paul than my Philipppus," he said, in 1524.

THE ICONOCLASTS.

Meanwhile grave events had been happening at Wittenberg. With all his sturdy out-spoken vehemence against what he considered mischievous error, Luther was yet conservative by nature, and opposed to sudden, sweeping, and ill-considered changes. It was therefore with bitter chagrin and disquietude that he heard how some of his friends had been showing far more zeal than discretion during his absence in his Patmos. Dr. Carlstadt (Bodenstedt) especially, an unwise, changeable, and fanatical man, abolished the mass, thundered against Church ceremonies generally, and pronounced the presence of images in churches to be a form of idolatry. He even put himself at the head of a party of violent and ignorant men, with whom he entered All Saints' Church at Wittenberg; and shouting the second commandment as a justification of their proceedings, they began during divine service to break the images of saints in pieces. This iconoclastic fury quickly spread to other towns; and paintings, and even stained-glass windows, were included in the list of idolatrous ornaments. Zwingli, the Zurich reformer, was so ill-advised as to countenance these proceedings from the pulpit, vehemently declaiming against "graven images." These were among the things that alienated from the Reformation the learning and genius of Erasmus, who, protesting against this vandalism, wrote that the symbols which adorn our Christian temples were not placed there for the adoration of the faithful, but as elegant decorations or pious memorials. Carlstadt presently placed himself at the head of a fanatical sect, calling themselves Zwickau prophets. From among these arose those Anabaptists whose extravagances, afterwards including among the most violent of them the practice of polygamy and the doctrine of community of possessions, prejudiced the minds of many against the Reformation altogether.

These disorders induced Luther to quit the Wartburg suddenly, without waiting for the permission of the Elector. In March 1522 he made his way, disguised as a trooper, the "Cavalier George," to Wittenberg, by his presence and exhortations to put an end to these abuses. "My bitterest enemies," he declared, "though they have at times pressed me hard, have never dealt me so heavy a blow as I have just received from my own people." During a week he preached daily at Wittenberg against the over-hasty, ill-considered innovations, and succeeded in winning the minds of men for the gradual and natural development of the Reformation. It was at this time that the book of Henry VIII. against Luther appeared, for which the title "Defender of the Faith" was accorded to that fickle and imperious monarch. Luther replies to his royal traducer in no measured terms, attributing the King's anxiety to defend the papacy to an uneasy knowledge of the weakness of his own title, and a consequent anxiety to secure the countenance and protection of the holy See. "Hal and the Pope," he writes, "have exactly the same legitimacy; the Pope stole his tiara as the King did his crown; and this is the reason why they are as thick together as two mules in harness." But though his language at this period frequently betrays a deplorable violence, arising partly, it would seem, from the irritation caused by over-work and anxiety, the rock to which Luther clings, the foundation upon which he builds up his whole system, the idea of Bible truth as the one infallible guide, appears in his writings more strongly relied on than ever. He declares the Word of God to be superior to everything else. If he has the Divine Majesty on his side he cares not though a thousand Augustines, a thousand Cyprians, a thousand churchfuls of Henries, should rise up against him. He is convinced that God, as manifested in His Word, cannot err or deceive, while Augustine and Cyprian, like other holy men, may err and have erred.

Pope Adrian VI. was urgent for the carrying into effect of the sentence against Luther; and promised that he would himself institute a reformation in the Church. But the movement had gone too far. Luther was now looked upon as the representative of the principle of resistance against papal tyranny. Wittenberg had become the head-quarters of German culture, and was visited by students from all parts of the empire. The Bible translation continued to appear in parts at intervals, and every now and then a pamphlet, none the less relished for its polemic character, kept up the zeal and interest of the adherents of the reformers. Melancthon, learned, wise, and moderate, gave a definite form to the new faith, in his "Loci Communes," and the party of progress in Germany not only gave in their adhesion to the Reformation, but represented that movement as the struggle of civilization against barbarism, of enlightenment against mediæval ignorance. The citizens especially, and before all those of the imperial free cities, were zealous for its cause. Even the popular literature took the direction of praise of the reformers, and of satire against their opponents. Hans Sachs, the "cobbler bard" of Nuremberg, hailed Luther as the Wittenberg nightingale; and to religious zeal was added the impulse that arose from the prospect of more temporal advantages. As a German historian tersely expresses it: "To princes were promised Church lands, to the priests wives, to the people freedom."

LUTHER'S MARRIAGE.

Of his detestation of the Romish institution of the celibacy of monks, priests, and nuns, Luther gave a practical proof in 1525. In that year he married, taking to wife Catherine of Bora, who had formerly been a nun. His domestic life was singularly happy. His wife, though not a woman of high intellectual powers, was warm-hearted and affectionate; the marriage was blessed with five children. Luther himself describes his wife as "gentle, obedient, and kind in all things, far beyond my hopes."

It was a great advantage to the cause of the Reformation that the attention of the Emperor was called off from Germany by the war in which he became involved in Italy, and which brought him into opposition against Clement VII. who succeeded to the papal chair after the short reign of Adrian VI. The new faith had thus time to become firmly rooted in the empire, before it had to take the field, and maintain itself by force of arms. Besides the Elector Frederick of Saxony, other princes also gave in their adhesion to the doctrines of the Reformation, and adopted the new faith. And even in Southern Germany, in the Bavarian and Austrian States, the cause flourished exceedingly.

THE PEASANT WAR.

But a new danger menaced the cause. The condition of the peasantry throughout Germany had for a long period been miserable, and was now almost unbearable. The government was weak, and could not shield these poor serfs against the oppression of their feudal lords, who harried them grievously, subjecting them to a crushing taxation, and treating them in all respects like slaves. Understanding, under the idea of evangelical liberty, the form of freedom they most coveted and could best comprehend—immunity from taxes—the poor ignorant bondsmen rose in revolt in various parts of Germany, and soon disgraced their cause by excesses resembling those of Cade's rebellion in London. In various instances the nobles, who had certainly done enough to earn the undying hatred of the peasantry, were murdered, as in the case of Count Helfenstein, massacred with spears by an enraged throng. Castles were burned and houses plundered; and it was not until a general union of the forces of the princes against these marauders had taken place, that the rebellion was put down; ending, as such attempts are wont to do, in the yet deeper degradation of the rebels. Luther, who saw in these disturbances a potent weapon that might be used with advantage against the Reformation, was especially anxious to sever his cause from that of the peasants, with whom he would have nothing in common. He even for a time lost sight of Christian charity, and, forgetting how dire had been the provocations that had driven these unhappy men into rebellion, roused up all Germany, in fiery pamphlets, against the "murdering and plundering peasants," who, he said, should be hunted down and slain wherever they were met with. He was especially anxious that nothing should occur to deprive the Reformation of the support of the princes, upon whose co-operation and goodwill he chiefly depended to maintain it against the Emperor and the Romish Church. In his anxiety to dissipate the idea of religious reform from that of opposition against temporal authority, Luther sometimes went so far as to substitute one tyranny for another, preaching a doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance with regard to the princes, that was, to say the least of it, burdensome and not free from servility. Thus Sebastian Frank,

Luther's contemporary, and one of the most enlightened men of his century, bemoans the dogmatic and uncompromising severity with which the power of the ruler, whether exercised for good or for evil, is upheld by the Lutheran system. "Formerly, under the Papacy," he writes, "one had much more freedom in denouncing the vices even of lords and princes; but now everything must be done courtier-like, or it's called sedition, Lord help us!" A German historian has justly remarked that rebellion, when once it has attained authority, generally becomes conservative, and maintains its own authority by all and every means. The story of the combat between irresponsible power and freedom has frequently shown that the rebels of yesterday may become the despots of to-day.

LUTHER AND ZWINGLI; CONFESSION OF AUGSBURG.

It is greatly to be deplored that Luther did not see his way to co-operate with Zwingli, the head of the Zurich Reformers; and that the debate between the two chiefs, in 1529, in the castle of Marburg, on the vital question of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, ended in the separation of two great bodies of Christians who should have stood together, especially in those dangerous times. Zwingli showed a far more conciliatory spirit, and held out his hand, even with tears, desiring friendship with his opponent. "There are no people on earth with whom I would sooner be united than with those of Wittenberg," he exclaimed. But Luther sternly rejected the proffered union. "Ye have a different spirit from ours," was his reply.

Less than thirteen years after the theses had been affixed to the church door at Wittenberg, the seed then sown had ripened into a plentiful harvest. On the famous 31st of October, 1517, it was a solitary priest who stood up to maintain the cause of the truth; on the 25th of June, 1530, a goodly assemblage of Reformers met the Emperor at Augsburg, to proclaim before the face of all men their confession of faith. Luther himself was not present on this great occasion, for he was still under the ban of the Empire, pronounced against him nine years before at Worms. He was in the castle of Coburg; but in the spirit he was present with his friends on the day of the Confession of Augsburg. "With sighing and prayer I am truly and faithfully beside you," he is writing to Melancthon. "The cause itself concerns me also; indeed, more than any of you."

MARTIN LUTHER.

DOMESTIC LIFE AND TRIALS.

For some time after his marriage he was very poor, and at no time could his household dispense with the strictest economy. But with undiminished cheerfulness he learned the art and mystery of wood-turning; content, like St. Paul, to labour with his hands for his family's support and his own. His income never exceeded two hundred Meissen florins, a sum which, even in those days of cheap living, could afford only the necessaries of life, and at one period he hardly had these. "You ask me for eight florins," he writes to Spalatin; "where on earth am I to get eight florins?" Though his bookseller offered him an income of four hundred florins annually, for whatever he might write, whether it were less or more, he refused. His rigid conscience would not permit him to take money for proclaiming the truth. Some copies of each work, for distribution, constituted the only stipend he received.

His health, in the latter years of his life, was broken; he was subject to various painful maladies; and his strong belief in direct agency in the government of the world caused him to ascribe these attacks, when they came, to Satanic power. "I take it," he says, "that my malady is made up, first of the ordinary weakness of advanced age; secondly, of the results of my long labours, and habitual tension of thought; and thirdly, above all, of the blows of Satan: if this be so, there is no medicine in the world will cure me." Nevertheless he continued working to the last—exhorting, preaching, watching over the growth of the Church of which he had been the corner-stone.

DEATH OF LUTHER.

His life ended at Eisleben, where it had begun. In January of the year 1546, he set forth, accompanied by his three sons, on a journey to visit the counts of Mansfeldt, in the character of a peace-maker, a quarrel having broken out in the family concerning that fertile source of strife, worldly possessions. He succeeded in his mission; but on his return fell ill at Eisleben, and laid himself down to die. His faith burned brightly up as his bodily strength waned. And still there was a touch of the old combative spirit to the last. He thanked God in prayer that the Saviour had been revealed to him, "Jesus Christ in whom I have believed, and whom I have confessed, and whom the sorry Pope and godless people persecute." His friends were assembled round his dying bed. The faithful old companion Justus Jonas asked him if he died faithful to the doctrine he had professed and preached, and the dying Reformer's last word was an emphatic "Yes!" Then he closed his eyes and gradually fell asleep. It was the 18th of February, 1546.

ESTIMATE OF HIS CHARACTER.

As with many other great men, attempts have been made to invest Luther with graces of which he knew himself to be deficient, to represent him as a perfect man. We prefer giving the picture that shows him as he was. In Luther we find the strong rugged nature of the peasant of lower Germany. He was a man of deep feeling, thoroughly penetrated with the conviction of the truth and of the saving power of biblical Christianity; but at the same time hard-headed and opinionated, thoroughly after the fashion of a Saxon peasant, somewhat narrow in his views, and of limited theological education.

But such as he was, and showed himself to be, Luther was eminently the man to set up the standard of revolt against Rome, to enter upon a combat for life or death, to wrestle shoulder to shoulder with the colossal power of the Papacy. He feared only God and the Devil—fear of man was unknown to him. In the beginning, his progress on the path of anti-papal rebellion was cautious, almost marked by timidity. On several occasions it was in the power of the Romanists to have brought back the rebel, or at least to have arrested his onward progress. But just in proportion as the measures taken by the opponents of the brave monk became more arrogant, displaying increased hatred and obstinacy, did his figure become more heroic. The grandest period of his life was the year 1521, when, undeterred by danger, difficulty, and the warning of his friends, he undertook that heroic journey in a peasant's waggon to Worms, there to confront all that the power of an Emperor and a council of princes and the malice of Romish hierarchy could bring against him. "If they were to kindle between this and Worms," he said, "a fire that should reach to Heaven, yet will I pass through it, and go forth into the very teeth of the behemoth." It was the perfection of heroism; and like Ridley and Latimer at the stake, on the day when Luther stood alone, in the strength of his sure and certain belief, undaunted in the presence of that great assembly, he kindled a flame in the heart of the German people, that from that hour to this has never been extinguished.

EMINENT DENOMINATIONAL PREDECESSORS.

THE history of the denomination to which the distinguished pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle belongs is in some respects a singularly chequered narrative; but at the same time the story is closely associated with the names of men who were eminent for piety, for genius, and for the philanthropy which leaves its mark upon the world. The Baptists and the Quakers have always been considered the farthest removed from the Papacy of all Protestant sects; and hence, in the Reformation era, they naturally attracted the bitterest hatred of all who showed a disposition to retain old abuses, and stand by the old order of things. The records of three centuries and a half ago are not only very obscure, but what they contain at all is, for the most part, supplied by enemies, who, in those exciting times of fierce controversy and no quarter, were not likely to tell an impartial or unvarnished tale. There were doubtless indiscretions committed by zealots who chose to attach to themselves a particular name; but these were not committed by one side alone; and in any case the acts of individuals are not sufficient warrant for misrepresenting a whole class. Whatever may have been their general failings, the members of the body in question have been stout-hearted enough to face the gaol, the gallows, or the stake, rather than surrender their belief; and for this reason the roll of their martyrology is somewhat extended, whether reckoned in connection with this country alone, or whether including the wider area of Europe. That roll commences with the sufferings of some of the earliest victims of intolerance, while it includes Edward Wightman, who was burned at Lichfield in 1612, and was the last person executed in England for the crime of "heresy."

Coming to later times, we find that the first pastor of Devonshire-square Chapel, William Kiffen, was important enough to advance Charles II. £30,000; and while in the same century John Bunyan was the most clear-shining star among the preachers, there is presumptive evidence that the author of Paradise Lost belonged to the same sect as the author of The Pilgrim's Progress. In the next century, William Carey rose from the position of a common shoemaker to become one of the most distinguished linguists of his time, and one who devoted energy and talent to the task of translating the Bible into many of the languages of India. Contemporary with Carey was William Knibb, who did more than anyone else to abolish slavery in Jamaica. Belonging to the same age were Robert Hall, a man whom the late Dean Stanley judged to be the greatest preacher England has ever produced; John Foster, who on account of the additions he made to standard literature, is still recognised as the Essayist; and John Howard Hinton, one of the most vigorous theological thinkers of his time, whose son James won equal distinction in the walks of science. These are representatives selected from a large number of others. Mr. Spurgeon himself has frequently referred to his once eminent predecessor, Dr. Gill, the commentator and Hebrew scholar, whose published works fill some ten thousand folio pages.

ANCESTRY AND PARENTAGE.

The family of Spurgeon originally belonged to the Netherlands; but not content to live under the cruel rule of a proud tyrant like the Duke of Alva, they emigrated to the Eastern counties of England during the reign of Elizabeth.

The emigrants who thus found a congenial home in this favoured isle, where the Reformation had permanently struck its roots, did not keep together, however; for while one section remained in Norfolk, others went further afield to settle in Essex; and from this latter stock the present world-renowned preacher is descended. For generation after generation did these two branches of the family cling with unflagging tenacity to the faith of their ancestors—a faith they have retained in its purity down to our own times. "Early in his ministry in London," says Mr. Stevenson, speaking of our immediate subject, "he was introduced at a book-store in Paternoster-row to Mr. John Spurgeon, a descendant of the Norwich branch of the family; and on comparing notes of their respective ancestors, piety, uprightness, and loyalty were found alike in both." About a century after their settlement in England the family had a further taste of persecution; for when the rigorous laws against Nonconformists were in force under Charles II., we find a member of the family, one Job Spurgeon, suffering a long and painful imprisonment at Chelmsford for 'conscience' sake. From the earliest times the family were evidently ranked among the Puritans; and when Puritanism broke with the Established Church in the secession of 1662, they doubtless became Nonconformists.

The Rev James Spurgeon, the grandfather of the popular preacher, is still well remembered by many persons of our acquaintance as an elderly gentleman who dressed after the manner of the old-fashioned school, and who was of spare habit and rather short in stature. Born in 1776, He was of the Independent denomination, and had been educated for the ministry at Hoxton Academy, once an important college of the Dissenters, and the remains of which may still be seen in the chapel still standing in the interesting High Street of Hoxton Old Town. James Spurgeon followed business pursuits until he was twenty-six, when he relinquished other worldly prospects for the sake of the Christian ministry. After going through the usual four years' curriculum, he settled at Clare, in Suffolk, in 1806; but in 1810 he removed to Stambourne, in Essex, where he remained until the time of his death in 1864.

Retaining till the last a predilection for the old school of Calvinistic theologians, this veteran also at times could deal in that species of wit which is supposed to be characteristic of a Puritan ancestry. Subject to a hereditary affliction, we have heard that when advanced nearly to the end of the ninth decade of his life, he would sit by the fire on a winter night, and rubbing both aching knees, declare that there was a probability of his days being, after all, cut short by rheumatism. He showed the strongest possible partiality for his grandson; and perhaps was never happier than when that grandson could be announced as the centre attraction of some coming festival—the preacher of an anniversary sermon. On one memorable occasion, through some disarrangement on the railway, the young orator, eagerly expected, was so long delayed, that the old pastor commenced a sermon himself, but on seeing his relative enter the chapel, he immediately stopped and descended from the pulpit. When the new-comer had finished his more brilliant discourse, the delighted octogenarian quietly told the people, that although the grandson could preach better than the grandfather, he could not preach a better Gospel.

A minister with whom we are acquainted some time ago supplied us with an original reminiscence of Stambourne, which shows how decidedly old Mr. Spurgeon was prejudiced in favour of one classic hymn-writer above all others. Our friend was appointed to preach on a special occasion for the octogenarian pastor, and he had hardly entered the chapel before a well-wisher approached, who, in a tone of nervous eagerness, ventured to express a hope that the hymns selected for singing were all by Dr. Watts. Unluckily this was not the case; but as time was too pressing to make any alteration without inconvenience, those selected were allowed to pass, let the consequences be what they might. When the first hymn was announced, the aged pastor betokened grave disapproval by a significant shake of the head; when he discovered the authorship of the second, he closed the book, and refused to join in the singing; and on finding that the third was no improvement on its predecessors, he shook his fist as though he knew of a way of teaching preachers better manners, were not summary action held in check by reverence for times and places. When the people had dispersed, he approached our friend, and, with eyes twinkling with excitement, gave utterance to feelings too long pent up in his soul. "Young man," he cried, as he gave ominous significance to his words by raising a stout stick which he usually carried about,—“young man, if you do not want your brains knocked out, you must sing Dr. Watts's hymns!” We are able to vouch for the fact that the indiscretion of the morning was not repeated in the evening. Elated at this grateful change, the venerable man no longer clenched his fist; nor was the stout stick any longer in requisition; but on the contrary, venting that extreme satisfaction which now filled his soul, he spoke accordingly, “Right, sir, right,” he cried, “I am glad to see you can appreciate the best authors so quickly!”

The Spare Half-Hour, by Mr. Spurgeon, opens with “A tale of my Grandfather,” which contains one or two very striking passages respecting a place called Honey-wood Park, whither the old man had been wont to resort at stated intervals for private devotion and meditation; the once secluded retreat being the more sacred to him because there, while passing along, his own father had fallen down and died. On one occasion, as the Rev. J. Spurgeon told his grandson at one of the last interviews the two were privileged to enjoy together, he had to go from Coggeshall to Halstead, and the road passed by the spot above-mentioned, to which so many hallowed memories were attached. The narrative goes on to say that “on the previous night he dreamed very vividly that the devil appeared to him, and threatened to tear him in pieces if he dared to go along that footpath and pray under the oak as he had been wont to do. The evil one reminded him that there was another way through the farmyard, and that if he took the farmyard path all would go well with him. When my grandfather awoke, the impression on his mind was overpowering, and he reasoned thus with himself:—Whether it be a dream or a temptation from Satan I cannot tell, but anyhow I will not yield to it, but will show the devil that I will not do his bidding in anything, but will defy him to his face. This was the good man all over. Like Luther, he had a vivid impression of the reality and personality of the great enemy, and was accustomed to make short work with his suggestions. . . . My grandfather, then a young man, went on cheerily enough till he came to the stile where the two paths diverged; then a horrible fear came upon him, and he felt his heart beat fast. Suppose he really should meet the arch-fiend, and should find him too strong for him, what then? Better take the farm-yard path. No, that would be yielding to Satan, and he would not do that for ten thousand worlds. He plucked up courage, and tremblingly pressed on. The stile was leaped, the narrow track through the wood was trodden with resolution mingled with forebodings. The oak was in sight, the sweat was on his face, his pace was quickened, a dash was made, and the tree was grasped, but there was no Satan there. Taking breath a moment, the young man uttered aloud the exclamation, 'Ah, cowardly devil, you threatened to tear me in pieces, and now you do not dare show your face!' Then followed a fervent prayer and a song of praise, and the young man was about to go on his way when his eye was caught by something shining on the ground. It was a ring, a very large ring, he told me, nearly as large as a curtain-ring, and it was solid gold; and how it came there it would be hard to guess. Inquiries were made, but no claimant ever appeared, and my grandfather had it made into my grandmother's wedding ring, in memory of the spot so dear to him." The Rev. James Spurgeon celebrated his ministerial jubilee year in 1856; and No. 81 of his grandson's printed sermons is a discourse preached at Stambourne on that occasion. We have dwelt thus long on Stambourne and its associations, because there, in the manse of his grandfather, and under the care of a maiden aunt, the future great preacher spent several of his earliest years.

His own recollections go back to times when, as a child, he used to spend many of his hours in his grandfather's study, sitting on a hassock looking at missionary pictures in The Evangelical Magazine; and when the choicest recreation was to follow horses and dogs on foot, over hedges and ditches, in the hunting field.

John, second son of the above, one of a family of ten children, is the father of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Engaged in business until middle life, he afterwards turned attention to the Christian ministry, and has held pastorates successively at Tollesbury and Cranbrook, at Fetter Lane in London, and at Upper Street, Islington. Though a Pædobaptist, the theology of the Rev. John Spurgeon corresponds with that of his father before him, and also with that of his celebrated son. He married Miss Jarvis of Colchester, who is still living, and who, according to the testimony of all her children, has been one of the best of mothers.

EARLY DAYS AND YOUTHFUL ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. Spurgeon was born at the old-fashioned Essex village called Kelvedon, on the 19th of June, 1834; and with his brother James, who is three years younger, he received his first education at a school in that place. Charles appears thus early to have been celebrated for having a larger head than James, but both were popular with their playmates and schoolfellows. A reminiscence of these earliest days comes from the Rev. John Spurgeon himself: "I had been from home a great deal," he once remarked to an American divine visiting this country,

"trying to build up weak congregations, and felt that I was neglecting the religious training of my own children while I toiled for the good of others. I returned home with these feelings, I opened the door, and was surprised to find none of the children about the hall. Going quietly up the stairs, I heard my wife's voice. She was engaged in prayer with the children. I heard her pray for them one by one by name. She came to Charles, and specially prayed for him, for he was of high spirit and daring temper. I listened until she had ended her prayer, and I felt and said, 'Lord, I will go on with Thy work. The children will be cared for.'" The religious and moral discipline to which the young people were subject in such a home was, of course, of unspeakable value; but happily their advantages were not limited to the boundaries of home. The clergyman of the parish, the Rev. Charles Dalton, who held the living for over fifty years, having been a pattern in his profession worthy of ranking with Dr. Primrose in The Vicar of Wakefield. How shall we account for the remarkable manner in which the air of these old Essex manse seems to have promoted longevity? The Rev. James Spurgeon and three others ministered to the same people for two centuries; and Kelvedon was in a way a rival of Stambourne.

At the age of seven years, C. H. Spurgeon returned to the home of his parents, who were then living at Colchester, and who were anxious that the already precocious child should enjoy the best possible educational advantages. His education, therefore, went forward satisfactorily; for with good masters and kind friends the pupil gave evident signs of yielding back at another day something more than good interest for all the trouble expended upon him. We once heard Mr. Spurgeon relate an anecdote of these early days at school, which was very characteristic of himself and his surroundings while he was a school-boy. One extremely cold morning, while engaged with a tutor in the class, the bottom and least honourable place happened to be near a large stove; and as the grateful warmth seemed to be more desirable than any transient scholastic honours, the wary lad took care not to manifest that knowledge which would have sent him up higher into the cold. Questions continued to be asked to remain unanswered; but being a shrewd observer, the tutor presently detected where the shoe was pinching, and thus immediately ordered a wheel round so that the head of the column should be next the fire. That unexpected stratagem had the looked for effect of at once curing Master Spurgeon's unaccountable dulness. No sooner were questions asked than he replied to them; and in less time than it has taken to describe, he was again enjoying the warm place by the fire. It was in this same academy that he subsequently became a tutor; and he did so at a time when many of the boys who were subject to his authority were bigger than himself.

During those early and happy days of life at school, C. H. Spurgeon still passed his vacations in the manse at Stambourne; and in The Spare Half-Hour he relates, in his usual vivid style, several recollections. It was customary with the grandfather to allow his grandson to read the Scriptures at family worship; and strangers who were occasionally present were wont to remark on the unerring correctness with which the youthful reader went through the exercise. "Once upon a time," writes Mr. Spurgeon, "when reading the passage in Revelation which mentions the bottomless pit, I paused and said, 'Grandpa, what can this mean?' The answer was kind but unsatisfactory: 'Pooh, pooh, child, go on.' The child, however, intended to have an explanation, and therefore selected the same chapter morning after morning, and always halted at the same verse to repeat the inquiry, hoping that by repetition he would importune the good old gentleman into a reply. The process was successful; for it is by no means the most edifying thing in the world to hear the history of the Mother of Harlots, and the beast with seven heads every morning in the week, Sunday included, with no sort of alternation either of psalm or gospel; the venerable patriarch of the household therefore capitulated at discretion, with, 'Well, dear, what is it that puzzles you?' Now the child had often seen baskets with very frail bottoms, which in course of wear became bottomless, and allowed the fruit placed therein to drop upon the ground; here, then, was the puzzle: If the pit aforesaid had no bottom, where would all the people fall to who dropped out at its lower end?—a puzzle which rather startled the propriety of family worship, and had to be laid aside for explanation at some more convenient season."

One of the visitors at Stambourne nearly forty years ago was the Rev. Richard Knill, a worthily still remembered as a man who did eminent service in the way of Bible distribution in Russia. A strong attachment sprang up between the missionary and the pastor's grandson; and the former, with a prophetic eye sufficiently wonderful at the time, declared his belief that the child would grow up to preach to crowds of unparalleled numbers. The two had much talk together about the Saviour in the early morning; the elder prayed for the younger, kneeling in the garden arbour, and at parting the youth received a gift of sixpence, on condition that he would commit to memory Cowper's favourite hymn, "God moves in a mysterious way," etc.; and this was to be given out when he should grow up to be sufficiently famous to preach in Rowland Hill's pulpit. The day came in due course, as was predicted, and Cowper's hymn was sung. Mr. Knill was, we believe, the first Englishman who dared to break through conventional rules by conducting religious services in a theatre; and it was this example which afterwards encouraged Mr. Spurgeon to begin preaching in the Surrey Music Hall.

During his educational days we are thus able to follow the future preacher from Kelvedon to Stambourne, and thence to Newmarket, Colchester, Maidstone, and Cambridge. We do not know where the notion had its origin that Mr. Spurgeon's early training was defective; in point of fact his education was the best he could have received for the work he has had to do, and for the position he has had to occupy. The tutor to whom he was chiefly indebted, Mr. Edward Leeding, still keeps an academy for young gentlemen at Auckland Hill, Lower Norwood; and such is the pupil's unbounded respect for his old master, that several handsome presents have from time to time been pressed upon that master's acceptance. The inestimable services he rendered in youth will never be forgotten. These facts are mentioned because this retired schoolmaster, who was both a competent and a conscientious judge, held very decided views concerning his celebrated scholar's attainments. He was able and ready to set those right who went about retailing the news that Mr. Spurgeon was no scholar; the truth being that at an unusually early age he was not only one of the best scholars of the neighbourhood in which he lived, but one who could have taken his degree at the university without the slightest difficulty.

Great changes occurred even in boyhood, which had the effect of shaping Mr. Spurgeon's future course, and these he has himself described with his usual force. At the age of sixteen he fell into a condition of religious despondency something akin to that which overtook John Bunyan in his unenlightened days, and he determined on visiting all the chapels in Colchester, with the view of obtaining relief. After going to one place after another without result, a Primitive Methodist sanctuary was entered, where "a very thin-looking man came into the pulpit," and preached from the words, "Look unto Me and be ye saved all the ends of the earth." That preacher's rendering of the sacred text, "Look! look! look!" entered the young hearer's soul; the chains of bondage were snapped; he went forth feeling a freedom he had never experienced before. That preacher was a labouring man whose name has never been given to the public; he was no more Mr. Eaglen, as some have averred, than Mr. Eaglen is Mr. Spurgeon. About the same time, while studying the New Testament in the original Greek, he also changed his views on the question of baptism; and thus, in 1851, formally identified himself with the Baptists, one of the Three Denominations of Protestant Dissenters in England.

THE BOY PREACHER.

Before he was sixteen, Mr. Spurgeon had become accustomed to use both his voice and his pen. He gave addresses in a Sunday-school at Colchester, which had attractions for hearers older than the ordinary scholars; and the Rev. John Spurgeon has now in his possession an unpublished essay, written at this early date, entitled "Anti-Christ and Her Brood; or, Popery Unmasked." This was one of three productions sent in to compete for a prize offered by a gentleman at Nottingham; and though it did not carry off the chief premium, the effort was nevertheless rewarded with a gift of money, probably through the recommendation of Dr. G. Smith the adjudicator.

The more arduous work of preaching was also commenced about the same time; and the start was made in a manner as memorable as it was unexpected. Mr. Spurgeon was now associated with the Baptist congregation at St. Andrew-street, Cambridge, a church which once had for its pastors, the greatest pulpit orator of his time, Robert Hall, and his eloquent and learned predecessor Robert Robinson, whose familiar hymn, "Come, thou fount of every blessing," is a favourite in all evangelical denominations. Attached to this assembly was a Local Preachers' Association, the agents of which held meetings in the villages around the University, as opportunity offered. The Superintendent was a venerable man whom the fraternity recognised as Bishop Vinter; and, wrote Mr. Spurgeon a few months ago, "We had one Saturday finished morning school, and the boys were all going home for the half-holiday, when in came the aforesaid bishop, to ask us to go over to Teversham next Sunday evening, for a young man was to preach there who was not much used to services, and very likely would be glad of company." This was a carefully-laid trap, and the unsuspecting youth fell into the snare, finding, when he would have gone back, no way of retreat. Being obliged to preach, he did so to the best of his ability. To his own surprise and wonder there had been no symptoms of a break down in any one of the divisions; on the contrary, such was the uninterrupted flow of ideas, that at the close an aged dame called out, "Bless your dear heart, how old are you?" "You must wait till the service is over before making any such inquiries," answered the preacher as he proceeded to give out the finishing hymn. Then, after the benediction had been pronounced, the desire to talk seemed to spread to the whole congregation, and the query, "How old are you?" was asked again with renewed earnestness. "I am under sixty," said the young orator at length, unable any longer to evade some sort of a reply. "Yes, and under sixteen," added the first interrupter of the service. The people were at least gratified with the assurance that the youthful genius, who had, as it were, burst upon the world that afternoon, would come again provided the gentlemen at Cambridge thought him fit to do so. "Very great and profound," adds Mr. Spurgeon, "was our awe of those 'gentlemen at Cambridge' in those days."

After a beginning was thus made, the young preacher took engagements in various parts of the country, and among the places he visited was Houghton, in Huntingdonshire. Some time ago, at the special request of the present writer, a gentleman in that locality recovered some things from people who remembered Mr. Spurgeon when he wore a short jacket, and a broad, turn-down collar. One friend encountered had been present at the cottage service at Teversham above described. Another heard him preach at Somersham at seventeen years of age, when the boyish voice seemed strangely to contrast with that of the aged man who usually occupied the pulpit. Many with whom he then came in contact had sufficient sagacity to see that the boy would eventually become a powerful and popular preacher. "One old minister," according to our friend's report, "for whom Mr. Spurgeon preached, was plagued with a bad wife, and she must needs go to America; but with great patience the husband waited for her return, never fastening the door of the house, nor suffering others to do so, until she came back to him." Several others remembered the precocious talent of the preacher; and it was believed that the late eccentric miller of Houghton, Potto Brown, looked upon the youthful phenomenon with less favour than otherwise he would have done, because he thought it utterly impossible that the discourses given could be the preacher's own productions.

As a wealthy man and a local philanthropist, the above-mentioned Mr. Brown was known during his long life far and near as one of the most eccentric men of his time; and among others, Mr. Spurgeon has good reason to remember the miller's quaint wit and kind heart. "In our youth we preached at Houghton, and had the felicitous misery of being the good miller's guest," wrote the Pastor in 1879. "How he shocked our Calvinistic propriety! But we gave him no quarter as to what we remember denouncing as worthless theology. It was all fair to speak very plainly to Mr. Brown, for he never minced matters himself. We recollect his telling us that our preaching was very well for an apprentice boy, which was, no doubt, a correct estimate; but after he had spoken in that style we felt quite at home with him, and gave him a Roland for his Oliver without the slightest compunction. It was a battle royal, and both the old gentleman and the 'prentice boy' grew sufficiently warm; but no scars remained on either combatant. Mr. Brown walked to Huntingdon with us in loving conversation, and afterwards sent us 'Haldane's Life' as a present, with his sincere regards; and one whom he had horrified with his doctrinal statements felt an inward drawing towards the bluff heretic. Looking back over some six or seven-and-twenty years, we venerate the old man's memory." We may add that he was a man worth remembering. He erected a chapel, grew grapes for the sick poor, presented bacon to those who stole his cabbages, and even drew the teeth of the peasantry for nothing. "Richard," said he to one man of heavy build, who opened his enormous mouth wider than necessary to have a troublesome fang extracted, "I can stand outside to draw the tooth." Such were his kindness and pointed wit. The argumentative combat between this veteran descendant of a Quaker ancestry and the rapidly developing protégé of the Stambourne Puritan, must have been a sight of a thousand.

As a preacher in his teens, Mr. Spurgeon can tell of numerous adventures both on the road and in the pulpit—the very things which enliven an autobiography. He never pleaded unpropitious weather as an excuse for holding back from duty; for we have heard him tell how, on a stormy winter night, he has, on finding an empty chapel, gone round a Cambridgeshire village, lantern in hand, to collect a congregation. Long before his name was known in London, he was popular among the rural population of the University county.

FIRST SETTLEMENT AT WATERBEACH.

At the age of seventeen, or in 1851, Mr. Spurgeon became pastor of the Baptist Church in the quiet village of Waterbeach, situated four miles from Cambridge on the Norwich main line of railway. Twice have we visited that now classic spot for the purpose of gathering reminiscences first hand from surviving friends, so that what is offered to the reader has at least been gathered with more than ordinary care.

The congregation was small but respectable, the previous minister's stipend having been only twenty pounds a year, and the original old thatched chapel was accidentally burned in 1861. "If it had not been burned down, it would never have been pulled down," we were assured by a local farmer, "for there were people there who venerated the very smoke." Another friend on the spot described Mr. Spurgeon's first service on an autumn Sunday in the year of the First Great Exhibition; how he looked pale and thoughtful beyond his years, though at first sight he was but a school-boy, who appeared to be incapable of getting through a service. As soon as he began to speak, however, all fears were removed, and misgivings about abilities at once gave place to fears that the young pastor would too soon be called away to a larger sphere. What has since occurred in London took place on a more minute scale at Waterbeach. The hitherto scantily attended chapel became filled; then the aisles were invaded; and when other space filled, hearers crowded about the doors. As a result, a reformation of manners became apparent in the district,—drunkards became sober; profligates seemed to be awed into greater propriety of living. Some of the discourses of those days are still vividly remembered; and at one time Mr. Spurgeon intended giving a volume of these village sermons to the world, but the publication never appeared.

It is quite a mistake to suppose that at this time the preacher, young as he was, was hidden in a corner; the truth is, that at eighteen he was one of the most popular men in Cambridgeshire, and one whose services were in constant request for anniversaries and festivals. We have heard Mr. Spurgeon tell how, on one occasion, in 1852, he was invited to preach by a staid octogenarian of the old school, who had heard of his neighbour's popularity without having seen his face. When the preacher for the day arrived, the old man was so disconcerted at his youthful appearance, that instead of according the usual welcome he indulged in rude expressions, deprecating the custom of boys going up and down the country preaching before their mother's milk was well out of their mouths. The country people were crowding to the services in vehicles of every sort and size; but as a manifest failure was in prospect, that merely made matters worse than otherwise they would have been. As if to lighten his own responsibility the old pastor went round the village to express personal disgust from door to door; and when the time of trial came, he sat at first in a corner where he could not be seen. Mr. Spurgeon selected for reading Proverbs xvi; and in commenting on "A hoary head is a crown of glory," he argued that, in spite of Solomon's assertion, it was not always so. There were tongues in some hoary heads which could not be civil to the boy who came to preach for them; and rudeness gave no glory. Then followed, "if it be found in the way of righteousness." In that case Solomon was right after all, for unless it were so, red hair for a crown would be as honourable as white. In the meantime the old pastor had come forth from his hiding-place; and at the conclusion of the service, full of wonder and delight, he ascended towards the lately despised "supply," and accompanying the words with a smart slap on the loins, called out before the people, "You are the sauciest dog that ever barked in a pulpit."

It was at this time that judicious friends recommended Mr. Spurgeon to go through a course of theological training at the denominational college then situated at Stepney, but since removed to Regent's Park. As Dr. Angus, the tutor, happened to be visiting Cambridge, a meeting was arranged to come off beneath the roof of Mr. Macmillan, the well-known publisher. Mr. Spurgeon arrived exactly to time; the tutor also came as he had promised; but being shown into separate rooms, each waited until patience was thoroughly exhausted, and then went away, one to London, the other to the school, disappointed. Still the idea of entering the college was not relinquished until it was dispelled by the subsequent experience of that singularly eventful day. That very afternoon a preaching engagement had to be kept in the suburbs of Cambridge. "I walked slowly in a meditative frame of mind over Midsummer Common," writes Mr. Spurgeon, "to the little wooden bridge which leads to Chesterton; and in the midst of the common I was startled by what seemed a loud voice, but which may have been a singular illusion; whichever it was, the impression was vivid to an intense degree. I seemed very distinctly to hear the words, 'Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not!' This led me to look at my position from another point of view, and to challenge my motives and intentions." He resolved to stay with his people; and the wisdom of the decision has never since been doubted.

THE CALL TO THE METROPOLIS.

Writing rather more than two years ago about his early experience, Mr. Spurgeon shows that the first intimation of his services being required in London came on a Sunday morning, and in the chapel at Waterbeach. The letter "was an unusual missive, and was opened with curiosity. It contained an invitation to preach at New Park-street Chapel, Southwark, the pulpit of which had formerly been occupied by Dr. Rippon, . . . whose name covered New Park-street Chapel and its pulpit with awe unspeakable." Supposing a mistake had been made, the receiver of this message returned the letter to a friend on the opposite side of the table; but ominously shaking his head, that gentleman intimated his fear that the affair was only too genuine. He had always been sure that their pastor would be called away from a little place like that; but at the same time he thought it somewhat unaccountable that Londoners should have scented them so soon. An evasive answer was returned, and then came a second letter reiterating the request of the former, the result being that the invitation was accepted. The truth was that the people at New Park-street had had news carried to them by one of their own number of the boy-preacher's exceptional powers, and they determined on making a trial of his services.

Arriving in London on a Saturday evening, Mr. Spurgeon himself tells something about his experience at the boarding-house in Queens-square, whither he had been directed for a lodging. "As we wore a huge black satin stock, and used a blue handkerchief with white spots, the young gentlemen of that boarding-house marvelled greatly at the youth from the country who had come up to preach in London, but who was evidently in the condition known as verdant green. They were mainly of the Evangelical Church persuasion, and seemed greatly tickled that the country lad should be a preacher. They did not propose to go and hear the youth, but they seemed tacitly to agree to encourage him after their own fashion, and we were encouraged accordingly. What tales were narrated of the great divines of the metropolis and their congregations! One we remember had a thousand city men to hear him; another had his church filled with thoughtful people, such as could hardly be matched all over England; while a third had an immense audience, almost entirely composed of the young men of London, who were spell-bound by his eloquence. The study which these men underwent in composing their sermons, their Herculean toils in keeping up their congregations, and the matchless oratory which they exhibited on all occasions, were duly rehearsed in our hearing; and when we were shown to bed in a cupboard over the front door, we were not in an advantageous condition for pleasant dreams." The dark December night was one of solitary misery; but the youth was hoping to get clear of the scrape in which he was landed, and already looked back upon Waterbeach as upon a Garden of Eden.

On the next morning he wended his solitary way to New Park-street Chapel, the sight of which imposing structure awakened new emotions, and he wondered at his own boldness at venturing to leave a country charge to preach in such a cathedral-like edifice. There were seats for twelve hundred persons, and probably about a sixth part of that number were present; but in the evening there was a considerable increase, and a gentleman who was present once assured us that the effect was amazing. The boy of nineteen seemed to have the experience of a professor of ninety; while the brilliance of his imagination and the boldness of his metaphors, joined to his striking departure from pulpit conventionalities, marked him at once as a genius of originality the like of whom no one had before looked upon. The members of a failing cause and a well-nigh deserted chapel were that night raised from the despondency of their low estate. The benediction was pronounced, but the congregation were too excited to go away to their homes. They gathered in groups to discuss the young preacher's eligibility for the pastorate; and nothing would satisfy them short of the official assurance that no effort would be spared to secure his services. Mr. Spurgeon himself relates how different were his emotions as he "trudged back to the Queen-square narrow lodging." He felt able to assume a bolder face. "Our tone was altered, we wanted no pity of any one; we did not care a penny for the young gentlemen lodgers and their miraculous ministers, nor for the grind of the cabs, nor for anything else under the sun. The lion had been looked at all round, and his majesty did not appear to be a tenth so majestic as when we had only heard his roar miles away."

The congregation meeting in New Park-street Chapel was of Puritan origin, and dating back two centuries, had been served by eight pastors, some of whom were in their day men of considerable eminence. Of the founder, William Rider, little is known; but Benjamin Keach, 1668-1704, was an able man, and the author of the well-known "Key to Open Scripture Metaphors." Keach's successor, Benjamin Stinton, 1705-19, was followed by the celebrated Commentator, Dr. Gill, 1720-71, whose works have been already mentioned. Then came John Ripon, D.D., 1773-1836, the compiler of a once popular hymn-book; Joseph Angus, D.D., 1837-40, the present President of Regent's Park College; James Smith, 1842-50; and William Walters, 1851-53. Mr. Spurgeon is, therefore, the ninth name on the roll; and the congregation has existed for 230 years. The original meeting-house was in Horselydown; but in the time of Dr. Gill another was erected in Carter-lane, a site now included in the Southwark approaches to London Bridge. It was the opening of the new bridge which necessitated the building of New Park-street Chapel, in which Mr. Spurgeon commenced his London ministry.

SETTLEMENT IN LONDON; TWO HISTORICAL LETTERS.

The congregation which, in spite of the illustrious associations of the past, was hastening towards extinction, now saw a door of hope unexpectedly open. Mr. Spurgeon was invited, and, after some hesitation, heartily responded to the call. The letters which he wrote on that occasion have become historical documents; they were first given to the world by the present writer a few years ago. In the first, dated from 60, Park-street, Cambridge, on January 7th, 1854, reference occurs to Waterbeach, a "little Garden of Eden," which would not have been forsaken had the stipend been sufficient to ensure a maintenance. The people in London were naturally impatient for the new era of prosperity to go forward without interruption; the friends at Waterbeach were quite as naturally a good deal dejected in prospect of a permanent separation. In regard to the impression he had made in London, Mr. Spurgeon wrote:—"Enthusiasm and popularity are often the crackling of thorns, and soon expire. I do not wish to be a hindrance if I cannot be a help. Then turning to the devoted villagers who had won his first love, he added,— "I owe them much for their kindness, although they insist that the debt lies on their side. Some of them hope, and almost pray, that you may be tired in three months, so that I may be again sent back to them."

In the second letter, written three months later, and in which we find the charge formally accepted, some striking expressions also occur, e.g.: "I sought not to come to you, for I was the minister of an obscure but affectionate people; I never solicited advancement. The first note of invitation from your deacons came to me quite unlooked for, and I trembled at the idea of preaching in London. I could not understand how it came about, and even now I am filled with astonishment at the wondrous Providence. . . . Remember my youth and inexperience, pray that these may not hinder my usefulness. I trust also that the remembrance of these may lead you to forgive the mistakes I may make, or unguarded words I may utter."

Whatever misgivings were experienced they were soon set at rest; for on a larger scale what had occurred at Waterbeach was repeated in Southwark. The Rev. John Spurgeon had disapproved of his son's entering on a larger sphere before he had passed through a regular college curriculum; and when the father of the rising preacher met them in the street, Essex seers comforted him with the prophecy, "Your son will never last in London six months; he has no education." The fairness of such estimates were now tested. Every one of the 1,200 seats in the chapel were speedily occupied; then the crowd invaded all the standing-room, and an overflow struggled for admittance around the doors. It was admitted on all hands that an original genius had appeared in the English pulpit; and everyone wanted to know who he was, and whence he came. He was unlike all the popular men who had preceded him, his very style being as unique as his illustrations were fresh from the storehouses of Inspiration and of Nature. People in London asked one another as a standing question of the day, "Have you heard Spurgeon?" so that the crowd of one Sunday went home to stimulate the ever-increasing popular curiosity. Newspapers carried the news to provincial towns, and readers in quiet villages eagerly purchased the sermons which were already occasionally issued. Then arose a host of critics, votaries of the pencil and the pen, some of whom were friendly; some were neutral; others, who were the minority, were bitterly antagonistic. According to the representations of some, readers inferred that the new phenomenon was another Whitefield, a messenger raised up to arouse a sleeping world. More carping writers looked on with other eyes; the preacher was to them a mere passing meteor, which, having suddenly flashed into sight, would as suddenly be extinguished in darkness when his little course was run. A good many other prophecies were ventured which time has never seen fulfilled. In the meantime the atmosphere of the overcrowded chapel at New Park-street was compared by the preacher to "the Black Hole of Calcutta;" and some method of ventilation became urgently necessary. "By faith the walls of Jericho fell down," remarked Mr. Spurgeon, when he had been in London a few weeks, "and by faith this wall at the back shall come down too." This prediction was at once accomplished; but when enlarged to the utmost capacity of the site, the chapel was hardly more able to accommodate the pressing crowds than it was before.

EXETER HALL; THE ROYAL SURREY GARDENS; A GREAT CATASTROPHE.

While the old chapel was in course of being enlarged, Mr. Spurgeon preached in Exeter Hall, commencing in February, and ending with the last Sunday in May, 1855. This move naturally tended to increase his popularity; for the building now occupied was not hidden in a by-street of Southwark, but stood in a commanding situation in a leading West-end thoroughfare. The newspapers had now another story to tell,—of how, on each successive Sunday, the broad area of the Strand was at one point rendered impassable by people who congregated to hear a young man who had recently removed from Waterbeach to London as a Nonconformist minister. "Remarks of no very flattering character appeared in various journals, and the multitude was thereby increased," writes the preacher himself, while recalling the adventures of those days. "Caricatures such as 'Brimstone and Treacle' adorned the printsellers' windows; the most ridiculous stories were circulated, and the most cruel falsehoods invented; but all things worked together for good." In the summer of 1856, after using the enlarged chapel for more than a year, Mr. Spurgeon returned to Exeter Hall; but on learning that they would not be allowed to use that place continuously, the managers looked about for some other spacious building likely to suit their purpose. Their choice fell on the monster music-hall at the Royal Surrey Gardens, then lately erected for the concerts of M. Jullien. "With some trembling at the magnitude of the enterprise,"

The first service was held on the evening of October 19th, 1856, when probably 10,000 persons entered the building. All went well until the commencement of the prayer; but just at that quiet time, according to the entry in the church-book, "a disturbance was caused (as is supposed by some evil-disposed persons acting in concert), and the whole congregation were seized with a sudden panic. This caused a fearful rush to the doors, particularly from the galleries. Several persons, either in consequence of their heedless haste, or from the extreme pressure of the crowd behind, were thrown down on the stone steps of the north-west stair-case, and were trampled on by the crowd pressing upon them. The lamentable result was that seven persons lost their lives, and twenty-eight were removed to the hospitals seriously bruised and injured." Not knowing that the accident was so serious as it subsequently proved, Mr. Spurgeon remained in the pulpit, and used all his powers to restore quiet and confidence, without avail. When he learned the whole sad truth, the shock to his nervous system was such that he was utterly prostrated, and unable to preach for some time afterwards. "Until this catastrophe occurred, uninterrupted health had been enjoyed; this was the first break-down of the strong man, whose robust constitution had till now allowed of his preaching a dozen times a week in different parts of England. The pain endured was greatly increased by the inconsiderate, or even virulent, attacks and misrepresentations of the newspaper press. By one London daily paper, a type of many others, the distressed preacher was portrayed as "a ranting charlatan," who uttered "vile blasphemies," and hurled "damnation at the heads of his sinful hearers." It is well known that these calumnies have long since been lived down; but it is nevertheless a singular fact that the very journals which were Mr. Spurgeon's most violent enemies a quarter of a century ago, have since turned round to become his fastest friends, the defenders of his character, and the advocates of his institutions.

It was just about this time, when other papers were indulging in detraction, that some utterances of a very different quality appeared in The Times in reference to the ordinary doings at the Royal Surrey Gardens: "Fancy a congregation consisting of 10,000 souls streaming into the hall, mounting the galleries, humming, buzzing, and swarming,—a mighty hive of bees,—eager to secure at first the best places, and at last any place at all. After waiting more than half an hour,—for if you wish to have a seat you must be there at least that space of time in advance,—Mr. Spurgeon ascended his tribune. To the hum and rush and trampling of men succeeded a low, concentrated thrill and murmur of devotion, which seemed to run at once, like an electric current, through the breast of every one present; and by this magnetic chain the preacher held us fast bound for about two hours." More in the same strain followed, and then the writer threw out a suggestion which has never been adopted, e.g., "Here is a man not more Calvinistic than many an incumbent of the Established Church, who 'humbles and mumbles,' as old Latimer says, over his liturgy and text,—here is a man who says the complete immersion, or something of the kind, of adults is necessary to baptism. These are faults of his doctrine; but if I were the examining chaplain of the Archbishop of —, I would say, . . . 'May it please your Grace, here are two churches in the metropolis, St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. What does your Grace think of inviting Mr. Spurgeon, this heretical Calvinist and Baptist, who is able to draw 10,000 souls after him, just to try his voice some Sunday morning in the nave of either of these churches?'"

About twelve months after the above was written, Mr. Spurgeon preached to nearly 24,000 people at the Crystal Palace. The occasion, October 7th, 1857, was the day set apart for national humiliation on account of the troubles in India, and a sum of £686 was collected for the National Fund. At different times services of exceptional interest were also undertaken on very memorable occasions on the Continent. Thus during the earlier months of 1860, we find Mr. Spurgeon preaching at the Eglise de l'Oratoire, and elsewhere at Paris; then in Calvin's pulpit in Geneva cathedral, and also in the church of the historian Merle d'Aubigne. About two years later he preached in nearly all the principal Dutch towns, when a lengthened interview occurred between the English pastor and the Queen of the Netherlands. In 1867, while the Metropolitan Tabernacle was in process of renovation, the largest congregations ever attracted together for consecutive Sundays under one roof, assembled to hear Mr. Spurgeon in the Agricultural Hall at Islington.

It does not appear, indeed, that there were wanting at any time authoritative voices to silence the voice of detraction. It is said that the late Dr. Binney one day came upon a party of theological students who were indulging in a vein of uncharitable criticism regarding the popular preacher, and before proceeding, he invited their attention to this remark: "I myself have enjoyed some amount of popularity; I have always been able to draw together a congregation; but in the person of Mr. Spurgeon we see a young man, be he who he may and come whence he will, who at twenty four-hours' notice can command a congregation of 20,000 people. Now, I have never been able to do that, and I never knew of anyone else who could do it."

If we take into consideration the vast crowds he has uniformly attracted, the services conducted by Mr. Spurgeon have been remarkably free from mishaps of any kind, and also from the interruptions of crazy enthusiasts. At Halifax, on April 7th, 1858, a gallery, which had seated 2,000 people, gave way after the service, and two were injured. What would the panic and destruction of life have been if the accident had happened earlier! "Had such a thing occurred, and had I been the unhappy preacher on the occasion," said Mr. Spurgeon, "I feel certain that I should never have been able to occupy the pulpit again. Such was the effect of the first calamity that I marvel that I ever survived."

ERECTION OF THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle is one of the most conspicuous objects on the main southern road out of London; and it stands within a stone's throw of the Elephant and Castle, the sign of a tavern which sorely puzzled the Paris quidnuncs on the occasion of the visit of Napoleon III. to this country some years ago. Soon after Mr. Spurgeon's settlement in London, his friends saw that it would be imperatively necessary to provide a building whose accommodation would be something like proportionable to the multitudes drawn together; but not until the autumn of 1856 was a commencement made of the work of collecting funds. The freehold site was purchased of the Fishmongers' Company for £5,000; and the largest donation to the building fund reached that amount. Thoroughly determined to open the chapel free of debt, Mr. Spurgeon himself was the chief collector of the £31,332 expended, as he preached in all parts of England, taking half of every collection for the great enterprise in which the people were embarked. The memorial stone was laid by Sir S. M. Peto on the 16th of August, 1859; and the opening services, which lasted over a month, were commenced in March 1861. The building will seat 5,500 persons; there is standing-room for about 1,000 more; the lecture-room holds a congregation of over 900; the Sunday-school room will accommodate more than 1,000 children; while there are six class-rooms, eleven vestries, kitchen, and numerous minor store-rooms below stairs, as well as on the second floor.

While the Tabernacle was in course of erection, each Sunday morning service was conducted in the Surrey Music Hall; but in December 1859, this tenancy was given up in consequence of the Company announcing their determination to open the place for Sunday evening recreation. The Hall was soon afterwards burnt down, and the grounds have since been built upon. For nearly fifteen months, or until March 1st, 1861, the congregation again occupied Exeter Hall.

In the days under review, the newspapers of each Monday morning usually chronicled a catalogue of the aristocratic visitors who had attended Mr. Spurgeon's service on the Sunday preceding; and among these none were more illustrious than Dr. Livingstone, who once occupied a seat on the platform in the music-hall. Another visitor was Dr. Armitage of America, whose mission was to invite Mr. Spurgeon to undertake a lecturing tour in the United States for the purpose of collecting money for the building fund. This was the first of several similar endeavours, every one fruitless, although a thousand dollars in gold, besides expenses, have been offered to this world-famed preacher for each lecture he would promise to deliver on the other side of the Atlantic.

In the years which have succeeded, Mr. Spurgeon's life has been so bound up with his publications and institutions, that we shall best convey a clear idea of what has occurred by referring to these under separate heads. Even did space allow, it would be tedious to refer to all the calumnies circulated and misrepresentations of words and actions which have been made from time to time. A ridiculous rumour once gained currency at the antipodes that the pastor kept a public-house; and by friends nearer home he has been abused for smoking a cigar. A leading quarterly once declared that he was little other than "a regular pope;" and a journal of lighter calibre had the effrontery to describe the weekly sermons as being unworthy of the attention of persons of common sense, and the preacher's ailments as arising from excess. Friends have become familiar with things like these until they have ceased to be either surprised or annoyed at them. We might also refer to providential escapes from peril of which the present generation knows little. In 1855, while in an overcrowded boat with a drunken sailor on the Clyde, he was within a little of being drowned. In 1878, when taking carriage exercise in the Highlands of Scotland, the harness broke just as the party were going rapidly down a steep with a precipice at the bottom; and through the horses bolting at a runaway speed, there seemed to be a clear prospect of the tourists being knocked to pieces. At the bottom, however, the horses turned and stopped, and thus all were saved.

THE PREACHER; THE PUBLISHED SERMONS.

"Before I had ever entered a pulpit," Mr. Spurgeon once remarked, "the thought had occurred to me that I should one day preach sermons which would be printed. While reading the penny sermons of Joseph Irons, which were great favourites with me, I conceived in my heart that one day I should have a penny pulpit of my own." Mr. Spurgeon has not only a penny pulpit of his own, but the weekly issue has gone on uninterruptedly for nearly twenty-seven years, or rather five discourses have been published every month, making the total, at the end of 1881, no less than 1,634 numbers. The preacher's position is in this respect quite unique; all other attempts on the part of eminent divines to publish their utterances periodically having proved failures in a short time.

It is of course one of the most surprising religious phenomena of this century, when the printed sermons of one man are found retaining their place in public favour for so long a period; but the farther we look into the particulars of their circulations in various countries and languages, the greater reason shall we find for astonishment. Though the ordinary weekly sale in London ranges from twenty to thirty thousand, there are individual sermons, such as that on Baptismal Regeneration, of which over a quarter of a million have been sold. Besides this diffusion in England, a still larger edition appears to find readers in America, where the newspapers also, in numerous instances, insert the discourse regularly, unabridged; and the example of journalists in the United States is followed by editors in our Colonies. The circulation is thus world-wide, and cannot, with any approximation to correctness, be estimated. Then we have to take account of the numerous translations which have already been made. The Dutch have from the first shown a strong partiality for the discourses both in their native country and at their Cape of Good Hope settlements. In German there are several collections; but how many not one person knows, although Mr. Spurgeon remarks that he has "picked up in divers places sermons bearing date from Baden, Basel, Carlsruhe, Ludwigsburg, and so on." The French, Italian, and Welsh languages have altogether several volumes; while in Sweden a collection in four volumes has found great favour; "and the translator informed me," says the preacher, "of the conversion of some of noble and even royal birth through their perusal." Hungary has also to be included in the category. In addition to all these, single sermons have been issued in a large number of other tongues spoken in Europe, Asia, or at the antipodes. Works by Mr. Spurgeon in Arabic and many other languages are published in London by the Religious Tract Society alone; and probably the best informed person on this subject could not tell us of every translation, the number of which is continually being augmented.

Until the end of the year 1861, the sermons were issued in a small-sized type; but in the following year, the repeal of the last of the taxes on knowledge allowed of a larger sheet, with improved type, being given to the purchaser. It was also at this date that the publication, which had hitherto been associated with New Park-street, altered its title to The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit. In regard to his editorial labours, Mr. Spurgeon tells that although, in consequence of his constant wanderings abroad, the earlier volumes received only little revision, the later ones "are more carefully corrected, and the work of revision has been a very useful exercise, supplying in great measure that training in correct language which is obtained by those who write their productions before they deliver them." He goes on to intimate that the labour, so much heavier than persons might suppose, "has usually occupied the greater part of every Monday, involving the burning of no inconsiderable portion of midnight oil."

In connection with this long continued weekly issue more remarkable things have occurred than can ever be told, because some of them are forgotten; but persons whose curiosity tends in this direction may consult the monthly notes in recent volumes of The Sword and the Trowel. We hear of one gentleman who paid for their insertion as ordinary advertisements in Colonial newspapers; another, who was a Quaker merchant, sold them at his office in London; and a third, who gave away a quarter of a million copies, sent volumes to every royal palace in Europe, to all the students in our home universities, to every member of both Houses of Parliament, and to a large number of householders. Hence, in ordinary and extraordinary ways, the diffusion has been extended; and while the majority of readers have been edified, a minority of critics have dealt in bitter deprecation and innuendo. In the preface to his first volume the preacher gave out that he was "invulnerable either to criticism or abuse;" and he has ever since abided by that excellent rule.

THEOLOGICAL AND LITERARY WORKS.

Besides being a preacher and a theologian, Mr. Spurgeon is a practised litterateur. He had not been resident in London very long before he began to use the pen, the still well known work, "The Saint and His Saviour," being the first of his books apart from separate sermons. Inexperienced in the ways of London, and unacquainted with the details of publishing enterprise, the young author of this very successful work actually parted with the copyright for fifty pounds; nor was that trifling honorarium ever supplemented by the purchaser. This book has exercised a wide influence, and large numbers who have been stimulated or raised from the depths, have learned to value its wise counsels and fervent appeals. The copyright was lately purchased by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, who have issued a new and attractive edition.

Though the above at once became a popular work, it has since been excelled in popularity by the shilling brochures, "John Ploughman's Talk," and "John Ploughman's Pictures," of which 400,000 copies have been sold. In both of these the author deals out every-day philosophy for the people in that racy, pointed style of which he is a master, and the Pictures more especially advocate the cause of the temperance reformation. The next in point of popularity are "Morning by Morning" and "Evening by Evening," the sale of which together amounts to 145,000 volumes. Then come four volumes of a uniform series, "Lectures to My Students," "Commenting and Commentaries," and "Speeches at Home and Abroad," collected by G. H. Pike. The last named contains many of Mr. Spurgeon's happiest platform efforts; but theological students and preachers will find in the book on Commentaries some of the most valuable advice which it was in the power of the writer to give. This counsel is also given in that lively manner which admits of being relieved by anecdotes and pleasantry. Thus in comparing two eminent writers, who represent different schools of theology, the lecturer says: "I have placed next to Gill in my library Adam Clarke; but as I have no desire to have my rest broken by wars among the authors, I have placed Doddridge between them. If the spirits of the two worthies could descend to the earth in the same mood in which they departed, no one house would be able to hold them." Further on, we are glad to find Dr. A. Clarke characterised as "a prince among commentators," and one who "frequently by a sort of sidelight brings out the meaning of the text in an astonishing novel manner."

But the principal effort which has engaged Mr. Spurgeon's pen for more than sixteen years is "The Treasury of David," of which five large 8vo volumes have been published. From early life the author has shown the strongest affection for the Psalms; and accordingly the reader finds in this commentary some of his best and most finished work. The plan adopted is to give an exposition, and at the end of that a rich array of quotations collected from the whole range of literature; so extensive, indeed, is the field from which the gleanings have been made, that one or more amanuenses are employed for this special department. Of this standard work about 80,000 volumes have been sold.

Mr. Spurgeon has issued a number of other works. Chief among them are "Types and Emblems," and "Trumpet calls to Christian Energy," both being specimens of the week-night discourses given at the Tabernacle; "Feathers for Arrows," a book of illustrations for preachers and teachers; and the Shilling Series of popular little books for the people. Of the last, seven volumes have been published. Nor should we omit from the list The Sword and the Trowel, the threepenny monthly magazine which Mr. Spurgeon has edited since 1865. This serial has obtained a high position, and the early volumes, now out of print, realize a high price. Mr. Spurgeon's publishers are Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster, the former having belonged to New Park-street Chapel in the memorable year 1854.

THE PASTORS' COLLEGE.

All of Mr. Spurgeon's friends are aware that the institution which he regards with choicest favour is the Pastors' College, a school for theological training, founded in 1856. "When it was commenced," says the founder, "I had not even a remote idea of whereunto it would grow. There were springing up around me, as my own spiritual children, many earnest young men who felt an irresistible impulse to preach the Gospel, and yet with half an eye it could be seen that their want of education would be a sad hindrance to them." The college was really inaugurated by the pastor and Mr. W. Olney, while the two were riding in a cab together; and they contributed the first twenty guineas to the funds.

During the first years, however, as the number of students increased, the necessary funds were gathered with some difficulty. Mr. Spurgeon himself subscribed from £600 to £800 annually; but at length, with diminished receipts from America, in consequence of the sermons containing denunciations of slavery, the exchequer declined until a weekly offering was suggested as a source of supply. This increased to £1,869 in 1869; and the people have since made the annual number of pounds collected correspond with the years of the Christian era. Then every year, during the Conference week in April, friends are invited to a supper, at which, on the average, a sum of £2,000 is subscribed. The offering and the supper are thus the two chief sources of supply; and the yearly expenditure is at least £6,000. The Vice-President is the Rev. J. A. Spurgeon, who since 1864 has also served as the efficient Co-pastor at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and by so doing has relieved his brother of that pressure which is too heavy for one man to bear alone. The college owes much of its success to the earnest labours of the first tutor, the Rev. G. Rogers, in whose house the students were originally housed, and who, after twenty-three years of service, has lately retired.

The number of students in course of training is usually about 100; and about 500 have gone forth into the world as preachers of the Gospel. Of these 355 are in the British Isles; the remainder are scattered over the wide world. Some are serving as missionaries in India, and some other mission fields; and many are found in Canada and at the antipodes. In addition to other things the college is thus a missionary agency; and at home three very successful evangelists are regularly employed in itinerating over the country.

THE STOCKWELL ORPHANAGE.

The founder of this institution was the late Mrs. Hillyard, a clergyman's widow, who in the autumn of 1866 pressed upon Mr. Spurgeon's acceptance nearly the whole of her fortune, or £20,000, for the purpose of establishing a home for fatherless boys. Though this sum was insufficient to carry out the work, supplemental contributions were received, the estate in the Clapham-road was purchased and put in trust, and the memorial stones of several houses were laid in the summer of 1867. These are named after the persons who supplied funds for their erection. The cost of the Boys' Orphanage, including the land, amounted altogether to about £12,000; and the endowment is at present valued at over £30,000. No debt was ever contracted; and the money was collected by persons representative of various Christian sects. The management is entirely catholic; for out of 646 children received, 230 were of Church of England parentage; the remainder belonged to Nonconformist denominations.

At the time of writing, an orphanage for girls is in course of erection, on a site contiguous to that of the boys; and when completed the whole will form a square with accommodation for 500 orphans. The cost of maintenance will in future not be less than £10,000 a year.

THE COLPORTAGE SOCIETY; THE BOOK FUND.

The first of these agencies was commenced in 1866; but for some time the progress made was inconsiderable; and Mr. Spurgeon says that "had it not been for the persevering entreaties of the principal promoter of this work, we should have allowed it to die out." The affairs of the colporteurs took a favourable turn, however, and one district after another has been occupied until at present nearly eighty men are in the field. From the last report we learn that books and periodicals of the value of £7,577 had been sold during the year by the men, who also got through a vast amount of other work in the way of diffusing religious knowledge among the industrial population.

The Book Fund, for supplying needy ministers with theological literature, has been entirely conducted by Mrs. Spurgeon for about six years. Like some kindred institutions, this agency sprung up as it were spontaneously, without any planning or forethought on the part of its present friends. When "Lectures to my Students" first appeared, Mrs. Spurgeon happened to express the wish that every preacher could possess a copy, and forthwith funds were supplied for giving away a number of volumes. When a beginning was made, a desire had been kindled to extend the boon to a wider circle, and to include other books in the distribution. Though an invalid, and at times a great sufferer, Mrs. Spurgeon has from the first conducted this delicate business with that rare tact and devotion by which women sometimes prove themselves superior to men. The annual reports are from a literary point of view skilfully written; but more valuable is the warm-hearted sympathy pervading their pages. Nor is the constituency to which Mrs. Spurgeon has volunteered to minister a small one; for during the last year between seven and eight thousand volumes have been distributed among over 1,000 recipients of several denominations, 130 having been clergymen of the Established Church.

THE SILVER WEDDING TESTIMONIAL;
CONCLUSION.

In the above review of Mr. Spurgeon's life and labours no reference has been made either to the frequent ailments by which those labours have been interrupted, nor to the Silver Wedding Testimonial of £6,233 presented in 1879. That testimonial was given to Mr. Spurgeon unconditionally to do with as he thought proper; and while the whole was devoted to charitable purposes, about £5,000 of the amount will remain invested for ever as an endowment on the Almshouses associated with the Tabernacle.

When the presentation was made in May 1879, Mr. Spurgeon gave several lengthy addresses, in the course of which he reviewed his work and made several personal allusions. Referring to the fact that he had been laid aside almost every year, he frankly confessed that "flesh and blood cannot bear the strain, at least such flesh and blood as mine." "I believe," he added, "that affliction was necessary to me, and has answered salutary ends." Then in connection with the proverb, "There is life in the old dog yet," he said, "I may by degrees mend and improve, and get over my physical trouble, and perhaps be more hale and hearty in days to come than I have been for years. Who knows? may God grant me this high favour!"

Though rheumatism may be hereditary, there has of course been a near connection between Mr. Spurgeon's frequent sufferings and the excessive mental wear and tear to which he has been subjected. In point of fact, the popular notions regarding such a man are more likely to be erroneous than founded in reason or truth. Thus people believe that he is not only rich, but able to obtain fabulous sums by merely asking, for any new project that may be started. It would be nearer truth to say, that Mr. Spurgeon is really a man whom many prosperous city merchants would call poor; for the balance in hand at the bank has often been small indeed when the heavy demands on available resources are taken into account. Then preaching as he has preached is assuredly not easy work. "For years," he says, "I never entered this pulpit without such a fit of trembling and distress of mind that sickness of the most violent kind came upon me . . . Often have I felt that I would sooner be flogged than face the crowd again." At the same time he confesses that he could not live without the preaching which has been the chief delight of life; and every week, as need arises, "the fitting words have been given." The object aimed at by the preacher is represented by neither wealth nor fame; he is able to confess with truth, "I have no riches;" while his unparalleled success is ascribed to a Higher Power, and under God to the worthy band of helpers who have risen up around him. No one can doubt that Mr. Spurgeon's career has been altogether unselfish; there has been much of self-denial, but no self-seeking. Many self-confident critics have from time to time made ingenious attempts to account for an unexampled popularity; but observers nearer home—those who have been acquainted with the man in his life and work—have ever been acquainted with its springs.

Though Mr. Spurgeon has made his mark on the age, the time has not come for estimating, in its full extent, his life influence. Under fifty years of age, he is now at the zenith of his usefulness, and is hoping to outgrow those infirmities which have too often checked a constitutional enthusiasm. Mr. Spurgeon at the Metropolitan Tabernacle is a great power, and in himself is quite an institution of modern London; but we shall only correctly estimate his influence by keeping in view those agencies, evangelistic and civilizing, which have been set in motion. Every member of the church, now numbering between five and six thousand, is supposed to undertake some kind of work among the surrounding people. The weekly sermon published in London is supposed to reach 100,000 readers in Great Britain, and many times that number in other quarters of the globe. From the Pastors' College 500 preachers have gone forth. Some of these occupy very important spheres; they have founded more than 100 new churches, and about a third of a million sterling has been expended in chapel building. Then the colporteurs are scattering nearly £700 worth of pure literature every month among the classes who otherwise would purchase mental aliment of a very different kind. Finally, a number of minor institutions too numerous to mention are working for similar ends. The spectacle as a whole is quite unique: nothing so striking has occurred since the Reformation; and in the preacher and his work we seem to have a prophetic warning of the conquests which Christianity is yet destined to achieve in the world.

IMMATURE AND MATURE GENIUS; A COMPLETE CAREER.

AMONG the men who have endowed the world with something that, to use the expressive words of Milton, "it would not willingly let die," two classes may be considered as occupying the opposite points, at the beginning and the end, as it were, of the list of Worthies. In the first class may be placed those who, making their way out of the surrounding crowd by sheer force of intellect, gave unequivocal evidence of the power that was in them, and were then cut off before the promise had ripened into fruition. To this order belong such geniuses as Chatterton, "the wondrous boy who perished in his pride," self-slaughtered, after enduring, till they could be borne no longer, the pangs of hope deferred, and neglect and hunger, till doubt darkened into despondency, and the torn-up manuscripts and the phial of poison remained to show how despondency had blackened into despair; poor mild, gentle Kirke White, in his very eagerness to improve the gifts that were in him, and from feverish anxiety to vindicate the good opinion of those who had put him forward, studying himself into a decline; André Chénier, the graceful and genial French poet, perishing by the guillotine on the 25th of July, 1794, only two days before that fatal ninth of Thermidor which witnessed the fall of the tyrant Robespierre and his faction, and would have opened the prison-door to the poet as it did to thousands of other captives. "C'est dommage, il y avait encore quelque chose là," said Chénier sententiously, touching his forehead, as he climbed into the tumbril for the last short grim journey; the Fates were against him. He had not time to tell the world half he had to say before the grim sergeant, Death, here personated by Citizen Sanson, arrested him and bore him off to the shades, and thus was he relegated to the ranks of those whose names remain to show what might have been. The opposite class consists of those whose lives are marked by completeness; whose work, begun early, is carried through to a perfect and satisfactory end. To few is it given to labour on successfully and happily from the morning to the late evening of their day; to feel such pleasure in their toil that they continue it with hardly an effort, never feeling the longing to crown a life of labour with an age of ease; men who in their lives win some of that loving appreciation which is in general awarded only to those who have passed beyond the consciousness of earthly praise or blame. Such a man, indefatigable, earnest, and happy in thoroughly fulfilling his vocation as one of the leading scientific investigators of the present century, was the great philosopher whose life and work we here endeavour briefly to sketch.

A GREAT AND LENGTHENED USEFULNESS.

Living to the almost patriarchal age of ninety years, at work almost till the last, publishing his latest great literary effort at an interval of more than sixty years after his earliest work, the friend of kings and princes, and yet proud and glad to popularize science; by public lectures to his countrymen; marvellously gifted and deeply learned, yet a student to the end of his days,—this great investigator has left behind him a name equally revered and beloved among his own nation and honoured throughout the world. It is hardly possible to estimate too highly the services he rendered to science; and a detailed account of his life and labours alone could put forward in their true proportions and importance the result of seventy years of work. Suffice it to say, at the outset, that he was the first to teach, by his own unwearied investigations, the unity of the great operations of the natural world, the relation each of the elements bears to the whole; to arrange in marvellous order and method before the eye of his reader, in logical sequence and proportion, the various truths before presented in mere aimless confusion; separating ascertained fact from hypothesis, showing the operation of great natural laws in phenomena that appeared dependent on chance; uniting the scattered and isolated natural objects into groups, and investing with new interest the wondrous works of creation.

The duration of the distinguished natural philosopher's career is as remarkable as the astonishing diversity of his acquirements. Between the publication of his first scientific treatise and the completion of the great work, the "Cosmos," which he looked upon as the crowning achievement of his life, more than sixty years elapsed; the first-mentioned work being published in 1790, the latter in 1854,—and the whole interval between these two dates that thus mark the beginning and the end of Humboldt's literary activity was filled with work in various departments, one of which would have been considered amply sufficient to employ all the energies of even an active and untiring man. Every division of natural philosophy was enriched by new facts, theories, and conclusions drawn out by the genius of this extraordinary man, who may be looked upon as the ver: "admirable Crichton" of science. At one time he is found writing, with a marvellous fund of well-ordered information, on the distribution of plant-life over the globe; at another he discourses learnedly and originally on the structure and action of volcanoes;—electric science, the laws and conditions of climate in various parts of the earth, the geological structure of continents, the wonders of insect life,—all came within the comprehensive scope of his investigations. And eminent as he was, and vast as were the stores of his knowledge, he was entirely free from all taint of self-consciousness or intellectual pride. Ever ready to give all credit and honour to his fellow-workers in the field of science, he seems, in his works, to rejoice with the cordial heartiness of a friend at every success achieved by one of them, criticising their work in the kindest spirit, ready to approve, slow to reprehend. With himself, on the contrary, he is severe, speaking as if under correction even where he chronicles the result of long and patient research. Of him it may be said, as of Chaucer's grave clerk of Oxford, "Of study toke he moste care and hede; and gladly would he learne, and gladly teche."

EARLY YEARS; A FORTUNATE CHILDHOOD.

The year of the birth of Alexander von Humboldt was remarkable as giving to the world various men who in widely different spheres became famous. It was 1769, the year in which Wellington, Napoleon, and Cuvier were born. The Humboldts were an old Pomeranian family, with a strong military dash in their blood. The grandfather of Alexander was a captain in that well-drilled army of Frederick William I. of Prussia, whose giant guard regiment excited the astonishment of Europe; and the philosopher's father, Alexander George von Humboldt, occupied the distinguished post of adjutant to Ferdinand of Brunswick, the hero of Minden, and of many another hard-fought field, during the great Seven Years' War. The little Alexander, with his elder brother, Wilhelm von Humboldt, afterwards distinguished for his classical and historical attainments, had the advantage of an excellent education. The boys' first tutor was that Joachim Heinrich Campe who afterwards became celebrated throughout Germany as one of the first men who regarded education as a science, and based instruction on an appeal to the reasoning powers, and not merely the memory. Campe especially strove to interest his little pupils in the wonders of foreign lands, and the marvels of animated nature; and thus from an early age was kindled in the mind of the young Alexander that thirst for knowledge and desire of discovering scientific truths, that led him at a later period to undertake journeys and voyages into distant climes, under circumstances of exceptional peril and difficulty.

The boys appear to have spent a happy childhood at their father's old country home at Tegel, not far from Berlin, where Major von Humboldt, now in retirement after the close of the great war, was honoured annually by a visit from the Prince of Prussia, afterwards king under the title of Frederick William II. It is remarkable, and may perhaps be a comforting reflection to anxious parents and teachers who are apt to be discouraged by an absence of quickness of apprehension in boys, that Alexander von Humboldt was acknowledged to be slow at learning; so that even his mother and his tutor, who after the death of the Major watched carefully over the boys' progress, were fain to acknowledge that Alexander was dull of comprehension, and would probably not make a scholar.

As in a thousand similar instances, the reflective, quiet cast of the boy's mind, deliberate in grasping ideas, but tenacious in retaining, and indefatigable in comparing them, was misunderstood, while the readiness and facility of comprehension in the elder brother William were perhaps over-valued.

A REMINISCENCE OF A GREAT KING; UNIVERSITY DAYS.

One notable reminiscence of the two brothers, who were then, as they remained to the end, fondly attached to each other, was a grand review of the troops at Spandau by the grand old hero, Frederick the Great, at which they were present, on the 19th of May, 1783. The "snuffy old lion," as Carlyle calls him, though long past the Psalmist's threescore and ten, had still as sharp an eye, and as ready an interest in things military, as in the days of his strength: and only the year before his death he remained for many hours on horseback, on a field day, in a pelting rain that wetted him to the skin, and sent the broad brim of his cocked hat slouching over his brave old face. It was the exceptional fate of Alexander von Humboldt that his life was prolonged till the reign of the fourth successor of the great Frederick.

Never surely were two fortunate youths more favoured in the preparation for the active duties of life than were the two brothers. Early association with some of the best teachers in Germany awakened and stimulated their interest for learning. A residence at the University of Frankfurt on the Oder, then rising fast in reputation, afforded each of them an opportunity of following his peculiar bent of study; William inclining to classical literature and Alexander to science. After two years Alexander removed to Göttingen, then considered as the most distinguished of the German seats of learning. The acquaintance of the celebrated naturalist Blumenbach, and still more that of George Forster, who had accompanied Captain Cook on his second voyage round the world in the capacity of botanist, and was never weary of relating the marvels of the tropical world, increased in the young student the longing for scientific exploration and adventure that had been long before awakened by the teaching of Campe, now a high dignitary in Brunswick, but still preserving his friendship for his former pupils. At the end of their University career the two brothers parted for a time. William, who was about to enter on a diplomatic career, went off, in 1789, to Paris with Campe, who desired, as he expressed it, to witness the obsequies of French despotism; for the Revolution had begun, the Bastille was down, and Mirabeau was thundering in the hall of assembly on the sovereignty of the people. Alexander, for whom natural science had far greater charms than politics, started soon after, with Forster, on his first scientific journey to the Rhine, Holland, and England; and then it was that his first investigations were embodied in a modest work entitled: "Mineralogical Considerations on Some Basalts on the Rhine."

GEOLOGICAL STUDIES AND USEFULNESS.

Geology had now begun to engage attention. Gottlieb Werner, of Freiburg, the Government inspector of mines, the "father of modern geology," had just started the Neptunian theory, wherein, forming his conclusions from observations confined to the restricted area of the mountain systems of Saxony, he ascribed an aqueous origin to rocks of all kinds; soon to be confuted by Hutton, of Glasgow, who, rightly judging that the Grampians presented indications of the action of fire rather than water, started the opposing Plutonic theory, soon in its turn to be supplanted by the completer system of "Stratum Smith," of Cheltenham, who assigned to each of the actions a certain share in the arrangement of the earth's crust. Humboldt, at first a follower of Werner and his theory, found reason in the course of time considerably to modify his views on this as on many other questions of natural science.

For a time Humboldt was a diligent student in the Academy of Mines at Freiburg, under the direction of Werner. Soon afterwards, in 1792, he received important Government employment; a proof that his geological acquirements had already attracted public attention. He was appointed in the first instance assessor in the Department of Mines at Berlin, and afterwards chief director in the Franconian mines in Bayreuth, that he, lately been added to the Prussian dominions. At this time his associates were the naturalist Leopold von Buch, and a distinguished French botanist, Aimé Bonpland, a kindred spirit in enthusiasm and scientific zeal. The acquaintance with Bonpland quickly ripened into friendship, and had in the end most important results, in the discovery of new and valuable facts in scientific knowledge, by the united investigations of the congenial associates.

DETERMINATION TO TRAVEL; HUMBOLDT'S ACCOUNT OF HIS WISHES.

The position of the young Government official was in many respects an enviable one. Raised, at the outset of his career, to high and responsible office, with duties peculiarly congenial, ample leisure to pursue the studies dear to him, and such plentiful private means as secured him from all anxiety for the future, it would seem natural that he should settle down contentedly to his work. But it was not so. He felt within himself the capacity for greater things, and longed to be "up and doing;" to achieve the bloodless and beneficent triumphs of science in a wider field than the limits of his present sphere of action would permit. He himself has left on record, in plain, forcible words, the aspirations and hopes that rendered him dissatisfied with things as they were. "From my earliest youth," he says, "I had felt an ardent desire to travel in distant regions seldom traversed by Europeans. This desire is characteristic of a period in our life, when such a prospect opens a boundless horizon before us, and nothing has a greater attraction for us than strong emotions of the soul, and the picture of physical dangers. Brought up in a country which maintains no direct communication with the two Indies, and afterwards a dweller among mountains that are far from the coast, and celebrated for the extensive mining operations carried on there, I felt an increasing passion for the sea and for long voyages developed within me. Those things with which we are acquainted through the lively representations of travellers have an especial charm for us; our power of imagination is attracted towards all that is indefinite and unlimited; the enjoyments that are denied to us appear more considerable than those within our reach during the daily course of a sedentary life." And thus, though this "sedentary life" of official duty was sweetened by all that fortune could give, with congenial occupation, and the society of such distinguished friends as Goethe and Schiller themselves, Humboldt resolutely determined to give up his appointment, to turn his back on the agreeable society-life of Germany, and to go forth as a pioneer of science into regions untrodden and unknown.

The death of his mother, and the consequent division of the two family estates between himself and his brother, facilitated the long-cherished project of a great voyage to the equatorial regions of America. Humboldt sold his estate of Ringenwalt, to devote the purchase-money to his travels. After various delays, caused by the unsettled state of Southern Europe, —for it was the time of Bonaparte's Italian and Egyptian campaigns,—he started with his friend Bonpland on what proved a most important and remarkable voyage; rich in results to science, richer and more important still in its suggestiveness and the indications it gave to future travellers.

THE GREAT JOURNEY OF EXPLORATION BEGUN; ASSISTANCE FROM SPAIN.

The starting-point was Corunna, in Spain; the date the 6th of June, 1799. Alexander von Humboldt had received from the King of Spain a most important concession, in the form of a royal permit to visit every part of the dominions of Spain in the New World. "Never had so extensive a permission been granted to any traveller," says Humboldt, "and never had any voyager been honoured with greater confidence on the part of the Spanish Government. To dissipate every doubt which the viceroys or captains-general representing the royal authority in America might entertain with respect to the nature of my labours, the passport of the Chief Secretary of State set forth that I was at liberty to make use of my scientific instruments, that I might make astronomical observations through the whole of the Spanish dominions, measure the height of mountains, examine the products of the soil, and execute all operations I might judge useful for the progress of the sciences." And indeed, this solemn permission in passport-form was not by any means superfluous; for the colonial Spaniards of those days looked with considerable jealousy upon visitors from Europe, to whose researches they obstinately insisted on attaching political rather than scientific motives. "Ye are spies; to view the nakedness of the land ye are come," was the welcome with which they were most likely to receive strangers. Captain Cook's desire to observe the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, some years before, had been described by a Spanish governor as an unaccountable whim of the English commander "to see the north star go through the South Pole." Even in the case of Humboldt and Bonpland, though their credentials secured them welcome and assistance everywhere, many of the officials and dignitaries, lay and clerical, with whom they came in contact, were utterly at a loss to imagine what object these two men could have in taking so much trouble, and enduring so much danger and difficulty. One old prior of a South American mission-station especially "smiled superior" at the zeal of the investigators, as he stared with good-humoured contempt at their collection of dried plants, their voluminous sheets of notes, and their scientific apparatus; finally declaring that he knew nothing of the use of all those toys, and that, as to the pleasures of science, to his mind the greatest of earthly pleasures, not excepting sleep itself, consisted in the enjoyment of a good succulent piece of roast beef.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ATLANTIC.

It had been the travellers' intention to attach themselves to a scientific expedition that was to have sailed from Marseilles under Admiral Baudin; but France had now other matters more urgent than exploration in hand, and war thrust aside science. Therefore the friends were glad to take the liberal offer of the Spanish King; who thus deserved the credit of having assisted the great scientific discoverer, Humboldt, as his remote ancestor had furthered the aims of the great geographical discoverer, Columbus. From the day when the Pizarro ran out of the harbour of Corunna, Humboldt was indefatigable in investigating, comparing, and experimenting on the various phenomena of nature. Among his first observations, afterwards embodied in his "Personal Narrative," were very valuable remarks on ocean currents, especially on the Atlantic Gulf Stream. He points out how tropical plants, and waifs and fragments of ships and cargoes from the Antilles and the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, are carried across to North-western Europe by this great "river in the sea;" how the wreck of the Tilbury, an English ship, drifted across from Jamaica to the coast of Scotland; how even canoes with American savages in them have come across the Atlantic to the Azores and the Canary Islands. "This last example," he says, "is the more worthy of attention, as it proves at the same time how, at a period when the art of navigation was yet in its infancy, the motions of the waters of the ocean would contribute to disseminate the different races of men over the face of the globe."

The striving of Humboldt, in all his investigations, was to bring together instances of various kinds, collected over a vast area, to prove the existence of great general laws. Later scientific observers have followed in the track first indicated by the great Prussian philosopher, whose work is equally valuable for what it achieves and what it suggests. The subject of oceanic and atmospheric currents, as popularly elucidated in the late Commodore Maury's "Physical Geography of the Sea," is based, so far as its propositions and reasoning are concerned, on the work of Humboldt, especially in the parts relating to currents and counter-currents, and the recognition of difference of density caused by change of temperature as the cause of motion of large bodies of air and water.

TENERIFFE AND ITS WONDERS; THE PEAK; THE DRAGON-TREE OF OROTAVA.

Fortune favoured the travellers. England and Spain were at that time at war; but no British cruiser fell in with the good ship Pizarro; and Teneriffe, and afterwards Cumana, on the American coast, were reached in safety. The aspect of the famous island drew from the geological knowledge of Humboldt some interesting remarks on the difference in the appearance of organic and inorganic nature, of the earth itself, and of the plants and animals with which it is covered in different parts of the world. Animal and vegetable types, he observes, are distributed in bands or zones across the earth's surface; the palm trees and arborescent ferns and grasses being characteristic of inter-tropical, as the acicular-leaved trees, the pine and fir tribe, are of the colder regions; but the inorganic crust of the earth has the same features everywhere. The different masses of rock, granitic, basaltic, cretaceous, and the rest, appear under the same aspect in all latitudes; and the mariner approaching an unknown coast frequently recognises in its structure the familiar appearance of the rock systems he has been accustomed to see in his native land.

The ascent of the Peak of Teneriffe drew the attention of Humboldt and his companion to a great point, which continued to be one of the chief subjects of the investigations of Humboldt during many years, and which he treated with wonderful clearness and force in a treatise on the structure and action of volcanoes in various parts of the world. The more he travelled, the more his opportunities were multiplied of comparing the dimensions and general features of what are popularly known as "burning mountains," the more was he impressed with the imperfect nature of the information till then obtained on the subject of volcanic action, and with the fallacy of the method adopted by the scientific men of his time, who almost invariably generalized on incomplete data, and drew conclusions from too narrow premises. Vesuvius and Etna, he said, had generally been accepted as representing the sole existent form of volcanoes,—conical mountains with large craters; whereas the mountains that may justly be included in the category are as varied in form and appearance as the manifestations of volcanic action itself. He draws attention to the stupendous extent of volcanic action in an earlier period of our planet's existence, the tremendous outbreaks that heaved up the huge Andes range from beneath the surface of the earth; and aptly illustrates the fallacious conception that identifies volcanic action with low conical mountains alone, by the classical tale of the Italian peasant of ancient times, who fancied he saw in his little village the outlines and dimensions of imperial Rome. A few restricted phenomena can never be a safe basis for general conclusions. "To raise ourselves to geological conceptions worthy of the greatness of nature," he says, "we must set aside the idea that all volcanoes are formed after the models of Vesuvius, Stromboli, and Etna." He also points out that the peak once an active volcano, and now in the condition of a solfatara, or one with a burnt-out crater, may some day burst forth again in eruption, as Vesuvius did on the occasion of the destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum, A.D. 79, after remaining during a long period quiescent.

Humboldt and Bonpland took advantage of their short stay at Teneriffe to visit and measure one of the most remarkable trees of the world, the famous dragon-tree of Orotava. Judging by the small increase in the size of this tree in the course of centuries, and comparing its dimensions with those of the young dragon-trees that surround it, Humboldt assigns to it a vast age. It is just mentioned by the voyagers, the Bethencourts, who visited Teneriffe in 1402, and appears to have been worshipped as a sacred tree by the Guanches, the original inhabitants of the island, as the ash-tree of Ephesus was by the Greeks, the sacred banyan-tree in Ceylon, or the Lydian plane-tree which Xerxes decked with trophies. This visit to the dragon-tree of Orotava was afterwards the occasion of an interesting series of observations on the age of trees. Humboldt says that Decandolle, the naturalist, judging by the rings formed in successive years under the bark of the trunk assigns to the celebrated yew-tree in the village of Braborne in Kent an age of three thousand years, and to the Scotch yew of Portugal twenty-five or twenty-six centuries; while the celebrated rose-tree, in the ruins of the crypt of the cathedral of Hildesheim in Germany, has an ascertained age of a thousand years. The cathedral was founded by Louis the Pious, the son and successor of Charlemagne; Louis died in 840; and that this rose-tree was planted at the foundation of the cathedral is attested by a document of the eleventh century, which records how on the rebuilding of the cathedral the rose-tree of good King Louis was preserved, and its branches spread out over the walls of the crypt. At Ripon in Kent and Crowhurst in Surrey are also trees of an estimated age of from twelve to fourteen centuries.

PASSAGE TO CUMANA; VOLCANOES AND EARTHQUAKES.

On the voyage from Teneriffe to Cumana, the travellers were impressed by the first sight of the Southern Cross, rising from the bosom of the waters; and remembered how the navigators of the fifteenth century, sailing forth into unknown seas, and losing sight of the familiar constellations that had shone down upon them like the eyes of friends, were comforted when this new group arose, exhibiting the form of the sacred symbol of Christianity to cheer and encourage them on their way. . . . They passed near the great fucus banks, where the sea is covered with enormous lengths of seaweed. In one case, that of the fucus gigantes of Forster, the stem of the weed attains a length of 800 feet. Fever broke out on board the Pizarro before Cumana was reached; the reasons of the visitation are acutely summed up by Humboldt as overcrowding, dirt, and want of ventilation. One poor fellow died on board; another, after being bled to a state of utter exhaustion by the surgeon on board—who must have been a descendant of Dr. Sangrado, and seems to have thought the one efficacious treatment to consist in getting rid of as much vitiated blood as possible—was brought out of the fetid hole, where he had been lying with his face within ten inches of the deck, that the last sacraments of his Church might be administered. So soon as the poor wretch felt the purer air he began to mend; whereupon the medical gentleman triumphantly pointed to the efficacy of his system of bleeding, which had evidently saved the man's life.

Only eighteen months before, Cumana, the travellers' destination, had been more than half destroyed by an earthquake. The attention Humboldt was at once drawn to a subject to which he devoted much study during a series of years, the varying frequency and violence of earthquakes in different parts of the world, and in some instances in places situated under the same latitude. He draws the great distinction between the eruptions of volcanoes and the occurrence of earthquakes, that the former are evidently independent of difference of latitude, volcanic eruptions being equally violent in mountains near the poles and in those under the equator; while earthquakes are almost confined to tropical regions, that of Lisbon, in 1755, being altogether an exceptional phenomenon as regards the violence of the shocks, and the area over which its influence extended; the Scottish and even the Swedish lakes being affected in their level by the disturbance of their beds. Accordingly, while he considers that earthquakes are due to causes of disturbance comparatively near the earth's surface, he declares the eruptions of volcanoes to proceed from such depths as to be entirely uninfluenced by conditions of climate or of atmospheric temperature. He also notices the greater violence of the earthquakes where there are no volcanoes in the district; and comes to the conclusion that beneath the surface are many unfilled veins or passages, in which expansive gases accumulate, and burst forth at times through the natural chimneys or craters of the mountains; sometimes the escape of the gases and of the heated lava takes place not through a crater, but through a fissure opening along the ridge of a mountain. In noticing the various nature of volcanic eruptions, he observes how the Spanish inhabitants of South and Central America distinguish between volcanoes "de agua y de fuego," water and fire volcanoes,—not lava but boiling mud being in some instances hurled into the air, as in the famous great eruption of the Moya, by which 40,000 Indians lost their lives. This occurred in 1797. The observations of Humboldt put beyond a doubt the interesting fact of the existence of underground communication between volcanoes situated at great distances from each other; thus he points out that this great Moya eruption took place just at a time when the volcano of Pasto, two hundred miles away, which had been throwing up a column of black smoke uninterruptedly for three months, ceased to do so, and the explosive gas found another outlet. In one instance, in South America, a volcanic outburst was preceded by an underground, rumbling noise, like the sound of artillery, that extended over a district of 35,000 square miles.

THE NEGROES OF CUMANA ; LIFE IN THE CITY.

The negroes round Cumana are noticed by Humboldt as shiftless, lazy, and unambitious—as negroes have ever proved themselves to be, the eulogies of enthusiastic partisans notwithstanding. The slaves were in a wretched condition, driven to their work like cattle, and utterly spiritless and wretched; the free negroes were apathetic and listless, too idle even to cultivate gardens for themselves, because they could get vegetables and fruit from Cumana in return for the fish they carried to the town for sale. An amusing account is given of a Castilian living among the negroes and mulattoes of the Araga coast, a "triton of the minnows," looking down with lofty contempt upon the savages among whom he had set up his rest. He was a shoemaker by trade, this great hidalgo, but it appeared he made little profit, for the people had an inveterate tendency to go barefoot. He received the travellers with much pomp and ceremony, presented them with a few small opaque pearls of slight value, with a liberal flourish—desiring that the visit and the donation might be recorded in their diary; they promised it should be so, and kept their word, and the Castilian cobbler was cheaply immortalised.

In former times the peninsula of Araga was remarkable for a brisk trade in pearls and slaves. Among the curious customs of the people of Cumana Humboldt notices their amphibious propensity of passing several hours daily in the waters of their river, the Manzanares. Children and grown-up folks alike are distinguished by this propensity. On moonlight nights men would put chairs in the river, and gravely proceed to smoke their cigars sitting in the water; and hospitably invited the travellers to join them.

In visiting the Roman Catholic mission stations Humboldt, while acknowledging warmly the kindness and hospitality extended to himself and his companion, judiciously doubts whether the system pursued, of isolating the natives, and keeping them in strict dependence, like children who must obey unconditionally, is not the surest way utterly to demoralise them. He describes the natives as generally submissive, very much afraid of the white men, whom they are anxious to propitiate, and utterly unable to do anything for themselves.

SAGACIOUS MULES ; CAVERN OF CARIBE ; A DANGEROUS ADVENTURE.

Here the travellers had their first experience of mountain journeying on horseback, or rather on mule-back. The initiation was useful, as a prelude to the experiences of travel among the mighty Cordilleras of the Andes. The sagacity of the mules excited the admiration of the travellers, who found it uniformly the best way to leave their four-footed bearer to his own resources, and trust him to bring them safely through all perils. In his personal narrative our traveller says: "It is on the frightful roads of the Andes, during journeys of six or seven months across mountains furrowed by torrents, that the intelligence of horses and beasts of burden displays itself in an astonishing manner. Thus the mountaineers are accustomed to say: 'I will not give you the mule whose step is easiest, but him who reasons best (le mas racional).' This popular saying, dictated by long experience, perhaps better combats the saying that makes animals mere living machines, than all the arguments of speculative philosophy."

Among the remarkable localities near Cumana, visited by the travellers, was the Cavern of Caribe, a dark cave of unknown dimensions, the object of superstitious fear with the Indians, who declare it to be haunted by the spirits of the dead, as it certainly is by strange birds called guacheros, that live in the darkness, uttering wailing cries, and moving heavily to and fro in their dark domain.

Humboldt makes a whimsical observation concerning the apes of these regions. He declares that in proportion as these animals get to resemble human beings more closely in their appearance, they lose their natural liveliness and Simian activity, and acquire a melancholy and careworn look, their cheerfulness seeming to diminish in proportion to the apparent increase of their reasoning powers.

The second residence of the travellers at Cumana produced a startling incident, which might have given their scientific career as sudden and tragic a termination as that of Captain Cook. On the 27th of October, 1799, as they were walking at evening on the margin of the gulf, there rushed suddenly from a neighbouring thicket a half-naked coloured man, or "Sarabo," a half-breed between Indian and negro. This wretched native, who had, it appeared, been driven half mad by ill-treatment on board ship, and who, hearing the two friends speak French, mistook them for a couple of his oppressors, aimed a tremendous blow with a heavy club at Humboldt, who fortunately avoided it, and then struck Bonpland to the ground, stunned and bleeding, and endeavoured to follow up the attack with a long knife. Hereupon he fled, but was captured by some merchants who had seen the occurrence at a distance, and came running up to the rescue. Fortunately for the travellers, the miserable Sambo escaped from the prison where he had been laid by the heels to await his first examination. The stream of justice flowed very tardily in those regions, and the travellers might have been detained for many months to give evidence against the poor wretch. Bonpland felt the effects of the assault for some time.

His companion utilised the time occupied by his friend's recovery for the observation of an eclipse of the sun. Never, indeed, was a more active and indefatigable searcher into the secrets of nature than Alexander von Humboldt. His constitution, originally weak, had been fortified by exercise, temperance, and the cheerfulness engendered by an engrossing and congenial pursuit. He had the faculty, like Napoleon, of sleeping almost at will, and a short repose sufficed him. The amount of actual work, in the way of observation and carefully conducted experiments, he went through during this journey, and, indeed, throughout every part of his career, is amazing. And here is one of the chief causes of the great value of the results he achieved for science. He gives, as it were, chapter and verse for every assertion he makes; nothing is hurried, nothing left incomplete, nothing accepted on hearsay. Step by step the great votary of natural science clears his path as he marches onward, wresting one secret after another from nature, and enriching the world with knowledge.

AN EARTHQUAKE; ASCENT OF THE SILLA.

The travellers now had occasion to make acquaintance with a somewhat startling incident of tropical life—an earthquake; and Humboldt graphically describes the impression made upon him when for the first time he felt the earth, naturally associated with the idea of firmness and stability, trembling beneath him. Afterwards during their residence at Quito, when from the great volcano of Pichincha came the "formidas" or internal rumblings, the precursors of heavy earthquake shocks, lasting eight or nine minutes, they had become so accustomed to the phenomenon that they did not even rise from their beds; and at last were no more astonished at seeing the earth heaving around them than the sailor is to see the ocean rising in billowy waves. He was told that 1784 had been a year especially fertile in earthquake shocks; the Mexicans at that time had been as much accustomed to hear the subterranean thunder rolling beneath their feet as at others to hear it rumbling through the air.

At Caracas, whither they had proceeded soon after, Humboldt and Bonpland ascended a remarkable mountain, the Silla, or Saddle mountain, in the neighbourhood of the city. The energy of Humboldt is shown in the fact that though he had spent the whole of the previous night in watching occultations of the satellites of Jupiter, he started at five in the morning on this expedition. Some inhabitants of Caracas who set off to take part in the expedition soon turned back; among others, a young Capuchin monk, of whom Humboldt gives an amusing account. This amateur explorer boasted of the great things he would do; but very soon sat down, almost at the foot of the mountain, and watched the ascent of the climbing party with his telescope.

THE LLANOS OF THE ORINOCO.

No part of this eventful journey is more interesting than the expedition now undertaken by the travellers across the vast steppe or plain that stretches to the south, behind Caracas, towards the mighty Orinoco and the great rivers its tributaries. At that time these regions were completely a terra incognita even to the scientific world; nothing was known of those vast equatorial regions of America beyond the coast-line, and Humboldt's account reads almost like an account in a fairy tale. To him the vast treeless plains stretching away at a dead level to the horizon, with only banks or ridges of floetz rising here and there above the uniformity of the surface, suggested the idea of a petrified ocean; but like the ocean it is far from being devoid of life. The steppes or llanos are inhabited by wild animals of the most different kinds,—striped viverræ or bats, the armadillo, the maneless lion, the jaguar or American tiger, whose strength enables it to drag to the summit of a hill the body of a bull it has killed. Enormous herds of cattle roam, almost wild, over the llanos; and Humboldt calls attention to the wonderful adaptability displayed by the ox and horse tribe to various conditions of climate and vicissitudes of circumstances; an adaptability also possessed in the vegetable world by the cereals or corn plants. The animals and plants, he observes, that are most necessary to the comfort and well-being of man, appear to have followed him over the face of the globe, and to flourish and increase wherever he can make his dwelling; on the bleak hills of Norway and on the burning plains of India alike they find subsistence; and from the hardy rye to the lordly maize every zone of the earth's surface produces a corn plant of one kind or another.

In the llanos the cattle struggle on against difficulties and dangers of the most opposite kinds. The drought of summer converts the plains into arid deserts, and numbers of creatures perish for want of water. The cunning mule obtains a supply from the melocactus, a globular plant covered with thorny spikes, and containing a watery pulp. Many mules are seen lamed from thorns in the feet by kicking these plants open. The sufferings endured by the animals, when the rivers have become dry watercourses, are pitiable, the stings of myriads of insects greatly increasing them. Then comes the wet season, and the whole region is converted into a swamp, with great lakes, from which the higher portions stand out in the form of islands. Then the cattle have to live like amphibious animals, swimming from island to island, and menaced by alligators and jaguars; while the formidable gymnotus, or electric eel, lurking in the water, destroys many of them, stunning or numbing them with repeated shocks. In no part of the world does nature appear in more wonderful diversity of climate, or exhibit a greater and more marvellous fullness of animal life, than in these vast llanos of Venezuela.

LIFE OF ANIMALS IN THE FOREST; ASCENT OF CHIMBORAZO; RETURN.

During a long journey by water in native canoes, the travellers penetrated to the frontier settlements of the Spaniards on the Rio Negro, in the south. Returning by the Casiquiare into the Orinoco, the connection of the latter great river with the mighty Marañon, the Amazon river, was established as a geographical fact. The wondrous wealth of animal and vegetable life in the primeval forests, where climbing plants or lianas, of more than a hundred feet in length, stretched from one colossal tree to another, like the tackle of a ship; the generally impenetrable thicket, with paths broken through it only here and there by the animals coming down to the river to drink, in such numbers and variety that one of the boatmen, who had learnt biblical history at one of the Spanish mission stations, declared, "It is here as in Paradise,"—the nocturnal noise and confusion occasioned by the beasts of prey hunting through the trees—with all the other experiences of that remarkable journey in regions where the foot of civilized man had never yet trod,—all these things are to be found described, in clear yet eloquent language, in the "Personal Narrative" and the "Aspects of Nature," in which latter work the author presented for the benefit of the reading public some of the most striking scenes of his wanderings.

The ascent of the mighty Cordilleras, of the Andes, including that of the mighty Chimborazo, the Snow Mountain, which Humboldt was the first to climb, formed another part of the enterprising traveller's experience; and here he noticed the wonderful diversity of plant-life under the same parallel of latitude at different elevations above the sea level. From the hot valleys, where the vegetation is entirely tropical, as the traveller ascends to the higher regions, he passes by regular gradations, through districts exhibiting in a series the plants first of the temperate and then of the cold regions; at length arriving at the heights where a few lichens and mosses are the last representatives of the vegetable world before he reaches the region of perpetual snow. The remarkable distribution of animals also excited his wonder—the highest peaks of the Andes and the depths of hot springs alike exhibited traces of animal life in various forms. The plan of the journey in South America, and afterwards in Mexico, was several times altered in consequence of rumours, which always turned out delusory, that Baudin's expedition was expected to arrive in one port or another. After pursuing this scientific will-o'-the-wisp for a long period, to his great detriment in loss of time and temper, Humboldt at length wisely determined to give up the idea of joining Baudin altogether, and finish his journey independently as he had begun it. The great enterprise was not concluded until 1804, and never had a journey enriched science with such vast and varied results—geology, botany, ethnology, electric and meteorological science, physical geography, astronomy—there was not a department in which this admirable Crichton of science did not show himself an admirable proficient and a patient, persevering, and reverend investigator. When at length, in August 1804, he landed at Bordeaux, on his return, he had to contradict by his presence a report that he had died of yellow fever at Vera Cruz.

SPLENDID EDITION OF HUMBOLDT'S TRAVELS.

The only continental city where at that time the resources could be found adequate to the publication, in a worthy form, of the account of these travels was Paris; for the other capitals of continental Europe were agitated by the turmoil of war, and the fear of invasion. Humboldt accordingly conceived the idea of establishing his residence in the French metropolis. After an excursion into Italy for scientific purposes, and a visit to Berlin, which capital he found in the possession of the French, he carried this design into effect; and until 1827 he resided mostly in Paris, occupied in the task of preparing for the press, revising and publishing the account of his travels. Humboldt was a man to whom money was valuable only in so far as he found it necessary for carrying out his scientific designs. At the very outset he had, as we have seen, sold his landed property to provide funds for his travels; and now he devoted the remainder of his fortune to the expenses of publishing in twenty-nine volumes, some written in French, others in Latin, a splendid collection of narratives, treatises, and notes embodying the results of his travels and researches in the New World. The work was enriched with more than fourteen hundred engravings, many of them coloured; and the expense from first to last amounted to $45,000; for wonderful as was Humboldt's energy, and indefatigable as he showed himself as a worker, it would have required the hundred hands of Briareus to execute even the mechanical part of the gigantic task; and the author was obliged to enlist the assistance of eminent men like Cuvier, Bonpland, Latreille, and Kunth, in the botanical, zoological, and other departments. And in carrying out this work, priceless in its importance to science, he received no kind of assistance from his own or any other European Government.

He had his reward, however, in the consciousness of having given an entirely new impulse to scientific study and exploration. It is not alone what he achieved, but what he taught others to achieve that renders this work of Humboldt's a magnificent success. Other travellers had investigated each a separate department of science; he combined his teaching to one great and complete result.

"All are but parts of one harmonious whole," is the truth he inculcates and exhibits in all his explanations of the separate phenomena and operations of natural forces; it was the task of his life to investigate and exhibit, not natural history, but the history of nature. That order is heaven's first law, and that in the working of the great forces of nature, as in the structure, form, organization, and distribution of animals and plants over the face of the globe, as also in inorganic nature, from the blazing star in its orbit, to the grain of dust in the dark cavern, the relation of each part to the whole may be traced, is the main idea that permeates the whole of his labours.

VARIETY AND EXTENT OF HUMBOLDT'S WORK; TARDY APPRECIATION BY HIS GOVERNMENT.

The titles of his chief works are enough in themselves to indicate the vast and varied field covered by this great traveller's scientific and general researches. Thus, among the books published in the period of his residence in Paris are: "Voyage aux Régions Equinoxiales du Nouveau Continent," with a splendid atlas; the "Ansichten der Natur," views or aspects of nature, in which the till then dry and unattractive subjects of physical geography, geognosy, and the history of plants are popularized in such a way that the least scientific reader is charmed into interest, and awakened to the sense of the marvels of the animal and plant world,—

"Finding therein no little delectation, To think how strange, how wonderful they be;"

the "Essai Politique sur le Royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne," wherein he gives practical advice and hints of great value concerning the cultivation of useful plants, and the revenue to be thence derived—the first practical lessons in the political economy of agriculture offered to those fertile but ill-governed regions. Then come the splendid botanical works, wherein he classes plants, not according to the arbitrary Linnæan system, but with reference to their general features and habitat, dividing them rationally and scientifically into those of tropical, temperate, and cold regions. Among these were the "Essai sur la Géographie des Plantes," and "De distributione geograph. plantarum secundum cœli temperiem et altitudinem montium" (On the distribution of plants according to climate and the height of mountains). The system of using the chronometer for the determination of longitude, and of the measurement of the height of mountains by the sinking of the mercury in the barometer, also arose from his fertile brain. Amid all his multifarious occupations, he still found time to work for the political benefit of his country, and his political acumen was highly valued by the reigning house of Prussia; as is shown by the fact of his accompanying Prince William on a difficult diplomatic mission in 1807, his arrival in London, as the companion and friend of the King of Prussia, in 1814, and afterwards by his presence, as the representative of his country, at the congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle and Verona.

The world-wide reputation of his works, and the reverence with which his name was uttered by every mouth, awoke that portion of the world in which a prophet has proverbially the least chance of finding honour—his own country—to a sense of his worth; King Frederick William III. of Prussia became somewhat tardily impressed with the idea that so illustrious a subject of Prussia ought not to be living among strangers, and pressed the philosopher to take up his residence at Berlin; which Humboldt accordingly did in the year 1827.

His elder brother William rejoiced, and with good reason, at this return of the traveller to his native land. "Alexander is here," he writes jubilantly to his friend Gentz, on the 21st of May, 1827, "and has regularly established his residence here—he is more industrious and livelier than ever."

SCIENCE POPULARIZED; HUMBOLDT'S LECTURES.

Not only William von Humboldt, who had always regarded his brother with an affection mingled with wonder and veneration, had reason to rejoice at the philosopher's return to Berlin; for indeed the whole of Germany had reason to remember the year 1827 as a remarkable epoch,—as the time when science was for the first time popularised before a German audience; and the result of long years of unwearied labour and research was presented to the public in a series of lectures, so admirably lucid and yet so solidly wise—so attractive in the playful fancy which enlivened the delivery, and yet so closely logical and convincing in their arguments,—that the capital was fairly taken by storm, and many a man dated the opening of a new world of wonder and enchantment to his mental ken from the day when he heard the quiet, modest, and good-humoured voice of Alexander von Humboldt in the hall of the Academy of Sciences. The subject of his series of lectures, that occupied six months, was the physical description of the world. Crowded and enthusiastic audiences filled the hall; and the enforced exclusion of hundreds for want of room occasioned a pressing petition for a repetition of the course in the great hall of the Singing Academy of Berlin. The King, accompanied by the royal family and some members of the Court, came regularly to hear the wonders of creation expounded by the traveller; and what was even more gratifying to the man who had laboured so long to spread, knowledge among the community generally, the people came thronging to learn from him what a marvellous world it was in which they lived, and how the earth, like the heavens, declares the glory of the Creator;—how the mountains and the plains, equally with the firmament show His handiwork; how day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. These lectures, delivered in presence of King and magnates and people, were a public recognition of the fact that knowledge was no longer to be the heritage of an exclusive and privileged caste, but like the glorious sunlight was to shine on all alike who would come forth to rejoice in its rays.

THE EMPEROR NICHOLAS AND HUMBOLDT.

And now, when he had almost entered upon his sixtieth year, the grand old scholar prepared for a new and arduous course of travel. It was to the Ural Mountains, and thence to the vast regions of Central Asia, and the mighty range of the Altai, that his unwearied energy now led him. The occasion of this new journey was in itself a highly honourable one. The Czar Nicholas of Russia has not left behind him the kind of memory that, redolent of justice and benevolence, "smells sweet, and blossoms in the dust." We think of him generally as the stern, ambitious, unscrupulous autocrat, who closed a long reign of tyranny and repression with an unjust war, and broke his heart when the failure and destruction of his hosts in the Crimea brought home to his proud spirit the lesson that the glories of even an emperor's birth and state "are shadows, not substantial things," and that the best-laid plans of aggrandizement may collapse in sudden and overwhelming ruin. It is only just, on the other hand, that he should have all credit for the enlightenment and largeness of view he showed on certain occasions; and never were these qualities more advantageously exhibited than when, in 1828, he made a proposition that Humboldt should undertake a comprehensive journey through his empire, at the sole expense of the Russian Crown; any idea of advantage that his government might reap from the investigations of the distinguished traveller, with respect to mining and other national industries, to be rigidly subordinated, to the interests and advancement of science, which were to be regarded as the first and chief object of the expedition. Humboldt was not the man to refuse an offer so congenial to his tastes and wishes; but it speaks well for his patriotism that his acceptance was coupled with the condition that the journey should be delayed until the spring of the next year. He had yet to finish the course of lectures promised to his own countrymen; and in the autumn he felt called upon to preside at the annual meeting of German naturalists and professors of medicine, which was this year to be held at Berlin. This and other duties to his own people being rigidly and punctually fulfilled, in the spring of 1829 he set forth on his Asiatic travels.

HUMBOLDT'S JOURNEY INTO CENTRAL ASIA.

In this second great journey Humboldt was accompanied by two most efficient coadjutors, Gustav Rose and Ehrenberg. The former undertook to conduct the chemical mineralogical analysis, and to keep the scientific diary of the expedition; while the zoological and botanical department was entrusted to Ehrenberg. Humboldt himself was fully occupied with observations on the magnetism of the earth, and with astronomical geography, and the general investigation of the geognostic and physical features of North-western Asia.

The orders of the Czar naturally procured for the travellers every possible assistance and protection in their arduous undertaking that the word of an autocrat can give. A mining official of high position was commissioned to accompany them everywhere, and assist them with his local knowledge, besides seeing that the authorities in the various towns furnished all necessary supplies; and thus equipped, and provided with all that Imperial hospitality and patronage could afford, they quitted St. Petersburg on the 20th of May, to make their way to Moscow over the Ural range. In his investigation of the nature and features of this great mountain chain, Humboldt was frequently reminded of his experiences among the Andes many years before; especially he remarks on the similarity in the direction of the chain, parallel with a meridian, from the pole towards the equator. The number of new facts which he obtained for the departments of geology and mineralogy, during a four weeks' residence among the Ural mountains, afterwards astonished even those who were aware of his unfailing energy and industry. After a visit to the malachite quarries of Zhetysai, the travellers continued their journey by way of Ikaterinenborg and Tobolsk into the heart of Asia, passing over the terrible Borabinsk steppe, formidable for the myriads of stinging insects that infest it, and accordingly avoided by the inhabitants of the country around, who seldom, unless urged by necessity, venture into its precincts. But in the cause of science Humboldt encountered the dangers and discomforts of the Borabinsky plain, as he had faced the perils of the steppes of the Orinoco. He made his way to the banks of the Obi river, and on the 17th of August reached what he considered the exact central point of Asia, to the north of Lake Usaisang. He returned by way of Astrakan to the banks of the Volga and the Caspian, and so back to Moscow and St. Petersburg.

RESULTS OF THE ASIATIC JOURNEY.

The energy and activity displayed by Humboldt, who was now sixty years old, during this remarkable journey, are sufficiently attested by the fact that within the short period of eight months and a half he had traversed by land a distance of more than eleven thousand geographical miles, or nearly half the extent of the earth's surface measured round the equator. By the end of December he was back again in St. Petersburg, having completed one of the most remarkable land-journeys of modern times. The distance traversed, though in itself remarkable, was the least salient feature of the achievement; the chief wonder lay in the enormous mass of scientific material, in the number of observations and notes on geology, mineralogy, and physical geography, collected by this indefatigable searcher into the secrets of nature, at a time of life when the energies of the majority of men have begun to diminish, and they are prone to look forward to rest, rather than to increased exertion. But immediately on his return the old philosopher sat down to the arduous task of giving to the world in various most valuable volumes the result of his Asiatic researches. This was accomplished chiefly in the great work entitled, "Asie Centrale; recherches sur les Chaînes de montagnes, et la climatologie comparée," published in French and German respectively at Paris and Berlin, in 1843.

THE ONE TRIAL OF HUMBOLDT'S LIFE.

The reputation of the great man of science in his own country was increased by every new work that poured from his prolific pen. After the death of Frederick William III., that monarch's successor, the late King Frederick William IV., continued to treat the now aged philosopher with marked distinction, and at various times employed him on diplomatic missions of honour and importance, especially to Paris. The King took especial pleasure in Humboldt's society, and chose him as his travelling companion on his visit to England in 1841, and to Denmark in 1845. Amid all the honour and respect of this later period of Humboldt's life, there was, however, one exceedingly black spot, which the sage was compelled perforce to contemplate from time to time,—a bitter drop in the cup of his life, which interfered most unfortunately with the flavour of the draught. Thackeray somewhere relates how once, when a housekeeper had shown and expounded to him all the glories of a grand country house, he turned upon the stately dame, after the treasures of various cupboards and cabinets had been displayed and admired, and utterly put her out of countenance with the startling question: "And pray, ma'am, where do you keep the skeleton?" There was a skeleton in Humboldt's cupboard that occasionally thrust itself forth amid all the satisfactions and all the useful labours of his distinguished life, and would not be banished. This skeleton was Debt. Though, at the outset of his career, Humboldt had inherited a considerable fortune, that fortune had been entirely absorbed in the expenses of his travels and of his publications, in which he spared no cost, his one object being to attain the utmost completeness, especially in illustrations. For him money had no value apart from his scientific pursuits, and in distributing to the necessities of others he was generous to a fault. In his later days, accordingly, he found to his dismay that his fortune had not only melted away completely, but that the pension awarded to him by Frederick William III., and continued by that king's successor, was all he had left for his maintenance. It was insufficient, for he was careless of his affairs, and benevolent to a fault, easily imposed on by a fictitious tale of distress, and unable to answer an application with a refusal. Thus his embarrassments increased, and were a source of annoyance to him almost to the end of his long life. It was the brother of the king, afterwards Emperor of North Germany, who, during the time he acted as Regent, relieved the illustrious old man of the load of debt that had long weighed upon him. His activity continued undiminished, and long after he had passed his seventieth year his correspondence amounted to between three and four thousand letters annually.

"COSMOS"; A GREAT END TO A GREAT CAREER.

Finis coronat opus; the greatest triumph of his scientific career was still to be achieved in the form of a book that to a certain extent embodied and summed up the experiences of his long and eminently useful life. This work was his magnificent "Cosmos;" and was left as a legacy in the first instance to his German fellow-countrymen, and then to all searchers after knowledge in every civilized country in the world. In the preface the venerable author tells his readers that the design had been present for nearly fifty years in his mind before it found definite expression in this book. The Greek word Cosmos indicates the scope and intention of the work. The design is to exhibit, as he expressed it, "the appearance of corporeal things in their relation to each other, for the comprehension of nature as a whole, animated by inner forces." The idea of the universe as exhibiting in its highest development the perfection of order, beauty, and harmony is carried out with wonderful completeness in the "Cosmos," a worthy conclusion to a splendid and glorious life-work. The task of uniting the various branches of scientific knowledge, before isolated and separate, into an orderly and systematic whole, was a gigantic effort for a veteran; but Humboldt achieved it in a most satisfactory manner. Never had any of his books being welcomed with such enthusiasm, never had the appearance of successive volumes been watched for with such impatience of anticipation, as was exhibited in Germany, France, and England alike, as the various volumes of the "Cosmos" were issued from the press; to be immediately translated into the principal European languages, and eagerly studied by all the scientific world. It was not until 1854 that the concluding volume appeared; and the author was eighty-five years old, when at length he laid down his pen, and felt that his life's work was done. To the last he was a student, anxiously comparing, enquiring, adding fact to fact, and conscious that the scientist, like every other searcher after truth, after all only "sees through a glass darkly." It is touching to note the modesty with which he spoke and wrote of himself and his attainments, while all Europe was ringing with his praises, extolling what he had done, and holding him up as the model of a votary of science. "I am at once surprised and flattered," he writes to a London publisher in 1851, in reply to a letter proposing an English version of the "Cosmos," "at the interest evinced in your worthy and intelligent country for the last work of my late age;" and in answer to a respectful request that he would indicate another work suitable for the general public, in an English dress, he good-humouredly observes that authors are not good people to consult on such a subject; but suggests that the "Ansichten der Natur" has been popular in Germany, and might achieve success in England also; but he gives his suggestion with a diffidence exceedingly grateful in one who had done so much, and held such a position as he could command in the domain of scientific knowledge.

DEATH OF HUMBOLDT; SPECIMEN OF HIS STYLE.

At the age of ninety years, full of days and honour, Alexander von Humboldt was laid at last in the grave of his family at Tegel, on the 11th of May, 1859. He was never married. The chief possession he left behind him, his valuable library, he had bequeathed to his faithful servant, assistant, and friend, Seiffert, the companion of his travels. It was afterwards removed to America.

The following Extract, descriptive of the great treeless llanos or steppes of Venezuela, is taken from the "Aspects of Nature." It will give an idea of the author's picturesque style in the description of natural scenes:—

"Separated by days' journeys from each other, huts are found, constructed of bundles of reeds bound together with thongs, and roofed with ox hides. Countless herds of wild cattle, horses, and mules swarm in the steppes. Forests, thousands of years old, and an impenetrable gloom cover the moist region that surrounds the desert; and mighty granitic masses narrow the beds of the foaming rivers. The wood resounds with the thunder of falling waters, the roaring of the jaguar, and the dull howling of the apes. Where the shallow stream leaves a sandbank exposed, lie outstretched, motionless as masses of rock, with open jaws, and frequently covered with birds, the clumsy bodies of the crocodiles; its tail rolled round the branch of a tree, lurks by the bank, certain of its prey, the chequered boa. Stretching suddenly forward, it seizes in the track the young bull or the weaker game, and forces its prey, covered with saliva, down its distended throat. But when, beneath the perpendicular rays of the never-clouded sun, the burnt-up grassy surface has crumbled into dust, the hardened ground gaps open, as if shattered by a mighty earthquake; like rushing water-spouts opposing currents of air spring upward in funnel shape; a dull straw-coloured twilight is spread by the apparently lowering sky over the desert plain; the view suddenly narrows, and the plain contracts, the heart of the wanderer sinks within him. The hot, dusty sand, floating in the misty, veiled horizon, increases the sultriness of the pestilential air.

"As the animals in the icy north grow torpid through cold, so here the crocodile and the boa slumber motionless, buried deep in the dry clay. Everywhere drought signifies death, everywhere the thirsty creature is pursued by the delusive serial mirage of a waving mirror of waters. With thick clouds of dust whirling round them, and tormented by burning thirst and by hunger, the horses and oxen roam to and fro, the latter with frightened roar, the former with outstretched necks snuffing the wind to detect, by the dampness of the current of air, the proximity of some water-puddle not yet entirely evaporated. When the burning heat of day is succeeded by the coolness of the night of equal length, even then horses and oxen cannot enjoy their rest. Enormous bats suck their blood in vampire fashion, attaching themselves closely to their backs, where they cause festering wounds, into which swarms of stinging insects penetrate. When at length, after a long drought, the beneficent rainy season succeeds, the scene suddenly changes. The deep blue of the till then unclouded sky becomes at once overcast. At night the weak light in the constellation of the Southern Cross can barely be recognized. The soft phosphoric gleam of the magellanic clouds is extinguished, even the constellations of the Eagle and of Ophiucus in the zenith glimmer with a trembling light. Some scattered clouds in the south appear like distant mountains, and the vapours spread like mists over the zenith, and distant thunder announces the vivifying rain. . . . Hardly has the surface of the earth been moistened before the fragrant steppe is covered with the most various kinds of grasses. Excited by the light, herb-like mimosas unfold their slumbering leaves, and welcome the rising sun, together with the morning song of the birds and the opening blossoms of the aquatic plants. Horses and oxen now pasture in the full enjoyment of life. But in the grass that shoots up high lurks the beautifully-spotted jaguar, that springs catlike with airy bound upon the animals as they pass by. . . . Sometimes, on the margin of the swamp, the moistened clay is seen slowly rising upward in clods—with a violent noise, as at the outbreak of the little mud volcanoes, the upheaved earth is hurled high into the air;—

those who understand the meaning of it flee from the appearance, for a gigantic watersnake or a mailed crocodile comes forth from the depths, awakened from a trance by the downpour of rain. . . . As the rivers gradually swell, nature forces the same animals that during the first half of the year were fainting with thirst on the dusty parched earth, to live like amphibious creatures—for a portion of the steppe now appears like an enormous lake. The mares take refuge with their foals on the higher banks, that stand forth like islands above the mirror of waters. Every day the dry space becomes narrower. For want of pasture the crowded animals have to swim about for hours together, cropping a bare subsistence from the blossoming grass that rises above the brown-coloured turbid water. Many foals are drowned; many are caught by the crocodiles, crushed by the pointed teeth, and then devoured. Not unfrequently horses and oxen are seen that have escaped from the jaws of these rapacious lizards, and still carry on their bodies scars from crocodiles' jagged fangs.

"But as in these steppes tigers and crocodiles fight with horses and oxen, so in certain parts of this wilderness we likewise see man in continual combat against his fellow. With unnatural greed the tribes drink the blood of their enemies—others, apparently weaponless, yet equipped for murder, slay their foe with a poisoned thumb-nail. The weaker hordes, when they pass along the sandy shore, carefully, with their hands, efface the marks of their timid footsteps, to conceal them from the stronger tribes. Thus man, in the lowest state of brutal savagery, as in the fictitious glory of higher civilization, everywhere prepares unrest for himself in life—thus the wanderer in distant regions, crossing land and ocean, like the historical investigator searching the records of the ages, everywhere encounters the lamentable spectacle of a race divided against itself. And, therefore, he who amid the yet unsettled strife of nations longs for spiritual repose, gladly casts down his eyes to contemplate the peaceful life of plants, and the inner working of the holy power of nature;—or, following the innate impulse that has glowed for centuries in the human heart, he fixes his gaze upwards, on the distant stars that in undisturbed harmony sweep onward in their ancient unchanging course."

"Below the mission of Santa Barbara de Arichuna we passed the night, as usual, in the open air, on a sandy flat on the bank of the Apure, skirted by the impenetrable forest. We had some difficulty in finding dry wood to kindle the fires with which it is here customary to surround the bivouac as a safeguard against the attacks of the jaguar. The air was bland and soft, and the moon shone brightly. Several crocodiles approached the bank; and I have observed that fire attracts these creatures as it does our crabs and other aquatic animals. The oars of our boats were fixed in the ground to support our hammocks. Deep stillness prevailed, only broken at intervals by the blowing of the fresh-water dolphins, which are peculiar to the river network of the Orinoco, as, according to Colebrooke, they are also to the Ganges, as high up the river as Benares; they followed each other in long rows.

"After eleven o'clock, such a noise began in the adjacent forest, that for the remainder of the night sleep was impossible. The wild cries of animals resounded through the woods. Among the many voices which echoed together, the Indians could only recognise those which, after short pauses, were heard singly. There was the plaintive, monotonous cry of the howling monkeys, the whining flexible notes of the little sapagous, the grunting murmur of the striped nocturnal ape, the fitful roar of the great tiger (jaguar), the cougar, or maneless American lion, the peccary, the sloth, and a host of parrots, parraquas, and other birds of the pheasant kind. Whenever the tigers approached the edge of the forest, our dog, which before had barked incessantly, came howling to seek protection under the hammocks. Sometimes the cry of the tiger resounded from the branches of a tree, and it was then always accompanied by the plaintive piping tones of the apes, which were endeavouring to escape from the unwonted pursuit.

"If the Indians are asked why such a continuous noise is heard on certain nights, they answer with a smile that the animals are rejoicing in the beautiful moonlight, and celebrating the return of the full moon. To me the scene seemed rather to be owing to an accidental, long-continued, and gradually-increasing conflict among the animals."

INTRODUCTORY.

WE have here the life of one of whom Scotland has good reason to be proud. Of all the brave and remarkable men whom that country has produced, John Knox, the hero of the Scottish Reformation, was perhaps the bravest and most remarkable.

"In the history of Scotland," says Mr. Carlyle, speaking of the Reformation, "I can find properly but one epoch: we may say it contains nothing of world-interest at all but this reformation by Knox. . . . Knox is the one Scotchman to whom, of all others, his country and the world owe a debt."

The career of this eminent Reformer is, then, well worthy of our study. The incidents of his life are highly picturesque, for he was the central point in an age of excitement. He was made for his work; and to understand his character is to comprehend also that spiritual revolution which has done so much for his native land, and of which he was the moving spirit.

Even if we take exception to many of the things Knox did or encouraged, we cannot but admire his consistent boldness, his deep earnestness, and his self-denying, unflinching zeal. No one can deny that but for him Scotland would not now occupy the proud place she does in the world, as one of the leading representatives of religion, education, and freedom.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

John Knox was the son of obscure parents, and was born in 1505. There is some doubt respecting his birthplace, which was probably the village of Gifford, in East-Lothian, although it has been asserted that he was born at Haddington.

His education was more liberal than was usual in those days. In his youth he was sent to the grammar school at Haddington, and about 1524 was removed to the University of St. Andrews, where the learning principally taught was the philosophy of Aristotle, scholastic theology, civil and canon law, and the Latin language. Greek and Hebrew were at that time little understood in Scotland; and Knox did not acquire the knowledge of them till somewhat later in life.

After Knox became Master of Arts, he taught philosophy, most likely as an assistant or private lecturer in the University, and his class became celebrated.

He was ordained a priest before the age fixed by the canons of the Church, which must have taken place previous to the year 1530; at which time he had attained his twenty-fifth year, the canonical age for receiving ordination.

His first instruction in theology was received from John Major, the Professor of Theology in the University; but the opinions founded upon it were not long retained. The writings of Jerome and Augustine attracted his attention, and the examination of them led to a complete revolution in his sentiments. It was about the year 1535 that his secession from Roman Catholic doctrine and discipline commenced; but he did not declare himself a Protestant until 1542.

KNOX'S SHARE IN THE REFORMATION.

Reformed doctrines had made considerable progress in Scotland before this time. Knox was not the first reformer; there were many persons, earls, barons, gentlemen, honest burghesses, and craftsmen, who already professed the new creed, though they durst not avow it. It was to the avowal, extension, and establishment of the Reformed religion that Knox's zeal and knowledge so powerfully contributed.

His reprehension of the prevalent corruptions made him regarded as a heretic; for which reason he could not safely remain in St. Andrews, which was wholly in the power of Cardinal Beaton, a determined supporter of the Church of Rome; and he retired to the south of Scotland, where he avowed his apostacy. He was condemned as a heretic, degraded from the priesthood, and it is said by Beza that Beaton employed assassins to waylay him.

He now for a time frequented the preaching of the Reformed teachers Williams and Wishart, who gave additional strength to opinions already pretty firmly rooted. Having relinquished all thought of officiating in the Roman Catholic Church, he became tutor to the sons of Hugh Douglas, of Langniddrie, a gentleman of East Lothian, who had embraced the Reformed doctrines.

After the murder of Cardinal Beaton, Knox removed with his pupils from Langniddrie to St. Andrews (1547), where he conducted their education in his usual manner, catechising and reading to them in the church belonging to the city. There were many hearers of these instructions who urged him, and finally called upon him, to become a public preacher. Diffident and reluctant at first, he consented to their request. In his preaching, far more than the Reformed teachers who had preceded him, he struck at the very foundations of Popery, and challenged his opponents to argument, to be delivered either in writing or from the pulpit; and so successful were his labours, that many of the inhabitants were converted to his doctrines.

AFTER THE CAPTURE OF ST. ANDREWS; ON BOARD THE GALLEYS; IN ENGLAND; ON THE CONTINENT.

It was not long before an event took place by which his efforts received a temporary check. The murder of Cardinal Beaton had given offence and created great excitement through the kingdom. It was a severe blow to the Roman Catholic religion and the French interest in Scotland, both of which Beaton had zealously supported, and vengeance was loudly called for upon the conspirators by whom he had been murdered. These conspirators had fortified St. Andrews; and the art of attacking fortified places was then so imperfectly understood in Scotland, that for five months they resisted the efforts of Arran, the Regent. From their long wars in Italy and Germany, the French had become as experienced in the conduct of sieges as the Scotch were ignorant. The French were allies of Scotland; to France, therefore, Arran sent for assistance. About the end of June, 1547, a French fleet, with a considerable body of land forces, appeared before the town (Robertson, vol. i., p. 314). The garrison capitulated, and Knox, among many others, was taken prisoner, and conveyed to Rouen, where he was confined on board the galleys.

After some fifteen months' close imprisonment, Knox was liberated, with his health greatly injured by the rigour with which he had been treated. This was in February 1549. He now repaired to England; and though he had never received ordination as a Protestant, Crammer did not hesitate to send him from London to preach in Berwick. In Berwick and the north of England he followed his arduous undertaking of conversion until 1551, when his fame at last reached the ears of Edward VI., who first offered him the living of All-Hallows, and then a bishopric; both of which he declined.

In consequence of this his enemies brought charges against him; and on the 14th of April he was called before the Council, and required to answer the following questions:—

"Why he refused the benefice provided for him at London? Whether he thought that no Christian could lawfully serve in the ecclesiastical ministrations according to the laws and rites of that realm? And if kneeling at the Lord's Table was not indifferent?"

To the first he answered that his conscience witnessed to him he might profit the Church more in some other place than in London. To the second, that many things needed reformation in the ministry of England, without which no minister did or could discharge his duty before God; for no minister had authority to prevent the unworthy from partaking of the sacrament, which was a chief part of his office; and that he refused no office which might in the least promote God's glory and the spread of Christ's Gospel. And to the third he replied, that Christ's action at the communion was most perfect; that it was most safe to follow His example; and that kneeling was a human invention.

The answer which he gave to these questions occasioned a good deal of altercation between him and the Council. There were present on the occasion the Bishops of Canterbury and Ely, the Lord Treasurer, the Earls of Northampton, Shrewsbury, and Bedford, the Lords Chamberlain and Treasurer, and the Secretaries. After long reasoning with him, he was desired to take the matter farther into consideration, and dismissed.

Knox was in London at the time of Edward's death, but thought it prudent to fly the kingdom as soon as Mary's policy towards the Protestants became apparent. In January 1554, he landed at Dieppe; from Dieppe he went to Geneva; and from Geneva to Frankfort, where Calvin requested him to take charge of a congregation of English refugees. In consequence, however, of some disputes, he soon left Frankfort and returned to Geneva.

Here he wrote an "Admonition to London, Newcastle, and Berwick;" "A Letter to Mary, Dowager of Scotland;" "An Appeal to the Nobility;" "An Admonition to the Commons of Scotland;" and his "First Blast of the Trumpet." This "Trumpet" he intended to have blown three times, if Queen Mary's death had not happened in 1558.

In this First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women, he vehemently attacked the admission of females to the government of nations. Its first sentence runs thus: "To promote a woman to bear rule, superiority, dominion, or empire, above any realm, nation, or city, is repugnant to nature, contumely to God, a thing most contrarious to His revealed will and approved ordinance, and, finally, it is the subversion of all equity and justice." This inflammatory composition, as might have been expected, excited much hostility against its author. At the time of its publication, both England and Scotland were governed by females: Mary of Guise, the Queen-Dowager of Scotland, was likewise regent of that kingdom, while the Princess Mary was heiress of its throne; and in England Mary was queen, and her sister Elizabeth the next in succession to the crown. It hardly admits of wonder, then, that when, in 1559, Knox was desirous of returning to England, Queen Elizabeth's ministers would not permit him to do so, and he was compelled to land at Leith.

While at Geneva he contracted a close intimacy with John Calvin. The conversation of this celebrated man, then in the height of his reputation, confirmed Knox in his affection for that form of worship which had been established at Geneva. His solitary reflections in exile and under persecution, had, as we learn from his eloquent and pathetic letters, assumed an extraordinary bitterness of self-reproach; they seemed to upbraid him as one who had fled from the fold, and deserted his flock when the spiritual conflict most required his presence; and he returned to Scotland in 1555, with the stern resolution to "spare no arrows," to abide at his post, and to sacrifice everything for the complete establishment of the Reformation, according to those principles which he believed to be founded on the Word of God.

THE PROGRESS OF THE REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND.

During his absence from his native country the persecutions of Mary had driven some of the English Reformers to take refuge in Scotland. Harlow, originally a tradesman in the lower ranks of life, but afterwards a zealous preacher under Edward VI., took up his abode in Ayrshire, and assembled around him a little congregation; John Willock, a Scottish Franciscan friar, who had been converted to Protestantism, and afterwards admitted a chaplain to the Duke of Suffolk, was another of these labourers. He had been sent twice, in 1555 and 1558, on missions from the Duchess of Friesland, in whose dominions he had sought refuge, to the Queen-Regent; and as his affability, moderation, and address were equal to his learning and piety, he was received with distinction, and privately permitted to address his exhortations to all who were anxious for instruction.

The second arrival of Willock gave a great impulse to the cause of the Reformation. "The images," says Knox, "were stolen away in all parts of the country; and in Edinburgh that great idol called St. Giles was first drowned in the North Loch, and afterwards burned, which raised no small trouble in the town." Notwithstanding this marked demonstration, it was resolved by the Queen-Regent and the bishops that the usual procession appointed for the saint's day should not be omitted; and having procured another image from the Grey Friars, and fixed it to a wooden barrow, which was borne on men's shoulders, the cavalcade, headed by the Regent herself, surrounded by priests and canons, and attended by tabors and trumpets, proceeded down the High Street towards the Cross.

The sight inflamed the passions of the Protestants; and various bands of the citizens, abhorring what they esteemed an abomination, resolved upon revenge. Nor was it long before this was accomplished; for scarce had the Queen-Regent retired, when some of these, under pretence of assisting the bearers, caught hold of the barrow, cast down the image, and dashed it to pieces on the pavement; and then, to use Knox's words, "the priests and friars fled faster than they did at Pinkie-cleuch: down go the crosses, off go the surplices, round caps, coronets, with the crowns. The Grey Friars gaped, the Black Friars blew, the priests panted and fled; and happy was he that first got to the house, for such a sudden fray came never among the generation of Anti-Christ within this realm before!"

A VEXED QUESTION.

Yet although some progress had been made, and Knox hailed with gratitude the co-operation of Willock, it was with feelings of astonishment, bordering upon horror, that he found the friends of the Protestant opinions unresolved upon the great question whether it was their duty openly to separate from the Roman Catholic Church. Many of them continued to sanction by their presence the celebration of low mass; and as the Queen-Dowager had found it necessary, in the prosecution of her political objects, to extend her favour to the Protestants, they were anxious to stretch their uniformity to the National Church as far, perhaps even farther, than their consciences permitted.

The discourses of the Reformer, who at first preached privately to a few friends in the house of John Syme, a Burgess of Edinburgh, soon threw a new light upon the danger of such concessions. Men's consciences became alarmed. A conference was held at the house of Erskine of Dun, one of the few among the landed adherents of the Reformation in Scotland who seems to have had religion at heart.

Knox had the advantage which is ordinarily possessed by the single-purposed and headstrong—the others must either break with him or submit. "The question was proposed, and it was answered by the said John, that nowise it was lawful to a Christian to present himself to that idol." He admits that there was much ingenious pleading on behalf of the "temporisers," and that especially they put forth very plausibly the precedent "that Paul, at the commandment of James and of the elders of Jerusalem, passed to the temple, and feigned to pay his vows with others."

Knox, however, repudiated the precedent. Saying vows and attending mass were not the same thing. Then he greatly doubted "whether either James's commandment or Paul's obedience proceeded from the Holy Ghost." But his most telling point was, that the incident was recorded for a warning rather than an example; for in reality it proceeded, and was probably the cause, of St. Paul's danger and calamity.

Both in broad determination of purpose and skilful Biblical criticism he was master of the situation; and he records, with his usual chuckling exultation, how young William Maitland of Lethington, "a man of good learning and of sharp art and reasoning," admitted himself to be utterly defeated by Knox's reasoning, saying, "I see perfectly that our shifts will serve nothing before God, seeing that they stand us in so small stead among men."

HEARERS AND FOLLOWERS; A LETTER TO ROYALTY.

Among his hearers and followers at this time—about the year 1555—we find some men who became afterwards noted in the history of their country: Erskine of Dun, a baron of ancient family, whose learning was superior to the times; Sir James Sandilands, commonly called Lord St. John, a veteran in his adherence to the Reformation; Archibald, Lord Lorn, afterwards Earl of Argyle; the Master of Mar; the Lord James, afterwards Regent; the Earl of Glencairn, and the Earl Marshal, were usually present at his sermons, and were ardent admirers of his doctrine.

At length the Roman Catholic clergy, hitherto unaccountably indifferent, roused themselves from their lethargy, and Knox was summoned to appear before an ecclesiastical convention in the capital. He repaired to Edinburgh, prepared to defend his principles; and to his astonishment, found the diet deserted, and his pulpit surrounded, not by his accusers, but by crowds of affectionate and zealous disciples, to whom for a short season he was permitted to preach without interruption or disturbance. This liberty he probably owed to the toleration of the Queen-Regent; but when, at the request of the Earl Marshal, he carried his boldness so far as to address to this daughter of the house of Guise a letter, in which he exhorted her, not only to protect the Reformed preachers, but to lend a favourable ear to their doctrines, he found his propositions received with derision and contempt. Receiving his letter from Glencairn, and glancing hastily over it, the Dowager handed it to the Archbishop of Glasgow, asking him if his Lordship was solicitous to read a pasquil—a mode of proceeding which the Reformer treated afterwards with uncommon severity.

A RETREAT TO GENEVA.

At this critical period, when rejoicing in the success of his preaching, and congratulating himself that the time of the Church's deliverance was drawing nigh, Knox received an invitation to become pastor of the Reformed congregation in Geneva; and the readiness with which he obeyed the summons is one of the inexplicable circumstances of his life. Although his labours had been signally rewarded, the infant congregation, of which he was the head, still required his nurture and protection. During his last journey into Angus, the threatenings of the friars and bishops had increased, and the clouds of persecution were seen gathering round him. The state of the Reformation at Geneva, on the contrary, was prosperous. He had before bitterly upbraided himself for deserting his appointed charge in the hour of peril; yet he now repeated the same conduct, left his native country, and settled with his family on the Continent. It was in vain to tell his followers, as he did, that if they continued in godliness, whenever they pleased they might command his return. They were continuing in the truth, as he himself informs us, and they earnestly but unsuccessfully endeavoured to detain him. The rage, indeed, of his opponents was about to assume at this time a deadly aspect. They had denounced him to the Queen as an enemy to magistrates, as well as a seducer of the people, and, possibly, by retiring he saved his life; but, judging with all charity, it must be admitted, that whilst his writings at this period had all the impassioned zeal, his conduct betrayed some want of the ardent courage of the martyr.

His retreat had an immediate and unfavourable effect on the spread of the new opinions. The bishops and the friars increased in boldness and violence. Knox, whose personal encounter they dreaded, now that his appearance was impossible received a summons to stand his trial; condemnation followed, and he was burnt in effigy at the high cross of the capital. Previous to his departure, the Reformer exhorted his followers to continue their private meetings, which, he said, they ought to open and conclude with prayer, to read the Scriptures, and to listen to the word of exhortation from any experienced brother, provided his instructions were given with modesty and a desire to edify. Such directions they willingly obeyed; and secure in the countenance and protection of the queen-mother, who at this time courted their assistance, they became less the objects of jealousy and persecution to their adversaries of the Catholic faith.

INVITED TO RETURN; AT DIEPPE.

At last the leaders of the Reform party thought they might safely request the return of Knox to his native country. In a letter addressed to the Reformer, they informed him that the "faithful of his acquaintance were steadfast to the belief in which he had left them, that they thirsted for his presence, and were ready to jeopard their lives for the glory of God. Little cruelty," they observed, "had been used against them, the influence of the friars was decreasing, and they had good hopes that God would augment his flock."

Obedying this invitation, Knox resigned his charge at Geneva, and arriving at Dieppe on his way to Scotland, was met there, to his grief and mortification, by letters which arrested his journey. They stated that the zeal of the Reformers had suddenly cooled; that many, contented with the toleration they enjoyed, preferred the security of worshipping God in private according to their consciences, to the peril attending a public reformation; and that the scheme which had given rise to their letter had been precipitately abandoned.

It did not belong either to the disposition or principles of the Reformer to bear this vacillating conduct in silence. He addressed to them an immediate and indignant remonstrance, urged upon them the sacred duty of accomplishing the great work which they had begun; assuring them that although dangers and trials must be met with in its prosecution, their relinquishing it would not save them from the most tyrannical prescription; and concluded by reminding them that so vitally important a matter as the reformation of religion belonged to them, the nobility, even more than to the clergy or chief rulers called kings.

This epistle, which was accompanied by a detailed address to the nobles, and by private letters to Erskine of Dun and Wishart of Pittarrow, two leading men among the reformers, produced an astonishing effect. The lords deplored their weakness; a new impulse was given to the cause; zeal and resolution animated their repentant followers; and on the 3rd of December, 1557, that memorable bond or covenant was drawn up which henceforth united the Protestants under one great association, which was subscribed immediately by their principal supporters, and could not be deserted without something like apostacy.

It described in no mild or measured terms the bishops and ministers of the Roman Catholic Church as members of Satan, who sought to destroy the Gospel of Christ and His followers; and declared that the subscribers felt it to be their duty to strive in their Master's cause even to death, certain as they were of victory in Him. For this purpose it declared that they had entered into a solemn promise, in the presence of the "Majesty of God and His congregation, to set forward and establish with their whole power and substance His blessed Word; to labour to have faithful ministers; to defend them, at the peril of their lives and goods, against all tyranny;" and it concluded by anathematising their adversaries, and denouncing vengeance against all the superstition, idolatry, and abomination of the Roman Catholic Church.

This bond, which was drawn up at Edinburgh, received the signatures of the Earls of Glencairn, Argyle, Morton, Lord Lorn, Erskine of Dun, and many others. It was evidently an open declaration of war against the established religion: toleration and compromise were at an end; and their next step showed that the Congregation, for so the Reformers now named themselves, were determined to commence their proceedings in earnest. They passed a resolution, declaring "that in all parishes of the realm the Common Prayers (by which was meant the service-book of Edward VI.) should be read weekly on Sunday, and other festival days, in the parish churches, with the lessons of the Old and New Testaments; conform to the order of the Book of Common Prayer; and that if the curates of parishes be qualified, they shall be caused to read the same: but if they refuse, then the most qualified in the parish were directed to supply their place." It was resolved at the same time that "doctrine preaching, and interpretation of Scripture, be used privately in great houses, avoiding great conventions of people thereto, until such time as God should move the prince to grant public preaching by true and faithful ministers."

These resolutions the Lords of the Congregation proceeded to put in execution in such places as were under their power. The Earl of Argyle encouraged Douglas, his chaplain, to preach openly in his house; other barons followed his example; and a second invitation was addressed to Knox requesting his immediate presence among them. The Reformer in consequence landed in Scotland, the 2nd of May, 1559, he being then fifty-four years of age.

IN SCOTLAND AGAIN.

Knox found the cause of the Congregation in a very different condition from that in which he had left it at the period of his retreat from Scotland in 1557. It acquired a wonderful accession of strength in the return of this bold, uncompromising, and eloquent adherent, who, without delaying in the capital, repaired directly to Dundee. Here he learned that proceedings had been taken against the preachers of the Congregation, who had been summoned to appear at Stirling to answer for their conduct on the 10th of May. Knox at once expressed a wish to assist his brethren, and make confession of his faith along with them.

It was now resolved by the leaders of the Congregation that they would accompany their preachers to Stirling; and the principal barons of Angus and Mearns took their journey for this purpose to Perth. They wore no armour, but declared that they came as peaceable men, and solely to make confession of their faith, and to assist their ministers in their just defence. Lest their numbers might create alarm, Erskine of Dun, a grave and prudent man, noted for his early adherence to the Reformed opinions, leaving his brethren in Perth, went forward to Stirling, and requested an interview with the Queen. On this occasion ~~the~~ Regent acted with much dissimulation. She listened with apparent moderation; and when the envoy assured her that the single wishes of the Congregation were to be permitted to worship God according to their conscience, and to secure liberty to their preachers, she declared that if the people would disperse, the preachers should be unmolested, the summons discharged, and new proceedings taken which should move all ground of complaint.

Relying upon this promise, Erskine wrote to his brethren who were at Perth: their leaders sent home the people; and it was expected that peace and toleration would be restored. But with the removal of the danger the Regent thought it politic to forget her promises; and with a precipitation which was as treacherous as it was short-sighted, the summons was continued; the ministers, who did not appear, were denounced as rebels; and all were prohibited, under the penalty of high treason, from receiving or supporting them.

Enraged at such perfidy, the Laird of Dun withdrew indignantly from court; rejoined his brethren who were still at Perth; excused himself for having too implicitly trusted a princess who he was now convinced was resolved upon their destruction, and warned them to prepare for those extreme measures which were meditated against them. His representations made a deep impression; and Knox seized the moment to deliver to the people a sermon against idolatry, with all that fervid and impassioned eloquence for which he was so remarkable. He described how odious this crime appeared in the sight of God; what positive commands had been given in Scripture for the destruction of its monuments; and concluded by a denunciation of the mass as one of the most abominable forms in which it had ever appeared to ensnare and degrade the human mind.

AN OUTBREAK AT PERTH.

This gave rise to the first outbreak of popular reforming zeal into actual violence. The scene is thus described in Knox's own words:—

"The manner whereof was this: the preachers before had declared how odious was idolatry in God's presence; what commandment He had given for the destruction of the monuments thereof; what idolatry and what abomination were in the mass.

"It chanced that the next day, which was the 11th of May, after that the preachers were exiled, that after the sermon, which was vehement against idolatry, that a priest, in contempt, would go to the mass; and to declare his malapert presumption he would open up one glorious tabernacle which stood upon the high altar. There stood beside certain godly men, and amongst others a young boy, who cried with a loud voice,—

"This is intolerable, that when God by His Word hath plainly damned idolatry, we shall stand and see it used in despite."

"The priest, heretofore offended, gave the child a great blow, who in anger took up a stone, and casting it at the priest, did hit the tabernacle and broke down an image; and immediately the whole multitude that were about cast stones and put hands to the said tabernacle and to all other monuments of idolatry, which they despatched before the tentmen in the town were advertised (for the most part were gone to dinner), which noised abroad, the whole multitude convened, not of gentlemen, neither of them that were earnest professors, but of the rascal multitude, who, finding nothing to do in that church, did run without deliberation to the Grey and Black Friars; and notwithstanding that they had within them very strong guards kept for their defence, yet were their gates incontinent burst up.

"The first invasion was upon the idolatry, and thereafter the common people began to seek some spoil; and in very deed the Grey Friars was a place so well provided, that unless honest men had seen the same, we would have feared to have reported what provision they had. Their sheets, blankets, beds, and coverlets were such as no earl in Scotland hath the better; their napery was fine. There were but eight persons in convent, yet had eight puncheons of salt beef (consider the time of year, the 11th of May), wine, beer and ale, besides stores of victuals effeiring thereto. The like abundance was not in the Black Friars; and yet there was more than became men professing poverty.

"The spoil was committed to the poor; for so had the preachers before threatened all men that for covetousness' sake none should put their hand to such a reformation, that no honest man was enriched thereby the value of a groat. Their conscience so moved them that they suffered those hypocrites to take away what they could of that which was in their places. The Prior of Charterhouse was permitted to take away with him even so much gold and silver as he was well able to carry. So was men's consciences before beaten with the Word, that they had no respect to their own particular profit, but only to abolish idolatry, the places and monuments thereof; in which they were so busy and so laborious that within two days these three great places, monuments of idolatry,—to wit the Grey and Black thieves and Charterhouse monks (a building of wondrous cost and greatness,—were so destroyed that the walls only did remain of all these great edifications."

This extract brings powerfully before us a notorious feature of the Scottish Reformation—the destruction of the monuments of early ecclesiastical architecture throughout the country.

A DIFFICULT PART TO PLAY.

This ebullition of popular fury was not confined to Perth; the infection spread to Cupar, a small town which had embraced the Protestant opinions; and here similar excesses, though on a smaller scale, took place. These things being told to the Queen-Regent, they so incensed her, that she vowed to destroy every man, woman, and child in Perth, and to burn it to the ground. In execution of this threat she caused her French army to march towards it; but being told that great numbers from the neighbouring district were assembling for its defence, her impetuosity was checked, and she resolved to use stratagem where force was apparently useless.

She sent the Earls of Argyll and Moray to ask the design of the leaders of the Congregation in such commotions. Knox, in the name of the rest, answered, "That they whom she thus persecuted were the servants of God, and faithful and obedient subjects of the realm; that the religion which she would maintain by fire and sword was not of Jesus Christ, but a superstitious device of men, and that her enterprise should not succeed in the end; but that she fought not against man only, but against the eternal God."

Argyll and Moray delivered this message; and in return the Queen-Regent promised that the Reformers should be permitted to leave the town in peace. Knox preached a sermon, exhorting his friends to constancy; adding, "I am persuaded that this promise shall be no longer kept than the Queen and her Frenchmen can get the upper hand;" which happened just as he said, for she immediately took violent possession of the town, and put a garrison of Frenchmen into it. This breach of faith so disgusted the Earls of Argyll and Moray that they forsook her and joined the Congregation, and withdrew into Fife. Having met with the Laird of Dun and others, they sent for Knox, who on his way to them preached in Crail and Anstruther, intending to preach next day at St. Andrews.

This intention came to the ears of the archbishop, who raised a hundred spearmen and sent this message to the Lords, "That if John Knox offered to preach there he should have a warm military reception." They in their turn forewarned him of his danger, and dissuaded him from going. Knox answered that he was fully resolved on preaching. "In this town and church," he said, "did God first call me to the dignity of a preacher, and in this town, when torn from it by the tyranny of France, I expressed my assurance that I would preach again. Therefore preach here I must." And preach he did, and with such boldness and success that the magistrates and the people of the town, immediately after the sermon, agreed to remove all "monuments of idolatry," which, we are told, they did with all expedition.

Accompanying the forces of the Congregation, Knox now went to Edinburgh, where he preached in the principal churches. Soon after, however, he was obliged to leave the capital, in consequence of its occupation by the Regent's army, between which and that of the Reformers several skirmishes had taken place. He now undertook a preaching tour through the kingdom, and within less than two months travelled over a great part of Scotland, diffusing the knowledge and strengthening the interests of the Protestant cause.

A LETTER TO SECRETARY CECIL.

At this time, too, Knox greatly exerted himself in procuring for the Reformers the assistance of England. In this great object he was ultimately successful. The management of the correspondence to which it led chiefly devolved upon his hands; and the reader will gain a good idea of his powers as a letter-writer from the following remarkable epistle addressed to Secretary Cecil. His work against female sovereigns had made him odious to Elizabeth; and in this letter to Cecil he endeavours to deprecate her resentment. He intended to have enclosed at the same time an epistle to the Queen herself, but this he delayed owing to the sudden departure of the messenger.

"I understand," said he, in that honest and undaunted style of writing which was unacceptable to the courtly taste of the English Secretary, "I am become so odious to the Queen's Grace and to her Council, that the mention of my name is displeasing in their ears; but yet I will not cease to offer myself, requiring you, in God's name, to present to the Queen's Grace this my letter, smelling nothing of flattery, and therefore I hope it shall be the more acceptable. Why that either her Grace, either that the faithful in her realm, should repute me as an enemy, I know no just cause. One thing I know, that England by me this day hath received no hurt, yea, it hath received, by the power of God working in me, that benefit which yet to none in England is known, neither yet list I to boast of the same: only this will I say, that when England and the usurped authority thereof was enemy to me, yet was I friend to it; and the fruit of my friendship saved the Borders in their greatest necessities. My eyes have long looked to a perpetual concord betwixt these two realms, the occasion whereof is most present, if you shall move your hearts unfeignedly to seek the same. For humility of Christ Jesus crucified, now begun here to be practised, may join together the hearts of those whom Satan, by pride, hath long dissevered: for the furtherance hereof I would have license to repair towards you. God move your heart rightly to consider the estate of both the realms, which stand in greater danger than many do espy. The common bruit, I doubt not, carrieth unto you the troubles that be lately here risen for the controversy in religion. The truth is, that many of the nobility, the most part of barons and gentlemen, with many towns and one city, have put to their hands to remove idolatry and the monuments of the same. The Reformation is somewhat violent, because the adversaries be stubborn; none that professeth Christ Jesus with us usurpeth anything against the authorities, neither yet intendeth to usurp, unless strangers be brought in to subdue and bring in bondage the liberties of this poor country: if any such thing be espied, I am uncertain what shall follow."

IN ACTIVE WORK.

The exertions of Knox at this period were incredibly great. By day he was employed in preaching; by night in writing letters on public business. He was the soul of the Congregation, was always found at the post of danger, and by his presence, his public discourses and private advices, animated the whole body, and defeated the schemes employed to corrupt and divide them.

Such zeal and activity could not but expose him to the most deadly resentment of the Papists and the Queen-Regent. A reward was publicly offered to any one who should apprehend or assassinate him; and not a few, actuated by hatred or avarice, lay in wait to seize him. But all this did not deter him from appearing in public and discharging his duty as usual.

At length, however, the Queen-Regent died, and a general peace, which lasted for some time, was procured; during which the Commissioners of the Scottish nobility in 1560 began to settle ministers in different places. Knox was appointed to Edinburgh, where he continued till the day of his death.

The same year the Scots' Confession was compiled and agreed upon; and that the Church might be established upon a good foundation, a commission and charge was given to Knox and five others to draw up a form of government and discipline. When they had finished their task, they presented it to the nobility, and by them it was afterwards approved and ratified.

AFTER THE ARRIVAL OF QUEEN MARY; A CONFERENCE WITH THE QUEEN.

The advancement, however, which the Reformation was daily making soon after met with a severe check by the arrival of Queen Mary from France in August 1561. Along with her came Popery, and the mass was again publicly set up. This highly offended the religious part of the nation, and none more so than Knox, who, expressing the evil and danger of it on every occasion, by that means greatly exasperated the Queen and court.

On one occasion he was called before them and charged with being guilty of high treason. The Queen was present; and she produced a letter written by him, in which it was alleged he had convoked Her Majesty's lieges against law. On this a long argument ensued between him and Secretary Lethington as to the contents of the letter. Knox gave such sensible and bold answers in defence of himself and his doctrines, that at last he was acquitted by the Lords of the Council, to the great displeasure of the Queen and the popish party.

Some time previous to this, indeed immediately after the Queen's arrival in Scotland, Knox displayed similar independence and boldness in a long private conference which he was permitted to hold with the Queen. The Reformer has himself left us an account of their conversation.

The Queen blamed him for the violence of his book against female government; and with a clearness and vigour of argument for which he was probably not prepared, pointed out its evil consequences in inciting subjects against their rulers. She then advised him to treat with greater charity those who differed from him in opinion.

"If, Madam," said he, "to rebuke idolatry, and to persuade the people to worship God according to His Word, be to raise subjects against their princes, I cannot stand excused, for so I have acted; but if the true knowledge of God and His right worshipping lead all good subjects (as they assuredly do) to obey the prince from their hearts, then who can reprehend me?" As for his book, he allowed it was directed against female government, but excused its principles as being more matters of opinion than of conscience, and professed his willingness to live in all contentment under Her Majesty's government as long as she kept her hands undefiled by the blood of the saints of God. He contended that in religion subjects were bound to follow, not the will of their prince, but the commands of their Creator. "If," said he, "all men in the days of the apostles should have been compelled to follow the religion of the Roman emperor, where would have been the Christian faith? Daniel and his fellows were subjects to Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, and yet they refused to be of their religion."

"But," interrupted the Queen, "these men did not resist."

"And yet," replied Knox, "they who obey not the commandment may virtually be said to resist."

"Nay," said Mary, "they did not resist with the sword."

"That," rejoined Knox, "was simply because they had not the power."

"What," cried the Queen, starting and speaking with great energy, "do you maintain that subjects, having power, may resist their princes?"

"Most assuredly," continued the Reformer, "if princes exceed their bounds. God hath nowhere commanded higher reverence to be given to kings by their subjects than to parents by their children; and yet if a father or mother be struck with madness and attempt to slay his children they may lawfully bind and disarm him till the frenzy be overcome. It is even so, Madam," added this stern champion of resistance, fixing his eyes upon the young queen, and raising his voice to a tone which almost amounted to a menace,—“it is even so with princes that would murder the children of God, who may be their subjects. Their blind zeal is nothing but a mad frenzy, and therefore to take the sword from them, to bind their hands, and to cast them into prison till they be brought to a more sober mind, is no disobedience against princes, but just obedience, because it agreeth with the Word of God.”

At these words Mary stood for some time silent and amazed; she was terrified by the violence with which they were uttered. She thought of her own youth and weakness; of the fierce zealots by whom she was surrounded; her mind pictured to itself, in gloomy anticipation, the struggles which awaited her, and she burst into tears. On being comforted and soothed by Moray, who alone was present at the interview, she at length collected herself, and said, turning to Knox, "Well then, I perceive that my subjects shall only obey you and not me; they must do what they list, not what I command; whilst I must learn to be subject unto them, and not they to me."

"God forbid," said the Reformer, "that it should ever be so; far be it from me to command any, or to absolve subjects from their lawful obedience. My only desire is that both princes and subjects should obey God, who has in His Word enjoined kings to be nursing fathers, and queens nursing mothers to His Church."

"Yea," quoth Mary, "that is indeed true; but yours is not the Church that I will nourish. I will defend the Church of Rome, for I think it is the true Church of God."

At this strong assertion of her belief the indignation of Knox flamed fierce and high. "Your will, Madam," said he, "is no reason, neither doth your thought make that Roman harlot to be the immaculate spouse of Christ. And wonder not, Madam, that I call Rome an harlot, for that Church is altogether polluted with every kind of spiritual abomination, as well in doctrine as in manners. Yea, Madam, I offer myself to prove that the Church of the Jews, who crucified Jesus Christ, when they manifestly denied the Son of God, was not so far degenerated from the ordinances and statutes which God gave by Moses and Aaron unto His people, as the Church of Rome is declined, and for more than five hundred years hath declined, from that purity of religion which the Apostles taught and planted."

"My conscience," said Mary, "is not so."

"Conscience," said Knox, "requires knowledge; and I fear of right knowledge you have but little."

After some further exhortations, the Reformer exposed the idolatry of the mass, and threw down his defiance to the most learned Papists in Europe, declaring his earnest wish that he might have an opportunity of engaging with them in controversy before the Queen herself.

"In that wish," said Mary, "you may perhaps be indulged sooner than you expect."

She was then called to dinner; and Knox, on taking his leave, prayed that she might be blessed in the commonwealth of Scotland as richly as ever was Deborah in the commonwealth of Israel.

OTHER INTERVIEWS WITH THE QUEEN.

This was not the only interview Knox had with the Queen. They had four or five conversations, sometimes in her own palace, at her own request, sometimes by summonses of her Council. Mary often enough burst into tears, oftener than once into long-continued fits of passionate weeping—Knox standing with mild and pitying visage, but without the least hairsbreadth of recanting or recoiling; waiting till the fit should pass, and then with all softness, but with all inexorability, taking up his theme again.

"The high and graceful young Queen," remarks Mr. Carlyle, "we can well see, had now met, nor did meet, in this world with such a man. The hardest-hearted reader cannot but be affected with some pity, or think with other than softened feelings of this ill-starred young, beautiful, graceful, and highly-gifted human creature, planted down into so unmanageable an environment. So beautiful a being, so full of youth, of native grace and gift; meaning of herself no harm to Scotland or to anybody; joyfully going her progresses through her dominions: fond of hawking, hunting, music, literary study; cheerfully accepting every gift that outdoor life, even in Scotland, can offer to its right joyous-minded and ethereal young Queen. With irresistible sympathy one is tempted to pity this poor sister-soul, involved in such a chaos of contradictions, and hurried down to tragical destruction by them."

A memorable interview took place in 1562, when Knox had to defend himself from the charge of preaching against the Queen's dancing. Mary, he says, made a long harangue or oration; and Knox answered at length, showing that he had been misrepresented. We give the conclusion of the conversation in the words and orthography of Knox's "History:—

"The Queyn," he says, "looked about to some of the reaportaris, and said: 'Your wourdis ar scharpe yneuch as ye have spooken thame: but yitt thei war told to me in ane uther maner. I know,' she sche, 'that my uncles and ye ar nott of ane religioun, and thairfoir I can nott blame you albeit you have no good opinioun of thame. But yf ye hear anything of myself that myslikis you, come to myself and tell me, and I shall hear you.'

"'Madam,' quod he, 'I am assured that your uncles ar eneymes to God, and unto His Sone Jesus Christ; and that for mantenance of thair awin pompe and worldlie glorie, that thei spair not to spill the bloode of mony innocents; and thairfoir I am assured that thair interpryses shall have no better successe than otheris haif had that befoir thame have done that thei do now. But as to your awin personage, Madam, I wold be glade to do all that I could to your Grace's contentment, provided that I exceed nott the boundis of my vocatioun. I am called, Madam, to ane publict function within the Kirk of God, and am appointed by God to rebuk the synnes and vices of all. I am not appointed to come to everie man in particular to schaw him his offense; for that labour war infinite. Yf your Grace please to frequent the publict sermonis, then doubt I not but that ye shall fullie understand boith what I like and myslike, as weall in Your Majestie as in all otheris. Or yf your Grace will assigne unto me a certane day and hour when it will please you to hear the forme and substance of doctrin whiche is proponed in publict to the churches of this realme, I will most gladlie await upoun your Grace's pleaur, tyme, and place. But to wait upoun your chalmers doore or ellie whair, and then to have no farther libertie but to whisper my mynd in your Grace's eare, or to tell you what otheris think and speak of you, neather will my conscience nor the vocatioun whairto God hath called me suffer it. For albeit at your Grace's commandiment, I am heare now, yett can not I tell what other men shall judge of me, that at this tyme of day am absent from my book, and wayting upon the courte.'

"You will not alwayis," said sche, 'be at your book'—and so turned hir back. And the said Johne Knox departed with a reasonable meary countenance; whairat some Papists offended said: 'He is not effrayed.' Which heard of him he answered: 'Why should the pleasing face of a gentill woman effray me? I have looked in the faces of many angric men, and yit have nott bene effrayed above measure.' And so left he the Quene and the courte for that tyme."

After the Queen's marriage with the Earl of Darnley in 1565, on Sunday the 19th of August, Mary's husband came to the High Church of Edinburgh, where Knox preached from the words, 'O Lord, our Lord, other lords beside Thee have had the dominion over us,' etc. In his sermon he took occasion to speak of wicked princes, who for the sins of a people were sent to them as scourges; and also said that "God set in that room boys and women."

The consequence of this indiscreet sermon was that Knox was immediately ordered before the Council. He came to court after dinner, and was brought into the Queen's presence by Erskine of Dun, one of the Superintendents of the Kirk; but the presence of royalty was no restraint. The Queen wept as she listened to his bold harangue; and Knox left her at length as she yielded to a passionate flood of tears. As he passed from the outer chamber, he paused in the midst of a gay circle of the ladies of the royal household, in their gorgeous apparel, and addressed them in a grave style of banter on the pity that the silly soul could not carry all these fine garnishings to heaven.

A VISIT TO ENGLAND; IN DANGER; AT ST. ANDREWS.

About this time Knox visited his two sons, whom he had sent to reside with their mother's relations in England; and he endeavoured to render his journey thither subservient to the interests of religion, by carrying a letter from the Assembly to the English Bishops, interceding for lenity towards those of the clergy who scrupled to use the sacerdotal dress enjoined by the law. He returned to his charge about the time of the Queen's flight with Bothwell to Dunbar; and was delegated by the General Assembly to repair to the west in order to persuade the Hamiltons to join the confederated Lords in settling the kingdom.

On the 29th of July, 1567, he preached a sermon at the Coronation of James VI. in the parish church of Stirling; and was one of those who strongly urged the trial of Mary for the alleged murder of her husband, and her connection with Bothwell.

At the meeting of Parliament towards the end of the same year, he pressed the ratification of all the Acts of 1560 in favour of the Reformed faith, and was appointed one of the Commissioners for drawing out the particular points belonging to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which were to be presented at next meeting of Parliament.

In October 1570, Knox had a stroke of apoplexy, which, to a considerable degree, affected his speech; and though in a few days he was able to resume the duty of preaching, he never recovered from the debility produced by the attack. But though so much weakened in body that he never went abroad except on Sundays to the pulpit, yet whenever he saw the welfare of the Church or Commonwealth threatened, he entered into the cause with all the keenness of his most vigorous days.

In April of the following year, his situation was rendered very critical. The popish faction, having found that it would be impossible to get their form of worship re-established while the Reformation was making such progress, and while Knox and his associates were in such favour with the people, began to try other plans than those they had hitherto used. They spared no pains to blast his reputation by the most malicious calumnies. They tried even to gain their end by making attempts upon his life; for one night as he was sitting in his own house, he was fired at from the other side of the street. The shot entered at the window; but he being at another side of the table from that at which he usually sat, the assassin missed his mark: the bullet struck the candlestick, and then lodged in the roof of the apartment.

At the earnest entreaties of his friends, Knox reluctantly withdrew to St. Andrews, where he continued with undiminished boldness to denounce the enemies of the Reformed faith, and to withstand the encroachments made by its false friends upon the polity and revenues of the Church. The Earl of Morton, who afterwards became Regent, urged him to inaugurate the Archbishop of St. Andrew's; but he declined to do so, with solemn protestations against it; and pronounced an anathema both on the giver and receiver of the office. Though he was then very weak in body, he would not refrain from preaching, and was obliged to be supported in going to church; and when in the pulpit, he had to rest a little before he began to preach; but before he ended his sermon, he became so vigorous and active that he was like to have broken the pulpit to pieces.

At St. Andrews Knox remained till the end of August 1572, when the civil broils were a little abated, and he returned to his flock at Edinburgh. He was now much oppressed with the infirmities of old age, and the extraordinary fatigues he had undergone. The death of the Regent Moray had made a deep impression upon him; and when he heard of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and the murder of the Admiral Coligni, the melancholy news almost deprived him of life.

NOMINATING A SUCCESSOR; THE LAST SERMON.

Feeling his end approaching, he persuaded the Council and Kirk Session of Edinburgh to unite with him in admitting James Lawson, at that time Professor of Philosophy in the college of Aberdeen, as his successor. He wrote a letter to Mr. Lawson, entreating him to accept the charge, and added this postscript: "Make haste, my brother, otherwise you will come too late;" meaning that if he came not speedily he would find him dead. Mr. Lawson accordingly set out, making all possible haste for Edinburgh, where, after he had preached twice to the full satisfaction of the people, the 9th of November was appointed for his admission.

When the 9th came, Knox, though then still weaker, preached with much power. In the close of his sermon he called God to witness that he had walked in a good conscience among them, not seeking to please men, nor serving his own or other men's inclinations, but in all sincerity and truth preaching the Gospel of Christ. Then praising God, who had given them one in his room, he exhorted them to stand fast in the faith they had received; and having prayed fervently for the Divine blessing upon them, and for the increase of the Spirit upon their new pastor, he gave them his last farewell; at which all the congregation were much affected.

He was carried home; and on the 13th was so weak that he had to abandon his ordinary reading of the Scriptures. The next day he expressed his determination to rise; and being asked what he intended by getting out of bed, he replied that he would go to church, thinking it had been Sunday. He told them that he had been all night meditating on the resurrection, which he should have preached on in order after the death of Christ, having made that the subject of his sermon the Sabbath before. He had often, we are told, prayed that he might end his days in meditating and preaching upon that doctrine; a desire that seems to have been granted to him.

LAST DAYS.

Upon the 17th, the elders and deacons were sent for by him, and, raising himself in his bed, he addressed them in these solemn words: "The time is approaching for which I have long thirsted, wherein I shall be relieved of all cares, and be with my Saviour Christ for ever. And now God is my witness, whom I have served with my spirit in the Gospel of His Son, that I have taught nothing but the true and solid doctrine of the Gospel; and that the end I proposed in all my preaching was to instruct the ignorant, to confirm the weak, to comfort the consciences of those who were humbled under the sense of their sins; and bear down, with the threatenings of God's judgments, such as were proud and rebellious. I am not ignorant that many have blamed, and yet do blame, my too great rigour and severity; but God knows, that in my heart I never hated the persons of those against whom I thundered God's judgments. I did only hate their sins, and laboured with all my power to gain them to Christ. That I forbore none of whatsoever condition, I did it out of the fear of my God, who had placed me in the function of the ministry, and I knew would bring me to an account. Now, brethren, for yourselves, I have no more to say, but that you take heed to the flock over whom God hath placed you overseers, and whom He hath redeemed by the blood of His only-begotten Son. And you, Mr. Lawson [this was his successor], fight a good fight. Do the work of the Lord with courage and with a willing mind; and God from above bless you and the Church whereof you have the charge: against it, so long as it continueth in the doctrine of the truth, the gates of hell shall not prevail."

During his illness he continued to exhibit all his wonted interest in public affairs, often bewailed the defection of Grange, one of his oldest friends, and sent a message to him, which at the time was regarded as almost prophetic. "Go," said he, addressing Lindsay, the minister of Leith, "to yonder man in the castle, whom you know I have loved so dearly, and tell him that I have sent you yet once more to warn him, in the name of God, to leave that evil cause. . . . Neither the craggy rock in which he miserably confides, nor the carnal prudence of that man [meaning the Secretary Lethington] whom he esteems a demi-god, nor the assistance of strangers, shall preserve him; but he shall be disgracefully dragged from his nest to punishment, and hung on a gallows against the face of the sun, unless he speedily amend his life and flee to the mercy of God."

It appears probable enough that in this and other similar predictions, the dying Reformer, who was not only intimately acquainted with, but engaged in, the secret correspondence between his party and England, availed himself of this knowledge to fulminate his threats and warnings, which he knew the advance of the English army was so soon likely to fulfil.

One of Knox's visitors having desired him to praise God for the good he had done, he answered: "Flesh of itself is too proud, and needs nothing to puff it up;" and protested that he only laid claim to the free mercy of God in Christ. Among others, to the Earl of Morton, who was then about to receive the regency (the Earl of Mar having died the preceding month), he was heard to say, "My Lord, God hath given you many blessings; He hath given you high honour, birth, great riches, many good friends, and is now to prefer you to the government of the realm. In His name I charge you, that you will use these blessings better in time to come than you have done in time past; in all your actions seek first the glory of God, the furtherance of His gospel, the maintenance of His Church and ministry; and then be careful of the King, to procure his good and the welfare of the kingdom. If you act thus God will be with you; if otherwise, He will deprive you of all these benefits, and your end will be shameful and ignominious." This threatening, Morton, to his melancholy experience, confessed was literally accomplished; at his execution in June 1581, he called to mind Knox's words, and acknowledged that in what he had said to him he had been a true prophet.

Knox's weakness rapidly increased; and on Friday the 21st of November, he desired his coffin to be made. The succeeding Saturday and Sunday were spent by him almost uninterruptedly in meditation and prayer, in pious ejaculations, and earnest advices addressed to his family and friends. These words were frequently in his mouth: "Come, Lord Jesus. Sweet Jesus, into Thy hands I commend my spirit. Be merciful, Lord, to Thy Church which Thou hast redeemed. Give peace to this afflicted Commonwealth. Raise up faithful pastors who will take care of Thy Church. Grant us, Lord, the perfect hatred of sin, both by the evidence of Thy wrath and mercy."

Monday, the 24th of November, was the last day he spent on earth. He rose out of bed about ten o'clock, sat up for about half an hour, and then returned to bed again. Being asked if he had any pain, he answered, "No pain but such as, I trust, will soon put an end to this battle; yea, I do not esteem that pain to me which is the beginning of eternal joy." In the afternoon he caused his wife to read the fifteenth chapter of the First Epistle to the Corinthians. When it was ended, he said, "Is not that a comfortable chapter?" and a little after, "I commend my soul, spirit, and body into Thy hands, O Lord."

About eleven o'clock he gave a deep sigh, and said, "Now it is come;" upon which Richard Bannatyne, his faithful friend and secretary, drew near, and said, "Now, sir, the time you have long called to God for doth instantly come; and, seeing all natural powers fail, give us some sign that you live upon the comfortable promises which you have so often showed to us." Upon this Knox lifted up one of his hands, and immediately after, sighing twice, he expired without any struggle, as one falling asleep.

The Reformer was buried in the churchyard of St. Giles, upon Wednesday the 26th of November. His funeral was attended by the Earl of Morton, then Regent, other Lords, and a great multitude of people of all ranks. When he was laid in the grave, the Earl of Morton said, "There lies a man who in his life never feared the face of man: who hath been often threatened with dog and dagger, but hath ended his days in honour and peace."

PERSONAL APPEARANCE; THE DOCTRINES OF KNOX.

Knox was little in stature and of a weak constitution, which led Principal Smeaton, one of his contemporaries, to say, "I know not if ever God placed a more godly and great spirit in a body so little and frail. I am certain that there can scarcely be found another in whom more gifts of the Holy Ghost for the comfort of the Church of Scotland did shine. No one spared himself less; no one was more diligent in the charge committed to him, and yet no one was more the object of the hatred of wicked men, and more vexed with the reproach of evil speakers; but this was so far from abating that it rather strengthened his courage and resolution in the ways of God." Beza calls him "the great apostle of the Scots."

The doctrines of Knox were those of the English Reformers impregnated to a certain extent with Calvinism. His opinions respecting the sacraments coincided with those of the English Protestants; he preached that all sacrifices which men offered for sin were blasphemous; that it was incumbent to make an open profession of the doctrine of Christ, and to avoid idolatry, superstition, and every sort of worship not authorized by the Scriptures. He was altogether opposed to Episcopacy.

The opposition of Knox as well to Episcopacy as to prelacy has caused his reputation to be severely handled by many writers of contrary opinions on these points. The elaborate character drawn of him by his biographer Dr. McCrie, appears to us on the whole a just representation, and we give a brief summary of it:—"Knox possessed strong talents, was inquisitive, ardent, acute, vigorous, and bold in his conceptions. He was a stranger to none of the branches of learning cultivated in that age by persons of his profession, and he felt an irresistible desire to impart his knowledge to others. Intrepidity independence and elevation of mind, indefatigable activity and constancy, which no disappointments could shake, eminently qualified him for the post which he occupied. In private life he was loved and revered by his friends and domestics. When free from depression of spirits, the result of ill-health, he was accustomed to unbend his mind, and was often witty and humorous. Most of his faults may be traced to his natural temperament and the character of the age and country in which he lived. His passions were strong, and as he felt he expressed himself without reserve or disguise. His zeal made him intemperate; he was obstinate, austere, stern, and vehement. These defects, which would have been inexcusable in most other persons, may be more easily forgiven in him, for they were among the most successful weapons in his warfare.

KNOX'S FAMILY; HIS LITERARY WORKS.

Knox was twice married. It was while one of Cranmer's chaplains at Berwick-on-Tweed that he became a visitor in the family of Richard Bowes, captain of Norham Castle, who was connected by marriage with the Wiclif family. Inclining still to the old faith, Captain Bowes opposed the advances of John Knox to his fifth daughter, Marjory; but the girl herself, and, still more her intensely Puritan mother, favoured his suit. In 1553 Marjory became betrothed to him, and was ever after alluded to and addressed as his "wyfe" and "dearest spouse." In 1556, after his Continental experiences, he seems to have been married; and his sickly mother-in-law was an inmate of his house till she died. At the close of 1560, after he had settled in Edinburgh as city minister, his wife died at the age of twenty-seven. When Calvin condoled with him, he described her as "a wife, the like of whom is not everywhere found." His own epithet for her was "suavissima."

It is around Knox's second wife that public interest centres. After three years he married a girl of sixteen, of royal blood; and the union excited the jealousy of Queen Mary, of whom Randolph wrote to Cecil—"The Queen stormeth wonderfully for that she is of the blood and name." She was Margaret Stewart, second daughter of Andrew, third Lord Ochiltree, and was descended from Robert II. through his second son, Robert, Duke of Albany. Her father was "the good Lord Ochiltree," and intimate friend of John Knox; but the marriage caused much gossip, curious and malevolent. By his first wife Knox had two sons, both of whom died unmarried.

John Knox's second wife became a widow at twenty-four, was allowed the Reformer's pension of 500 merks for one year by the General Assembly, and the year after married Andrew Ker, of Faldonsyde, Roxburghshire, a zealous friend of the Reformation.

Of the three daughters whom she bore to John Knox, the youngest, Mrs. Welch, appears to have been a remarkable person.

John Knox's literary works are, "An Admonition to England," "An Application to the Scots Nobility," "A Letter to Mary the Queen-Regent," "A History of the Reformation," "A Treatise on Predestination," "The First and Second Blast of the Trumpet," and "A Sermon Preached in August 1565," on account of which he was for some time prohibited from preaching.

His chief work is "The History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland," printed after his death. Having been written at intervals, and amid the distractions of a busy life, much of it is in a confused and indigested state; but it still maintains its value as a chief source of information on the ecclesiastical history of the eventful period during which the author lived; and, though sometimes inaccurate, and the production of a partisan, it has, in the main, been confirmed by the researches of later historians.

Speaking of Knox's "History," the late Dr. John Hill Burton says: "There certainly is in the English language no other parallel to it in the clearness, vigour, and picturesqueness with which it renders the history of a stirring period. Whoever would see and feel the spirit of the Reformation in Scotland—and in England, too, for that matter—must needs read and study it

The reader who may happen not to be a zealous Calvinist, will deal with it as the work of a partisan. From first to last there is no mistaking it for anything else. It is throughout the living spirit of partisanship, strong, resolute, and intolerant.

"But for all that it is truth. In fact, the author had achieved a perfection of positivism which is incompatible with dissimulation and concealment. Whatever is done by him and his is so absolutely right, and so valuable as an example and encouragement to others, that the more loudly and fully it is proclaimed to the world the better.

"Of all the revelations in this book, none is more remarkable than its writer's own character. His arrival in Scotland is an important event; all his doings are important in his own eyes as well as in those of others. Whether it be for the adoration of the just, or the malignity of the wicked, 'John Knox' is ever the conspicuous figure in John Knox's book. When the Regent, Mary of Lorraine, is seized with a fit of untimely exultation, it is against him that she flings. 'She burst forth in her blasphemous railing, and said, "Where is now John Knox's God? My God is now stronger than his, yea, even in life."' Speaking of the last ecclesiastical Council, which attempted the internal reform of the Church, he says: 'The bishops continued in their Provincial Council until that day that John Knox arrived in Scotland;' as if this conjunction aggravated the audacity of their doings.

"The way in which he thus sets forth his notions, as if he were writing the biography of some great man whose deeds he had the good fortune to witness, might be called egotism or vanity in one less in earnest. But it all comes of natural impulse, and reads naturally. All the world is astir, and he, John Knox, is the centre of its motion. He was a man of thorough practical experience, who had seen life in all its grades, from the court to the galley-slave's bench. He was signally acute in penetrating political mysteries, and unflinching the designs of men when these were hostile; but he was as signally blind to the true character of compliant or perfidious partisans. Working with greedy, selfish men, intent on their own aggrandisement, he deemed them to be as completely as himself under the influence of an unselfish religious spirit; and when the evidence of sordidness was all too flagrant, he turned his honest eyes on it with surprise, like one who beholds his sober, sedate friend take suddenly to drinking, or go off in a fit of acute madness."

It may be mentioned that in more than one quarter Knox was charged with innovation on the old language of the country, which he corrupted by modern additions. When put in a friendly shape, the import of this charge is that he improved the language of his country as he reformed its religion; and it has been pointed out as a singular coincidence that Luther has the fame of reforming the language of Germany, and Calvin of reforming the language of France.

THE TEST OF A GREAT MAN.

There is, perhaps, no juster test of a great man than the impression which he has left, or the changes he has wrought upon his age; and under this view, none is more entitled to this appellation than Knox, who has been deservedly regarded as the father of the Reformation in Scotland. The history of his life is, indeed, little else than the history of this great religious revolution; and none can deny him the praise of courage, integrity, and indefatigable exertion in proclaiming that system of truth which is believed to be founded upon the Word of God. To this he was faithful to the last; and whatever faults he may at times have committed in the prosecution of his designs, on no occasion do we find him influenced by selfish or venal motives. In this respect he stands alone and pre-eminent over all men with whom he laboured. To extirpate a system which in its every part he believed to be false and idolatrous, and to replace it by another of which he was as firmly persuaded that it was the work of God, seems to have been the master passion of his mind. In the accomplishment of this none who have studied the history of the times or his own writings, will deny that he was often fierce, unrelenting, and unscrupulous; but he was also sincere, upright, and disinterested. He neither feared nor flattered the great; the pomp of the mitre or the revenues of the wealthiest diocese had no attraction in his eyes; and there cannot be a doubt of his sincerity, when, in a last message to his old and long-tried friend Lord Burgheley, he assured him that he counted it higher honour to have been made the instrument that the Gospel was simply and truly preached in his native country, than to have been the highest prelate in England.

INTRODUCTORY.

IN the following pages we have sketched the life of one whose memory is cherished by a third part of the human race, and whose character and teachings have for over two thousand years influenced the institutions of his native land.

We see in Confucius the patron saint of China; an intensely earnest teacher whose words have there given laws to thought, and have kept alive throughout that vast empire a reverence for the past and a sense of duty that have made the Chinese the most orderly and most moral people on the face of the earth, however true it may be that to "the mighty hopes that make us men" they are still strangers.

Confucius was a man, to use the words of a distinguished writer, who, six centuries before Christ, considered the outward economy of an empire a worthier object of study than all hidden and abstracted lore; who prized maxims of life and conduct more than all speculations regarding the Divinity; who had actually anticipated some of the most modern propositions respecting the governor and the governed.

This man was not a mere name for a set of opinions; he had a distinct, marked personality. All his words and acts have not been limited to a narrow circle or to one or two centuries. He has left an impression of himself upon the most populous empire in the world. After two thousand years his authority is still sacred among the people, the mandarins, the emperors of China; his influence is felt in every portion of that vast and complicated society.

The study of such a career as that of this famous sage will do much to banish from our minds the idea that the little circle of thought and opinion in which we ourselves move is the only possible one. It introduces us to ways most unlike our own; and whilst we recognise the fact that human nature is everywhere pretty much the same, we also see that it is capable of very strange developments.

CHINA IN THE TIME OF CONFUCIUS.

The China of the time of Confucius was a feudal kingdom, and consisted of only about a sixth part of the present vast empire. It embraced thirteen States of note, and a considerable number of smaller ones: the population might be from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000.

It has been pointed out by Professor Legge that feudal China was a very different thing from feudal Europe. There were three elements which combined to give feudal China peculiarities of character for which our better acquaintance with feudal Europe would not have prepared us.

"First we must take into account the long duration of time, through which the central authority was destitute of vigour. For about five centuries, State was left to contest with State, and clan with clan in the several States. The result was chronic misrule and misery to the masses of the people, with frequent famines. Secondly we must take into account the institution of polygamy, with the low status assigned to woman and the many restraints put upon her. In the ancient poems, indeed, there are a few pieces which are true love tales, and express a high appreciation of the virtue of their subjects; but there are many more which tell a different tale. The intrigue, quarrels, murder, and grossness that grew out of this social condition it is difficult to conceive, and would be impossible to detail. Thirdly, we must take into account the absence of strong and definite religious belief properly so called, which has always been a characteristic of the Chinese people. We are little troubled, of course, with heresies, and are not shocked by the outbreak of theological zeal; but where thought as well as action does not reach beyond the limits of earth and time, we do not find man in his best estate. We miss the graces and consolations of faith; we have human efforts and ambitions, but they are unimpregnated with divine impulses and heavenly aspirations."

The supreme rulers of this Kingdom were of the Chow dynasty, the third which, within historic time, had held dominion over the country; but the dynasty had passed its zenith, and held the sceptre with anything but a firm hand. The chiefs of the different States belonged to the five orders of nobility, which corresponded closely to the dukes, marquises, earls, counts, and barons, who played a leading part in feudal Europe. These princes, as they might be called, paid an annual tribute to the King, and might, at any time, be summoned, with their military levies, to act in his service.

Without energy and ability on the part of the sovereign, a feudal kingdom is sure to become a prey to disorder, and the period was one of widespread and ever-increasing suffering and degeneracy. The general government was weak, and disorganization was at work in each particular State.

Even at this early period of history there was much literary culture, and many of the arts of civilization were practised. Not only at the royal court, but at the court of every feudal chief, we find historiographers and musicians. Institutions of an educational nature also abounded.

BIRTH AND PARENTAGE.

The birth of Confucius took place in the State of Loo either in the year 550 or 551 B.C., in one of the months of winter. His clan name was K'ung. Confucius, we may add, is just the Latinized form of K'ung Fu-tze, which means "the philosopher or master K'ung."

The father of Confucius, Heih by name, appears in the history of the times as a soldier of great prowess and daring. In the year B.C.

562, when serving at the siege of a place called Peih-yang, a party of the assailants made their way in at a gate which had purposely been left open; and no sooner were they inside it than the portcullis was dropped. Heih was just entering. Catching the massive structure with both hands, he gradually, by dint of main strength, raised it and held it up till his friends had made their escape.

Confucius's mother's name was Yen Ching-tsai. Her marriage with Heih took place when Heih was seventy years old; and the prospect, therefore, of his having an heir having been so slight, unusual rejoicings commemorated the birth of the son who was destined to achieve such everlasting fame.

Tradition reports that Confucius was born in a cave on Mount Ne, whither Ching-tsai went, in obedience to a vision, to be confined. But this is, no doubt, only one of the many legends with which Chinese writers delight to glorify their sage. It is about as likely to be true as the account they give of how the event was heralded by strange portents and miraculous appearances; how genii announced to Ching-tsai the honour ~~this~~ was in store for her, and how fairies attended at Confucius's nativity.

EARLY YEARS; PUBLIC EMPLOYMENTS.

As to the early years of Confucius we have slight information. It would seem that from his childhood he exhibited marked ritualistic tendencies, and as a boy took great delight in playing at the arrangement of vessels and at postures of ceremony. As he grew up he became earnest in the study of history; and we find him looking back with love and reverence to the golden age of the reigns of the great and good Yaou and Shun.

When fifteen years old, we are told he bent his mind to learning. In his twentieth year he married a lady from the State of Sung. Unfortunately he only supplied another illustration to the rule that literary men and philosophers seldom are happy husbands. In the end, he divorced his wife, not, however, before she had borne him a son.

His abilities attracted attention; and not long after his marriage, he was offered the post of Keeper of the public stores of grain. The necessity for doing something for a living induced him to accept it; and in the following year we find him promoted to be Guardian of the public fields and lands. Whilst engaged in these official duties, his son was born; and Confucius was regarded with so much respect, that the reigning duke, on hearing of the event, sent him the present of a carp. From this circumstance the child got the name of Le (a carp).

It was, as we have already hinted, at a critical period in the history of China that Confucius passed his early years. The world, says Mencius, one of the most celebrated of his followers, had fallen into decay, and right principles were nowhere to be found. Oppression and perverse discourse were everywhere prevalent. Rulers were murdered by their ministers, and fathers by their sons. Confucius was terrified by what he saw, and he resolved to take in hand the work of restoration.

In his twenty-second year we find him assuming the position of a public teacher; and his house began to be frequented by young and inquiring spirits, who wished to gain acquaintance with the doctrines of antiquity. However small the fee his pupils could afford to pay, the sage never refused to give instruction. All he asked for was an ardent desire to learn, and the capacity to take advantage of what was taught. "I do not open the truth," he said, "to one who is not eager to gain knowledge, nor help out any one who is not anxious to explain for himself. When I have presented one corner of a subject to any one, and he cannot learn from it the other three, I do not repeat my lesson.

HIS MOTHER'S DEATH.

The mother of Confucius died in the year 528 B.C. This interrupted his administrative functions. According to the ancient and almost forgotten laws of China, children were obliged to resign all public employment on the death of either of their parents; and Confucius, desirous of renewing the observance in his native land of all the practices of venerable antiquity, did not fail to conform to the enactment.

He further resolved, that instead of consigning the dead, as was now customary in China, to any waste piece of ground at hand, the obsequies of his mother should be celebrated with a pomp and magnificence which should be an example to the whole country. This spectacle, in which pomp united with propriety, struck his fellow citizens with astonishment, and inspired them with such touching recollections, that they resolved to restore the observance of what were supposed to be the ancient funeral rites, and to bury their dead with all the honours of antiquity. This example was soon followed by the inhabitants of the neighbouring States, and the whole nation, excepting the lowest class, has continued the practice to the present day.

Confucius, however, was not satisfied with a splendid ceremony, which might be forgotten before the "funeral baked meats" were cold. He inculcated the necessity of repeating acts of homage and respect at stated times, either at the grave or in a part of the dwelling-place consecrated for the purpose. Hence arose the hall of ancestors and anniversary feasts of the dead, which now distinguish the Chinese as a nation, and in which, unfortunately, the Confucian testimonials of affection and respect have degenerated into idolatrous worship. Delighted at the success of his experiment, Confucius shut himself up in his house to pass in solitude the three years of mourning for his mother.

When the mourning for his mother was over, Confucius remained in Loo, most likely pursuing his studies in the history, literature, and institutions of the empire, and imparting instruction to the inquirers who flocked to listen to his words.

AT LOO AND AT CHOW.

In B.C. 523, when Confucius was about twenty-nine years old, we find him studying music under a famous master called S'ung. His convictions on the subjects to which he had been giving attention for the previous fifteen years were now fully matured, and he was ready to take advantage of an opportunity which soon presented itself.

Ho-ke and Nun-kung King-shuh, sons of one of the principal ministers of Loo, became his disciples, their wealth and standing in the State giving him a position he had never enjoyed before. By the influence and kindly offices of King-shuh, a wish he had entertained of visiting the Court of Chow was gratified; and he went thither in a carriage and pair placed at his disposal by the Duke Ch'au.

At Chow he appeared not as a politician, but as an inquirer into the ceremonies and maxims of the founder of the dynasty. He did not remain long there, returning within a year to Loo, where he recommenced his work of teaching. His fame was greatly increased; disciples came to him from different parts till their number amounted to about 3,000. We are not to conceive of these disciples, Professor Legge points out, as forming a community and living together, though parties of them may have done so. We shall find Confucius hereafter always moving amid a company of admiring pupils; but the greater number must have had their proper avocations and modes of living, and would only resort to the master when they wished specially to ask his counsel or listen to his instructions.

His stay in Loo, however, did not last much longer. The three leading clans of the State, those of Ke, Sh'uh, and Mang, after frequent contests among themselves, engaged in a war with the reigning Duke, and defeated his armies. On this the Duke fled to the State of Ts'i, whither Confucius followed him.

AT TS'I.

Possibly Confucius was attracted to Ts'i by knowing that the music of the emperor Shun was still preserved at the Court. At all events we are told that, having listened to a strain of the much desired music on his way to the capital, he hurried on, and was so charmed with the airs he heard, that for three months he never tasted flesh. "I did not think," said he, "that music could reach such a pitch of excellence."

On crossing the Tai Mountains on his way to Ts'i, an interesting incident occurred. We mention it, for it is a good illustration of the way in which the sage took advantage of every incident for conveying to his disciples some wholesome moral lesson. They came upon a grave, and beside it sat a woman weeping and wailing. Confucius stopped, and sent one of his little band to ask the reason of her grief. "Why," said the woman, "my husband's father was killed by a tiger, and my husband also, and last of all my son has fallen a victim to the wild beast." "But why do you not leave so fatal a spot?" "Because," replied she, "there is here no oppressive government." "Take heed, my children, said Confucius to his disciples, "oppressive government is fiercer and more dreaded than any tiger."

Hearing of the arrival of Confucius, the Duke of Ts'i, King by name, sent for him; and after some conversation, being minded to play the part of patron to so distinguished a visitor, offered to make him a present of the city of Lin-k'ew, with all its revenues. But this the sage declined, remarking to his disciples: "A superior man will not receive rewards except for services done. I have given advice to the Duke King, but he has not followed it as yet, and now he would endow me with this place. Very far is he from understanding me." He still, however, discussed politics with the Duke, and taught him that "there is good government when the prince is prince, and the minister is minister, when the father is father, and the son is son." "Good," said the Duke; "if, indeed, the prince be not prince, the minister not minister, and the son not son, although I have my revenues can I enjoy it?"

Confucius did not find in Ts'i a residence to his mind. The Duke King could not make up his mind exactly how to treat him. The newcomer was not a man of rank; but the ruler felt that as much honour was due to him as rank could lay claim to. Some of the advisers of the Court set him down as "impracticable and conceited, and marked by a thousand oddities." In the end it was proposed to settle a considerable revenue upon him; but Confucius would not accept any pension unless his counsels were followed. This the people of Ts'i were not quite so ready to do. Dissatisfaction followed, and he returned to the State from which he had come. Loo, however, he found still in disorder, the reins of government being in the hands of the strongest party for the time being.

IN LOO AGAIN; AS MINISTER OF CRIME.

In Loo he remained in private life for fifteen years, his time being occupied in the prosecution of his studies, and in adding to the number of his disciples. A portion of his leisure he devoted to the compilation of the Book of Odes and the Book of History.

At last order was restored, and an opportunity was afforded him of entering into the service of the State. He was made Minister of Crime, and had a chance of putting his principles of government to the test. The appointment was sufficient to deal crime its deathblow. There was no need to put the penal laws in force, for there were absolutely no offenders. The people gloried in his rule, and used to sing at their work songs in which he was described as their saviour from oppression and wrong.

In Confucius we have an enthusiast to whom want of success in the reformation of his age never seemed to suggest a doubt as to the complete wisdom of his creed. If his theory was to be successful in practice, his official administration should not only have secured the reform of the subjects of his sovereign, but should have effected an equally healthy change in the neighbouring state. But what was actually the case? The contentment which reigned among the people of Loo, instead of rousing the Duke of Ts'i to institute a similar system, only excited his jealousy. "With Confucius at the head of the Government of Loo," said he, "Loo will become supreme among the States; and Ts'i, which lies nearest to it, will be the first to be swallowed up. Let us propitiate it by a surrender of territory."

A more sagacious statesman, however, suggested that they should first attempt to bring about the disgrace of the sage. With this object in view, he sent, by way of a present to the Duke of Loo, eighty beautiful girls, accomplished in the arts of music and dancing, and a hundred and twenty of the finest horses to be seen anywhere.

The result was just what was anticipated by the wily minister. The girls found a splendid welcome in the Duke's harem, the horses were safely housed in the ducal stables; and Confucius was left to his own reflections on the folly of men who preferred the frivolous songs of pretty girls to the wisdom of Yao and Shun.

Confucius felt that he must leave the State. The neglect of the Duke to send round among the ministers portions of the flesh after a great sacrifice, furnished a plausible reason for withdrawing from the Court. He left very slowly and unwillingly, hoping that a change would come over the Duke and his counsellors, and that they would recall him. But no recall came; and he went forth, in his fifty-sixth year, to a weary period of wandering among various States.

CONFUCIUS'S IDEAS OF GOVERNMENT.

As to Confucius's ideas of government, which we may pause here to examine, we quote from Professor Legge the following instructive summary:—"A disciple once asked him what he would consider the first thing to be done, if entrusted with the government of a State. His reply was, 'The rectification of names.' When told that such a thing was wide of the mark, he held to it; and, indeed, his whole social and political system was wrapped up in the saying.

"He had told the Marquis of Ts'i, as we have already seen, that good government was obtained when the ruler was ruler, and the minister minister; when the father was father, and the son, son. Society, he considered, was an ordinance of heaven, and was made up of five relationships—ruler and subject, husband and wife, father and son, elder brothers and younger, and friends. There was rule on the side of the first four, and submission on the other. The rule should be in righteousness and benevolence, the submission in righteousness and sincerity. Between friends the mutual promotion of virtue should be the guiding principle. It was true that the duties of the several relations were being continually violated by the passions of men, and the social state had become an anarchy. But Confucius had confidence in the preponderating goodness of human nature, and in the power of example in superiors. 'Not more surely,' he said, 'does the grass bend before the wind, than the masses yield to the will of those above them.' Given the model ruler, and the model people would forthwith appear.

"And he himself could make the model ruler,

He could tell the princes of the States what they ought to be; and he could point them to examples of perfect virtue in former times—to the sage founders of their own dynasty; to the sage S'ang, who had founded the previous dynasty of Shang; to the sage Yer, who first established a hereditary kingdom in China; and to the greater sages still who lived in a more distant golden age.

"With his own lessons and these patterns, any ruler of his day, who would listen to him, might reform and renovate his own State, and his influence would break forth beyond its limits, till the face of the whole kingdom should be filled with a multitudinous relation—keeping well-fed, happy people. 'If any ruler,' he once said, 'would submit to me as his director for twelve months, I should accomplish something considerable; and in three years I should attain the realization of my hopes.' Such were the ideas, the dreams of Confucius. But he had not been able to get the ruler of his native State to listen to him. His sage counsels had melted away before the glance of beauty and the pomps of life."

WANDERING TO-AND-FRO.

Though disappointed of the hopes he entertained of the Duke of Loo, Confucius was by no means disposed to resign his rôle as the reformer of the age. "If any one among the princes would employ me," said he in words we have already quoted, "I would effect something considerable in twelve months, and in three years the Government would be perfected." But the times were unfavourable. The struggle for supremacy which had been going on for centuries between the princes of the various States was then at its height; and though there might be a question as to who would be ultimately victorious, there could be no doubt that the sceptre had already passed from the hands of the ruler of Chow.

When Confucius left Loo, he was in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He did not return to it for thirteen years. During this period, he travelled about among different States, hoping to fall in with some prince who would accept him as his adviser, and so initiate a government which should become the centre of a general reformation. But his hopes were vain; several princes were pleased enough to receive and entertain him, but, spite of his wise discourses, they would not alter their plans.

REMARKABLE INCIDENTS.

Many incidents that befell the sage during this unsettled period of his life are of great interest both as exhibiting the manners of the time, and as showing us the principles which animated Confucius, and the philosophy by which he hoped to regenerate mankind.

During his wanderings, he and his company were once in danger of perishing from want. The courage even of Tze-lu, a leading disciple, gave way. "Has the superior man indeed thus to endure?" he asked. "The superior man may have to suffer want," replied Confucius; "but he is still the superior man. The small man in the same circumstance loses his self-command."

His disciples naturally did not take so exalted a view as he did of what he considered to be a heaven-appointed mission, and were inclined to urge him to make concessions in harmony with the times. "Your principles," said Tszc-kung to him, "are excellent, but they are unacceptable in the empire; would it not be well, therefore, to modify them a little?" "A good husbandman," answered Confucius, "can sow, but he cannot secure a harvest. An artisan may excel in handicraft, but he cannot provide a market for his goods. And in precisely the same way a superior man can cultivate his principles, but he cannot make them acceptable."

When on his way to Wei, he was attacked at Poo by some determined opponents. On this occasion his person was seized; and though his followers struggled manfully with his captors, their efforts did not save him from having to swear that he would not continue his journey to Wei. Spite, however, of his oath, he had no sooner escaped from the clutches of his captors than he resumed his journey as if nothing had happened.

This deliberate forfeiture of his word by one who had commanded them to "hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles," surprised his disciples; and Tszc-kung, who was usually the spokesman on such occasions, asked him whether it was right to violate the oath he had taken. But Confucius, who had learned expediency in adversity, replied: "It was an oath extracted by force. The spirits do not hear such."

CONFUCIUS AND THE HERMIT.

In China in the days of Confucius, as, indeed, there have been in all places and at all periods of the world's history, there existed a class of recluses who had withdrawn themselves from the world in disgust. Learned and well-disposed, they had abandoned the conflict with the vice and disorder that seemed everywhere about them. With these the sage, during the course of his wanderings, frequently came in contact. His character was beyond their comprehension; they felt almost a contempt for him when they beheld him struggling against the stream, and hoping against hope.

On one occasion, Confucius was looking about for a ford. He saw a man working in a neighbouring field, and sent Tze-lu to ask for information. The man, who proved to be a recluse, having discovered that his questioner was one of Confucius's disciples, said to him: "Disorder like a swelling flood overspreads the kingdom, and no one is able to repress it. Why follow a master who withdraws from one ruler and another that will not follow his counsel? would it not be better to follow those who retire from the world altogether?" So saying he picked up his hoe again, without saying anything about the whereabouts of the ford.

Tze-lu returned and reported what the man had said; on which Confucius said, "It is impossible to withdraw from the world, and associate with birds and beasts that have no affinity with us. With whom should I associate but with suffering men! The disorder that prevails is what requires my efforts. If right principles ruled through the kingdom, there would be no necessity for me to change my State."

"We must," says Professor Legge, "recognize in these words a brave heart and a noble sympathy. Confucius would not abandon the cause of the people. He would hold on his way to the end. Defeated he might be; but he would be true to his humane and righteous mission."

MISTAKEN IDENTITY.

On his way to visit the State of Ch'in, his way happened to lie through the town of Kwang, which had suffered considerably from the filibustering expeditions of a notorious disturber of the public peace called Yang Hoo. To this objectionable character Confucius bore such a striking resemblance, that the citizens of Kwang surrounded the house in which he lodged, intending to attack him. The situation was certainly disquieting, and his disciples were greatly alarmed. The belief of Confucius, however, in the heaven-set nature of his mission, raised him above fear. "Is not the truth lodged in me?" he said. "If Heaven had wished to let this sacred cause perish, I should not have been put into such a relation to it. Heaven will not let the cause of truth perish, and what, therefore, can the people of Kwang do to me?" Saying which he tuned his lyre, and sang probably some of those songs from his recently compiled Book of Odes, which breathed the wisdom of the ancient emperors.

From some cause or other—more likely from the people of the town discovering their mistake than from any effect produced by Confucius's ditties—the attacking force suddenly withdrew, leaving the sage free to go wherever he pleased.

RETURN TO LOO.

At last, after having been absent for about thirteen years from his native State of Loo, the time arrived when he was to return to it. But by the irony of fate, the accomplishment of his long-cherished desire was due, not to his reputation for political or ethical wisdom, but to his knowledge of military tactics, for which he had a hearty contempt. There happened at this time to be a disciple of the sage, one Yen Yew, in the service of Ke K'ang; and he had conducted a campaign against Tse with great success. On his triumphal return, Ke K'ang inquired how he had gained his military skill. "From Confucius," replied the general. "And what sort of a man is he?" asked Ke K'ang. "Were you to employ him," answered Yen Yew, "your fame would spread abroad; your people might face demons and gods, and would have nothing either to fear or to ask of them. And if you accepted his principles, were you to collect a thousand altars of the spirits of the land, it would profit you nothing."

Attracted by such a prospect, Ke K'ang proposed to invite the sage to his Court. "If you do," said Yen Yew, "mind you do not allow mean men to come between you and him."

"But," says Mr. Douglas in his "Confucianism and Taoism," "before Ke K'ang's invitation reached Confucius, an incident occurred which made the arrival of the messengers from Loo still more welcome to him. K'ung W'än, an officer of Wei, where Confucius then was, came to consult him as to the best means of attacking the force of another officer with whom he was engaged in a feud. Confucius, disgusted at being consulted on such a subject, professed ignorance, and prepared to leave the State, saying as he went away, "The bird chooses its tree; the tree does not choose the bird."

Just then Ke K'ang's envoys arrived, and he at once accepted the invitation they brought. He packed up his baggage and set out for a State which he had not seen for so long a time, and which was endeared to him by many early recollections.

UNWELCOME COUNSEL; IN PRIVATE LIFE.

On arriving at Loo, he presented himself at Court, and, in answer to a question of the Duke Gae on the subject of government, threw out a strong hint that the Duke might do well to offer him an appointment. "Government," he said, "consists in the right choice of ministers." To the same question put by Ke K'ang, he replied, "Employ the upright, and put aside the crooked, and thus will the crooked be made upright."

At this time Ke K'ang was perplexed as to what measures to adopt to suppress the prevailing brigandage. "If you, sir," said Confucius, "were not avaricious, though you might offer rewards to induce people to steal, they would not." From this answer we see the estimate put by the sage on not only Ke K'ang, but the Duke Gae—for the two were so entirely of one mind that the deeds of Ke K'ang never failed to be endorsed by the Duke. It was clearly impossible that Confucius should serve under such a régime; and instead, therefore, of soliciting public employment, he retired into private life, and devoted himself to literary pursuits.

He had now leisure to finish editing the Shoo King, or "Book of History," to which he wrote a preface; he also "carefully digested the rites and ceremonies determined by the wisdom of the more ancient sages and kings; collected and arranged the ancient poetry, and undertook the reform of music." He made a diligent study of the "Book of Changes," to which he added a Commentary. This Commentary sufficiently indicates that the original meaning of the work was as great a mystery to him as it had been to others. But he had a high idea of the value of the kernel encased in this unusually hard shell, and used to say, that "if a few years could be added to his life he would give fifty of them to the study of 'The Book of Changes,' and that then he expected to be without great faults."

FATHER AND SON.

In 442 B.C. his son Le died. He is seldom mentioned in the life of his illustrious father; and the few references we have to him are enough to show that a small share of parental affection fell to his lot.

Almost the only instance we have of the manner of Confucius's intercourse with his son Le, is the following: "Have you heard any lessons from your father different from what we have all heard?" asked one of the disciples once of Le. "No," said Le. "He was standing once alone, when I was passing through the court below with hasty steps, and he said to me, 'Have you read the Odes?' On my answering 'Not yet,' he added, 'If you do not learn the Odes, you will not be fit to converse with!' Another day, in the same place and the same way, he said to me, 'Have you read the Rules of Propriety?' On my replying 'Not yet,' he said, 'If you do not learn the Rules of Propriety, your character cannot be established.' I have heard only these two things from him." The disciple was delighted, and said: "I asked one thing, and I have got three things. I have heard about the Odes; I have heard about the Rules of Propriety; I have also heard that the superior man maintains a distant reserve towards his son."

"I can easily believe," says Professor Legge, "that this distant reserve was the rule which Confucius followed in the treatment of his son. A stern dignity is the quality which a father has to maintain upon his system. It is not to be without the element of kindness, but that must never go beyond the line of propriety. There is too little room left for the play and development of natural affection."

"SPRING AND AUTUMN ANNALS."

In spite of his declining strength and his many employments, he now wrote the Ch'un ts'ew, or 'Spring and Autumn Annals,' in which he followed the history of his native State of Loo, from the time of the Duke Yin to the fourteenth year of the Duke Gae, that is, to the time when the appearance of the K'e-lin, which we shall notice presently, warned him to look for the termination of his earthly career.

"This," says Professor Douglas, "is the only work of which Confucius was the author, and of this every word is his own. His biographers say that 'what was written he wrote, and what was erased was erased by him.' Not an expression was either inserted or altered by anyone but himself. When he had completed the work, he handed the manuscript to his disciples, saying, 'By the "Spring and Autumn Annals" I shall be known, and by the "Spring and Autumn Annals" I shall be condemned.' This only furnishes another of the many instances in which authors have entirely misjudged the value of their own works.

"In the estimation of his countrymen even, whose reverence for his every word would incline them to accept his opinion on this as on every subject, the 'Spring and Autumn Annals' holds a very secondary place; his utterances recorded in the Lun yü, or 'Confucian Analects,' being esteemed of far higher value, as they undoubtedly are. And, indeed, the two works he compiled, the 'Shoo King' and the 'Shee King,' hold a very much higher place in the public regard than the book on which he so prided himself. To foreigners, whose judgments are unhampered by his recorded opinion, his character as an original historian sinks into insignificance, and he is known only as a philosopher and statesman."

There was nothing spiritual in the teachings of Confucius. He rather avoided references to the supernatural. In answer to a question about death, he answered, "While we do not know life, how do you know about death?"

GATHERING CLOUDS; THE DEATH OF CONFUCIUS.

In 441 B.C., he lost by death his favourite disciple Yen Hwuy.

When the news of his death reached him, he exclaimed, "Alas! Heaven is destroying me."

A year later, a strange, one-horned animal was caught by a servant of Ke K'ang while on a hunting expedition. No one could tell what sort of creature it was, so Confucius was sent for. At once he declared it to be a K'e-lin; and, according to tradition, it was identical with one which appeared before his birth. This, it is said, was proved by its having a piece of ribbon on its horn fastened there by his mother when the weird animal presented itself to her in a dream on Mount Ne. This second apparition could have only one meaning, and Confucius was profoundly affected by the portent.

"For whom have you come?" he cried, "for whom have you come?" Then bursting into tears he added, "The course of my doctrine is run, and I am unknown."

"How do you mean that you are unknown?" asked Tze-kung.

"I don't complain of Providence," replied the sage, "nor find fault with men that learning is neglected and success is worshipped. Heaven knows me . . . Never does a superior man pass away without leaving a name behind him. But my principles makes no progress, and I, how shall I be viewed in future ages?"

Early one morning, we are told, he rose, and with his hands behind his back, and dragging his staff, moved about by his door, saying softly to himself,—

"The great mountain must crumble;
The strong beam must break;
And the wise man wither away like an herb of the field."

In a little while he came into the house and seated himself opposite the door.

Tze-kung had overheard him, and said to himself, "If the great mountains crumble, to what shall I look up? If the strong beam break, and the wise man wither away, on whom shall I lean? The master, I fear, is going to be ill." Upon this he hastened into the house.

Confucius said to him: "Tze, what makes you so late? . . . The intelligent monarch arrives who will make me his master. My time is come to die."

So it was. He lay down on his couch, and after seven days breathed his last.

On the death of their master, the devoted company of his disciples buried him with great pomp. A number of them erected huts in the vicinity of his grave, and remained there for three years, lamenting his loss as if he had been their father. Tze-kung, the last of his favourite three, stayed behind the rest, to indulge his grief for another period of the same duration.

The tidings of the death of Confucius spread through the country, and created a great sensation. As has been too often the case in the history of this world, the man who was neglected during his lifetime became all at once the object of unbounded admiration.

THE GRAVE OF CONFUCIUS.

The grave of Confucius is situated in a large rectangle separated from the rest of the K'ung cemetery, without the bounds of the city of K'uh-fow. Through a magnificent gateway we gain entrance to a noble avenue lined with cypress trees, which leads to the tomb. The tomb consists of a large and lofty mound, with a marble statue in front, bearing by way of inscription the title given to Confucius under the Sung dynasty: "The most sagely ancient instructor; the all-accomplished, all-informing King."

A short distance in front of the tomb, on the right and left hand, are two smaller mounds, one over the grave of his son, and the other over that of his grandson, the author of the remarkable treatise known as "The Doctrine of the Mean."

Scattered all about are imperial tablets of different dynasties, with glowing tributes in honour of the sage; and to the right of the grandson's mound we see a small house said to mark the situation of the hut in which Tze-kung passed his long period of mourning. On the mound grow acacias, cypresses, the Achillea, a plant whose stalks are employed for purposes of divination, and the crystal tree, a tree which is said not to be found elsewhere.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND HABITS.

As to the personal appearance of Confucius, most that is recorded is decidedly mythical. The legends assign to his figure "nine and forty remarkable peculiarities, a mere fraction of which would have made him more a monster than a man. No doubt he was in size and complexion much the same as many of his descendants of the present day. The statue of Confucius which stands in the temple adjoining his tomb, represents him as tall, strong, and well-built, with a fair red face and large and heavy head.

But if his disciples did not think it worth while to give an account of his personal appearance, they have taken care to transmit to posterity a very minute account of his habits. The Tenth Book of the Analects is all taken up with his deportment, eating, and style of dress. In public he was a man of ceremony, but he threw off all formality when he sat at home.

In the presence of his prince, his manner, though self-possessed, displayed respectful uneasiness. When he entered the palace, or when he passed the vacant throne, his countenance changed, his legs bent under him, and he spoke as though he had scarcely breath to utter a word. When it fell to his lot to bear the royal sceptre, he stooped his body as though he were not able to sustain its weight. If the prince came to visit him when he was ill, he had himself placed with his head to the east, and lay dressed in his court-clothes with his girdle across them. When sent for by the prince to assist in receiving a royal visitor, his countenance appeared to change. He inclined himself to the officers among whom he stood; and when sent to meet the visitor at the gate, "he hastened forward with his arms spread out like the wings of a bird." At the wild gatherings which accompanied the annual ceremony of driving away pestilential influences, he paid honour to the original meaning of the rite by standing in his court robes on the eastern steps of his house, and received the riotous exorcists as though they were favoured guests.

In regard to eating and drinking, he was very particular, and guided, to all appearance, by sound sanitary principles. All his food had to be cut properly and be served with its appropriate sauce. He was not a great eater; and when at meals, he sat silent. Whatever the fare might be, even though it were but coarse rice and thin soup, he would offer a little in sacrifice with a grave, respectful air. There was no fixed limit to the wine he drank, but it is on record that he never indulged to excess.

These and other characteristics of Confucius were carefully treasured up by his disciples, in consequence of every act being held to be closely associated with the great principles which it was his object to inculcate. A few more may prove of interest to the reader.

On occasion of a sudden clap of thunder, or a violent wind, he would change countenance. He would do the same, and rise up, moreover, when he found himself a guest at a loaded board. At the sight of a person in mourning he would also change countenance; and if he happened to be in his carriage, he would bend forward with a respectful salutation. His general way in his carriage was not to turn his head round, nor talk hastily, nor point with his hands. He was charitable. When any of his friends died, if there were no relations who could be depended on for the necessary offices, he would say, "I will bury him."

"The principles," remarks Professor Douglas, "which underlie all these details, relieve them from the sense of affected formality which they would otherwise suggest. Like the sages of old, Confucius had an overwhelming faith in the effect of example. "What do you say," asked the chief of the Ke clan on one occasion, "of killing the unprincipled for the good of the principled?" "Sir," replied Confucius, "in carrying on your Government, why should you employ capital punishment at all? Let your evinced desires be for what is good, and the people will be good." And then quoting the words of King Ch'ing, he added, "The relation between superiors and inferiors is like that between the wind and the grass. The grass must bend when the wind blows across it. Thus in every act of his life, whether at home or abroad, whether at study or in moments of relaxation, he did all with the avowed object of being seen of men, and of influencing them by his conduct. And to a certain extent he gained his end.

A SOLITARY ACCOMPLISHMENT; NO DISPUTANT; THE GOLDEN RULE.

The only accomplishment possessed by Confucius was music; but this he studied less as an accomplishment than as a necessary part of education. "It is by the Odes," he used to say, "that the mind is aroused. It is by the Rules of Propriety that the character is established. And it is music that completes the edifice.

We nowhere read of Confucius engaging in a dispute. When an opponent arose, it was in harmony with the doctrine of the sage to retire before him.

Walking one day with his disciples, Confucius directed their attention to the metal statue of a man with a triple clasp upon his mouth, which stood in the ancestral temple at Loo. On the back of the statue these words were engraved : "The ancients were guarded in their speech ; and, like them, we should avoid loquacity. Many words invite many defeats. Avoid also engaging in many businesses, for many businesses give rise to many difficulties." "Observe this, my children," said he, pointing to the inscription, "these words are true, and commend themselves to our reason."

The golden rule of our Saviour, "Do unto others as you would that they should do to you," which Locke designates as "the most unshaken rule of morality and foundation of all social virtue, was inculcated by Confucius, almost in the same words, four centuries before.

HONOURS AND PRIVILEGES.

Though Confucius was left to end his life in obscurity, the greatest honours and privileges were heaped upon his descendants, who have existed through sixty-seven or sixty-eight generations, and may be called the only hereditary nobility in China. They flourish in the very district where their great ancestor was born ; and in all the revolutions that have occurred, their privileges have been respected. In the earlier part of the eighteenth century, under the great Emperor Kang-hy, the total number of descendants amounted to 11,000 males. In every city, down to those of the third rank, styled Hien, there is a temple dedicated to Confucius. The mandarins, all the learned of the land, the Emperor himself, are bound to do him service. This service consists in burning scented gums, frankincense, tapers, and sandal-wood, etc., and in placing fruit, wine, flowers, and others agreeable objects before a plain tablet, on which is inscribed : "O Confucius, our revered master, let thy spiritual part descend and be pleased with this our respect, which we now humbly offer to thee." The ceremony is precisely the same as that which every man is enjoined to observe in the hall of ancestors to his parents.

CONFUCIANISM.

It was the great object of Confucius to regulate the manners of the people. He thought outward decorum the true emblem of excellence of heart ; he therefore digested all the various ceremonies into one general code of rites, which was called "Lo-ke," or "Ly-king," etc. In this work every ritual in all the relations of human life is strictly regulated, so that a true Chinese is a perfect automaton, put in motion by the regulations of the "Ly-king." Some of the rites are most excellent : the duties towards parents, the respect due to superiors, the decorum in the behaviour of common life, etc., speak highly in favour of Confucius ; but his substituting ceremony for simplicity and true politeness is unpardonable. The "Ly-king" contains many excellent maxims, and inculcates morality ; but it has come to us in a mutilated state, with many interpolations.

In the writings of Confucius, the duties of husbands towards their wives were slightly dwelt upon. On the other hand, the duties and implicit submission of children to their parents were extended to the utmost, and most rigidly inculcated. Upon this wide principle of filial obedience the whole of his system, moral and political, is founded. A family is the prototype of the nation ; and, instead of the notions of independence and equality among men, he enforces the principles of dependence and subordination—as of children to parents, the younger to the elder. By an easy fiction, the Emperor stands as the father of all his subjects, and is thus entitled to their passive obedience ; and, as Dr. Morrison observes, it is probably (he might say certainly) this feature of his doctrines which has made Confucius such a favourite with all the governments of China, whether of native or Tartar origin, for so many centuries. At the same time it should be observed that this fundamental doctrine has rendered the Chinese people slavish, deceitful, and pusillanimous, and has fostered the growth of a national character that cannot be redeemed by gentleness of deportment and orderliness of conduct.

Confucius was a teacher of morals, but not the founder of a religion. His doctrines constitute rather a system of philosophy in the department of morals and politics than any particular religious faith. Arnauld and other writers have broadly asserted that he did not recognise the existence of a God. In his physics, Confucius maintains that "out of nothing there cannot possibly be produced anything ; that material bodies must have existed from all eternity ; that the cause (lee. reason) or principle of things must have had a co-existence with the things themselves ; that, therefore, this cause is also eternal, infinite, indestructible, without limits, omnipotent, and omnipresent ; that the central point of influence (strength) whence this cause principally acts is the blue firmament (Tien), whence its emanations spread over the whole universe ; that it is, therefore, the supreme duty of the prince, in the name of his subjects, to present offerings to Fien, and particularly at the equinoxes; the one for obtaining a propitious seed-time, and the other a plentiful harvest."

He taught his disciples that the human body is composed of two principles,—the one light, invisible, and ascending; the other gross, palpable, and descending: that on the separation of these two principles, the light and spiritual part ascends into the air, whilst the heavy and corporeal part sinks into the earth. The word death never enters into his philosophy; nor, on common occasions, is it employed by the Chinese. When a person dies, they say "he has returned to his family." The body, it was difficult to deny, resolved itself into its primitive elements, and became a part of the universe; but, according to Confucius, the spirits of the good were permitted to visit their ancient habitations on earth, or such ancestral halls or other places as might be appointed by their children and descendants, upon whom, while they received their homage, they (the dead) had the power of conferring benefactions. Hence arose the indispensable duty of performing sacred rites in the hall or temple of ancestors; and all such as neglected this duty, it was believed, would be punished, after death, by their spiritual part being deprived of the privilege of visiting the hall of ancestors, and of the supreme bliss arising from the homage bestowed by descendants.

A belief in good and evil genii, and of tutelary spirits presiding over families, houses, towns, and other places, inevitably arose out of this system. It does not appear, however, that either Confucius or any of his followers attached the idea of a personal being or form to the Deity; nor have the true Confucians ever represented the Great First Cause under any image or personification whatsoever. The images and idols of China belong to other faiths. It was soon found that the notions of Confucius were too abstract and ideal for the mass of his countrymen, who, like the rest of mankind in nearly all ages and all countries, required something material to fix their attention and excite their devotion.

The moral doctrines of Confucius include, as we have already noticed, that capital one, which, however neglected in practice, has obtained in theory the universal assent of mankind: he taught his disciples "to treat others according to the treatment which they themselves would desire at their hands." In his doctrines there is an evident leaning to predestination or fatalism, and to fortune-telling, or predicting events by the mystical lines of Fo-shee.

With all his defects and omissions, Confucius was, however, a most wonderful man. His system, without making any pretension to Divine authority, still continues to prevail throughout the most extensive empire in the world. Some religions may have lasted as long, or longer, but we believe no philosophic code can claim anything like such a lengthened period of active practical existence. The Tibetan, the Buddhist, and other religions, have divided and still divide influence with it, but have never overthrown its empire. The superstitious and the vulgar of all classes, from the emperor on the throne to the poor sailor on board the junk, may burn gilt paper and offer sacrifices to wooden idols, practise incantations, and offer up prayers to the "invisible mother of heaven," but at the same time they all revere the name of Confucius; and the more enlightened pretend to be wholly guided by his merely philosophical code. The body of his laws and instructions is still followed, not only by the Chinese, but by Koreans, Cochinchinese, and other people who, taken collectively, are estimated at 400,000,000 of souls.

THE SUPERIOR MAN.

In his "Confucianism and Taouism," Mr. Douglas shows that the leading principle in Confucius's mind as a teacher was that the example of a "superior man" might reform the State. He seems to have thoroughly believed that, if one man could be found who came up to the standard of the ancient worthies Yaou and Shun, who were "profound, wise, accomplished, and intelligent," and, combined with these qualities, "were also mild, respectful, and quite sincere," then "the report of such an one's mysterious virtue would be heard on high," and the people would be reformed. Confucius appears to have shaped his life with this aim. He himself disclaimed any right to the title of a sage, or even of a "superior man," but his aim was to base the well-being of society on such principles as the sage would approve, and such as the old kings whom he names illustrated in their conduct. It is not surprising that Confucius lived to find out his error. "A superior man," he at length confessed, "ought not to enter a tottering State," for his teaching and his example would be useless, and he himself subject to contumely and disrespect."

The training necessary to become "a superior man" forms the main subject of Confucius's theories. He regarded the sage as "the equal of heaven;" but the superior man might be trained and rise to the condition so denoted.

SECRETS OF INFLUENCE.

"It will naturally be asked," remarks Mr. Douglas, "wherein lay the secret of the vast influence which has been exercised by Confucius. And to this we answer, first, that being a Chinaman of Chinamen, his teachings were specially suited to the nature of those he taught. The Mongolian mind being eminently phlegmatic and unspeculative, naturally rebels against the idea of investigating matters which are beyond its experiences, and its calm, placid habit forbids its being the instigator of fiery tempers and hot-headed crimes. With the idea, therefore, of a future life still unawakened, a plain, matter-of-fact system of morality such as that enunciated by Confucius was sufficient for all the wants of the Chinese. Secondly, it was to the interest of both the rulers and the ruled to support his doctrines. The de facto ruler found in him a tower of strength; for if the throne was the reward vouchsafed by heaven for eminent virtue, then he who occupied it in peace must necessarily have an unassailable right to it; and the constant exhortations to loyalty to be found on every page of the Confucian writings cannot but have been grateful to the ears of sovereigns.

"The ruled, on the other hand, felt that they were supreme in the estimation of the sage. The promotion of their interests and material well-being was the first duty of the sovereign; and the extent of their loyalty was to be measured by his success in this direction. He recognised no ranks or titles but those won by merit; and thus every office in the State was open to every one alike. The people were to be well cared for, and in case of neglect or oppression they had the right of rebellion. The sovereign was the viceregent of Heaven; but only as long as he walked in the heavenly way were the unswerving loyalty and devotion of his subjects due to him.

"And, thirdly, the possession of so highly-prized a literature at so early a date having suggested its adoption as the curriculum in schools and the test of scholarship at all examinations, the people, ignorant of all else, have learned to look upon it as the quintessence of wisdom, and its author as the wisest of mankind. It might be considered impossible to calculate the effects of the concentration of a nation's mind, century after century, on any given text-book; but in China we have the result worked out before us; and we find that it has amounted to the absolute subjection of upwards of forty generations of Chinamen to the dicta of one man."

The position and influence of Confucius are, according to another eminent scholar, to be ascribed chiefly to two causes:—his being the possessor first of all of the monuments of antiquity, and the exemplifier and expounder of the maxims of the golden age of China; and, secondly, the devotion to him of his immediate disciples and their early followers. The national and the personal are thus blended in him, each as its highest degree of excellence. He was a Chinese of the Chinese; he is also represented, and all now believe him to have been, the beau idéal of humanity in its best and noblest estate.

Confucius felt that he was in the world for a special purpose. It was not to proclaim any new truths or to initiate any new economy. It was to prevent what had previously been known from being lost.

He threw no light on the great problems of human condition and destiny. He never speculated either as to the creation of things or as to the end of them. He was not perplexed as to the origin of man, nor did he seek to know about his hereafter. He meddled with neither physics nor metaphysics. To his practical mind, the toiling of thought amid uncertainties seemed worse than useless.

A REPRESENTATIVE LIFE.

"A very remarkable man," says Professor Legge; "Confucius was persistent and condensed; but neither his views nor his character were perfect. In the China then existing, he saw terrible evils and disorders, which he set himself, in the benevolence of his heart, to remedy; but of one principal cause of this unhappy condition he had no idea. The existence of polygamy, and the evils flowing from it, were subjects to which Confucius never appeared to have given a thought. He mourned, it is true, on the death of his mother, but no generous word ever passed his lips about woman as woman, and apparently no chivalrous sentiment ever kindled in his bosom. Nor had he the idea of any progress or regeneration of society. The stars all shone to him in the heavens behind; none beckoned brightly before. It was no doubt the moral element of his teaching, springing out of his view of human nature, which attracted many of his disciples, and still holds the best part of the Chinese men of learning bound to him; but the conservative tendency of his lessons—nowhere so apparent as in the 'Ch'un Ts'ü'—is the chief reason why successive dynasties have delighted to do him honour."

To understand Confucius is to understand China. He had no idiosyncrasy. He was an incarnation of the national character, a mouth-piece of the national feelings; and he was only greater than the rest of his countrymen by being imbued with that genius which gives vitality and energy to thoughts that lie dormant, though existing in the minds of meaner men.

Confucius could not have produced the effect which he has produced upon the Kingdom of China; could not be recognised in the character in which he has been recognised for so many ages, if his mind had not been the very highest type of the Chinese mind; that in which we may read what it was aiming at both before and after he appeared to enlighten it. We may, therefore, acquiesce without difficulty in the opinion, that the Chinese religion was from the first of a much less high and mysterious quality than that of almost any people upon the earth; that the belief of the eternal, as distinct from and opposed to the temporal, existed very dimly and imperfectly in it, and was supplied only by a reverence for the past; that the sense of connection or communion with any invisible powers, though not absent, must have been weak and slightly developed; that the Emperor must have been regarded always as the highest utterer of the divine mind; that the priest must have been chiefly valued as a minister of the ceremonial of the Court; that rites and ceremonies must have had in this land a substantive value, independent of all significance, which they have scarcely ever possessed elsewhere; that there was united with this tendency one which to some may seem incompatible with it,—an attachment to whatever is useful and practical; that the Chinese must have entertained a profound respect for family relationships, that the relationship of father and son will, however, have so overshadowed all the rest, that they all have been regarded merely as different forms of it, or as to be sacrificed for the sake of it; that implicit obedience to authority will have been the virtue which every institution existed to enforce, which was to be their only preserver. If we suppose the reverence for the shades of ancestors, for the person of the Emperor, for the dignity of the father, to have been joined with something of a Sabeian worship, with some astrology and speculation about the future, we shall perhaps arrive at a tolerably near conception of China as it may have existed under the old emperors to whom the sage constantly refers with admiration and regret.

THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA.

The highly-wrought system of ethics of Confucius is the quintessence of worldly wisdom; and if a moral system, without spirit or spiritual aims, could give life to a people or nation, the Chinese might rank high among the peoples of the earth. It teaches a man what he ought to be, but it provides no motive beyond the well-being of society; and it rests on no sanction except the examples of Yaou and Shun and other worthies, whose sayings and whose examples have been patterns for other ages. Hence Confucianism was ever opposed to Buddhist teaching, because Buddhism pretends to rest on a revelation of truth, and holds out an ultimate perfection as within the reach of all men from the highest to the lowest.

China has three national religions: Buddhism, which was admitted as a religion of the State sixty-five years after Christ, Taoism, and Confucianism.

"These three religions," remarks Mr. Clodd in his "Childhood of Religions," "are often professed by the same person; and there is none of that bitter feeling between the believers in different creeds which exists so much among Christians, Moslems, and others. This is, however, owing to the lack of earnestness; for they who feel deeply concerning what they believe cannot be careless in regarding what they think are the errors of others."

Lao-tse, the founder of Taoism, lived between 500 and 600 years before Christ, and was an altogether different man from Confucius. He was a thinker, not a worker, seeking to unravel those same problems which perplexed Buddha; and what there is in the Chinese belief of a spiritual kind may have been aided by the teaching of Lao-tse. Confucius is said to have visited him, and confessed that he could not understand him. Taoism has become mixed up with magic and other senseless beliefs, and its priests are for the most part ignorant men, so that it has no great hold on the Chinese.

THE LEADING FOLLOWER OF CONFUCIUS

After the death of Confucius, the condition of the empire grew worse and worse; and so it continued till 371 B.C., when Mencius, on whom the mantle of Confucius was destined to fall, was born in the principality of Tsow. "On arriving at man's estate," says Professor Douglas, "he adopted, like his great prototype, the calling of a teacher, and gradually surrounded himself with a body of faithful and admiring disciples whom he educated to assist him in the work of perpetuating the doctrines of the sage. He had no system of his own to enunciate, but, clothing himself in the armour prepared for him by his master, he went forth to combat the evils of the day, and just in proportion as these were greater and more complex than in the time of Confucius, so was he bolder in attack and more subtle in argument than he. Where Confucius had chastised with whips, he chastised with scorpions; and this not only when he was dealing with his equals and inferiors, but also when princes and governors were the objects of his wrath."

CONFUCIUS.

Like his great master, Mencius earnestly looked for some ruler who would follow his counsels, and also, like Confucius, though he visited several Courts, and was hospitably entertained, he failed in his great object. But though fortune refused to smile upon him, he found consolation in his retirement in the belief that his want of success was the appointment of Heaven. "Heaven does not wish," he said, "that the empire should enjoy tranquility and good order;" and it was therefore in no discontented spirit that he finally resigned all hope of seeing his principles carried into practice, and devoted his life to the compilation of his works and the instruction of his disciples.

With the revival of learning under the Han dynasty, the attention of scholars was attracted to his writings; but it was not until the reign of Shin-tsung (A.D. 1068-1085) of the Sung dynasty, that they were included among the Confucian classics: since which time, however, he has held a place second only to that of Confucius in the esteem of his countrymen.

FUNDAMENTAL MAXIMS.

About the close of the seventeenth century the Emperor Kang-hi issued sixteen maxims founded on the teachings of Confucius for the guidance of the people, whose morality had for some time been daily declining, and whose hearts were not as of old." These maxims, which summed up as it were all the essential points of the Confucian doctrine, have been thus translated by Mr. Legge:—

1. Esteem most highly filial piety and brotherly submission, in order to give due prominence to the social relations.

2. Behave with generosity to the branches of your kindred, in order to illustrate harmony and benignity.

3. Cultivate peace and concord in your neighbourhood, in order to prevent quarrels and litigations.

4. Recognise the importance of husbandry and the culture of the mulberry-tree, in order to ensure a sufficiency of clothing and food.

5. Show that you prize moderation and economy, in order to prevent the lavish waste of your means.

6. Make much of the colleges and seminaries, in order to make correct the practice of the scholars.

7. Discountenance and banish strange doctrines, in order to exalt the correct doctrine.

8. Describe and explain the laws, in order to warn the ignorant and obstinate.

9. Exhibit clearly propriety and yielding courtesy, in order to make manners and customs good.

10. Labour diligently at your proper callings, in order to give settlement to the aims of the people.

11. Instruct sons and younger brothers, in order to prevent them from doing what is wrong.

12. Put a stop to false accusations, in order to protect the honest and the good.

13. Warn against sheltering deserters, in order to avoid being involved in their punishments.

14. Promptly and fully pay your taxes, in order to avoid the urgent requisition of your quota.

15. Combine in hundreds and tithings, in order to put an end to thefts and robbery.

16. Study to remove resentments and angry feelings, in order to show the importance due to the person and life.

CONFUCIAN LITERATURE.

The Confucian literature, as it exists at the present day, is very large; but if we separate from the mass those canonical books which, according to general belief, contain the complete system of the sage, we shall hold in our hands only three thin volumes. First of all, there is the Lun Yu, or "Philosophical Dialogues," of which we shall speak in the next paragraph, and from which we shall extract some of the wise sayings. Next comes the Tu Hsü or "Great Learning;" and last of all we have the Chung Yung, or the "Doctrine of the Mean." The two last-mentioned books have been very generally attributed to Tszsze-sze, the grandson of Confucius; and both of them contain digests of the doctrines of the philosopher. But Confucius was less of an original thinker than a "transmitter," as he called himself.

CHOICE APHORISMS.

In the classical book known as the Lun-Yu, or "Philosophical Dialogues," we have the recorded sayings of Confucius. It embraces his discourses or discussions with his disciples and others on various topics, and his replies to their inquiries. This work has been translated by Dr. Legge, and we are thus enabled to present the reader with the following choice aphorisms from the lips of the Chinese sage :—

Is he not a man of complete virtue who feels no discomposure, though men take no note of him ?

Fine words and an insinuating appearance are seldom associated with true virtue.

Regard faithfulness and sincerity as first principles.

I will not grieve at men's not knowing me ; I will grieve that I do not know men.

In the "Book of Poetry" (the She-King) are three hundred pieces ; but the design of them all may be embraced in that one sentence, "Have no depraved thoughts." (This recalls the saying of the later Jewish Rabbis, that all the 613 precepts of the Law were summed up in the words, "The just shall live by faith.")

Learning without thought is labour lost ; thought without learning is perilous.

Shall I teach you what knowledge is ? When you know a thing, to hold that you know it ; and when you do not know a thing, to allow that you do not know it,—this is knowledge.

When we see men of worth we should think of equalling them ; when we see men of a contrary character we should turn inwards and examine ourselves.

At first, my way with men was to hear their words and give them credit for their conduct. Now my way is to hear their words, and look at their conduct.

Tsze-kung said : "What I do not wish men to do to us, I also wish not to do to men." The master said : "You have not attained to that."

The superior man wishes to be slow in his words and earnest in his conduct.

Let relaxation and enjoyment be found in the polite arts.

Is virtue a thing remote ? I wish to be virtuous, and lo ! virtue is at hand.

To see what is right and not to do it, is want of courage.

Worship as though the Deity were present.

He who offends against Heaven has none to whom he can pray.

If my mind is not engaged in my worship, it is as though I worshipped not.

A good man is serene, a bad man always in fear.

Coarse rice for food, water to drink, the bended arm for a pillow—happiness may be enjoyed even with them ; but without virtue, both riches and honour seem to me like the passing cloud.

When a man is not in the habit of saying, "What shall I think of this ? What shall I think of this ?" I can truly do nothing with him.

What the superior man seeks is in himself. What the mean man seeks is in others.

In language it is simply required that it convey the meaning.

By nature, men are nearly alike ; by practice they get to be widely apart.

When a man at forty is the object of dislike, he will always continue what he is.

He who devotes himself to the study of the true and the good, with perseverance and without relaxation, derives therefrom great satisfaction.

Make yourself completely master of what you have learned, and be always learning something new ; you may then be an instructor of men.

A man devoid of sincerity and fidelity is an incomprehensible being in my eyes ; he is a great chariot without an axle, a little chariot without a pole ; how can he guide himself along the road of life ?

Humanity, or the sentiment of benevolence towards others, is admirably practised in the country ; he who, in selecting a residence, refuses to dwell in the country, cannot be considered wise.

If in the morning you have heard the voice of celestial reason, in the evening you will be fit to die.

If three of us were journeying together, I should necessarily find two instructors (in my travelling companions) : I would choose the good man for imitation, and the bad man for correction.

We may force the people to follow the principles of justice and reason, but we cannot force them to comprehend them.

He who has an unalterable faith in truth, and who is passionately fond of study, preserves to his death the principles of virtue, which are the consequences of this faith and love.

If the State is governed by the principles of reason and justice, speak boldly and worthily, act nobly and honourably. If the State is not governed by justice and reason, still act nobly and honourably, but speak moderately and with precaution.

The superior man blushes with fear lest his words should exceed his actions.

A PICTURE OF AN HONEST AND UPRIGHT STATESMAN.

"SIR, there is no wonder at all! We, who know Mr. Burke, know that he will be one of the first men in the country!"

Such was the hearty reproof thundered out by rough, honest, warm-hearted old Dr. Johnson, to a supercilious member of the Literary Club, who, smarting under a memorable defeat inflicted upon him in argument by Edmund

Burke, affected astonishment at the immediate and brilliant oratorical success attained by that luminous genius in Parliament. The self-asserting lexicographer, among whose faults a want of power in judging of the moral and intellectual worth of men could certainly not be included, justly said of the friend whom he loved better and respected more than any of that brilliant circle of admirers who assembled round his chair at those famous meetings at the Turk's Head, in Gerrard Street, "I do not grudge Burke's being the first man in the House of Commons, for he is the first everywhere. . . . No man of sense could meet Burke by accident under a gateway to avoid a shower, without being convinced that he was the first man in England. . . . If he should go into a stable, and talk a few minutes with the ostlers about horses, they would venerate him as the wisest of human beings. They would say, 'We have had an extraordinary man here.'"

And the sturdy old Doctor was right. Among the great men who adorned the English senate, and toiled for fame and for their country during the closing half of the eighteenth century, Burke stands out as the brightest in intellect, the most unsullied in character. Each of the great "Parliament men" who surrounded him had his fame darkened by some grave fault, amounting even to a vice. "Physician, heal thyself," would be the natural taunt addressed to Charles James Fox, who, while denouncing recklessness in his political rivals, was ruining himself with the dice-box. Sheridan, also, while aspiring to manage the affairs of a nation, was hopelessly and inextricably involved by his own extravagance and waste; and in William Pitt, the arrogance and self-sufficiency developed from too early a possession of power, led to the gravest consequences to his country, and indirectly had no small share in bringing about his premature decease. Of Burke, it may be said, as an enthusiastic admirer said of the great Lord Chatham, "He stood alone; modern degeneracy had not touched him." His countrymen, especially, could point to him with pride as a specimen of the very best and highest type of the Irish character,—ardent, enthusiastic, full of genius, with wit tempered by restraining wisdom, and above all full of ardent zeal for good, and a healthy and uncompromising detestation of wrong. Throughout his long and chequered career we may sometimes be conscious of the presence of error; but no biographer, writing of the life and deeds of Edmund Burke, has ever been obliged to apologise for or to extenuate crime. "Too fond of the right to pursue the expedient," as Goldsmith graphically and truly describes him, he was sometimes involved in difficulties, and darkened by calumnies a less ardent man would have escaped. In his later years he was sometimes goaded into bitterness by sneering adversaries, or even betrayed into absurdity by the phantoms of his over-excited imagination, as, for instance, on that memorable occasion, made the most of by his enemies, when he flung a dagger on the floor of the House of Commons. But there was no taint of self-seeking or of meanness in his great heart or his majestic intellect. From first to last, the idea of duty, the love for the thing that is right and true, was before him. His friends might sometimes be bewildered and embarrassed by his impetuosity; but they never had to blush for him, or anxiously to explain away inconsistency between his profession and his conduct. Sorely wounded was this good knight in the long life conflict; but never did a Du Guesclin or a Bayard keep his honour more untarnished, through evil and through good report, than Edmund Burke.

The record of his life is honourable alike to himself and to the public history of the time of which he was the most distinguished ornament. In one respect this story resembles that of the great Lord Chatham. It shows how in the England of the eighteenth century, in spite of aristocratic prejudices and the strong influence of hereditary caste, a man might make his way and achieve the highest influence and consideration by the force of industry, ability, and integrity. Speaking from his place in Parliament at that memorable period when the duty of introducing a measure for the retrenchment of public expenditure was entrusted to him by his colleagues, Burke emphatically said: "For my own part, I have very little to recommend me for this or for any task, but a kind of earnest and anxious perseverance of mind, which, with all its good and all its evil effects, is moulded in my constitution." He did himself injustice; the quality for which he modestly took credit was only one among many qualifications for a great career; but it was in his as in the case of nine aspiring men out of ten, the one thing indispensable; that concomitant of the highest genius, "the faculty of taking an enormous amount of trouble," was pre-eminent in him. "Tout vient à la fin à qui sait attendre," says the French axiom; and the triumph of perseverance has seldom been more brilliantly exhibited than in this great statesman's life.

EDMUND BURKE'S EARLY YEARS.

Edmund Burke, the greatest orator, and one of the greatest statesmen of his time, was born on the 1st of January, 1728 (old style, 12th January, 1729, new style, as recorded on his tombstone,) in the house of his father, Mr. Richard Burke, an attorney in Dublin. He received his first rudiments of education from a Mr. O'Halloran, the village schoolmaster of Castletown Roche, who many years afterwards used to pride himself on having taught Burke Latin. Like Sir Walter Scott and other distinguished men, he was prevented by delicate health in his childhood from joining in boyish sports, and was always reading and pondering, sitting by himself in corners. His brother Richard Burke, wondering many years afterwards how it was that Edmund seemed to have monopolized the family brains, explained the phenomenon by the reflection, "To be sure, when we were at play, he was always at work."

At Ballitore, near Kildare, Edmund Burke, with his two brothers, Richard and Garret, was placed under the care of a most kindly and judicious schoolmaster, Abraham Shackleton, a quaker, who had penetration enough to discern and appreciate the great abilities of the quiet "meditative boy." All through life Burke was especially amenable to and grateful for any real sympathy and kindness. He kept up a correspondence with Abraham Shackleton and his son Richard, throughout the most brilliant period of his parliamentary success, and declared in the House of Commons his indebtedness to Abraham Shackleton for the education that had made him worth anything.

Castletown Roche was to some extent classic ground. It was only a few miles from the ruins of Kilcolman Castle, whence Spenser the poet had been driven on the breaking out of Tyrone's rebellion in 1598. Edmund Burke himself could claim kindred, through his mother, with the author of the Faery Queen; whose immortal work was his favourite book. "Whoever relishes and reads Spenser as he ought to be read, will have a strong hold of the English language," he afterwards said; a thing worthy of remembrance by the student.

UNIVERSITY CAREER, AND START IN LIFE.

With a stock of reading, such as few lads in the present century, and still fewer in the last, carried with them from school, Burke entered as a pensioner at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1744. There was at that time a young sizar at Trinity, with whom he became acquainted, a somewhat lazy and exceedingly impecunious person, much given to neglecting the severer parts of the curriculum, having a terrible hatred for dry Burgendicius and Euclid, and much given to wasting his time with "the draggle-tailed Muses," and writing halfpenny ballads. His name was Oliver Goldsmith; unlike Burke, he was continually in scrapes, once even running away from college, and selling his books. Burke, on the contrary, seems to have passed a decorous though merry three years at Trinity; and we have glimpses of him, as airing his oratory in a debating society, perhaps with aspirations, even then, towards that larger debating society—that listening senate, whose applause he was destined one day to command.

After completing his college course, and becoming entitled in the usual way to the letters B.A., he left Ireland, and proceeded to London to study for the bar; entering as a student at the Middle Temple, April, 1747. His observations on London, as preserved in letters to his friends, are always apt, and frequently shrewd. They also exhibit the tendency to the florid rhetorical style for which his speeches and his writings afterwards became famous. To him the turrets of hospitals and charitable institutions appear as "piercing the skies like so many electrical conductors to avert the wrath of heaven from the great arched city." Already he instinctively haunts the Houses of Parliament, the chosen temples of fame; though with all admiration for the eloquence he hears there, he shrewdly observes that, after all, "a man will make more by the figures of arithmetic than the figures of rhetoric, unless he can get into the trade winds, and then he may sail secure over Pactolean sand." Law soon disgusted him, however, with its dry details, though he toiled manfully at it for some years, on the common-sense ground that a middling lawyer had better hope of success than a middling poet. After refusing, in deference to his father's opinion, a position offered him in New York, he settled down to the London life of a lettered student, writing for Dodsley, of Pall Mall, an account of the European settlements in America, and various other works. The first work he published was somewhat in the nature of a literary mystification. It was entitled "The Vindication of Natural Society," by a late noble writer; and appeared in the shape of a capital imitation of Lord Bolingbroke's style and manner. It aimed, and most successfully, at combating the infidel philosophy of Lord Bolingbroke's works, by showing that the creation itself may be criticised by an unscrupulous man, who is bold enough "to examine the divine fabrics by his ideas of reason and fitness." The book was well-timed; for there had recently appeared the works of Bolingbroke, published by Mr. David Mallet,—to the intense disgust of Dr. Johnson, who thus pithily expressed his opinion alike of the writer and editor: "Sir, he (Bolingbroke) was a scoundrel and a coward; a scoundrel for charging a blunderbuss against religion and morality; a coward, because he had not resolution to fire it off himself, but left half a crown to a beggarly Scotchman to draw the trigger after his death." Burke did good service by showing that the specious arguments of Bolingbroke, carried out to their ultimate issues, might be used against all human institutions, and would prove society itself to be an evil. So masterly was the imitation of the style, that it deceived many, who took the work for a genuine effusion of Bolingbroke. Among these were the polite Lord Chesterfield, Bolingbroke's intimate friend, and the learned Bishop Warburton. "You see, sir, the fellow's principles," cried the angry church dignitary; "they now come out in a full blaze!" "The imitation, indeed," says Mr. Prior, "was so complete as to constitute identity rather than resemblance. It was not merely the language, style, and general eloquence of the original that had been caught; but the whole mind of the peer, his train of thought, the power to enter into his conception, seemed to be transferred into the pen of his imitator with a fidelity and grace beyond the reach of art."

It must have been a pleasant life that Burke led in London during this period. He became acquainted with men of eminence who appreciated his genius, and in whose conversation he took delight. The genial Arthur Murphy; the versatile Garrick, who gave him some valuable hints on oratory, and at whose table he met men of sense and position; and lastly, Samuel Johnson and Mr., afterwards Sir Joshua, Reynolds; men as different from each other as they could be in manners and appearance, but alike in the possession of sterling worth, and in the power of recognizing and appreciating it in others.

The immediate occasion of his introduction to the great chain of literature "was the publication of a work which at once brought him into notice; his famous Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful." The originality of treatment and elegance of style in his work attracted general attention and approbation. Goldsmith reviewed the work favourably in the Monthly Review; Johnson declared it to be an example of true criticism;

Murphy declared the style to be in many passages "sublime and beautiful," while he disputed some of its positions; old Mr. Burke marked his appreciation of the copy dutifully despatched to him, by sending his son a hundred pounds.

MARRIAGE AND LITERARY INDUSTRY.

At the house of his friend and countryman, Dr. Nugent, at Bath, whither he had gone to recruit his health, weakened by strenuous application, Edmund Burke met the lady who became his wife, and from the time of their marriage until death parted them, was the comfort and solace of his chequered life. "Every care vanished the moment he entered under his own roof," was Burke's emphatic declaration, made in the stormiest part of his career; and in his will, in which he left his whole estate to her, he speaks of her with the highest admiration and gratitude. Even his female friends, Miss Hannah More and Miss Burney, allowed that Mrs. Burke was an admirable and a beautiful woman. This paragon among wives was Miss Mary Jane Nugent, the daughter of the physician. His connection with the worthy bookseller, Dodsley, became more intimate as the necessity for lucrative exertion increased with his marriage; and for some time he had to look to that "excellent crutch," literature, as his chief support. When the Annual Register, that most long-lived of periodicals, was established, Burke became the editor and chief contributor. Literary labour was not highly paid in those days, when Johnson was glad to be "fed with guineas," that is, to receive his pay in small sums. A hundred pounds a year was all Burke received for superintending the work, and writing the historical chapters. He certainly had some fine things to chronicle as historiographer; for 1759, the first year of the appearance of the Register, was emphatically an "annus mirabilis," full of splendid triumphs that intoxicated the nation with joy and pride; the taking of Ticonderoga and Fort Niagara—the splendid achievements of Hawke in the defeat of Conflans, on a dangerous and rocky coast—the victory purchased by the death of the heroic Wolfe in Canada; successes at Guadaloupe, Havre, Cape Lagos; and, on the other side, the tremendous struggle of the seven years' war in full operation, with the crushing defeat of Kunnersdorf, that unnerved for a time even the iron-hearted Frederick of Prussia. And in other directions this first Annual Register could boast of special attractions; for in it Burke wrote a review of Johnson's Rasselas, not without a kindly and outspoken expression of wonder, that the nation should as yet have done nothing in acknowledgment of the merit of the author, who had spent so many laborious years in its service. During these years of literary activity, Burke's reputation was steadily rising. His various knowledge fairly amazed all with whom he came in contact. When the famous Literary Club was formed in 1763, he at once became one of its most honoured members; and at that imaginary banquet, in which Goldsmith so charmingly represented the guests under the emblem of dishes, and was content, with his own good humour, himself to figure as the "gooseberry fool," while he dubbed the versatile Garrick the "salad," in whom opposite ingredients, the sweet and the sour, are found united, Burke, the great in conversation, is most appropriately "tongue, with a garnish of brains." Indeed, Goldsmith placed Burke's abilities in conversation above those of Johnson himself, who, it must be confessed, owed some of his success in the wordy arguments at the club to his impressive and dictatorial manner. "His sayings would not appear so extraordinary," said Lord Pembroke to Boswell, "but for his bow-wow way;" and Goldsmith himself, while acknowledging Johnson's conversational gifts, pithily asked, "Is he like Burke, who winds into a subject like a serpent?"

BURKE AND "SINGLE-SPEECH" HAMILTON.

But before the establishment of the Literary Club, where he was best appreciated, Burke had already gained influential friends, and after patient waiting, obtained an introduction into political life, for which he had by close study of commercial and financial questions, diligently prepared himself. Among the influential public men of the time was a certain Mr. William Gerard Hamilton, afterwards known by the nickname of Single-Speech Hamilton, from the fact that on the night of a memorable debate he electrified the House of Commons by an oration of quite exceptional power and eloquence; and fearful perhaps of disturbing the favourable effect he had produced, he never afterwards repeated the effort. To this Gerard Hamilton, who in 1761 accompanied Lord Halifax, the lord lieutenant, to Ireland, young Edmund Burke had been introduced by Lord Charlemont; and went with Gerard Hamilton as his private secretary. Here his knowledge of political economy, which was so great as to command the respectful admiration of Adam Smith, the author of the Wealth of Nations, was of the greatest practical use, and Hamilton was compelled to acknowledge the inferiority of his own knowledge as compared with that of his secretary. In 1763, accordingly, Burke was rewarded by a pension of £300 a year on the Irish Establishment, a usual method, at that time, of repaying political services.

Gerard Hamilton, essentially a coarse-minded and, as subsequent events showed, far from a scrupulous man, considered that by this pension he had bound his brilliant secretary to him body and soul. Indeed, it is curious to note in a certain order of minds the strong reluctance to believe in the existence of merit, unaccompanied by wealth. Thus pompous Sir John Hawkins, admitted into the Literary Club because, having belonged to a former gathering from which the new society was formed, he could not well be kept out, always affected to regard Edmund and Richard Burke as "adventurers," a terrible term, involving the dark imputation that they had their fortunes still to make; and the said Sir John was obliged to withdraw from the club altogether, in consequence of the way in which his rudeness to Edmund Burke was resented by the members who judged by another standard, and showed Hawkins very clearly that they considered him a "snob." Burke had already been irritated and galled by the knowledge that envy and malice sneered at him as "Hamilton's Jackal" and "Hamilton's Genius." This made him especially anxious to maintain his independence; and he wrote to Hamilton, stipulating for time to continue his literary labours. Hamilton, on the other hand, proposed to retain him—to use his own expression—"in a sort of domestic situation." "Would you dare to attempt to bind your footman to such terms?" was Burke's indignant protest. He at once made over the pension by power of attorney to Hamilton, who accepted the money, and retained it until the pension was struck out of the list some two years and a half later. The breach between Burke and Hamilton was irreparable, and again the young aspirant for political honours had to bide his time.

SECRETARY TO LORD ROCKINGHAM.

That time soon came. George Grenville, the prime minister, and his colleagues, especially the Duke of Bedford and his followers, the "Bloomsbury Gang," as they were nicknamed, had offended the king grievously, in the matter of a Regency Bill; for already George III. had been attacked with preliminary symptoms of the mental disease which afterwards darkened the closing years of his life. Overtures were made to William Pitt; but the Great Commoner, under the combined influence of gout and ill-temper, refused to take office; and through the medium of the old Duke of Newcastle, the Marquis of Rockingham, a young nobleman of high character and respectable talents, was placed at the head of a Whig ministry; and the marquis immediately appointed Edmund Burke as his private secretary. This was too flattering a distinction, and too promising a step on the ladder of preferment, not to have excited the envy of that malignant pack, who throughout his whole career were always baying at the heels of Burke. All kinds of preposterous stories were put into circulation about him; and the meddling and spiteful old Duke of Newcastle ran off with a face full of horror to Lord Rockingham, to whom Burke had until now been personally a stranger. "He is an impostor, my dear lord," was the burden of the old busybody's song; "he is a Papist, sworn to fight against the crown; a Jesuit in disguise, who got his training at St. Omer; a Jacobite, ready and willing to foster a rebellion." In some alarm, the marquis sent for his new secretary; who after contemptuously proving that he was a Protestant, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and had never seen St. Omer in his life, boldly avowed that some of his nearest connections were Catholics; that he was, and always had been, opposed to the penal laws; and that the circumstance of his having incurred suspicion would prevent him from holding the office his lordship had designed for him. But Lord Rockingham, delighted with Burke's spirit, would not hear of his resignation, and a perfect confidence and friendship was established between the two men, and remained unbroken until the death of Rockingham, in 1782. Not all the magnificent offers afterwards made to Burke, when he became a man to be gained at any cost, could induce him for a moment to waver in his fidelity to the chief who had trusted him.

There is an old proverb, to the effect "that of a quantity of mud thrown at a white wall, a certain amount will stick." And so it was with Burke. His enemies could not by any means be got to give up the "Jesuit" notion; and Burke, who had never seen the city of the celebrated Jesuit college in his life, was continually caricatured in the garb of a Romish priest, as "Neddy St. Omer." He treated such attacks with uniform disdain. "If I cannot live down these contemptible calumnies," he said to those who wished him to defend himself, "I shall not deign to contradict them in any other manner."

BURKE IN PARLIAMENT.

The next year saw a new and a great field opened for Burke's exertions; on the 14th of January, 1766, he took his seat as member for Wendover. He had long prepared himself for the position he had at last secured. During the last two sessions he had been a constant and interested visitor in the gallery. Thus he at once felt himself at home in the House; and on the very first day of his attendance delivered a speech of such eloquence as astonished and delighted no less a critic than the elder William Pitt, who happened to be present, and emphatically congratulated Burke on his success, and his friends on the value of the acquisition they had made. Sturdy old Johnson was delighted, and wrote off forthwith to Bennet Langton, "Lanky" as he used to call him: "Burke has gained more reputation than perhaps any man at his first appearance ever gained before. He made two speeches in the House for repealing the Stamp Act, which were publicly commended by Mr. Pitt, and have filled the town with wonder." Arthur Murphy was jubilant; and William Burke wrote triumphantly, a short time after: "Ned is full of real business, intent upon doing solid good to his country, as much as if he were to receive twenty per cent. from the commerce of the whole empire, which he labours to improve and extend."

There was need of honest and wise counsel in the British Parliament, pre-eminent need, at that time; for the ministers who preceded Rockingham and his party had hit upon the foolish and unjust expedient of taxing America, to wipe away the accumulation of debt from the last war. Grenville, the most opinionated and determined of ministers, had passed the Stamp Act, inflicting hardships in various ways on the Colonies, and calling forth a bitterness of feeling which the English Government entirely undervalued. It was the chief business of the Rockingham administration to repeal this enactment; and that they were enabled to do so, was in a great measure owing to the luminous and persuasive eloquence of Burke. One great characteristic in his nature was a deeply rooted hatred of oppression and wrong. Cruelty and injustice inflicted upon man, woman, or child, or even upon dumb animals, made his blood boil; and his vivid imagination placed before him every wrong brought to his knowledge, as vividly as if it had been perpetrated under his very eyes. The taxing of the American Colonies by England appeared to him, not only unjust, but utterly opposed to common sense, as tending to irritate and provoke to hostility a great and powerful community, otherwise loyally disposed towards England. He was emphatically "the tongue" of the Rockingham party, to which he adhered through evil and through good report, though offers were made to him by the Duke of Grafton, which must have been tempting to an ambitious man of narrow means. During the years that preceded the American war, he was the terror of the "bores" of the House, especially of George Grenville, whose lengthy and tedious harangues, which even the king used to remember with horror, he ridiculed with infinite wit and humour, and whose cloudy logic he mercilessly overthrew. His opponents were bewildered at the torrent of eloquence, imagination, and argument ready to be showered upon them at any moment, and whirling away their arguments in its headlong course. The old taunts of 'Jesuit,' 'traitor,' and 'malcontent,' had now lost credit even with the vulgar, though the figure of Burke in the black robe of a student or a priest of a Catholic seminary might still point the meaning of the old nickname, "Neddy St. Omer." The accusation of disloyalty to the monarch was answered with scathing sarcasm. When George Onslow, from the ministerial side, taxed him with want of respect for the crown, Burke indignantly replied that "he honoured the king as much as any man," but added, with a most significant wave of his hand towards the Treasury bench, "that his feeling did not extend to his majesty's manservant and maid-servant, his ox and his ass." Some of the parliamentary amenities of those days would not have been tolerated in our own more punctilious times; as, for instance, where Burke describes the minister of the day as "coming down in state, attended by his creatures of all denominations, beasts clean and unclean;" or again, when on the chairman of the East India Company beginning to read some well-known public papers in the House, he gravely rose and begged leave to send for his nightcap. One of his finest pieces of sarcasm occurs in a speech against the employment of the Red Indians in the American war. General Burgoyne had summoned seventeen Indian nations "to repair to the king's standard," and while enjoining them to refrain from scalping living prisoners, had engaged to pay a price for the scalps of the dead. Burke illustrated this course of action by the supposed instance of a riot on Tower Hill. There was a menagerie at the Tower in those days, and country cousins visiting London generally included a visit to the wild beasts in the programme of London sights, whence indeed arose the popular expression of "seeing the lions." Burke supposed the keeper of this menagerie turning his savage charges loose among the people, but saying to them emphatically: "My gentle lions, my sentimental wolves, my tender-hearted hyenas, go forth, but take care not to hurt men, women, or children." On his side, however, he had to endure language which, if used against the obscurest member of the present day, would probably lead to a speedy visit to the "clock tower." When he had been nearly twenty years in Parliament, and was acknowledged as certainly the most brilliant and probably the greatest statesman of that assembly, he was publicly designated as "that reptile Mr. Burke," by Major Scott, the nominee and thick-and-thin partisan of Warren Hastings in the House of Commons.

THE "ROCKINGHAMITES" TURNED OUT; PURCHASE OF "GREGORIES."

George III. had submitted to Lord Rockingham's taking office, as a makeshift, to get rid of Grenville, and consequently turned Rockingham and his friends out, so soon as that purpose was answered. Going into opposition with his patron, Burke did good service by publishing a masterly vindication of the principles and policy of the Rockingham party, under the title, A Short Account of a late Short Administration; and still further, in a humorous letter to the Public Advertiser, supposed to be written by a tallow-chandler and common councilman, appropriately named Whittington, who clumsily takes up the cudgels for the new ministry against that lately in office. "The main design of my taking pen in hand," says Burke, in the character of the worthy cit, "was to refute the silly author of a late publication, called A Short Account of a late Short Administration. This half-sheet account shows his ill-humour in the very title; he calls one year and twenty days a short administration; whereas I can prove, by the rule of three direct, that it is as much as any ministry in these times had any right to expect." This assertion the correspondent of the Advertiser makes good by enumerating the five administrations—of Pitt, of Newcastle, of Bute, of Grenville, and of Rockingham—that had been successively turned out in five years, giving a year and sixty days as the average duration of each. With a humorous and pungent attack on Lord Chatham, who was now once again in office, the letter ends. It fully answered its purpose, and set the whole town laughing.

Burke had always been, for his position, a poor man—a circumstance which supercilious

Horace Walpole does not forget, when he sneeringly remarks, in reference to his fearlessness, that insolence is more easily tolerated in an inferior than in an inferior raised above his superiors. In 1768, however, Burke became a landed proprietor. He says, in a letter to his friend Shackleton, "I have made a push with all I could collect of my own, and the aid of my friends, to cast a little root in this country. I have purchased a house with six hundred acres of land in Buckinghamshire, twenty-four miles from London, where I now am. It is a place exceedingly pleasant; and I purpose, God willing, to become a farmer in good earnest."

This "house and land" was the estate of Gregories, or Butler's Court, close to Beaconsfield. It cost Burke £28,000, and many have been the conjectures as to the means by which he raised this considerable sum. Detractors hinted at secret grants of public money, bribes, and other disreputable sources; but the truth seems to have been that Lord Rockingham, who felt the obligation he was under to Burke for the most valuable political assistance, pressed upon his brilliant coadjutor the sum necessary to make up the purchase-money after Burke had devoted to that purpose the inheritance he had received on the death of his father and his brother Garret, and as much as he could raise by way of loan from various members of his family. The Marquess never intended that the sum he lent Burke—it would have been much larger, and bestowed as a free gift, but for the refusal of the latter—should be repaid. Shortly before his death he sent for Mr. Lee, his legal adviser, and desired him to draw up a codicil to his will, cancelling every paper that might be found containing any acknowledgment of debt due to him from Edmund Burke. It was a transaction alike honourable to giver and recipient; for Burke had been a valuable adviser to Lord Rockingham in the management of that nobleman's vast estates; and had remained a poor man, in spite of offers from the ministry, because he would not quit the leader, who had valued and honoured him. He always took great interest in everything that related to his estate, retaining some 160 acres of the land in his own hands, and farming them with a good deal of discrimination. It sounds whimsical to find the orator who made his opponents tremble and falter, in the discussion of imperial questions, descending to details of the fattening of hogs, and the getting of twenty-four acres of wheat into the ground. That he made great efforts in completing the purchase of Gregories is shown, among other circumstances, by his being compelled, a year later, to apply to his friend Garrick for the loan of a thousand pounds for a year, on his bond. No doubt the request was granted, as was a similar one made not long after by a very different kind of borrower, poor Goldsmith, who, receiving what he asks for, is profuse in acknowledgments to "his honest little man." Burke probably got the money, for Garrick was a friendly man enough. A couple of months later the statesman sends a present of a turtle to the actor, humorously declaring that as the turtle is declared by epicures to contain in itself all kinds of flesh, fish, and fowl, it is a fitting dish for one "who can represent all the solidity of flesh, the volatility of fowl, and the oddity of fish." Whether, on the whole, Burke would not have done better to defer his purchase for a while, or to have chosen an estate where the price was not augmented by the obligation imposed on the purchaser to take the collection of paintings and sculpture belonging to his predecessor, is a question. Certain it is that in his later career the proprietor of Gregories was frequently hampered by debt, though he practised all the economy compatible with the maintenance of a frank but plain hospitality, inviting his friends literally to a joint of mutton, and making his carriage horses take their turn at the plough. Burke had the true light-heartedness of an Irishman, in spite of the cares of statesmanship, and the fret and fever of political life. He took Johnson down to see his new purchase, and the Doctor seems to have stared at the magnitude of the house and the extent of the arrangements generally. "Non equidem in video, miror magis," was his observation, though Boswell seems to think that a little momentary envy may have mingled with the great lexicographer's natural surprise, when he viewed his friend's broad acres and handsome country house, and thought of the comparatively small reward he had himself obtained for a life of literary toil. But he was not a man to let such a feeling as envy be more than momentary, the brave old Doctor, and knew well how to apply to himself his advice to Goldsmith against the love of outward show. "Nil te quæsieris extra," was a motto he could act up to in his own case; and, with his simple habits, it is a question whether what he called in Mr. Thrale's case, "the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice," would have had any especial charms for him.

Burke was always fond of a jest, and appreciated a mystification with an enjoyment that was truly Irish. In the literary club, of course Goldsmith was the ordinary butt of practical jokes, not always in the best taste. On one occasion a relative was dressed up to personify a wild Irish authoress, anxious to get the great Mr. Goldsmith's patronage for her poems. At another time the simple poet was made to apologize for words he had never uttered; even Burke could not resist playing upon poor Goldy's credulity.

BURKE'S CONDUCT TO BARRY AND CRABBE.

A passage in his life which shows him at his best is connected with the history of that restless and irritable genius, his countryman Barry, the artist. It was in the year 1763 that Barry, young, poor, and quite friendless, found out Burke in Dublin. Struck with the indications of genius and determination in the forlorn young man, Burke brought him to London, introduced him to various artists, found him employment in copying pictures, and subsequently, in conjunction with his brother Richard, sent him to Rome to study. His letters to Barry, who, combative and tenacious, had become involved in various quarrels, are admirable for the kindly wisdom of their general tone. Burke advises him as a father might advise a son, and with kindly foresight sets before him the trouble and annoyance that will inevitably attend a state of continual captiousness. "Believe me, my dear Barry," he says, "that the arms with which the ill disposition of the world are to be combated, and the qualities by which it is to be reconciled to us, and we reconciled to it, are moderation, gentleness, a little indulgence to others, and a great deal of distrust of ourselves. . . . Nothing can be so unworthy of a well-composed soul as to pass away life in bickerings and litigations, in snarling and scuffling with every one about us. Again and again, my dear Barry, we must be at peace with our species; if not for their sakes, yet very much for our own." Then he gently forecasts the effect, in Barry's own case, of this litigious spirit; and it is remarkable how entirely his words were verified by the event. He supposes Barry to have returned from Italy: "By degrees you will produce some of your own works; they will be variously criticised. You will defend them; you will abuse those that have attacked you; expostulations, discussions, letters, possibly challenges, will go forward; you will shun your brethren; they will shun you. In the meantime, gentlemen will avoid your friendship, for fear of being engaged in your quarrels; you will be obliged for maintenance to do anything for anybody; your very talents will depart for want of hope and encouragement, and you will go out of the world fretted, disappointed, and ruined. Nothing but my real regard for you could induce me to set these considerations in this light before you. Remember, we are born to serve and to adorn our country, and not to contend with our fellow-citizens; and that, in particular, your business is to paint, and not to dispute." It would have been well for Barry had he taken this wise advice to heart; but his combative temper was too much for him, and he managed to offend nearly everybody with whom he came in contact. Sir Joshua Reynolds, the most courtly of men, of whom Goldsmith wrote,—

"To coxcombs averse, yet most civilly steering,

When they talked without sense, he was still hard of hearing;"— even polite Sir Joshua could not endure petulant Barry, who in his turn hated the president of the Royal Academy, and even expected Burke to withdraw his friendship from Reynolds in deference to his own dislike. He rose to eminence, for his talents were too great to be altogether kept down, even by such a character; but he did not achieve half of what he might have done, if, following his wise friend's counsel, he had been content to take men as they were, and to paint instead of disputing. To Burke himself he was impertinent; and at one time, when his friend and patron was sitting to him for a portrait, to be presented to an old friend, Dr. Brocklesby, Barry chose to play the occupied man, and to declare that the statesman, who at some inconvenience was devoting to him the hours he could snatch in the intervals of parliamentary business, should send a day's notice of his coming; and on his arriving unexpectedly, was too much engaged to give him a sitting. Whereupon Burke, in an ironical yet exceedingly temperate letter, made Barry somewhat ashamed of himself. Burke was too generous altogether to withdraw his countenance, even where his forbearance was so sorely tried. He continued to visit Barry, and to assist him, with valuable suggestions, when pecuniary aid was no longer necessary; but the cordiality of their intercourse was gone; and in the correspondence the hearty "My dear Barry" of other days is replaced by the ceremonious "Sir," or "Mr. Burke's compliments." But the wayward and contentious painter in secret cherished a sense of the noble character of the man whose patience he had often tried. When he heard of the statesman's death, he felt, perhaps not without remorse, what this man had been to him. "The peace of God be ever with Edmund Burke," he tearfully exclaimed; "he was my first, my best, and my wisest friend; and I behaved, indeed, too harshly to him."

Among the works ascribed to Burke's eloquent pen were those remarkable letters, signed "Junius," that appeared in Mr. Woodfall's newspaper, The Daily Advertiser, from 1769 to 1770, containing bitterly adverse criticism of the deeds of ministers, and in some instances, as in the celebrated "Letter to the King," using the language of warning and reproof to royalty itself. The authorship of the Junius letters has never been fully proved, though the great preponderance of evidence is towards Sir Philip Francis, for whom Lord Macaulay, for instance, marshals a formidable array of facts. Burke was believed by Sir William Blackstone, Lord Mansfield, and other good judges of evidence, to have been the author; but, on the other hand, it must be remembered that he not only gave "his word and honour" that he was not the writer, but long afterwards spoke of the Junius letters as written in a flashy and meretricious style, calculated to mislead the ignorant. He would hardly have done this if they had proceeded from his pen. Barry was not the only man of genius who had reason to bless the day when he first looked on the face of Edmund Burke. In 1779 there came to London, from Aldborough, in Suffolk, a young surgeon's assistant, named George Crabbe. He was full of literary aspirations, and hoped, like Chatterton, to find in London a field whence he should glean fame and profit. Five pounds, borrowed from a sympathising friend, formed his whole stock of money; and by the time he reached London the five pounds had dwindled to three. Like Chatterton, he wrote assiduously, and sent manuscripts to booksellers, who would none of his work. An application for assistance to Lord North, the Prime Minister, remained unanswered; and no wonder, for Lord North, with the American war on his hands, had little leisure to devote to Crabbe's woes and wishes. A copy of verses addressed to Lord Chancellor Thurlow procured for "Old Gruff" only a dry intimation that his avocations left him no time to read poetry. At last, when he was reduced literally to his last shilling, when arrest for a small debt stared him in the face, and he knew not whence to procure his next meal, the unfortunate poet addressed a manly and pathetic letter to Burke, a man proverbial for sympathy and helpfulness. The warm heart of Burke was touched by the modest, manly fortitude and quiet bravery of the unknown, friendless man of letters, struggling so gallantly against adverse fortune. He received Crabbe into his house, employed all his powerful interest for him, read and revised his poems, and carried two of them to Doddsley, who published one of them, introduced the young poet to Fox, Reynolds, and other men of influence, helped him to enter the Church, and procured him the post of domestic chaplain to the Duke of Rutland. Thurlow also seems to have thought that Burke's protégé had something in him, and very practically apologised for his gruffness by the gift of a hundred-pound note to Crabbe, and afterwards by bestowing two small livings upon him. Crabbe used to speak of Burke with hearty gratitude as the founder of his modest fortunes. Various men of minor ability had also cause to thank Burke for substantial help; and this was the more praiseworthy from the fact that his position was far superior to his means, and brought him much more honour than emolument; and frequently he was giving away what he could ill spare.

REPRESENTATION OF BRISTOL. BURKE AS A MINISTER.

At the general election of 1774, Burke was returned for the borough of Malton, in Yorkshire; but just as he was returning thanks to his constituents, came a deputation from "Bristol, to inform him that he had been put in to nomination for that important borough, and begging him to lose no time in presenting himself to the electors. Journeying night and day, with the concurrence of his friends at Malton, he presented himself at Bristol within forty-eight hours—three hundred and fifty miles in two days was not bad travelling a century ago—and after a hard contest of three weeks was returned triumphantly.

Already, at the commencement of his connection with Bristol, he took care to set himself right upon a very important point, the question, namely, whether he would vote in Parliament according to his own opinion or to the wishes of his constituents. Thereupon he spoke out boldly and manfully, and pointed out in a masterly way the difference between a representative and a delegate. He declared himself ready to devote his time and his energies to the benefit of his constituents, and to prefer their interests to his; but reserved to himself full freedom of action according to his unbiassed opinion and his conscience. "Your representative owes you not his industry only," he bravely said, "but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion." He declared Parliament was not a congress of ambassadors from hostile states with different interests, but a deliberative assembly with one interest, that of the whole; that they chose a member, but when he had been chosen, he was not a member of Bristol, but a member of Parliament; and he utterly repudiated the idea of being bound by mandates or authoritative instructions from his constituents. Mr. Kruger, his fellow-candidate, was totally overwhelmed and dumbfounded by the brilliancy of Mr. Burke's oratory, and after an unusually exhaustive and eloquent speech of his colleague, was content to cry emphatically, as his contribution to the oratory of the day, "I say ditto to Mr. Burke! I say ditto to Mr. Burke!"

The independence of judgment for which he stipulated on the hustings, Burke exercised in his place in Parliament. He eloquently spoke in favour of the abolition of some restrictive laws that harassed the trade of Ireland; though his Bristol constituents, from a not unnatural jealousy, petitioned against measures of free trade for Ireland. Burke knew he was risking his seat by opposing himself to the wishes of the electors, but was content to do what he considered right and just, without regard to consequences. He paid the penalty at the next general election, in 1780, when he found himself charged with having, on various matters of policy, voted against the opinion of the good people of Bristol. He defended himself with vigour and dignity, declaring that he found his consolation in the fact that he was not accused of venality, or of neglect of duty, or of sacrificing his constituents' interests to his own ambition, but simply that he had pushed the principles of general justice and benevolence too far. Seeing that, though he still had many friends among the most respectable of the people, the million were against him, he declined to contest the borough, and took his leave of Bristol, as he expressed it, "in sorrow and not in anger," returning to Malton, for which borough he continued to sit to the end of his parliamentary career.

One of the points upon which the independence and courage of Burke had given umbrage to the worthy Bristol electors had to do with a religious question. The severe penal laws against the Catholics, passed at a time of national excitement and danger, were felt to be quite needlessly harsh and oppressive, now that the necessity for their maintenance had long ceased to exist; and Sir George Savile brought in a bill for the relief of the Roman Catholics, a measure to which Burke gave his heartiest support; refusing, moreover, a present of five hundred guineas, offered to him as a reward for his exertions by a body of delighted Roman Catholics, on the passing of the Bill, and discouraging also the idea of the erection of a statue to him in Dublin, on the sensible ground that such honours are suitable only as memorials of the dead. In June, 1800, through the mischievous meddling of a crazy fanatic, Lord George Gordon, an enormous crowd of the lowest rabble from the London slums united into a kind of mock confederacy, dignified by the name of the Protestant Association, assembled on Kennington Common, and thence marched to the door of the House of Parliament, to present a petition for the repeal of Savile's Act. Repulsed from the House of Commons, chiefly through the determined conduct of General Conway, they separated into mobs, ripe for mischief, and began burning down Catholic chapels, and attacking and plundering the houses of those gentlemen who had been instrumental in passing Savile's bill. Burke, as a prominent advocate for Catholic relief, had become obnoxious to some of the fanatics, and was again caricatured in his old character of Neddy St. Omers, and the Jesuit stirring up the fires of Smithfield. Nevertheless, he went boldly out among the crowd, and afterwards reported, with great truth, that many of them had no definite idea of a religious question, but were simply riotous and unruly. The supineness of the authorities, however, delivered London into the hands of these rioters for some days. Burke, who had energetically advocated the prompt putting down of these disgraceful disturbances, pleaded for mercy for the many deluded prisoners who were sentenced to death after order was restored; pointing out, with great truth, that the execution of a few ringleaders would strike more terror than the indiscriminate hanging of a number of subordinate agents.

At length, in 1782, the ministry of Lord North, utterly discredited by the state of things in America, by the necessity of increased taxation, and by the general opinion of its inefficiency, resigned office, and the Rockingham party returned to power once more. Burke was made a privy councillor, and obtained the office of Paymaster of the Forces. This office was one to which various irregular gains were attached, such as the interest accruing from the sum, seldom less than £1,000,000, in the paymaster's hands, with various other advantages. With singular disinterestedness, Burke introduced a thorough reform of the department, and surrendered all these perquisites, refusing to receive anything beyond the salary for his office. He thus saved the nation an outlay of £48,000, his own salary being, according to his bill for reforming the finances, cut down to £4,000.

The tenure of power by the new Ministry was brief. Lord Rockingham died, after a very short illness, and Lord Shelburne, a man especially obnoxious to Fox, Burke, and the rest of the Rockingham party, was appointed to succeed him; whereupon Burke and his colleagues resigned their offices. Lord Shelburne, after vainly endeavouring, by means of young Mr. Pitt, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, to effect a reconciliation with Fox, was obliged to go out in his turn, and the Rockingham party resumed their seats, Burke taking up his office of paymaster, while Richard, his brother, became first one of the Treasury secretaries, and afterwards Recorder of Bristol. Lord Portland was placed at the head of the administration, in which Lord North, who still had a numerous following in Parliament, was likewise included; and hence it obtained the title of the Coalition Ministry.

They were not in office long. The misgovernment of India had long become a scandal throughout the world, and Fox brought in his India bill, with the intention of taking all government authority out of the hands of the East India Company; and this was to be done, moreover, in a very high-handed manner. The king became alarmed, and used his influence with such success, that the bill was thrown out in the House of Peers; and the king thereupon dismissed the ministry, chiefly, it is said, out of hatred to Fox, whom he detested with persevering rancour. William Pitt then entered upon his long lease of power, shielded from opposition by the support of George III., and Burke's short tenure of power closed for ever.

LATER YEARS. TRIAL OF WARREN HASTINGS.

The time now came when the hardest task of a laborious political life was to be undertaken by the defender of the liberties and rights of America. Burke was now to stand up in the cause of oppressed millions, against a tyranny in comparison to which the worst injustice inflicted upon the American colonies was mercy and benevolence—to denounce the great successful bad proconsul, who had increased the wealth of a mercantile company, while he brought shame upon the name of England in far-off Hindostan. There was much in the splendour and romance that surrounded India, with its ancient civilization and literature, its picturesque architecture, wonderful tropical vegetation, and above all the various castes of its myriad population, to make that country interesting to a man of Burke's powerful mind. He had studied India and its affairs till he could describe all connected with it with an accuracy a man who had long dwelt there might envy. "All India was present to the eye of his mind, from the halls where suitors laid gold and perfumes at the feet of sovereigns, to the wild moor where the gipsy camp was pitched; from the bazaar, humming like a beehive with the crowd of buyers and sellers, to the jungle, where the lonely courier shakes his bunch of iron rings to scare away the hyænas." For years there had come across the ocean, from this great dependency of the British Empire, dark rumours, gradually spreading into outspoken reports, that made the heart of Burke to sicken within him, and his blood to boil at the heights and depths they disclosed of tyranny and wrong. A tyrant, without pity, remorse, or fear, sat enthroned, by the act of the British senate, as Governor-General of India; and the enormous power put by the legislature into his hands had been grossly abused. Aided by unscrupulous instruments, among whom an unjust judge stood forward with infamous prominence, he had plundered the natives, and ill-used and robbed princes and princesses. He had lent English troops to a native ruler for the purpose of enslaving a brave nation who had done no wrong to the English, and had doomed a chivalric race to slavery and subjection under merciless foes, in return for blood-money, paid down as the price of his intervention. During the latter years of the first governor-general's rule in India, as the demands of the Company for more money increased in urgency, the means taken to gratify that lust for wealth, from being unscrupulous, became utterly wicked and horrible. Organized extortion and fraud, upheld by tyranny that called to its aid the infliction of outrages, insult, and tortures; a total denial of the rights of the natives as subjects of the English Government, to the ordinary safeguards of law and justice; oppression at last consolidated into a system against which there was no appeal; such were the realities, partly hidden under the glare of military success and aggrandisement, in the government of India under Warren Hastings. At one time, even in India, there had been a strong opposition to his proceedings. One man especially had shown sufficient courage to head a faction against him at his own council board, and had written in the minute book of the council a memorandum so hostile to the governor-general that he had been compelled to give "satisfaction," in the form of a hostile meeting, to the person denounced, and had been dangerously wounded; but even the bitter hostility and persistent opposition of Sir Philip Francis had been powerless against a man so utterly unscrupulous as Hastings. Once the clamour against him in England had become so formidable that it seemed as if even the Company, who, profiting by his extortions, upheld him, would be unable to stem the torrent of popular indignation. Hastings had sent home his resignation by the hands of his agent, who had duly presented it: when matters took a turn in his favour, he had repudiated his own act and his own handwriting, and the disputed authority of his friend; and had entered upon a new lease of power and oppression. And now, when this man, having gained brilliant successes, and enlarged the empire of Britain, or rather of the Company, in the East, returned to England, the majority were ready to balance the profit against the crimes, and to bury all the bad deeds of Warren Hastings in oblivion, because he had been successful in increasing the territory governed by the British in India, and because the revenue of the Company was augmented.

*The proprietors of India stock were ready to uphold his cause. The king condescended to receive him with great favour, and the queen to accept presents from him. It was said he was even to be raised to the peerage, by the title of Baron Hastings, of Daylesford, from the seat of his ancestors in Worcestershire. But Burke had determined that these evil things should not go down unchallenged into oblivion. Hastings had hardly landed in England before he gave public notice in Parliament of an intention to inquire into the late governor-general's conduct: and after various delays it was determined, chiefly through his exertions, that Hastings should be brought to trial for his crimes, before the peers of England, sitting in Westminster Hall. Burke himself, and his friends Charles Fox, Sheridan, Wyndham, and Grey, were appointed managers to conduct the prosecution. Among many accusations, the chief charges were, that Hastings had lent English troops for the destruction of the Rohillas, in consideration of forty lacs of rupees (£400,000) paid by the Nabob of Oude; that he had been guilty of inflicting hardships, spoliations, and imprisonment on the begums or princesses of Oude; that he had unjustly ruined and deposed Cheyte Sing, rajah of Benares. Though the proceedings were commenced in 1786, it was not until the 13th of February, 1788, that the trial commenced in Westminster Hall.

The great interest the nation took in the proceedings was manifested by the presence, on the opening day, of a crowd of spectators, of both sexes and all ranks, from the royal princesses downwards. Mr. Edmund Burke opened the impeachment by one of the grandest speeches he had ever delivered. The concluding words of this magnificent oration were pronounced with a grandeur and energy that impressed every hearer with admiration. "Therefore," cried Burke, after a masterly and splendid exposition of the case, "therefore hath it with all confidence been ordered by the Commons of Great Britain, that I impeach Warren Hastings of high crimes and misdemeanours. I impeach him in the name of the Commons House of Parliament, whose trust he has betrayed. I impeach him in the name of the English nation, whose honour he has sullied. I impeach him in the name of the people of India, whose rights he has trodden under foot, and whose country he has turned into a desert. Lastly, in the name of human nature itself, in the name of both sexes, in the name of every age, in the name of every rank, I impeach the common enemy and oppressor of all."

The effect produced by the speech, in which Burke described the cruelties perpetrated in India, was tremendous. All present were filled with pity for the oppressed nation, and with hatred for the oppressor. The female portion of the auditory wept and sobbed abundantly; and even Warren Hastings himself declared that for half an hour he felt himself the most culpable of men. Sheridan, in his magnificent, though somewhat theatrical, speech on the case of the begums of Oude, intensified the feeling; and had the trial been at once continued day by day to its conclusion, there is little doubt that a conviction would have followed. But it was not so. From various reasons, such as the necessary absence of the judges on circuit, the pressure of public business, and the tactics pursued by the counsel for the defence, who threw every obstacle in the way of the prosecution, with the hope of tiring the managers out, the affair lingered on from session to session. Frequently points of law were raised, which the law lords had to discuss in their own chamber. "The judges walked, and the trial stood still," said a witty critic. Hastings had enabled many to make their fortunes in India, and had thus many friends in Parliament and out of it, who stood up for him, declared his misdeeds had been exaggerated, and strove to harass the managers by imputations of personal and political rancour. No less a sum than £20,000 was spent by Hastings in influencing the press. Even the caricaturists were employed to use the potent weapon, ridicule, in the cause of Hastings. The managers were represented as "political banditti, assaulting the saviour of India;" in a coarsely humorous print, "The First Charge," Burke is depicted calling upon the court to find Hastings guilty of not suffering an Indian prince to smoke for two days; in another, he is shown exhibiting a magic lantern microscope that magnifies a 'begum wart' into a mountain, and a Benares flea into an elephant; while begum's tears also attain enormous proportions. But amid the indifference of a large portion of the public, and the active hostility of others, Burke toiled on. He had put his hand to the plough, and he would not look back. During these years of what promised to be fruitless work, his temper sometimes gave way under the violent strain; and the irritability he occasionally displayed was skilfully turned to account by his opponents. Some unguarded and unparliamentary words uttered by him were made the occasion of a vote of censure. It was expected that under such an insult he would retire from the prosecution; but he bowed his noble head, now bent with age and toil, to the rebuke, and persisted in his duty. A dissolution of Parliament took place, and the friends of Hastings declared that the whole proceedings should end with the House of Commons that had ordered the impeachment. But still Burke persevered, and the trial was not dropped. In his conscience he believed Hastings a guilty man. He had undertaken to prove the misdeeds of the governor-general; and a task he had once begun, nothing could induce him to abandon. Charles Fox, his brilliant coadjutor, did him justice in this matter. "The affairs of India," said Fox, "had long been hid in a darkness as hostile to inquiry as it was friendly to guilt, but by the exertions of one man these clouds had been dissipated. His ardent virtue, his sublime genius, and that glowing enthusiasm so essential to both, had, with the application of years, left them nothing of information at present to desire."

In June, 1794, when the managers summed up on the different charges, Mr. Burke being the last to speak, his duty in connection with the trial ended. In the next year, in April, a verdict of acquittal, which had been long expected, was given; then Mr. Pitt proposed, and Mr. Dundas seconded, a vote of thanks to the managers on the conclusion of their long and arduous duties, and the motion was carried. And with this the political life of Burke ended; for he immediately afterwards retired from Parliament.

The long and harassing work which the great orator had carried to an end in the face of so much opposition and obloquy, produced great and lasting effects. Hastings indeed was acquitted; but the grand principle of responsibility for which Burke contended was definitely established. It was now fully understood that the arm of the law could stretch across the many thousands of miles separating Great Britain from India; that the "black water," as the natives termed the dreaded ocean, was no obstacle to the passage of British justice. The worst proceedings of Hastings would have been impossible, had not former governors in India been allowed an impunity that made them look upon themselves as unaccountable and despotic. It was Burke who sternly upheld the proposition that despotic power was unknown to the English constitution; that even the king could not bestow it upon any individual, for it was not his to give. Hastings himself, though acquitted, did not escape unpunished. The trial had been fatal to his hopes of having an advancement in government employ in England. While the proceedings against him were in progress, it was impossible to employ him; when they were concluded, he was too old to begin a fresh career. The East India Company came to his assistance by paying the expenses of the trial, £70,000, and by bestowing upon him a pension, upon which he lived in retirement at Daylesford, till, in 1818, he terminated his chequered career at the age of eighty-three years.

BURKE AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

During the decade occupied by these Indian proceedings, great and eventful changes took place for Burke, bringing with them estrangement from old friends, and alienation from the political party with whom for a number of years he had been cordially and closely allied. Next to the affairs of India, Burke's attention during the closing portion of his career was absorbed, and his fortunes were influenced, by matters connected with the French Revolution.

For years he had watched with anxious interest the tokens that heralded the coming storm in France. During a visit to that country, shortly before the accession of Louis XVI., he had seen the causes at work that brought about the mighty crash of an ancient throne, and the overthrow of the ancient landmarks of government throughout Europe. Already, in 1789, before the horrible phase of the Revolution, the Reign of Terror, had commenced. Burke had made up his mind concerning the whole movement, which he unhesitatingly condemned. To him the fact that the soldiers were no longer to be depended on by the government, served to stamp the whole movement with the very worst features of sedition and rebellion. He did not see that the refusal to obey blindly the orders of an irresponsible despotism was in itself no unhopeful sign. Intense sympathy with the victims of the excesses which soon began to deface the great popular movement, blinded him to the tremendous wrongs the people had suffered for centuries. His mind, worn by a long public career, which had been almost from the beginning a hard conflict, had no longer the clearness of former days. He is prejudiced and violent whenever he has to deal with the subject of the Revolution, the mention of which acts upon him as the sight of scarlet on a bull. He wrote a work, "Reflections on the French Revolution," in which he set forth at length his ideas and prophecies. It had enormous success, was translated into French, and became the text-book of royalists and "empires." But even Horace Walpole, who professed himself delighted with it, owned that in some respects the author had gone too far; "Yet in general," he kindly adds, "there is far less want of judgment than could be expected from him;" the him referring, of course, to Burke. The sale of thirty thousand copies of the work attested its popularity.

A passage in this work, very often quoted in proof of the powers of Burke, shows that in this case those powers were rather of imagination than judgment. "It is now sixteen years," he writes, "since I saw the Queen of France, then the Dauphiness, at Versailles; and surely never lighted on this orb, which she hardly seemed to touch, a more delightful vision. I saw her just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she was just beginning to move in—glittering like the morning star, full of life and splendour and joy. Oh what a revolution! and what a heart must I have to contemplate, without emotion, that elevation and that fall! . . . I thought ten thousand swords must have leaped from their scabbards to avenge even a look that threatened her with insult. But the age of chivalry is gone. . . . The unbought 'grace of life, the cheap defence of nations, the nurse of manly sentiments and heroic enterprise,' is gone. It is gone, that sensibility of principle, that chastity of honour, which felt a stain like a wound, which inspired courage while it mitigated ferocity, which ennobled whatever it touched, and under which vice itself lost half its evil, by losing all its grossness." Now this was soaring into what a matter-of-fact judge once called "the high sentimental latitudes" most absurdly. To talk of the chastity of honour in reference to the higher classes in France during the last century, from the time of the Regent Orleans and his roués to the unutterable infamies of the rule of Louis XV., sounds like bitter irony. The assertion that vice loses half its evil by losing all its grossness, is also open to very grave doubt, inasmuch as the grossness of vice, displaying itself in all its hideousness, will deter many by inspiring disgust; and vice that has lost its grossness is the most insidious and dangerous of all. The present generation, too, can to the full pity and deplore the sorrows of the ill-fated Marie Antoinette, without being struck with admiration of the utterly frivolous French Court, with its Trianon and mock pastoral fêtes, its fiddling and dancing and coxcombray, in the midst of a nation mad with oppression, and hunger, and despair. George III. certainly perused the Reflections with a great deal of pleasure, remarking that it was a book that every gentleman ought to read; but as that royal critic declared a great part of Shakespeare to be "sad stuff," perhaps his judgment would hardly be received as possessing much weight. Miss Burney, Walpole, and Cumberland, the "genteel" dramatist, raised their voices in favour of the work; but though the enthusiastic lady especially declared it to be "the noblest, deepest, and most animated and exalted work she had ever read," posterity has not endorsed the opinion.

The heat and fury with which Burke inveighed against the Revolution and everything thereunto appertaining, startled and irritated his friends of the Whig party, Fox, Sheridan, and the rest, while it gave his enemies new weapons wherewith to goad the old lion to madness. At last, on one memorable evening in the House of Commons, after a bitter speech from Fox, who appears to have considerably lost his temper, Burke solemnly declared that the new Government of France, which Mr. Fox had been praising, was a plundering, ferocious, bloody, tyrannical democracy; and that though at his age it was obviously indiscreet to provoke enemies or to risk the loss of friends, he would put everything to the hazard for his public duty, and with his last breath exclaim, "Flee from the French Constitution!" Fox, unwilling that matters should go to extremity, whispered, "There is no loss of friendship." Burke angrily replied, "Yes, there is! I know the price of my conduct. I have indeed made a great sacrifice. I have done my duty, though I have lost my friend." And though Fox begged, even with tears, for a reconciliation, and afterwards eagerly seized a fancied opportunity for regaining a footing in his old colleague's esteem, from that time Burke sternly separated himself from the party with whom he had acted during his whole parliamentary career. He went over to the side of Pitt and Dundas. Dr. Parr, his fervent admirer, writes of the events of that memorable evening: "All the papers are with Burke, even the Foxite papers, which I have seen. I know his violence, and temper, and obstinacy of opinion, and—but I will not speak out, for I think him the greatest man upon the earth. . . . He is uncorrupt, I know, but his passions are quite headstrong."

SORROWS OF HIS CLOSING YEARS; THE END.

In 1792 he lost his dear and constant friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, who left him a legacy of £2,000. Though his embarrassments rendered this sum a very welcome windfall, Burke devoted part of it to relieving the necessities of two reduced old ladies, distant connections, in Ireland. In this year also occurred the famous dagger scene, a piece of indiscretion on which the caricaturists fastened like flies on a cake of sugar. It appears that Burke saw, at the Secretary of State's office, a dagger which had been forwarded there by a manufacturer at Birmingham, who had received it as a pattern, with an order for a large number, and had considered it prudent to send the sample to the Government for inspection. Burke had borrowed the weapon, intending to show it to the House; and, carried away by the ardour of his address, had given way to the somewhat theatrical action of throwing it on the floor.

Heavy sorrows darkened the close of the veteran statesman's life. In 1794, the year in which he retired from Parliament, he lost his brother Richard, with whom he had always lived on terms of the greatest confidence and affection; and whose "mirth and agreeable vein," so charmingly recorded by Goldsmith in his "Retaliation," had lightened many a weary hour in the stormy career of the elder brother. A far heavier calamity befell him a few months later, in the death of his only son Richard, who died of consumption, at the age of thirty-six, shortly after he had been returned in his father's place for the borough of Malton, so long and nobly represented by Edmund Burke. The younger Burke appears to have been in all respects admirable, and the fondest hopes of the affectionate hearts of his parents were concentrated on Richard, who was to carry down the name of Burke to new honour and fame. But the hopes were shattered by the untimely death of him whom the bereaved father pathetically bewails as the lost hope of his house, "the prop of his age," "his better self." When a relation had a son born to him soon after, he writes: "May he live to be the staff of your age, and close your eyes in peace, instead of your being, like me, reversing the order of nature, and having the melancholy office to close his."

In October, 1795, two pensions were at length awarded to him, at the express wish, it is said, of the king, who, especially since the appearance of his works on the French Revolution and "A Regicide Peace," had got to look upon him very favourably. The fact that the pension, the natural and honourable reward of thirty years of service, was accepted by the broken-down old man, who wished to die free from the burden of undeserved debt, was sufficient to cause a clamorous outcry among his political opponents in both Houses. The Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Lauderdale, in the House of Peers, especially distinguished themselves by cheap outbursts of patriotism at Burke's expense. The former, at least, had reason to rue his rashness; for indignation once more kindled the fire of old days in the breast of the veteran. The great powers that had produced the "Thoughts on the Discontents," and the "Letters to the Merchants of Bristol," were torpid, but not dead; and in his "Letter to a Noble Lord" he drew such a contrast between the pension awarded to himself in return for long years of labour, and the enormous grants of land made to the Duke's ancestors, out of the plunder of monastic foundations, that the Duke was for a time exposed to the scorn of the whole nation, who wondered how a man in his position could have had the fatuity to lay himself open to such an attack.

Within two years afterwards, Edmund Burke, the upright statesman, the persistent and eloquent denouncer of oppression and wrong, died quietly in his house at Beaconsfield, his last hours soothed by the cares of his affectionate wife. He required that his name and age alone should be inscribed on the tablet that would mark his resting-place in the quiet country church. With humble piety, he in his last will bequeathed his soul to God, "hoping for His mercy only through the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." He desired to be buried near the remains of his brother and his son, "in all humility hoping that as we have lived in perfect unity together, we may together have a part in the resurrection of the just."

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

" He stood upon the deck and watched till dawn.
But who can tell what feelings filled his heart
When, like a cloud, the distant land arose,
Gray from the ocean,—when we left the ship,
And cleft, with rapid oars, the shallow wave,
And stood triumphant on another world ! "

THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY ; SEARCHING AFTER KNOWLEDGE.

IN the history of the world there are certain points which may be taken as sea-marks, standing boldly forth like mountains, or still more like lighthouses, seen by the navigator from afar, as his bark ploughs its way through the waste of waters; at sight whereof he rejoices, for he knows that a certain part of his voyage is over, and can accurately calculate his position.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

He can now estimate accurately what is his position, can reckon the proportion of the journey still to be accomplished before he reaches his destined port, and rejoice by anticipation in the prospect of rest from his labours. Such a great point or sea-mark of history is found when the student of history reaches the period of the conclusion of the fifteenth century. He has travelled through the wide ocean of the middle ages; and the beacon that stands forth to tell him the most arduous portion of his voyage is past, has inscribed on it the record of the discovery of America, and the name of one of the greatest Worthies the world has ever beheld, the Genoese navigator, Christopher Columbus.

Among the various characteristic features that render the fifteenth century memorable among the ages, none is more prominent than the advance of geographical and especially of maritime discovery. In former times the energies of men had taken other directions; generally warlike, as evinced in the crusading spirit that, in spite of repeated and disastrous failure, sent forth hundreds of thousands to perish in an attempt whose success was in the very nature of things impossible. Wars, followed in most cases by pestilence and famine, kept down the numbers of the population in various countries. Sometimes a great plague, like the Black Death of 1348, would sweep across a continent, leaving behind it a track of desolation, and carrying off half the inhabitants of the districts it ravaged. For the more enterprising spirits, moreover, there was employment in the service of States always at war with one another, and ready to engage skilful and determined leaders of men. Age after age went by with no very marked change in the mode of life among the nations, or the appearance of any great idea to inspire them to progress and action. But in the fifteenth century all this was changed. The world woke up from the long sleep of the middle ages, and was full of intellectual activity and energy. Great inventions and discoveries, among which the art of printing stands forward in the first rank, aided every effort of progress by diffusing knowledge and bringing minds into communication. The breaking up of the old Greek empire in the middle of the century scattered throughout Europe men whose wanderings diffused throughout the nations the classic learning that had been stored up at the Byzantine Court. The splendid prosperity of the Italian republics, where "commerce proudly flourished through the State," awakened the emulation of other powers. It was a time of general energy, activity, and enterprise. A vivifying breeze seemed blowing over Europe, carrying away the dark haze of error by which for centuries the truth had been obscured. Speculative and practical men alike were longing for more light, and seemed to feel that the winter of ignorance was over and gone, and that a time was at hand when the earth should be, so to speak, widened and enlarged, according to the words of that ancient prophecy of classic days, which set forth that, in late posterity, there should come a time when ocean would relax the boundaries of the world, and a new great land would lie revealed to the gaze of man,—when Thule should no longer be the last among the nations.

PORTUGAL FOREMOST IN THE RACE; PRINCE HENRY THE NAVIGATOR AND HIS SERVICES.

In no direction did the advancing spirit of the age show itself more decidedly than in a tendency towards maritime enterprise and discovery. It was indeed hardly to be expected that the wealth and prosperity of Italy should not excite rivalry and emulation. The products of India, for which there was an ever-increasing market in Europe, were in the middle ages carried laboriously along the routes maintained undeviatingly century after century by the slow caravans to ports on the Mediterranean; and Venice and Genoa had by far the greatest share of the profit that arose from the distribution of these costly and luxurious wares throughout Europe. But in the fifteenth century a rivalry began on the part of the state of Portugal; and this rivalry was fostered, and indeed initiated, by the exertions of an enterprising, strong-willed, courageous man, endowed with a stern resolution and with a sagacity that placed him far beyond his contemporaries—Prince Henry of Portugal, surnamed the Sailor.

Inspired by an ardent half patriotic, half devotional, this remarkable man strove at once to promote the glory of his country and the spread of the Gospel. Under his auspices, voyages of discovery were undertaken into the Atlantic with the most important results. Madeira, Porto Santo, the Canary Islands, were successively added to the map of the world; and the cultivation of the vine and the sugar-cane in regions first inhabited by the wild Guanches, clad in goat-skins and inhabiting caves, brought a rich profit to the colonists. Then the idea arose of finding the way to India by sea without entering the Mediterranean. Voyages were undertaken with the view of getting round the south of Africa, and so across to the golden East; and thus the navigators successively passed the great capes on the African coast. They were not the first to venture into those distant seas. The Norman pirates had sailed across the same regions centuries before, but had left no definite record of their wanderings, excepting the De Bethencourts, Norman barons, to one of whom, John, the sovereignty of the Canary Islands was granted by the King of Portugal; and whose motto, "Talent de bien faire," is singularly appropriate, as indicating the usefulness of his discoveries. Cape Bojador was rounded by Gilianez in 1433; and the accounts brought home dissipated the fallacies entertained concerning equatorial latitudes as regions uninhabitable by man. In 1441 Prince Henry—who had obtained from the Pope a grant, for the Portuguese, of all lands to be discovered beyond Cape Bojador, with the further benefit of plenary indulgence for all who should perish in voyages, one of whose avowed objects was the gaining of many heathen souls to the Christian faith—sent two other captains, Gonzales and Tristan, to prosecute discoveries south of Cape Bojador. They came to the next great promontory, another stage in the course of discovery, Cape Blanco. Thence, on another voyage, they proceeded further south, and the zeal for further exploration was stimulated by the material profit the voyages began to yield to their promoters in the shape of gold dust and negro slaves. Thus we find not single ships, but squadrons, sailing to the coast of Guinea; and in 1444 and 1446, Vicente de Lagos, a Spaniard, and Alvino de Cada Monte, a Venetian, made very important voyages in the service of the indefatigable Portuguese prince. Cada Monte afterwards succeeded in doubling Cape Verde, with its luxuriant palm groves; and a rich cargo of gums, ivory, and gold rewarded his daring and enterprise. Fortunately for his country, Prince Henrique enjoyed great revenues in his capacity of Grand Master of the wealthy Order of Christ, and these he devoted to the aim of his life—the prosecution of discovery round Africa towards the East. We can fancy the grand old man in his favourite residence at Cape St. Vincent, looking out across the wide Atlantic, thinking of the various navigators who, under his auspices, were exploring its coasts, and musing on the future glory and prosperity these voyages were to bring to his native country. For half a century he pursued his object with undeviating perseverance; and though more than a generation passed away before the problem of the maritime route to India was definitely solved, first by the voyage of Bartholomew Diaz to that "Stormy Cape," whose name the astute John II. of Portugal judiciously changed to the more alluring appellation of Cape of Good Hope, and finally by the arrival of Vasco de Gama at Calicut, on the Malabar coast of India, the true and direct impulse to the great enterprise had been given by Henry the Navigator.

Thus did Portugal engross to herself the glorious field of maritime discovery to the East. There was, however, another direction, the exactly opposite one, in which similar distinction could be achieved. While the ships of the Portuguese were exploring the African coasts and gradually opening to it a new path for commerce by the East, a man of capacious brain, of indomitable perseverance, and of that lofty enthusiasm and unwavering belief in his destiny which is one of the chief attributes of genius, was pondering the question how India might be reached from the west; and hence was to arise an achievement unexampled in importance in the world's history, when the time should be ripe. The fulness of time for the discovery came in the year 1492; the man destined to make it was Christopher Columbus.

THE FAMILY OF COLUMBUS; THEIR POSITION AND ORIGIN.

This great navigator was born in the State of Genoa, in 1437. He was the eldest son of Dominico Columbus, a wool carder; and though his family had been reduced in circumstances, almost to actual poverty, he undoubtedly belonged to an ancient and noble race. It must be remembered, also, that in the industrial republics of Italy, as in the great towns of Flanders and Germany, handicraft was held in esteem and honour, and the trade guilds were considered honourable corporations important in the State. When exposed to insult at the hands of the proud hidalgos who, to his infinite sorrow, joined his later expeditions, the great discoverer said proudly: "I am not the first admiral of my family, let them call me what they will. David was once a shepherd, and I serve the same God who set him on a throne." He had two brothers, Bartholomew and Diego, whose names afterwards derived some lustre from association with his; though indeed Bartholomew, a man of resolute character and active mind, who became the very right hand of his illustrious senior, would probably have achieved some amount of greatness on his own account. There was a sister, too, who married an artisan of Genoa, all unconscious of the fame in store for her family.

COLUMBUS A SOLDIER, A SAILOR, AND A MAN OF SCIENCE; HIS GEOGRAPHICAL STUDIES.

The early life of Christopher Columbus was such as fitted him for the great part he was afterwards to play on the world's stage. His father, Dominico, recognizing undeniable proof of talent in the youth, sent him to the University of Pavia to study geometry, geography, astronomy, with its invariable concomitant in those days, astrology, and last, not least, navigation. There was plenty of employment to be found in those days by ardent and enterprising spirits in a naval career in the service of one or other of the maritime States of Italy, who were continually engaged as much in war as in commerce; and Christopher Columbus's university studies ended early, that he might begin the active business of life as a sailor in the service of the republic of Genoa. But his ardent mind had already imbibed a liking for knowledge, and for literary pursuits and investigations, that raised him far above the partisan warriors with whom he was associated, when, according to the custom of the times, he sought to win fame, position, and wealth in the service of various powers successively; at one time commanding a squadron of galleys under the banner of his native State, at another fighting as captain of a ship for the King of Naples. He was at once a soldier, a sailor, and a man of science. Almost from his infancy he had been passionately fond of cosmography and geographical science, in which he excelled; and the stirring scenes of his later life never effaced, or even weakened, the early inclinations of his thoughtful and pious mind. He had in his character, moreover, that touch of enthusiasm that is seldom wanting in lofty natures illumined by the light of genius. The bent of his thoughts was further determined by his occupation; for in the intervals of his maritime expeditions, he gained his livelihood, during many years, by drawing maps and charts; and thus his attention was continually fixed on geographical subjects. Especially his mind ran on the marvellous stories related by Marco Polo, concerning the lands of Cathay and Zipangu, now known as China and Japan. The old Venetian traveller had journeyed to these countries overland; but Columbus was seized with the idea that they might be reached by sea; and this thought lay hidden in his mind for many a year, until at last it was destined to bear fruit in a direction little anticipated even by himself, and to be the cause of a splendid discovery.

He established himself at Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was already gaining a livelihood as a maker of charts for sailors; and devoted himself to the same industry, varying his occupation by voyages to England, to Guinea, to the Spanish Islands in the west, and especially by a voyage which is likely to have had a close connection with his future career; for it was to the far north, or rather to the north-west, to the coast of Greenland; and in the frozen regions there still lingered among the hardy sailors from Iceland and the bleak Norwegian coasts some traditions of those voyages said to have been undertaken to the west by the bold Northern voyagers of earlier centuries; and obscurely and vaguely, yet with an unmistakable foundation of truth, the tales of the old times pointed to the existence of a great continent in the west, which had in former days been visited, though no record had been preserved of the route that led to it.

It was at Lisbon that Columbus met Donna Felippa de Palestrello, the daughter of a celebrated Italian pilot, who had been employed in the service of Prince Henry the Navigator. This lady became his wife; and the papers of Palestrello, including his correspondence with the famous Florentine geographer Toscanelli, placed in his possession by his wife's mother, are said to have furnished him with much information concerning India and those distant seas towards which his imagination was continually roaming. Many a great discovery has been based, in the first instance, on an erroneous calculation. "Die durch Irrthum zur Wahrheit reisten, Dass sind die Weisen," says the old German proverb, "Those are the wise who travel through error to truth;" and it was an error that set Christopher Columbus thinking on the possibility of reaching Zipangu and Cathay from the west.

TOKENS OF DISTANT LANDS.

His geographical theory was based on the system of Ptolemy and the Arabic geographers. He considered the world to be a globe, but underestimated its circumference by almost a third. In preparing his charts he had been struck by the fact that all the land on the globe seemed on one hemisphere, and consequently thought there should be some counterbalancing mass on the other side. Indeed, the old maps vaguely indicated a similar idea, by representing a region called Antilia, in the Atlantic. The more Columbus studied his charts, the more did conjecture shape itself into a settled conviction in his mind that a great and rich country was to be found on the other side of the globe. This region he supposed at first to be a prolongation of China or India, and his ardent imagination pictured it as that land of Ophir whence Solomon had obtained gold for the Temple.

From time to time, also, the sea had carried on its bosom some waif or fragment that spoke of countries in the west, not yet explored by the nations of the known world. Branches of trees and strange reeds had been found floating on the waters of the Atlantic, carried by eastern currents; pieces of wood, carved, but evidently not with iron tools; large canoes, hollowed from the trunk of a single pine tree; and it was told how, after a strong gale had been blowing from the west, there had been found in one of these canoes driven ashore on the strand of one of the Azores the bodies of two copper-coloured men, of a type of features unknown in those islands. In his northern voyage he had also doubtless heard of those masses of driftwood, carried by the Gulf Stream from equatorial regions, and deposited on the shores of the Arctic Ocean. The one error in his theory was that he looked upon this unknown land, of whose existence he now felt entirely convinced, as a prolongation of Asia.

OBSTACLES AND DIFFICULTIES; FAMILY MISFORTUNES.

But the age was not with him. Popular ignorance had clothed the unknown seas of the west with visionary terrors, representing the ocean as towering in gigantic waves interspersed with fathomless abysses, and roaring cataracts forming an inaccessible wall at the edge of the world. Others declared that the waters rushed towards the antipodes with an irresistible force that would carry the strongest ships helplessly along with it. The general opinion represented those distant regions of the earth as guarded by a power that had proclaimed to man, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther." Thus, when his aspirations took a definite shape in the mind of the navigator, and he made attempts to induce first one Government and then another to fit out an expedition for western exploration, he met everywhere with discouragement and refusal. His native Genoa verified the proverb that a prophet hath not honour in his own country. John II. of Portugal, though he listened with interest to the Italian navigator's propositions, referred them to a council, who pronounced the scheme altogether chimerical, but treacherously sent out a ship secretly, in charge of a pilot, commissioned to try and find the route to Asia on his own account. After a short cruise beyond the Azores, unable to shape his course, and terrified by the novelty of his position, the navigator returned, and stigmatised the whole idea of Columbus as a delusion.

Misfortunes had meantime come upon the ardent genius so little appreciated by his contemporaries. His wife Donna Felippa was dead. His investigations had been pursued to the detriment of his worldly interests; he was in debt, and his creditors seized his very maps and charts. He was fain to quit Lisbon secretly; and with his son Diego at his hand, took the road to Spain, a penniless man, resolved to negotiate with Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile for the discovery of a new world.

COLUMBUS FINDS A PATRON; DISAPPOINTMENTS AND DELAYS; A COUNCIL.

Thus it happened that on a memorable day two travellers, one a grave, stalwart, handsome man, with locks prematurely sprinkled with gray, the other a delicate child of some seven or eight years, presented themselves, dusty and wayworn, to solicit hospitality at the gate of the Convent of La Rabida, near the then flourishing seaport of Palos, in Andalusia. The Prior, Juan Perez, a man of more enlightened mind than his contemporaries, listened with interest that heightened into wonder as the grave stranger expounded to him the grand scheme in which his whole life was absorbed. As with the calm deliberation of a settled faith, Columbus explained, step by step, his mighty project, the soul of Juan Perez caught the inspiration, and he became the first convert to the views of the navigator. He had been the confessor of the good Queen Isabella, and furnished the stranger with a letter of introduction to Fernando de Talavera, his successor in that office. Leaving his son Diego in the care of the good monk, Columbus set forth with renewed courage towards Cordova, where the court was then sojourning.

But his fair prospects of success were soon clouded with doubt and disappointment. Ferdinand and Isabella were then engaged in the task of driving the Moors from Spain; and the former would probably have felt little inclination to devote any of the resources of his kingdom to what he considered a visionary scheme. In the first instance, however, he had not the opportunity; for Ferdinand de Talavera, convinced that the applicant whose magnificent schemes contrasted so strangely with his poverty was a visionary, utterly disregarded the recommendation of Juan Perez, and never mentioned him to the King or Queen. Little did those powerful monarchs think, during the next two years, that the disregarded stranger, earning a precarious living by his old profession of map-drawing and engraving, waiting with magnificent patience till his opportunity should come, was destined to throw the chief glory on their reign, and to achieve the work by which it should be chiefly remembered. He was repulsed from every door, says the historian Oviedo, because he was poorly clad, and because he brought no recommendation to the courtiers and ministers except the letter of a solitary Franciscan monk, who had long been forgotten at court.

One consolation, however, he had; Donna Beatrix Enriquez of Cordova became the successor of the dead Felippa in his affections; and a son, Fernando, was born to him. In the course of time he made friends; one of whom, Mendoza, Archbishop of Toledo, procured him the interview for which he had waited so long. In this memorable audience Columbus proved himself a great man. Afterwards he writes how he entirely forgot his own individuality in the thought of the message he brought. "I was no longer myself," he says; "I was the instrument of God, chosen and set apart to accomplish a great work." Ferdinand, cold and grave by nature, was yet impressed by the strength and genius of this unknown stranger. Isabella understood him at once, and from that first interview became his consistent and generous patroness and friend. But again his scheme was referred to a clerical council, and nearly all the members pronounced it not only visionary but impious. The assertion of the sphericity of the world was the stone of offence to these extraordinary scientists; and metaphoric texts and passages of Scripture, literally interpreted, were quoted as proofs that his geography was wrong. One member of the council alone, Diego de Deza, gave him a cordial and friendly support; the business was adjourned, and again Columbus experienced all the sickness of heart that arises from hope deferred. But the Queen came to his aid in this time of trouble. By her order, quarters were assigned to the navigator at each halting-place of the Court, which was then moving about from place to place, so that he at least was recognized as a guest of the Sovereigns.

Thus years passed on. The Moorish war was ended, and Christopher Columbus, in the train of Ferdinand and Isabella, took part in that triumphal entry into Granada, on New Year's Day of 1492, that signalized the final downfall of Moorish dominion in Spain; when poor weak Boabdil el Chico took his last tearful look at the kingdom he had lost, and his stern mother scornfully bade him "weep like a woman over what he could not defend like a man."

Peace had returned at last, and the claims of the navigator were brought forward for consideration once more. The verdict of the council was against him; but Ferdinand, influenced by Isabella, gave him hopes that an expedition would be fitted out to try the question practically. Then came more delay, more hope deferred; and at length Columbus, half broken-hearted, quitted the Court, and again appeared at the gate of La Rabida, on foot, poorer and more dejected than ever. And now again the worthy Prior took up his cause, writing to Isabella herself on his behalf. This step was most fortunate. Columbus was sent for to Court, and the council was directed to reconsider its decision.

THE DEMANDS OF COLUMBUS; INTERVENTION OF ISABELLA.

A new difficulty now arose. Columbus, convinced of the reality of the scheme, had stipulated that he should receive the viceroyalty of the new possessions he would add to the dominions of Spain, and a certain proportion of the revenues thence derived; and to these demands he firmly and unwaveringly adhered. They appeared unreasonable as proceeding from a man who had everything to gain and nothing to lose; but he would make no abatement. For eighteen years he had waited for this hour, and now that it had come, he would hear of no bargain that bore the appearance of lessening the value of his thought. He resolved to quit the country that had despised his offer. His brother Bartholomew had already made overtures to Henry VII. of England. He would now himself proffer his services to the Court of France. He had already started for Cordova when a messenger overtook him, despatched by Isabella, who, by a generous inspiration, determined not to lose him on a sordid question of money. The financial transactions of the kingdoms of Aragon and Castile were kept separate, though the Sovereigns were united in marriage; and Isabella declared that all the expenses of the expedition should be charged on the revenues of Castile, which was done accordingly, and on the 17th April, 1492, a treaty was signed at Granada, between the sovereign princes of Spain on the one hand, and the Genoese adventurer on the other, for the discovery of a new world.

It was in the port of Palos that the expedition was to be fitted out. Among the chief inhabitants were three brothers, named Pinzon, able navigators, and men of wealth and position; two of these, Martin Alonzo Pinzon and Vincent Yanez Pinzon, resolved to take part personally in the enterprise. Three vessels were fitted out; the first, the Santa Maria, was commanded by Columbus himself; the second, the Pinta, by Alonzo; the third, the Nina, by Yanez Pinzon. For the service required of them, these barks were of the smallest, the Santa Maria, the Admiral's ship, being the only one completely decked. The others were of the kind called caravels, open in the waist, and only decked at the forecabin and poop; such vessels as would barely be used as coasters at the present time. The crews of the three ships consisted of a hundred and twenty souls in all.

1492; COLUMBUS'S FIRST VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY; DEPARTURE FROM PALOS.

On the 3rd August, 1492, the little squadron quitted the harbour of Palos amid the mournful adieux of the populace, who augured nothing good from what appeared to them a lamentably rash enterprise, and considered they were bidding an eternal farewell to their comrades. Nor were the sailors themselves in a more cheerful mood. They looked upon themselves as sacrifices offered up to the visionary schemes of an enthusiast, and the ambition of the Queen. The Admiral alone preserved his serenity. Now at length, after infinite delays and disappointments, his theory was to be put to the test; and it was for him to animate the courage of his companions, and to impart to them, if possible, a portion of the confidence he felt himself in the issue of their enterprise.

They touched at the Canary Islands; and the terrors and despondency of the sailors, repressed for a while by their leader's exhortations, returned when they saw the Peak of Teneriffe, the last land of the known world, disappear below the horizon, and found themselves steering westward through an ocean altogether untraversed and unknown. From that time until the triumphant day when the New World greeted their sight they were generally despondent, sometimes despairing, and not unfrequently mutinous. Their discontent on several occasions took the form of open revolt, and it required all the firmness as well as the persuasion of their leader to make them keep their course, and prevent them from turning the prows of the ships homeward; for they were continually exclaiming that their lives were being sacrificed, and that the whole scheme was delusive. Columbus laboured incessantly to bring them to a better frame of mind. To use his own words, he had condemned himself not to sleep until his enterprise should be accomplished. He described to the sailors, as though he had seen them, the riches and beauties of the lands they were about to discover. He concealed from them the daily reckoning he made of the distance traversed, as the trade winds blew them gently on in the course he wished to keep. It was impossible not to take heart under such a leader, though the spirit of opposition at times broke out in murmurs of despondency, and sometimes even in mutinous and fierce complaints. The declination of the needle, increasing as the equator was approached, terrified his pilots, who with consternation saw their trusted guide becoming apparently untrue to them. Columbus strove to reassure them by ascribing this variation to the influence of new stars shining in those regions.

The sight of some plants of the kinds that grow on rocks near the seashore, and of great floating masses of seaweed, and still more the appearance of birds of species seldom seen far from land, revived their spirits for a time, so that indeed they confidently imagined themselves near the goal of their journey; and more than once distant clouds on the horizon, being mistaken for land by the eager sailors, were hailed with eager rejoicing, that gave place to proportionate depression when the supposed land faded away in the distance. The trade winds, too, blowing them steadily along on their western course, became a source of alarm; the sailors feared that they were approaching regions whence they would never be able to return to Spain; and when the wind at last changed they insisted on having the course of the ships altered, declaring that they had done their duty, and that now they ought to be taken home. By alternate promises of reward, to encourage the timid, and threats of the King's anger to intimidate the mutinous, the Admiral contrived with infinite difficulty to preserve his influence and authority. He took advantage of a favourable moment to point the ships, whose course had been altered, once more to the west. A new terror was excited by the enormous amount of floating weed, with which the ocean in one part of their course appeared covered. The sailors declared that as they advanced these masses were increasing, and that at last the ships would be inextricably entangled in them. Everything that was new, in earth, air, and sky, awakened doubt and terror in their breasts; and amid all this fear, discouragement, and distrust, the Admiral had to preserve an appearance of perfect serenity and confidence, as the murmurs grew louder and were threatening from sullen and mutinous groups of men.

HOPE AND SUSPENSE; LAND DISCOVERED ON OCTOBER 12TH, 1492.

Things became worse through the reaction that followed a delusive hope. One morning at daybreak the cry of "Land!" arose from the Pinta, Alonso Pinzon's vessel, which was sailing close to that of the Admiral; and the men, fixing their eyes on a cloudy mass on the verge of the horizon, fell on their knees and gave thanks to God, believing that the end of their troubles and dangers was at hand, and that success had come at last. But to their intense mortification the supposed land melted away on their approach, fading like an unsubstantial pageant, and leaving nothing but deep despondency in the hearts of the baffled mariners. A similar "false alarm," a few days later, from the Nina, which hoisted her flags and fired her guns as a token of having seen land, brought the men to the verge of despair; and Columbus himself began to be doubtful whether he had not passed the extreme point of Asia, and if he might not be entering some new and unknown ocean. Thus the days wore on, until at last such unmistakable appearances showed themselves to the experienced eyes of the Admiral that he could doubt no longer, and even the reluctant crews felt their spirits revive within them, and were assured that the wished-for land must speedily show itself, and that success was certain.

For now a freshly-uprooted reed, with earth still clinging to its fibres, came floating by the ships; branches of trees presently appeared, one of them covered with fresh berries. The colour of the water had changed, and on sounding with the lead they found bottom. And, presently, a plank, with marks of the hatchet on it, and a club carved with some cutting instrument, gave token of the handiwork of man. Even the most incredulous were now convinced, and on board the ships all was joyful expectation when the night of the 11th of October closed in. A reward had been promised by the King, in the shape of a pension, to the man who should first discover the land of the New World; and in the triumph of his heart Columbus added a costly suit of velvet as a present from himself, enjoining the crews to keep good watch. He himself remained all night on the poops of the Santa Maria. Suddenly he thought he saw in the distance a moving light, and called two of his companions, Pedro Gutierrez and Rodrigo Sanchez, who confirmed his opinion. The light disappeared, but afterwards reappeared twice—a testimony that the land they were approaching was inhabited. As the morning of the 12th of October dawned, a gun, fired from the Pinta, which was somewhat in advance of the other vessels, announced that the mystery of the ocean was solved at length, and that the New World was found.

THE NEW WORLD; GUANAHANI, OR SAN SALVADOR; TOKENS OF GOLD.

The sailors fell on their knees, mingling with their outbursts of thankfulness and joy prayers to their Admiral that he would pardon their mutinous and disobedient behaviour. It was no time to remember offences. The heart of the Admiral was rejoiced by the realization of his life's dream; and the next duty was that of taking possession of the land thus opportunely discovered. It proved to be an island, green and beautiful to look upon, with forests rising in terraces almost from the verge of the ocean to the top of the great amphitheatre in the background. As the boats approached the shore, a number of dark-skinned natives could be seen running to and fro, evidently full of wonder at the appearance of the strangers. Afterwards it appeared that they looked upon the Spaniards as celestial visitants, thinking the ships had soared through the sky on their "woven wings," and had alighted, like huge birds, near their coasts. They are described as a friendly, simple people, these poor islanders, submissive and obliging, and anxious to do all honour to their visitors when once their timidity had been overcome. They were copper-coloured, with long wavy hair floating over their shoulders; their faces had an open expression, and they seemed true children of Nature.

The landing of Columbus and his crews on this first discovered land of the New World was effected with considerable pomp and ceremony. The Te Deum was chanted as the ship approached the shore. Columbus, Alonso, and Yanez Pinzon landed each from his boat, followed by a portion of the crew, bearing aloft a crucifix, and the royal standard displaying the arms and the intertwined cyphers of Ferdinand and Isabella. Reverently kneeling on the shore at the foot of the crucifix, the leader of the expedition gave thanks to the Power that had protected him and his companions amid the perils of the unknown deep, and had crowned his long-cherished hopes with triumphant fulfilment. He had on this occasion invested himself with the signs of his office as Admiral and viceroy of the countries he was to discover, and wore the purple mantle that indicated royal dignity. His companions, who had lately been ready to throw him into the sea as a visionary and an impostor, now knelt around him, and gazed upon him with admiration little short of worship, rendering full though tardy homage to the greatness of his genius, and acknowledging the wrong they had done in doubting and thwarting him. In the Admiral's mind the feeling of thankfulness and piety, predominant over triumphant exultation, is shown in the name he gave to the island—San Salvador, or St. Saviour; thus consecrating the first portion of the New World with the name of the Master whose servant he professed himself to be.

Guanahani, as the natives called their island, was considered by Columbus as situated on the extreme confines of the Indian Ocean, which he pictured to himself as stretching far to the east of the realms of Zipangu and Cathay. Thus the name, West Indies, given to the islands of the Caribbean Sea, and the name Indians, by which the natives were designated, arose from an error of the great navigator, in which he continued till his death, and the name was retained after the error had been corrected through the more accurate knowledge brought by later discoverers.

Though the natives of Guanahani were ignorant of the use of metals, insomuch that several cut their hands by grasping, with the curiosity of children, at the glittering Spanish sword-blades,—and though they had no idea of the relative value of things, eagerly exchanging whatever they possessed for a few glass beads or scraps of coloured cloth,—one circumstance about them speedily excited the attention and interest of the Spaniards. Many of them wore ornaments of gold—earrings and nose-rings, and thin bands round the wrists and ankles. They attached no value to these, readily exchanging them for any trifles offered by their visitors, whom they informed, by signs, that the gold came from a country to the south. In that direction, accordingly, the squadron sailed away; for the imagination of the Spaniards had been fired by the relations of Marco Polo and by traditions of yet earlier times, concerning a land where the precious metal was to be found in masses; and especially there rose before them gorgeous visions of that fabled region of Zipangu, whose king was said to dwell in palaces paved with gold. Their ships were stocked with fresh fruits and cassava by the friendly natives, who little thought that the visit of the white strangers was to be to them the commencement of a period of suffering, devastation, and ultimate ruin.

CUBA DISCOVERED; TREACHERY OF ALONZO PINZON.

Through a labyrinth of islands the voyagers threaded their way, touching at and naming several, and ever finding in the natural productions and in the natives a repetition of San Salvador. To the continually repeated question put by means of interpreters brought with them from Guanahani, they everywhere received the same answer: the country of gold was to be sought further south, and its name was Cuba.

On the 27th of October they reached this island, which recalled to Columbus, on a more majestic scale, the image of Sicily. The gorgeousness of nature in the plant and animal world here astonished the travellers more than even in the smaller islands they had till now discovered. "This is the most beautiful island the eye of man hath ever beheld," Columbus writes in his Journal. "One would wish to live in it for ever, and cannot here conceive the idea of pain or death." Columbus, as he sailed along the eastern portion of the northern coast, felt convinced that Cuba was a prolongation of Asia. But the natives, more timid than those of Guanahani, took to flight on seeing the strangers; and it was with extreme difficulty that the fears of some of them were overcome, and by means of presents and carresses they were induced to commence an intercourse, partly by signs, partly by the help of the interpreters from Guanahani. But though the envoys despatched into the interior of the island came back with specimens of new and unknown plants and fruits, the golden visions of wealth were not realized. The natives, when interrogated as to the whereabouts of stores of gold, pointed to the east; and accordingly for the east the sails were hoisted. For by this time cupidity had entered into the hearts of the crews, and the horrible lust of gold, the fruitful parent of many crimes, and destined to sully with stains of blood many a page of the record of discovery, had taken entire possession of them. Every object of their great enterprise seemed merged in the one desire to become suddenly rich; and again the fabled tales of Cathay and Zipangu and their riches inflamed the imaginations of all. So entirely did the love of gold overpower all other feelings in the mind of Alonzo Pinzon, the commander of the Pinta, that he took advantage of the sailing qualities of his vessel to abandon the Admiral and the other ships of the squadron, and to make the best of his way alone, in the hope of first freighting his ship with a golden cargo, and then carrying to Spain the news of the great discovery, and thus anticipating the fame and rewards due to Columbus.

DISCOVERY OF HAITI, OR ST. DOMINGO; THE FIRST SETTLEMENT.

Early in December the Admiral, thus abandoned by his faithless subordinate, came in sight of a great country eastward of Cuba. The natives called it Haiti; but the navigator, anxious to perpetuate the fame of the country that had sent him forth on his voyage, gave to this new land the name of Hispaniola, or Lesser Spain. It is the island now known as St. Domingo. The inhabitants are described by Columbus as in many respects superior to those of the islands he had yet seen; a handsome, good-natured race, living happy and contented under the paternal rule of their caciques or chiefs; kindly, hospitable, and simple; living amidst a nature so prodigal in its gifts that property had not yet created among them the idea of avarice or cupidity. "These men," he said, "seem as if they lived in a golden age, happy and contented in great and open gardens, that are neither surrounded with ditches nor divided by palings, nor shut in by walls. They act loyally towards one another, without laws, without books or judges. They regard him as a bad man who takes pleasure in doing another an injury." A great misfortune happened to Columbus here. While he was asleep the pilot to whom his ship had been entrusted ran her on a rock, and then fled in a boat towards the only remaining vessel, the Nina, with a party of sailors, under pretence of carrying an anchor ashore. The presence of mind and energy of the Admiral saved the lives of his companions, who got to land on a raft; and the friendliness of a cacique named Guacanagari, whose guest he had already been, provided a shelter for the shipwrecked men, and all the alleviation of which their situation was capable. The simple islander shed tears of compassion at the strangers' mishap; and with his men he laboured diligently to save everything that could be rescued from the wreck; and the property of the Spaniards, collected on the shore, remained as safe as the gold ornaments are said to have been that were hung up beside the English highways in the days of good King Alfred. Columbus was touched by the kindness and honesty of his hosts, and emphatically declared in his writings that there was nowhere on earth a better land or a better people.

And here, again, the display of some ornaments and coronets of pure gold, on which the islanders seemed to set no special value, excited eagerness questioning from the Spaniards. Guacanagari gave them to understand that within his country among the mountains in the interior was a region where gold could be found in abundance; and the name Cibao was mentioned, whose similarity to Zipangu in sound deceived Columbus; who, convinced that he had now come to the region of untold wealth, was anxious to return as quickly as possible to Europe with the good news, rather than risk the loss of all by a longer stay. For as Martin Alonzo Pinzon had abandoned him, and his own ship had been wrecked, he had only the little caravel the Nina left; and unless he succeeded in bringing her back safely to Spain, the secret of his discovery might yet be buried in the sea. He accordingly made every preparation. The friendly cacique, little dreaming what misery he was preparing for his people, readily consented to the building of a fort with the timber of the wrecked ship. This fort, to which he gave the name La Navidad, Columbus left in the charge of forty men, under the command of Peter d'Arena. He furnished them with all things needful for defence, and with goods for barter with the natives, and charged them to maintain friendly relations with the cacique and his people, and by exploration and questioning to gain all possible information concerning the gold regions in the interior; and so on the 4th of January, 1493, he bade adieu to the friendly Guacanagari, and set sail for Europe.

Along the coast he fell in with the Pinta, and with Martin Alonzo Pinzon, whose excuse of having been separated from him by accident he received graciously, conscious that he owed much to Pinzon and his family, without whose active co-operation he would hardly have got his ships equipped at Palos; and therefore he was not inclined, with regard to his lieutenant's act of undoubted treachery, "that every nice offence should bear its comment."

THE RETURN TO EUROPE; A STORMY PASSAGE; TRIUMPH.

Together, therefore, they hoisted sail for Europe. But the return voyage was not favoured, as the outward passage had been, by fair and genial weather. Furious gales and mountainous waves menaced the very existence of the ships, and Columbus was for a time tormented by the fear that his discovery would, after all, never be made known in Europe, but that the sea would hide its secret. During that perilous passage he more than once committed to the deep, in a securely fastened receptacle, a short record of his arrival at the western world, in the hope that if he and his crews perished the waves might bear the precious lines to some civilized shore, and thus rescue his great achievement from oblivion. One of these messages from the sea did actually find its way to land, after being washed to and fro for centuries in the Atlantic currents. Again the murmurs of discontent arose, and the superstitious sailors, regarding the tempest as a judgment upon their chief for his presumption in daring to uncoil the mystery of the distant and unknown shores, were ready to cast him, like Jonah, into the sea, as a propitiatory offering to the incensed genius of the storm. But some feeling of respect and awe for the Admiral's greatness restrained them; and at length the ships arrived, sorely battered and bruised, at one of the Azores, the island of St. Mary. Thence a succession of stormy days blew the little Nina out of her course, and drove her to the mouth of the Tagus, where she arrived on the 4th of March. Columbus was presented to King John II. of Portugal, who listened with wonder and interest to his account of his voyage. At last, on the 13th, the caravel entered the port of Palos, whence she had sailed amid such gloomy forebodings between seven and eight months before. Martin Alonso Pinzon in the Pinta had again parted company, and endeavoured to get to Europe first with the grand news of success. But he was outstripped in the race, arriving in Spain just after the Admiral. He died a few days afterwards, his death being hastened, if not caused, by shame and vexation. He had been guilty of a bad action in deserting his great chief, and endeavouring to appropriate to himself the fame that was another's; but it is only just that his merits should be weighed in the scale against his one fault, and that the share of the Pinzon family in the great enterprise of 1492 should be gratefully acknowledged by posterity.

The return of Columbus to Palos was hailed with acclamations and shouts of joy. The court was then at Barcelona, and to that city the Admiral was directed at once to repair. Ferdinand and Isabella received him with every mark of honour and respect, desiring him to be seated in their presence, and receiving from his own lips the first account of the world he had discovered. The natives whom he brought with him, the strange birds of bright plumage, the unknown fruits and other vegetable productions, and, more than all the rest, the crowns and ornaments of pure gold he presented to his royal patrons, were the theme of universal admiration. He was confirmed in all the titles, dignities, and privileges that had been promised him, and it was determined that a new expedition should be at once despatched, to complete what had been so auspiciously begun.

1793, SECOND VOYAGE OF COLUMBUS; THE SETTLEMENT OF ISABELLA; JAMAICA DISCOVERED.

The second voyage of Columbus, in 1793, was begun under very different auspices from that of the previous year. Now all was hurry and eagerness to depart. The spirit of adventure, no less than that of cupidity, had been thoroughly aroused, and hundreds were eager to assist in the work of planting the cross and the standard of Spain in the distant regions beyond the ocean. Columbus was to have the vice-royalty of all the regions he should discover; and Fonseca, Archdeacon of Seville, received the title of Patriarch of the Indies, and was entrusted with the preparations for the new and grand expedition to the west. This man afterwards became the most consistent opponent of Columbus, whose life he helped to embitter by his intrigues.

The new expedition started with every augury of success. It consisted of no fewer than seventeen ships, three of them being of large size; and no fewer than fifteen hundred men took part in the enterprise. But they were not, in general, the right men for colonists or for discoverers. Many of them were young hidalgos, impelled to join in the enterprise partly from love of adventure, partly in the hope of speedily enriching themselves. Their insubordination and turbulent disregard of authority rendered the task of controlling them difficult, if not impossible, of accomplishment; and they were far more inclined to oppress than to civilize the natives among whom they went. But nothing of this was felt at the beginning, when the fleet sailed gaily out of Cadiz Bay on the 28th of September.

As on his first voyage, the passage was fair, and the trade winds wafted the voyagers gently towards the west. On this occasion Columbus chose a more southerly course, and fresh discoveries were the consequence. On the 2nd of November, Guadaloupe was discovered: and here the voyagers became with horror aware of the customs of the Caribs, a wild people, of whom the mild inhabitants of Cuba and Haiti had already spoken with terror. Unmistakable traces of cannibalism showed the nature of these fierce people, some of whom, however, the Spaniards took prisoners. Thence, through the Antilles, Columbus steered his course for Haiti, anxious to revisit his colony, the first ever planted in the New World.

But to answering greeted the salvo with which Columbus announced his arrival. The fort lay in ruins, the cannon half buried in the ground ; while the whitening bones strewed around told too plainly the melancholy fate of the settlement. At first the natives hid themselves, with a timidity strangely in contrast with the confidence they had shown in the previous year, but after a time, from the mouth of the cacique, the truth was learnt. It appeared that the Spaniards had, on the departure of Columbus, at once commenced towards the natives that system of tyranny and oppression which their successors but too consistently carried out, to the utter extermination of those harmless races. They had enslaved the men, and taken possession of the women and girls ; until their cruelty and their licentious wickedness had aroused the islanders to make reprisals. Massacring the natives without pity or remorse, they had at length been massacred in their turn.

At some distance from the spot where the ill-omened fort of the Nativity had stood, Columbus founded the settlement of Isabella, the first permanent European colony in the New World. He named it after his patroness and friend, the Queen of Castile. Here for a time he was actively employed, superintending the building of houses and the laying out of enclosures and plantations, the construction of roads and the organizing expeditions to the interior ; for underlying all the activity and work of the new colony was the main idea of the acquisition of gold. The mountain Cibao was not far from the settlement, and thither the hopes of the Spaniards led them ; but the supply obtained disappointed their expectations. The natives, when questioned on the subject, pointed to the south as the land whence gold was to be won ; and thither accordingly Columbus led an expedition, after leaving his brother Don Diego as lieutenant at Isabella in his absence. He skirted part of the coast of Cuba, which he still believed to belong to the mainland of Asia ; and then, sailing southward in consequence of the natives' information, came to the large and important island of Jamaica. Here they found a more warlike race of inhabitants than in Cuba and Haiti, new and splendid plants, and exquisitely beautiful scenery ; but not the gold, on which their hopes were bent. After sailing some distance southward from Jamaica, Columbus was compelled to abandon further exploration for the time, and return to Hispaniola. His health had at length utterly given way under the continued strain of his exertions and anxieties. He suffered greatly from the gout ; and mental trouble was added in a large measure to his corporeal discomfort. He was carried on shore at Isabella in almost a dying state ; so complete was his exhaustion that recovery seemed impossible.

BARTHOLOMEW COLUMBUS ; ENVY AND CALUMNY ; AGUADO SENT AS COMMISSIONER ; SCHEME FOR A THIRD VOYAGE.

Very fortunately his brother Bartholomew had arrived in the colony shortly before ; a bold and absolute man, who proved a tower of strength to his brother. And never had such support as he could give been more needed. The colony was in a state of disorganization and mutiny. The discontented spirits had formed a faction against the governor, and calumnious reports against him were transmitted to Spain. The real truth appears to have been that many who went out with the idea of enriching themselves suddenly from the reputed gold mines, found themselves obliged not only to abandon their golden dreams for a time, but to go through the rough work inseparable from the foundation of a new colony. They accordingly were loud in their complaints against the Admiral, whom they accused of deceiving them. Some of the number actually returned to Spain, where their complaints were eagerly listened to by Fonseca, the Patriarch of the Indies, now Bishop of Badajoz, and the determined enemy of Columbus, whose authority he regarded as interfering with his own. By his influence he contrived that a commissioner should be sent out from Spain to investigate the state of affairs in the colony. This commissioner, Juan de Aguado, was a creature of his own ; and when Columbus saw in what a spirit of hostility Aguado was collecting evidence, he judged it prudent to go back to Europe himself, lest his credit with the King and Queen should be entirely destroyed. His return was very different from that after his first voyage. The grand expectation of finding masses of gold that had inflamed the imagination of the Spaniards had not been realized ; and instead of fortunate adventurers enriched beyond the dreams of avarice, there were seen landing at Cadiz a miserable set of angry and discontented men, who considered themselves deceived by the glowing reports Columbus had made of the New World, and were anxious for revenge. Columbus himself deeply felt the change in his position and understood how envy, calumny, and dis-disappointed greed were determined to hunt him to his grave. He appeared at Burgos, where the Court was then residing, not as before, in brave apparel, but in the habit of a Franciscan, girded with the cord of the order, his venerable head and his feet bare. The gentle heart of Isabella was touched at the appearance of the grand old man, who had brought so much glory to the crown of Spain, and who now, in the evening of his life, was fain to defend himself against the accusations of rancorous enemies. Ferdinand also perceived that Columbus had been wronged, and his own ears deceived by false reports. He was sufficiently shrewd and politic, however, to see that, rightly or wrongly, the Admiral was not popular in the colony. Accordingly, while outwardly restoring him to favour, and listening to the Admiral's proposals for a new expedition further to search out the secrets of the New World, he permitted delays to be interposed, so that year after year went by, and still no fleet was equipped; and the Admiral was now beyond sixty years of age, and the hardships, anxieties, and troubles of his second voyage, with his long and severe illness, had told upon him greatly. Isabella also, whose gentle and compassionate nature revolted against the system of slavery introduced by the Spaniards among the natives, stipulated for conditions of freedom and justice with respect to the Indians that would hardly be maintained among a tyrannical and turbulent community who considered the servitude and enforced labour of the aborigines an essential part of their scheme for enriching themselves. All these things occasioned a long delay before the petition of Columbus could be granted. He begged for eight ships, two to be dispatched with supplies to Hispaniola, and the remaining six to accompany him on a fresh exploration, which he felt certain would result in the discovery of that land of Ophir whose image had so often been present to his imagination.

1498, COLUMBUS STARTS ON HIS THIRD VOYAGE; EVIL OMENS.

One reason of a very serious nature there was that increased the delay. The royal treasury was nearly empty; Ferdinand's profound and skillful schemes of policy, destined to entrust the Spanish House with a wealth and grandeur that attained their highest point under his grandson Charles V., demanded the outlay of great sums in warlike enterprises, and in the pomp and display consequent upon the great family alliances by which he was consolidating his power; and these schemes of ambition and war for a long time stood in the way of Columbus and his claims. It was not until April, 1498, that Columbus was enabled to start on his third voyage.

Isabella, his constant friend, had done all in her power to advance his interests. He was confirmed in his titles and emoluments; the general license to navigators granted in 1496, at which Columbus had felt aggrieved as an interference with his rights, was revoked. Bartholomew Columbus, the Admiral's brother, was confirmed in the office of Adelantado bestowed on him by the Admiral. But the voyage began under evil auspices. Fonseca, bishop of Badajoz, and Intendant of the Indies, was, as he had ever been, the enemy of Columbus, and continued to throw every obstacle in his way. At the last, De Breviesca, a creature of Fonseca, treated Columbus with such open insolence on board the Admiral's own ship that the indignant veteran, losing his self-control, struck the parasite to the ground and spurned him with his foot. He quickly became sensible, however, how this natural outburst might be turned to account by his enemies, who were never weary of representing him as a headstrong, violent man, unfitted for command; and in a letter to the King and Queen, written soon after, he pathetically entreats them to believe, when his character is assailed, that he is "absent, envied, and a stranger."

DISCOVERY OF THE MAINLAND OF AMERICA; THE ISLAND OF TRINIDAD; THE ORINOCO.

The reports of disappointed adventurers had caused a great revulsion of public opinion with regard to the New World. There were not now, as in 1493, fifteen hundred people anxious and willing to take part in a voyage thither; those regions were now represented as offering only poverty, hardships, and toil to the settler, and few were disposed to join the expedition. Columbus now proposed that the deficiency in numbers should be supplied by despatching to Hispaniola parties of convicts, whose crimes had not been especially heinous, hoping by this means to obtain men who in satisfaction at their ameliorated condition would work cheerfully and submissively. The measure was an unfortunate one, for it filled the settlement with a rabble always ripe for mischief, and ready to join in any project of riot and rebellion against authority.

On this third voyage Columbus pursued a more southerly route, steering south-west after leaving the Cape Verde Islands, and came into the region

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

"Columbus was a man whom all posterity will view with admiration and honour with applause. The ingratitude he experienced is the usual return for services too great to be repaid. The minion of power may receive an adequate reward for his degrading servilities; but he who eclipses the splendour of an original kingdom by such an accession as a new world, may excite envy, but cannot meet with a due recompense without being considered as a rival to his prince. Perhaps the grand source of the misfortunes of Columbus was his indiscreet stipulation for a joint authority in his new discoveries. His good sense might have told him, that it was impossible to be a partner with a king."

A Spanish writer of veracity gives the following character of the great navigator: "Columbus was tall of stature, had a long visage, and a majestic aspect. His nose was aquiline, his eyes grey, and his complexion clear and ruddy. When young, his hair and beard were fair; but hardships soon turned them grey. He was a man of wit and pleasantry, eloquent in discourse, yet moderately grave in his deportment. His affability to strangers, and his judicious conversation, gained him the affection of every ingenuous mind; while an air of authority and grandeur attracted respect. He was strict in his religious observances himself, and obliged those who were under his command to show at least a decent regard to this sacred institution. He had an earnest concern for the conversion of the Indians, and endeavoured as much as was in his power to allure them, by obliging the Spaniards to lead a life in some measure corresponding to the faith they professed. His courage was undaunted: he was fond of great enterprises, temperate in living, modest in dress, patient under injuries; and much more anxious to bring his enemies to a sense of their offences, than to retaliate injustice. He remained unmoved amidst the numerous dangers and adversities that attended him, ever placing a firm reliance on Divine Providence. In short, had he lived in earlier times his conduct and his achievements would have procured him statues and temples in his honour. He would have been ranked with Hercules and Bacchus; and a constellation perhaps would have borne his name. However, he will be remembered as long as the world endures."
